INTRODUCTION

I. THE NĀRADĪYA PURĀṆA (NP.) AND ITS PLACE IN THE EVOLUTION OF THE PURĀṆA LITERATURE

i. The Ur-Purāṇa :

The term Purāṇa, though variously derived,[1] originally meant 'old' and was used as an adjective in the Ṛgveda (ṚV.). It developed the connotation 'something handed down from old times', 'a collection of old legends' by the time of the Atharvaveda (AV.) wherein it is used as a noun. Its use in the singular number in the sense of a tract of literature consisting of some ancient traditional lore in the AV[2] testifies to the existence of some collection of legends or an Ur-Purāṇa in the days of the AV. The institution of sacrifice needed some such collection of legends for narration on certain days (called Pāriplava) during the course of a sacrifice of long duration is clear from the prescription in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa (Śat. Br.) which calls upon the reciter to assert that the Purāṇa is the Veda and recite it.[3]

That there was such an Ur-Purāṇa in ancient times has been endorsed by Purāṇas in their mythological way. States the Nāradīya Purāṇa (NP.)

'There was only one Purāṇa (at the beginning of) every Kalpa. It was one hundred crores (of verses ?) in extent and that Purāna was the source of all Śāstras.[4]

1. For example :

Purāṇavaṁ bhavati "What was new in ancient times" Yāska-Nirukta III. 27, Purāanati 'That which breathes (existed) in the past (Vāyu P. I. 203)., Purā (Pūrvasmin kāle) bhavam (Pāṇini 4.3.23, 2.1.4).

2. AV. XI. 7.24; XV.6.10-11.

In AV.XI.8.7., the designation Purāṇa-vit 'Knower of Purāṇas' merely testifies to the existence of Purāṇa at that time but not the number of Purāṇas.

(AV.XI.7.24)

Tam itihāsaś ca Purāṇaṁ ca gāthāś ca nārāsaṁsīś cānvyacalan/

(AV.XV.6.10-11)

3. Śat. Br. XIII.4.3.12-13.

4. NP.I.92.22.23.

The Matsya Purāṇa (Mt. P.) is more explicit.

'God Brahmā 'remembered' Purāṇa (sg. no.) before all other Śāstras. It is after that all the Vedas proceeded from his mouths. Purāṇa was only one at the beginning.[5]

As the mention of 'Purāṇa' in the sg. no. in AV is corroborated by the traditional belief in Purāṇas in the existence of one, single Ur-Purāṇa, this tradition need not be regarded as 'purely imaginary', though the mythical origin of Purāṇas is fictitious.

But the Purāṇas accept the theory of the human authorship and the compilation of the first Purāṇa is attributed to Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana, the 'arranger' (Vyāsa) who is credited to have compiled this Purāṇa from the floating mass of orally transmitted legends (ākhyāyikās), tales or anecdotes (Upākhyānas) gnomic or Subhāṣita-like verses (gāthās) and description of the Kalpa-epochs.[6] If as is traditionally believed, this compiler be the same sage who arranged the scattered — traditional mantras into Vedic Saṁhitās, he is located on a sober datation to the middle of the 10th cent. B.C.[7]

ii. The Mūla Purāṇas :

The VP. informs us that Vyāsa taught this Purāṇa—compilation to a disciple who could thrill his audience (Roma-harṣaṇa) with his narration. As the Purāṇa was to be recited during the leisure period of sacrificial sessions, Romaharṣaṇa must Endorsed in the Vāyu I.60.21. The Bd. P., P.I.1.8-11 establishes the relation between the composer of the heavenly Purāṇa and its human adapter as follows : Brahmā → Vasiṣṭha → Parāśara → Jātūkarṇya → Dvaipāyana (Vyāsa).

7. S. K. Chatterji—Selected Writings—P. 140 (Vikas, Delhi 1978) Ray Chaudhari locates king Parīkṣit in 900 B.C. (Political History of India from the Accession of Parikṣit to the Extinction of the Gupta Dynasty P. 9) have tried to make it interesting with additions, modifications etc. It thus became a revised and enlarged edition of Vyāsa's Purāṇa and this came to be looked upon as an independent Purāṇa. Romaharṣaṇa taught it to his six disciples out of whom Akṛtavraṇa of Kāśyapa gotra, Sāvarṇi of Somadatta clan and Suśarmā of Śaṁśapāyana gotra composed their own Purāṇa-Saṁhitās.[8]

Thus the Purāṇa Saṁhitā of Vyāsa proliferated into four Saṁhitās, viz). that of Romaharṣaṇa which through his son Ugraśravas continued independently and the three ones revised (and enlarged ?) by his three disciples mentioned above. The four Saṁhitās were the basic ones — Pūrva-Saṁhitā (Vāyu. II.61.58), or Mūla-Saṁhitā (Bh.P.XII.7.7) or Ādi-Purāṇas (Mt. P. 164.16). The Vāyu tells us that all these Saṁhitās consisted of four parts (catuṣ-pādāḥ); they dealt with the same subject matter but were distinguished from one another in readings. All of them consisted of 4000 verses except that of Suśarmā (Śāṁśapāyana) which consisted of 8600 verses.[9]

The four Pādas of these original purāṇas are called (1) Prakriyā, (2) Anuṣaṅga (3) Upodghāta and (4) Upasaṁhāra. The Bd. and Vāyu, the oldest of the Purāṇas follow the Mūla-Purāṇas in this division. The NP. also has four Pādas (in part I*) (1) Chs. 1-41, (2) Chs. 42-62, (3) Chs. 63-92, and (4) Chs. 93-125. As the Part II of the NP. is apocryphal, the original NP. seems to follow the old tradition of four Pādas.

These original Purāṇas are not now extant but their authors — Romaharṣaṇa, Sāvarṇi, Kāśyapeya and Śaṁśapāyana are the interlocutors in various Purānas.[10]

What could have been the contents of the Mūla-Purāṇas is anybody's guess. But as Purāṇas served the needs of sacrificial ritual, the ten cycles of legends to be recited on Pāriplava days as laid down in the Śat. Br., Āśvalāyana Śrauta Sūtra (Aś. ŚS) may be regarded as the topics therein. They are as follows :

1. King Manu Vaivasvata and his subjects (human beings).
2. King Yama Vaivasvata and his people (Pitṛs).
3. King Varuṇa Āditya and his subjects, the Gandharvas.
4. King Soma Vaiṣṇava and his subjects, the Apsaras.
5. King Arbuda Kādraveya and his subjects, the serpents.
6. King Kubera Vaiśravaṇa and his subjects, the Rākṣasas.
7. King Asita Dhanva (or Dhanvan) and his subjects, the Asuras.
8. King Matsya Sammada and his people, the water-dwellers.
9. King Tārkṣya Vaipaśyata (or Vaipaścita) and his subjects, the birds.
10. King Dharma, Indra and his subjects, the gods.[11]

To these may be added the ancient Vedic legends forming the background of the Ākhyāna Sūktas (e.g. Purūravas and Urvaśī), cosmological hymns like the Nāradiya Sūkta and similar statements in ancient works like the AV. XI.7.24, XV.6.10-11, eulogistic legends composed by bards in honour of the royal sacrificer or patron leading to descriptions of the heroic exploits, conquests, donations granted by royal families. Pargiter rightly concludes "that the original Purāṇa dealt with ancient traditions about gods, ṛṣis, kings, their genealogies and famous deeds.[12]

10. For example : Śāvarṇi (Vāyu 1.21.1) Kāśyapeya (Vāyu I.56.1-2, 57.86-88, Bd. P.II. 15.1. etc.) vide Pargiter A I H T, P. 23 ft. notes.

Mahābhārata (Mbh.) and Purāṇas quote a number of old verses with some such remarks 'they say' 'It is said'. These verses presumably belonged to the older Purāṇas.

12. *Pargiter — A I H T, p. 36.

These topics later developed in the famous five characteristics (pañca lakṣaṇas) of Purāṇas viz. original creation (Sarga), re-creation after deluge (Pratisarga), genealogy (Vaṁśa), Manvantaras and accounts of dynasties of kings and sages (Vaṁśānucarita). But Pargiter's presumption that the Ur-Purāṇa had all the characteristics of later Purāṇas is not adequately substantiated and hence not acceptable.[13]

What may be the period of the proliferation of the Ur-Purāṇa in four Mūla-Purāṇas ? Even if Ugraśravas, Sāvarṇi and others are regarded as the direct disciples of Romaharṣaṇa whom Vyāsa taught his Purāṇa-Saṁhitā, for the establishment of four different traditions of these Purāṇas as independent Mūla-Purāṇas a period of at least one century from Vyāsa would be necessary. If the normally acceptable date of Vyāsa is 950 B.C., the Mūla-Purāṇas may be assigned to circa 850 B.C. as the probable date of their recognition as independent (though related) Mūla-Purāṇas. The use of Purāṇāni (in the Plural number) in the Taittirīya Āraṇyaka II-10, in Manu III. 232 and Yaj. III. 189 indicate that the number of Purāṇas then was 3 or more. VP's statement of being based on Mūla Purāṇas (III.6.19) shows that these existed at least upto the 3rd cent. A.D.

iii. Purāṇam Pañca-Lakṣaṇam :

As stated above, the five characteristics, viz., Sarga (creation), Pratisarga (Re-creation after dissolution), Vaṁśa (genealogy), Manvantaras and Vaṁśānucarita (Saga of the dynasties of kings and sages) came to be looked upon as sine qua non of Purāṇas. Not merely Amara Siṁha (5th cent. A.D.) in the Amara-kośa but Purāṇas themselves (e.g. AP. 1.14, BD.P.I 1.37.38, GP. I.215.11, KP.I.1.12, Mt.P. 53.65, SK.V.1.37) have endorsed this Pañca-lakṣaṇa definition of Purāṇas, viz.,

sargaś ca pratisargaś ca vaṁśo manvantarāṇi ca |
vaṁśyānucaritaṁ caiva purāṇam pañca lakṣaṇam ||

This enumeration of characteristics of Purāṇas is not strictly a definition as it does not record the differentia of Purāṇas; nor is there any invariable concomitance. On the contrary, as noted by Pusalkar "Pañca-lakṣaṇa occupies as insignificant part (about 1/40) of the extant Purāṇas."[14]

The analysis of the contents of the Mahāpurāṇas in NP. I. Chs. 92-109 (and annotations thereon) shows that the extant Purāṇas (with the exception of VP. and KP.) generally do not conform to the Pañca-lakṣaṇa definition (vide infra NP. and the five characteristics of Purāṇas). The problem is : why Purāṇas have been associated with the five characteristics in public mind though many of them do not conform to them and some Purāṇas such as the Bh.P. and NP.II.82.30, (unsuccessfully) claim themselves to have ten characteristics — and even when they incorporated much more material than could be covered in the "Ten characteristics."

A review of the evolution of Purāṇas shows that from the days of Kauṭalīya Arthaśāstra (c. 300 B.C.)* to the days of Viṣṇu Purāṇa (100-300 A.D.), the five characteristics from Sarga (creation) to Vaṁśānucarita (the saga of the dynasties of kings) were probably prominent in the then current Purāṇas and the Pañcalakṣaṇa definition became permanently associated with Purāṇas — even in the minds of the (non-conformist) authors of the Purāṇas themselves.

iv. Dharma-Śāstra and Purāṇas

By the 5th cent. B.C., there was probably some increase in Purāṇas which came to acquire titles and included some materials on Dharma Śāstra. The Āpastamba Dharma Sūtra (Ap. Dh. S.) quotes from some Bhaviṣyat Purāṇa, which states that performers of Vedic injunctions become the seed (i.e. Progenitors or Prajāpatis) of the new creation after Pralaya.[15] Ap. Dh. S. quotes from another (un-named) Purāṇa, the view of Prajāpati that food offered unasked and if its gift is unannounced

15. punaḥ sarge bījārthā bhavantī'ti Bhaviṣyat Pu.āṇe
—Ap. Dh. S. II.9.24.6

This implies the existence of the feature pratisarga as well as the inclusion of Dharmaśāstra in the then Bhaviṣyat Purāṇa. For the injunction mentioned cf. Yājñavalkya Smṛti (Yāj). III. 184.186 which echoes the wording of the Āp. Dh. S.

is acceptable (even from a sinner); if it be rejected, the manes (Pitṛs) of the rejector do not accept food from him for fifteen years nor does the fire carry his offering to gods.[16]

Āpastamba quotes another Purāṇa which states that house-holders performing sacrifices and desiring progeny undergo births and deaths while those who remain celibate throughout their life (renouncing saṁsāra) become immortal.[17]

Āpastamba summarises the view of another Purāṇa wherein he enunciates the right of self defence stating that no sin is incurred if a person attacked by another with the object of injuring, kills the attacker.[18]

v. Dharmaśāstra in the Nārada Purāṇa

It will be thus found that matters on Dharmaśâstra began to be incorporated in Purāṇas since the 5th cent. B.C. We find that the following topics of Dharmaśâstra are treated in the NP : Tīrthas — Holy places (I.12), Pūrta (e.g. temple-building, works for public well-being) and Dānas 'religious gifts' (I.13), duties of Varṇas 'castes' and Āśramas 'stages in life', sins, penances, funeral rites (I.14), Vratas 'vows' (I.chs. 17-23), Varṇāśramadharma, funeral rites, penances or prāyaścittas, tithis, major and minor sins (I.chs. 24-30), Varṇāśramadharma (I.31-32 and ch. 43), Initiation, the methodology of Mantraśāstra and worship

(I.chs. 64-68, I chs. 82-91), Vratas (I.chs. 110-124). The II part though apocryphal deals with the importance of religious vows (chs. 1-37) and glories of Tirthas 'holy places' (chs. 39 & to the end.)

To these may be added the scrappy description of the terrestrial globe (I. ch. 3), the contents of 18 Mahāpurāṇas (NP.I.92-109) which is very important from the Purāṇa literature point of view and brief resumé of each of the Vedāṅgas, viz. Śikṣā, Kalpa, Vyākaraṇa, Nirukta, Chandas, Jyotiṣa (NP. I. chs. 50-57).

The NP. is thus a Purāṇic encyclopaedia.

(vi) The Purāṇa in Modern Indian Languages :

As a matter of fact, there was an unbounded and unrestrained scope for the Purāṇas to expand. Indians being a mixed people synthesized their traditional Aryan, Dravidian, Austric and Mongoloid beliefs, folk-lore, dogmas and rituals into Purāṇas. And when Sanskrit ceased to be understood by the masses, they wrote Purāṇas in modern Indian languages, e.g. the Mānasa Purāṇa in Assamese and Bengali, the Ḍāṅgavai Purāṇa in Marathi, the Śaivite Periya-Purāṇam in Tamil.[19]

To sum up :

1. There was a collection of ancient legends or an Ur-Purāṇa at the time of the AV. and the credit of its being the arranger (Vyāsa) is given to Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana (Circa 950 B.C.).
2. The Ur-Purāṇa developed into four Mūla or Ādi Purāṇas by Circa 850 B.C.
3. By the time of Āpastamba (C. 500 B.C.) Purāṇas having names like Bhaviṣyat existed and in addition to the usual characteristics like Sarga, Pratisarga, matters pertaining to Dharma Śāstra were found in them.
4. By the time of Kauṭaliya Arthaśāstra (C. 300 B.C.) the Paurāṇika Sūta came to be substituted by an officer of the state with the Purāṇa portfolio. Dr. Kane presumes that those Purāṇas were similar in characteristics with the extant ones.

19. vide S. K. Chatterji — Purāṇa Apocrypha Select Writings, pp. 121-138.

5. The Mūla Purāṇas seem to have survived till the time of the Viṣṇu Purāṇa (100-300 A.D.). The VP. retained the Pañcalakṣaṇa structure in tact.
6. As the Purāṇas were associated with Pañca-lakṣaṇas for about 5 or 6 centuries, even the Purāṇa authors who did not conform to that structure, have incorporated the Pañca-lakṣaṇa definition of Purāṇa in their own works — a fact recorded by Amara Simha (5th cent. A.D.) in his Sk. lexicon (Amara Kośa).
7. Purāṇas went on developing and incorporating copious material on Dharmaśāstra and some from other branches of knowledge in encyclopaedic Purāṇas like the Nārada, Garuḍa and Agni. But the mediaeval writers on Dharma Śāstra treated them like Smṛtis and quoted them as authorities on matters pertaining to Dharma (such as Vrata, Tirtha, Prāyaścitta, Varṇāśrama-dharma and others).
8. The tendency of Purāṇa writing continued even in Modern Indian languages.

The NP. however, belongs to the Sk. stage. Hence, we consider it as per pañca-lakṣaṇa criterion of Mahāpurāṇas.

II. THE NĀRADĪYA AS A MAHĀPURĀṆA :

Mediaeval Writers on Dharma-Śāstra quote from two similar-sounding and equally authoritative Purāṇas viz. Nārada or Nāradīya (NP.) and Bṛhan-nāradīya (Brn. P.). Out of them the NP. is a Mahāpurāṇa and Brn. is an Upa-purāṇa and as the adj. Bṛhat shows, it is later than the NP. The Brn. is a small work of about 3600 verses and 38 chapters.[20] It is a sectarian (Vaiṣṇava) work and though Nāradā is the speaker, the criteria of Pañca-lakṣaṇa is not applicable to it. The NP. is a mahāpurāṇa traditionally supposed to contain 25000 verses (though the printed text of Veṅk, edt. has 18550 verses — 13144 in NP. Part I and 5406 in Part II). Maybe due to the synthesis of Aryo-Dravidian cultures as suggested by S. K. Chatterji,[21] the number eighteen became favourite with ancient Indians. The Vāyu Purāṇa mentions a part stage of ten Purāṇas but gives no details. But soon the number of Purāṇas came to be stated as eighteen though actually nineteen Purāṇas are enumerated.[22] Even the Upa-purāṇas, (minor Purāṇas) the actual number of which exceeds one hundred* are also stated to be eighteen.

The NP. gives the following list of Purāṇas[23] (Mahā-Purāṇas) :

1.	Brahma	2.	Padma	3.	Viṣṇu
4.	Vāyu	5.	Bhāgavata	6.	Nārada
7.	Mārkaṇḍeya	8.	Agni	9..	Bhaviṣya
10.	Brahma-Vaivarta	11.	Liṅga	12.	Varāha
13.	Skanda	14.	Vāmana	15.	Kūrma
16.	Matsya	17.	Garuḍa	18.	Brahmāṇḍa

This list with slight variations is repeated in many other Purāṇas such as the Viṣṇu III. 6.21-23, Liṅga I.39.61-63, Matsya 53.11 ff, Padma IV.100.51-54, Bhaviṣya I.1.61-64, Mārkaṇḍeya 134.7-11, Bhāgavata XII 13.4-8 and the Devi Bhāgavata I.32.

The variations are about the inclusion of the Śiva P. for the Vāyu P. and the rank of the NP. in the list of Purāṇas. The NP. gives itself the 6th place which is confirmed by other Purāṇas like VP. III 6.21-23, MK.P. 134 7-11, while it is ranked as the 7th in the list of Purāṇas in KP. I.13-15 and LP.I.39.61-64. Though the NP. is included as a (Mahā)-Purāṇa in the Purāṇa-lists of most other Purāṇas, the list in the Bhaviṣya P. III (Prati-sarga) iii.28.10-14 does not mention the NP. and the Brahma-Vaivarta (Br. V). Alberuni gives two lists of Purāṇas, the one being the same as in the VP., but the second list omits the NP., Bh.P. and Pd.P.[24] The list of Purāṇas with Kavīndrācārya (1600-1650 A.D.) omits the NP. and substitutes the Nandi Purāṇa instead.[25]

The NP. consists of two parts — Pūrvārdha and Uttarārdha. The Pūrvārdha seems to be the original NP. as, like old Purāṇas, it is divided into four Pādas and concludes with a Phalaśruti (merit accruing from listening to the NP.). The Phalaśruti indicates that the NP. ends there. The Mt.P. 53.23 AP. 272.8, and Skanda VII. i-2-43 say that the NP. was declared by Nārada with reference to events in the Bṛhat-Kalpa in 25000 verses.* In the present NP., Nārada is the listener while his four brothers, Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatkumāra and Sanātana are the speakers and there is no reference to Bṛhat-Kalpa. The Brn. though an Upa-Purāṇa has Nārada as the speaker but makes no mention of Bṛhat-Kalpa and the whole of Brn. is textually the same as NP. chs. 1-41. The statements of other Purāṇas about the interlocutors, Kalpa of reference and the textual identity between NP. part I and Brn. indicate that there must have been an older (and different) NP. which was the source of the extant NP. and Brn.

Now let us see how far the Pañcalakṣaṇa definition is applicable to the extant NP.

(i) Sarga (creation of the universe)

The NP. is a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa; as such it attributes the ultimate credit of creation, destruction, etc., of the Universe to Mahā-Viṣṇu. The NP., however, records the following theories of creation :

1. The Popular Purāṇic Trinity Theory.
2. The Śākta-Sāṅkhya Theory.
3. The Mānasa or Bhṛgu theory quoted from Mbh. Śānti. ch. 182.

1. The Trinity Theory :

Mahāviṣṇu divided himself into three forms according to guṇas; Brahmā characterised by Rajo-guṇa was created from the right side of Mahā-Viṣṇu for the creation of the Universe; from the middle (chest) appeared Rudra, characterised by Tamo-guṇa, for the destruction of the Universe. While Viṣṇu (a lower grade deity than Mahā-Viṣṇu) characterised by Sattva-guṇa was originated from his left side for the maintenance and protection of the Universe.[26]

yatrāha nārado dharmān bṛhat-kalpāśritān iha/*
pañca-viṁśa (°śat-) sahasrāṇi nāradīyaṁ tad ucyate//

26. NP. I.3.3-4.

2. The Śākta-Sāṅkhya Theory :

The other theory gives all credit to the Parā śakti (the Supreme Power) of Mahāviṣṇu. It is of the nature of existence and non-existence (bhāvābhāvarūpā). It is variously called Vidyā, Avidyā, Umā, Lakṣmī, Bhāratī, Girijā, Ambikā, Durgā, Bhadrakālī, Caṇḍī, Maheśvarī, Kaumārī, Vārāhī, Aindrī, Śāmbhavī, Brāhmī, Māyā.

The NP. emphasizes the fundamental unity of the divine power under different nomenclature. This power manifests itself into three forms — Prakṛti, Puruṣa and Kāla (Time) when Prakṛti is agitated the principle called Mahat is produced. The process is as follows : Prakṛti→Mahat→Ahaṁkāra (Cosmic ego) →Five Tanmātras (subtle elements) and (subtle) sense-organs →(Mahā) bhūtas (Five gross elements, viz., Ākāśa (the sky or ether), Vāyu (air, wind) Agni (Fire), Jala (Water) and Bhūmi (the earth) — each element arising out of the previous one. After the creation of the earth, god Brahmā created beings characterised by Tamoguṇa (e.g. insects, birds, beasts and other non-human beings), by Sattvaguṇa (Devas — gods in heaven) and by Rajo-guṇa (viz. human beings). He created progenitors like Dakṣa and others who populated the world.[27]

2. The Mānasa or Bhṛgu Theory :[28]

The eternal ageless God called Mānasa at first created Mahat from which was evolved Ākāśa (ether), the support of all Bhūtas. The evolution here differs from the traditional one. From Ākāśa is evolved water, from water arose fire and wind and the earth is the product of fire and wind. The unmanifest Mānasa (Viṣṇu) created the lotus from which was born Brahmā, the embodiment of Vedas, also known as Ahaṁkāra. The earth is the lotus for the Brahmā form of Mānasa and Mount Meru is its pericarp. Mānasa created mentally all the subjects.

The first theory is a popular Purāṇic way of attributing the functions of creation, protection and destruction to the Trinity whose mutual identity and one-ness with the Brahman is always emphasized.

27. NP. I.3.6.36. The verse after 36 enumerates the worlds (bhuvanakośa).

28. Ibid., I.42. 7-40. This is borrowed from Mbh.-Santi 182-11-33.

The second theory which appears with some modifications in the VP. (I.2.4, 5 etc.), Bh.P. (III Skandha) and with some difference in KP.I.4 employs the doctrine of transformation (Pariṇāmavāda) typical of the Sāṅkhya[29] system of thought to explain the evolutionary process. The philosophic aspect of this theory cannot be discussed here.[30]

The third theory is a quotation from Mbh. Śānti. 182.11-38. How far the credit of this is to be given to the NP. is doubtful. But as NP. claims it as its part, this theory seems alternatively acceptable to the NP.

2. Pratisarga

As compared with other Purāṇas like Bh.P., KP., NP. gives a meager description of Pratisarga when Mārkaṇḍeya was shown the Pralaya by Viṣṇu (NP.I.5.20 ff.). But that is the description of the Naimittika pralaya. Other Purāṇas like Bh.P., KP.II.45 describe the four types of Pralayas, viz. Nitya (everyday — disappearance of the world in the dark), Naimittika (at the end of the Kalpa), Prākṛta (At the end of god Brahmā's life when every thing is destroyed and Prakṛti attains equilibrium of the guṇas), Ātyantika — merger of the individual soul in the Para Brahman due to attainment of the Supreme spiritual knowledge. The NP. gives the duration of Viṣṇu's sleep, viz., two Parārdha years in one verse[31] while Mārkaṇḍeya floated on the waters of the deluge and states that Viṣṇu assumed the form of Brahmā and re-created the Universe.

The treatment of Pratisarga in the NP. is quite scrappy.

3. Vaṁśa (Genealogy)

Genealogies of gods or sages are not recorded in the NP. This characteristic is not applicable to the NP.

4. Manvantaras :

Though Kāla (Time) has been regarded as beginningless and endless and the evolutions and dissolutions of the Universe per Kalpa-periods have been going on, since time immemorial, an empirical attempt is made by man to measure Time. We find tabular statements of units of time in the Vedāṅga Jyotiṣa, in Smṛtis (e.g. Manu I.64), Purāṇas (like the Bh. P.III. 11.310, KP. I.5.6-19, Mt. P. 142.4, Vāyu 50.169) and Secular works like Kauṭaliya Arthaśāstra II.20.41). Though there is a general consensus regarding the names and duration of these units of Time, there are some differences regarding the duration of Kṣaṇa and Yāma.[32]

Purāṇas regard one human year as one day of gods, so one divine year = 360 human years.

As Kane shows, the theory of Yugas and Kalpas began to take shape in the 3rd cent. B.C. and was fully developed in the first centuries of the Christian era.[33]

The NP. enumerates Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali as the four Yugas and this set of four Yugas (inclusive of the 'twilight period' — Sandhyā+Sandhyāṁśa — preceding and following a Yuga) is 12000 divine years.[34] At another place the NP. gives the following durations of each yuga :[35]

Kṛta	: 1728,000	Tretā	: 1296,000
Dvāpara	: 864,000	Kali	: 432,000

human years.

It will be seen that though some Purāṇas (e.g. Vāyu I.57. 22-28, KP.I.5.9-13) give the duration of these Yugas in 'divine years', they do not differ much from each other.

NP. has given the further division of time units as follows :[36]

12000 Divine years = 1 Divya-yuga (Divine Yuga)
1000 Divya Yugas = 1 day of Brahmā (or the period of 14 Manus.
71 divya-yugas = 1 Manvantara.
2 Parārdhas—Brahmā years = one day or night of Viṣṇu.

Description of Yugas

The NP. I.41.6 ff. gives the description of the nature of four Yugas. The close similarity (even Textual) in these descriptions as found in *Mbh. Vana.*149.11-38, Vâyu 32 and 57-58 LP.39, Mt.p. 142-144, KP.I.30 shows that probably some Ādi-Purāṇa contained the nucleus of this description. Briefly the following are the characteristics of different Yugas.

Kṛta was an age of equality. All persons were contented, pious. The Veda was undivided. People followed the duties of their respective stages of life with no ulterior motive. Lord Nārāyaṇa was white in complexion and Dharma (whom Manu equated with a bull in VIII.16) was stable on four legs. In the Tretā age Dharma became pale and three-footed. Hari became red-complexioned. People engaged themselves in meditation and performance of sacrifices. They were truthful but a bit distressed. In Dvāpara, Dharma became two-footed and Hari became yellow in complexion. Veda-saṁhitā became divided. People had taken to Adharma.[37] And their span of life became shorter.

Description of the Kali Age

The dismal, harrowing 'Predictions' about the social, political, economic and religious disintegration and reversal of previous order in the NP. I.41.21-89 deserve comparison with similar 'predictions' about the state of society in the Kali Age in Mbh. Vana. chs. 188, 190, Brahma P. chs. 229-230, LP.I.40, Bh.P.XII.2, VP.VI. chs. 1-2 KP.I.30, Vayu, chs. 58, Mt.P. 143.32-88. These descriptions agree not only in the details of contents but even in the text of many verses. This points to some common source — some Ādi-purāṇa — of the closely similar descriptions or 'predictions'.

About social disintegration, the NP. states, "Kali is a sinful age. All castes will give up their prescribed rites and duties; all will be like Śūdras; Brāhmaṇas will desist from Vedic studies and follow psuedo-religion. Brāhmaṇas will 'sell' Dharma and the Vedas and will accept gifts from the unworthy. Brāhmaṇas will sell wine, take food from Śūdras and go to Śūdra women.

The Śūdra dynasties like Nandas, and Mauryas ruled over the land. Naturally there was the dominance of Śūdras and servility of Brāhmaṇas. As NP. puts it, :

37. dharmādharmau samau syātām/ NP. I. 41.19

"Śūdras will pretend to be Brāhmaṇas, study the Vedas and preach Dharma. They will disguise as Brāhmaṇas and deceive people. Brāhmaṇas will intermarry, serve Śūdras and lower castes and even carry the dead bodies of Śūdras. Kings will be of Mleccha tribes. They will be greedy and will squeeze money from the people by top-heavy taxation."

There was the dominance of Buddhism and Jainism. As NP. puts it : "Heretics (Buddhists and Jainas) would denounce the Vedas, condemn Āśramas (stages in life) and walk nude or wearing ochre-coloured garments. Their woman are faithless; women maintain themselves by prostitution.

When Kṛṣṇa (Viṣṇu) turns black in complexion, nobody will think of God. Women will imitate courtesans, sell their virtue. There will be droughts and famines. Average human span of life will be 16 years and girls will give birth to children at the age of five.

Only the devotees of Viṣṇu or Śiva will be immune from the effects of Kali Age."

R. C. Hazra shows that such was the condition in the Indian Society before 200 A.D.[38]

4. Manvantaras

We have seen above that one day of god Brahmā extends to 1000 Divya-yugas during which 14 Manus rule. Every Manvantara has a new set of a Manu, Manu's sons, an Indra, Devas and Seven Sages.[39] NP. gives the following names of Indras and gods.[40]

	Manu	Indra	Gods
1.	Svāyambhuva	Śacīpati	Yāmas.
2.	Svārociṣa	Vipaścit	Pārāvatas & Tuṣitas

	Manu	Indra	Gods
3.	Uttama	Suśānti	Sudhāmans, Satyas, Śivas and Pratardanas.
4.	Tāmasa	Śiva	Sūtas, Pārāharas, Sutyas and Sudhīs.
5.	Raivata	Vibhu	Amitābhas and others.
6.	Cākṣuṣa	Manojava	Aryas and others.
7.	Vaivasvata	Purandara	Ādityas, Vasus, Rudras and others.
8.	Sūryasāvarṇi	Bali	Aprameyas, Sutapās and others.
9.	Dakṣa Sāvarṇi	Adbhuta	Pāra and others.
10.	Brahmasāvarṇi (-ka)	Śānti	Suvāsanas.
11.	Dharmasāvarṇi-(-ka)	Vṛṣa	Vihaṅgamas and others.
12.	Rudrasāvarṇi	Ṛbhu	Harināhbas.
13.	Rocamāna	Divaspati	Sutrāmās, etc.
14.	Bhautya	Śuci	Cākṣuṣa and others.

The Manus, Indras and Devas of different Manvantaras possessed equal refulgence, prosperity and prowess.[41]

There is a consensus of the Purāṇas regarding the number and names of Manus, though there are some differences about the names of future Manus. Thus, Mt. P. gives the names of the future Manus as follows:[42]

Sāvarṇa, Raucya, Bhautya, Merusāvarṇi, Ṛta, Ṛtudhāma and Viśvaksena — while the Brahma P.[43] gives the following list, of future Manus : Sāvarṇi, Raibhya, Raucya and Merusāvarṇa.

Kalpa

Like all Purāṇas, NP. states that the present Manvantara is Vaivasvata in the Śveta-Vārāha Kalpa. But it does not give the list of Kalpas nor does it mention matters belonging to Bṛhat Kalpa. But Mt. P. chs. 53 and the Vāyu P. chs. 21, 22 give the list of Kalpas and the Purāṇas pertaining to them.

41. NP. I. 40.18-19.
42. Mt. P. 9.30-38.
43. Brahma P. 5.5 & 6.

5. Vaṁśānuvarṇana

The NP. is not interested in giving the genealogies of kings belonging to the Solar and Lunar races. It describes the episodes and information regarding the reigns of the following kings from the Solar race :

Bāhu — Sagara — Asamañjasa — Aṁśumān — Dilīpa — Bhagīratha (NP.I. 7 & 8) ; Sudās and Saudāsa alias Kalmāṣapāda (NP.I.ch.9) — Daśaratha — Rāma (and his three brothers) — NP. I.73.

Only three kings from the Lunar race are mentioned, viz., Sumati (I.ch.20), Dharmakīrti (I.ch.23) and Jayadhvaja (I.ch.39). As compared with Kṛṣṇa or Sahasrārjuna, these kings of Lunar race are insignificant if not fictitious.

It will thus be found that the definition Purāṇam Pañcalakṣaṇam is not applicable to the NP. In fact, it claims to be a Purāṇa of ten characteristics in its apocryphal part :

Nāradiyam purāṇaṁ tu lakṣaṇair daśabhir yutam /
— NP.II.82.30.

But the ten characteristics are not spelt out. Nor the ten lakṣaṇas of the Bh.P. are applicable to the NP. In fact, the author of the NP. is interested in the Dharma-Śāstra rather than the traditional characteristics of Purāṇas.

III. THE SOURCES OF THE NĀRADĪYA AND ITS PROBABLE DATE

As the NP. calls itself 'a compilatory work' (Saṁhitā),[44] its sources are numerous and its date or rather the dates of its parts depend on the dates of its sources. The NP. is mainly divided into two parts, — the first containing four Pādas and the second containing the glorification of the Ekādaśī vow and the story of Rukmāṅgada. The first part is, according to the NP. itself, the complete Nārada Purāṇa. It calls itself "consisting of four Pādas" (catuṣpādasamāyuktam — NP.I.125.26) in the Phala-śruti.

Being a Purāṇa — an Upabṛṁhaṇa of the Vedas — it draws heavily upon Vedic literature — the philosophical hymns like the Puruṣa Sūkta (RV.X.90), the Ākhyāna Sūktas, stories from 44. NP. I. 62.77, 79; II.82.34, 35.

Brāhmaṇas and the Mantras of Upaniṣads. It is obviously post-Vedic. Moreover, like other Purāṇas, it fully utilised traditional gnomic verses — gāthās or subhāṣita-like verses — current in the Indian Society since ancient times, as many of these gāthās are found in old Sk., Pāli and Prakrits. The Mbh. and Purāṇas many times use the words "It has been said," "So they or the wise say" indicating that such verses are quotations and quote them. These are found in secular works like the Pañca Tantra or Hitopadeśa or collection of verses under Śatakas or 'a treasury of Subhāṣitas'. It is difficult to fix the date of a work on the basis of these gnomic verses as their authorship or source is many times obscure. The NP. has absorbed a number of verses from Smṛtis like Manu, Yāj. NP. I.14 is the same as the Laghu Yama Smṛti.

The Bnr. and NP Part I (chs. 1-41) are textually the same. Though the adj. Bṛhan — in Bnr. shows that it is later than the NP., it is not later than the extant NP. but than the one to which the Mt. P. 53.23, the Sk.P. VII; 1.2.43 and AP. 272.8 refer as one narrated by Nārada with reference to the Bṛhat-Kalpa[45] — which the extant NP. is not. The Bnr. is an Upa-purāṇa and the extant NP. is the borrower from the Bnr.[46] Naturally the date of NP. Part I (chs. 1-41) is later than that of the Bnr. Govindānanda (1500-1540 A.D.) quotes Bnr. 7.14, 25-27 in his Kaumudī works viz. Śuddha-Kriyā — Varṣa-Kriyā and Śrāddha-kriyā, Raghunandana (1520-1575 A.D.) quotes Bnr. 7.14,22, and 24 in his Smṛti-tattva. Śūla-pāṇi (1375-1440 A.D.) quotes Bnr. ch.16 in his Vrata-Kāla-Viveka. Hence, Bnr. cannot be later than 1350 A.D. The Bnr. and NP. are mentioned as separate works in the Bṛhad-dharma Purāṇa (after 1250 A.D.), in the Bengal version of the Uttarakhaṇḍa of Śiva Purāṇa (circa 1200 A.D.) and the Orissan-Ekāmra Purāṇa (circa 1000-1100 A.D.). Hence, the Bnr. may be assigned 1050 A.D. at least. The Viṣṇu Śakti theory in the Bnr., crediting her with power of creation and destruction of the Universe and her various forms such as Lakṣmī, Durgā, Bhāratī and her identification with Prakṛti and Māyā (Bnr. 3-6, 9, 15, 16 etc.), shows that the Bnr. is posterior to Āgamas. The doctrine of Advaita and Māyā in (Bnr. 31.57ff) shows Bnr's acquaintance with the Advaita teacher Śaṅkara (788-820 A.D.). Thus the date of the composition of the Bnr. appears to be circa 850 A.D. Hence, the date of NP. Part I (chs. 1-41) is probably somewhat later i.e. circa 900-950 A.D.

3. The Mahābhārata and the Viṣṇu Purāṇa

From the comparison given below between NP.I. chs. 42, 43, 44 and 45 with Mbh. Śānti.[47] chs. 183, 192, 194, 195, 218 and 219 will show that NP. borrowed a great deal from the Mbh.

The chapters on the Vedāṅgas are derived from different sources and as such needs be assigned different dates. The chapter on Śikṣā (phonetics) in the NP. (I.50) deals not only with the correct pronunciation of Vedic and classical Sk. but treats of vocal and instrumental music also. As many of the terms and points of information are found in the Sthānāṅga Sūtra of the Śvetāmbara Jainas, this section need not be considered as late as the 11th cent. work — The Saṅgīta Makaranda of one Nārada (of the 11th cent. A.D.), but it is obviously later than Bharata's Nāṭya Śāstra (400 A.D.). The source of NP.'s treatment of music needs more investigation, though the Nāradiya śikṣā may be one.

The chapter on Kalpa (vedic ritual) (NP.I.51) deals with the following Kalpas — Nakṣatra K., Veda K., Saṁhitā K., Āṅgirasa K. and Śānti K. and not with the Śrauta, Gṛhya and Dharma Sūtras as of old. Moreover, according to the NP., these Kalpas belonged to every branch of the Veda though in ancient times they formed a part of the Caraṇa Vyūhas of the Atharva Veda. This innovation is due to Kumārila Bhaṭṭa (8th cent. A.D.) and as such the chapter may be assigned to the latter half of the 9th cent. A.D.

The chapter on Vyākaraṇa (Grammar), though not a systematic treatment based on Pāṇini's Aṣṭādhyāyī shows that it is not based on Kātantra but on Pāṇini, probably after the revival of studies in Pāṇini after Bhartṛhari (7th cent. A.D.). This chapter may be assigned to Circa 700-750 A.D.

The GP. and AP. do not treat Nirukta. The NP. gives a popular statement of that erudite work of Yāska but its immediate source is the Vaidikī Prakriyā of Paṇini's Aṣṭādhyāyī (the order of the Sūtras being similar to that in Bhaṭṭoji Dīkṣita's Siddhānta Kaumudī. Its date (though post-Yāska) cannot be precisely stated. But we are on surer grounds with regard to chapters on Jyotiṣa (chs. 54-56). The profuse quotations from the Sūrya-Siddhānta (6th cent. A.D.) in the chapter on Gaṇita, those from Varāha-mihira's Bṛhajjātaka (6th cent. A.D.) in the portion of Jātaka and those from Nāradiya Saṁhitā (4th cent. A.D.) in the Saṁhitā portion of the NP. show that the chapters on Jyotiṣa (Astronomy) cannot be earlier than the middle of the 7th cent. A.D. The three verses common to Bhāskarācārya's Līlāvati (12 cent. A.D) may be probably from a common source from which NP. borrowed them.

Though other encyclopaedic Purāṇas like the GP. and the AP. treat chandas (metrics) in details, its treatment in the NP. is succinct and different, but its date is uncertain.

Thus the chapters on the Vedāṅgas are presumably compiled between the 7th and the 9th cent. A.D.

The third part of the NP. deals with sects like Pāśupata, Śākta and Tantrism in general. The Pāśupata in the NP. regards Bindu as a Pāśa (I.63.22 and later), but Mādhava in the Sarvadarśana-saṅgraha does not mention it to be so in the sections on Nakulīśa-pāśupata, Śaiva and the Pratyabhijñā (प्रत्यभिज्ञा) darśanas. The Pāśupata in the NP. may be an old stage of the darśana discussed in a late (14th cent. A.D.) work like the Sarvadarśana saṅgraha, but that does not help to fix the date, though 8th cent. A.D. proposed by H. P. Sastri is not improbable. But more interesting and chronologically more helpful is the Rādhā cult in chs. 82-90. In the NP. there is a phenomenal exaltation of an anonymous cowherd woman of the Bh.P. to the position of the topmost deity of whom great goddesses like Mahālakṣmī and Durgā are but part-incarnations (aṁśāvatāras) and whose Sahasra-nāma eulogy is sung by the great god Mahādeva and the Tāntric procedures of Mantras and Yantras of whose sixteen incarnations occupy a place of honour in the NP. It must have taken some 2-3 centuries after the Bh.P. As the Bh.P. is mentioned in the Nandi Sūtra of the Śvetāmbara Jain canon, it must be located at least in the latter half of the 5th cent. A.D. Thus the date of the chapters on the Rādhā cult may be assigned to the 8th cent. A.D. Hazra, however, assigns the chapters I.64-68, 82-91 and the chapters on Vratas I.110-124 as "late interpolations" without assigning a probable date or period. This exaltation of Rādhā provided a sound background for Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavism for the other circumstantial evidence about the author of the NP. shows that he belonged to the eastern part of India — probably the Bengal-Orissa region.

Allied with the Rādhā cult, we have the Śakti cult under different names (chs. 85), Yakṣiṇī mantras (pertaining to an incarnation of Mahā Sarasvatī), mantras pertaining to Bagalā and other incarnations of Mahālakṣmī (ch. 86) and the procedure about four mantras of Durgā (ch. 87), to which may be added the Kavaca and Sahasra-nāma of goddess Lalitā (ch. 89).

It must have been a hey-day of Tantrism as the NP. gives not merely Śākta and Śaiva Tantrism (ch. 91) but the so-called Bhāgavata Tantra in the NP. includes cults such as (1) Vaiṣṇavism (with special emphasis) and (2) Śākta (3) Śaiva (4) Pañcāyatana (i.e. a group of Viṣṇu, Śiva, Devī, Gaṇeśa and Sūrya), (5) Rāma group (wherein Hanūmān, the monkey-lieutenant of Rāma, receives much more importance than both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa) and the Kārtavīrya mantra and planet-worship.

As is well-known Tantrism was practised by Hindus, Buddhists and Jainas and there is much in common in their Tantric rites. East India—especially Bengal and Assam—were the centres of Tantrism for centuries. But between 8th to 11th cent. A.D. Tantrism was very popular. We shall not be much wrong if we assign early part of the 11th century as the time and East India (especially the Bengal-Orissa area) as the place of composition of these chapters.

(6) The Mahāpurāṇas

As shown elsewhere (and in the annotations) chs. 92-109 show that the contents of the Purāṇas and the technical names of the sections of the Purāṇas in the NP. are different from those in extant Purāṇas. The extant Purāṇas were practically completed by the 10th cent. A.D. These chapters from the NP. showing an earlier version of the purāṇas must be earlier at least by half a century or so.

Here ends the 4th Pāda and the original NP. In ch. 125 named as Purāṇa mahimā, all interlocutors disperse and vv. 25-30 describe when and how the NP. should be recited and the fruit accruing therefrom. Sūta also departs to see Vyāsa. Thus ends the NP. itself.

(7) NP. Part II

In the Uttarārdha of the NP., there is no Nārada either as a speaker or a listener. It is Vasiṣṭha who expounds the greatness of Ekādaśī Vrata to King Māndhātā and the story of Rukmāṅgada and Mohinī covers chs. 1-37. Though this part has no direct connection with Part I, these dramatis personae are mentioned as narrators in the Caturvarga-cintāmaṇi (1260-1270 A.D.) by

Hemādri, in the Smṛti-Candrikā by Devaṇṇabhaṭṭa (1200-1225 A.D.). Aparārka (1100-1130 A.D.) quotes two verses from NP. II on the Ekādaśi Vrata. The above evidence shows that even the II part of the NP. was composed before 1100 A.D.[48]

It will thus be seen that the NP. I was probably compiled between 700-1000 A.D. while NP. II was appended by the 11th cent. A.D.

Dr. P. V. Kane[49] assigns 700-1000 A.D. while Dr. R. C. Hazra,[50] 875-1000 A.D., as the period of compilation of the NP.

IV. THE VEDĀṄGAS IN THE NP. (Chs. 50-57)

The Vedāṅgas are the 'limbs' or accessories of the Veda which help the proper understanding, recitation and sacrificial application of the Vedas. They include the following exegetical sciences : Śikṣā (phonetics), Kalpa (ritual), Vyākaraṇa (grammar), Nirukta (etymology), Chandas (metrics) and Jyotiṣa (astronomy).[51] These are compared to the following limbs of the Veda: the nose, the hands, the mouth, the ears, the feet and the eyes.

1. Śikṣā

The traditional list of Vedāṅgas assigns the first place to Śikṣā or instruction given for the correct pronunciation, accentuation, etc. of the Vedic text. Its oldest mention is found in the Taittirīya Upaniṣad (I.2) and the oldest text dealing with them are the Prātiśākhyas.

The NP. deals with not only the rules of correct pronunciations of (Vedic and classical) Sanskrit but also with the science of music—vocal and instrumental. The importance of this section of the NP. becomes obvious when we find AP. summarising the Pāṇinīya Śikṣā practically in Pāṇini's words.[52]

According to Nārada, Svara (accent) is important in Śikṣā. In chanting ṚK, Gāthās and Sāma-mantras, the Svarāntara pertaining to ṚK (Arcika) is one, to Gāthās (Gāthika) is two, while that related to Sāma-mantras (Sāmika) is three. The Arcikasvara is used in chanting Kaṭha, Taittirīya, Ṛgveda and Sāma

Veda Saṁhitās. The Ṛgveda may be chanted in Gāthika and Sāmika Svaras as well.[53]

In the Vāṅmaya (every day speech) the pronunciation is from (1) the chest (uras), (2) the throat (kaṇṭha), and the head (śiras) These three are known as Savanas.

The Svaras, low (nīca), medium (madhya) and high (Ucca) have their sources from uras, kaṇṭha and śiras respectively, and the seven notes (sapta-svaras) in the Sāmaveda also are produced from these. The Ārcika svaras are classified as Udātta, Anudātta and Svarita.[54] From physical (pārthiva) point of view, the svara is classified as ucca, madhyama and saṅghāta. Out of seven Svaras, the third, the first and the sixth (kruṣṭa) are used by Āhvarakas, the four svaras from second to the fifth by Taittirīyas, all the seven svaras by Sāmavedins and the second and the first svaras by Tāṇḍins, Śātapathas and the Vājasaneyins.

Vocal Music

Although one is tempted to compare this section of the NP. with Nārada's Saṅgīta Makaranda, the latter being later in date (11th. cent. A.D.) cannot be the source of the NP. The NP., however, quotes verses from 50.44 ff from an older work with the words : bhavanti cātra ślokāḥ.

The Svara-Maṇḍala

The Svara-maṇḍala consists of seven svaras, three grāmas (gamut), twentyone Mūrchanās (melodies) and fortynine tānas (protracted tunes). The seven svaras[55] are : Ṣaḍja (Sa), Ṛṣabha (Ṛṣ), Gandhāra (Ga), Madhyama (Ma), Pañcama (Pa), Dhaivata (Dha) and Niṣāda (Ni). They are regarded as originating from the throat (kaṇṭha), head (śiras), nose (nāsika), chest (uras), conjointly from chest, head and throat, forehead and the last from all these combined (sarva-sandhija) respectively. These correspond to the cry of a peacock (Mayūra), a bull (Go), a goat (Aja) a heron (Krauñca), a cuckoo in spring (puṣpa-sādhāraṇakāle kokila), a horse (Aśva) and an elephant (Kuñjara). They were first sung by Agni, Brahmā, Soma, Viṣṇu, Nārada, and (the last two by) Tumburu respectively. The Ṣaḍja pleases gods, Ṛṣabha sages, Gandhāra manes (pitṛs), Madhyama Gandharvas, Pañcama gods, sages and pitṛs, Niṣāda Yakṣas and Dhaivata all living beings (bhūtas). Strangely enough castes are associated with these svaras. For example, Pañcama, Madhyama and Ṣaḍja are supposed to have been presided over by Brāhmaṇas. The importance of these svaras (of sāman) for sustenance of all beings is emphasised by Nārada.[56]

Grāmas

The three Grāmas are Ṣaḍja, Madhyama and Gandhāra and they are supposed to have been produced respectively by Bhūrloka (the earth), Bhuvar-loka (the firmament) and conjointly from Svarloka and Abhra (heaven and clouds). Grāma-rāgas are due to the special position of Svaras (NP. I.50.32a-34a.)

Mūrchanās

Mūrchanās (melodies) are classified as pertaining to gods, manes (pitṛs) and sages. Those pertaining to gods are : 1. Nadī, 2. Viśālā, 3. Sumukhī, 4. Citrā, 5. Citravatī, 6. Mukhā and 7. Bālā. Those belonging to Pitṛs are 1. Āpyāyinī, 2. Viśvabhṛtā, 3. Candrā, 4. Hemā, 5. Kapardinī, 6. Maitrī, and 7. Bārhatī. The Mūrchanās of sages are : 1. Uttaramandra in Ṣaḍja, 2. Abhirūhatā in Ṛṣabha; 3. Aśvakrāntā in Gandhāra 4. Sauvīrā in Madhyama, 5. Hṛṣīkā in Pañcama, 6. Uttarā in Dhaivata and 7. Rajanī in Niṣāda.

Gandharvas sing the Mūrchanās of gods, Yakṣas use those of Pitṛs and men, those of sages (NP.I.50.35-41).

It is for proper Vedic studies that the NP. seems to have discussed the science of music in Śikṣā. Some of the instructions to students are interesting. Good teeth being essential, he recommends the twigs of Mango, Bilva, Apāmārga (Achyranthes aspera) etc. for brushing the teeth. He advises the use of Triphalā powder mixed with salt for good digestions and clear pronunciation. He advises to inhale (sandal ?) smoke and take in ghee. The student should recite the first seven Mantras in Mandra and then in his usual tone.[57]

57. Ibid. I. 50.207ff.

In spite of this discussion, he confesses that even expert musicians like him, Tumburu, Viśvāvasu and Gandharvas have a limited knowledge of Śikṣā[58] and what he stated is only a pointer (diṅ-mātra) in the matter.[59]

Musical Instruments

Nārada described only two instruments — Viṇā (a lute) and Veṇu (a flute). A Lute is either wooden (Dāravī) or human (Gātravati) and the latter is to be used in singing Sāmans.[60]

Nārada gives the correspondence between the notes of the flute and those of Sāman. The Madhyama of a Veṇu (flute) is the first Svara of Sāman. Thus the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th svaras of Sāman are the Gandhāra, Ṛṣabha, Ṣaḍja, Dhaivata, Niṣāda, and Pañcama svaras on the flute[61] respectively.

Unexpectedly here are two verses on chandas. The one gives the characteristics of Āryā (a mātrā-vṛtta with 12, 18, 12 and 15 mātrās per foot) and the rest Vipula (I.50.199-200).

2. Kalpa

This oldest tract of Sūtra literature deals with the (Vedic) ritual and was classified as Śrauta, Gṛhya and Dharma Sūtras according to the subject matter. The Kalpa in the NP. is divided into (1) Veda, (2) Saṁhitā, (3) Āṅgirasa, (4) Śānti and (5) Nakṣatra. The Veda Kalpa deals with performance of rituals with chanting of mantras from the Ṛgveda. Saṁhitā Kalpa describes the deities, metres (chandas) and ṛṣis of the mantras; Āṅgirasa Kalpa deals with the six specific acts (karmas) pertaining to sorcery (abhicāra). Śānti Kalpa, as the name suggests, describes the rites to ward off calamities caused by gods (divya), beings on the earth (bhaumika) and from the sky (āntarikṣa). Nakṣatra Kalpa deals with planets and stars (I.51.1-8). The NP. ascribes these Kalpas for every branch of the Veda though in ancient times they formed the part of the Caraṇa Vyūhas of the Atharva Veda.

The NP. describes the domestic rites and rituals under Nakṣatra Kalpa whrein we are given the purification of the plot of ground, placing of fire upon the altar (Vedi), arrangement of sacrificial materials, Gaṇeśa worship, propitiation of planets and pitṛkalpa i.e. performance of Śrāddha (NP.I.51.9 ff). The NP. draws heavily from the Yāj. smṛti ch. I in this chapter.

3. Vyākaraṇa

Vyākaraṇa or the science of grammar was developed for understanding the Veda and the earliest specimens of which are found in stray observations in the Āraṇyakas, the Uṇādi-sūtras (on formation of nouns from roots) and Phiṭ-sūtras (dealing with accents), Paṇini's Aṣṭādhyāyi being the only representative of such exegetical works. Out of the encyclopaedic Purāṇas, AP. gives the most exhaustive treatment of Sk. grammar in 11 chapters (chs. 349-359). It is an epitome of Kumāra vyākaraṇa.[62] GP. devotes two chapters (chs. 203-204) which show that Kātantra's grammar was its basis.[63]

According to Nārada, grammar is the mouth of the Veda (NP. I.52-1) and it discusses the following topics : (1) the seven case-endings, (2) Declension of nouns (in three genders), (3) Kāraka (cases), (4) Saṁhitās or Sandhis, (5) taddhita (nominal formation), (6) compounds (Samāsa), (7) Tiṅ Vibhakti (conjugation of verbs).

NP.'s presentation of grammar is popular and not scientific. He only gives examples and does not bother about Paṇini's rules.[64] It is possible that this section was written after Pāṇini was made popular by Bhartṛhari's Vākyapadīya, in the 7th cent. A.D.

4. Nirukta

Nirukta gives the etymology of Vedic words. The NP. considers it to be the ear of the Veda (Śrotrāṅga). It classifies Vedic roots into five categories, viz. those with Varṇāgama (addition of a syllable), varṇaviparyaya (Metathesis), varṇa-vikāra (change in the syllable), Varṇa-nāśa (Haplology), Saṁyoga (joining of letters) and he gives haṁsa, siṁha, gūḍhotmā, pṛṣodara and bhramara as the instances of these respectively (NP.I.53.1-5). As noted above, on p. 21 NP. further points out the difference in the declension and conjugation of Vedic and classical Sk. as in Pāṇini's Vaidikī Prakriyā. The roots are divided in ten groups (gaṇas) like bhvādi, adādi and the groups have 1006, 73, 22, 140, 32, 157, 25, 10, 52, 136, roots respectively. These are again classified according to their padas (e.g. Parasmaipada) and accents (e.g. Udātta, Anudātta, Svarita) (NP.53.16-76).

As all words are Siddha (derived), the study of their original form (Prakṛti), the morphology (Pratyaya), the augment (Āgama) should be undertaken (NP.I.53.70-86).

As compared with Yāska's work, NP. gives only a concise popular presentation containing a few illustrations. But the other two encyclopaedic Purāṇas (AP. & GP.) have not treated this topic at all.

5. Jyotiṣa (Astronomy)

Unfortunately no work of Vedic antiquity on Jyotiṣa proper has come down to us, except the references in the Saṁhitās and Brāhmaṇas (especially of the Yajurveda).[65]

Out of Purāṇas, AP. (some twenty chapters from 121ff) and GP. chapters 58-62 deal with Astronomy. GP. like NP. states that this science was composed by god Brahmā in 4,00,000 verses[66] — a figure popular with Purāṇa-writers. The treatment of this science in the NP. is more scientific and exhaustive. This science has three branches —Gaṇita (Astronomical calculations), Jātaka (Horoscopy) and Saṁhitā (Astrology, omens, etc.).

Gaṇita deals with (1) arithmetical operations (Parikarma), (2) calculation of the motions of planets, (3) place, direction, times of the grahas, (4) lunar and solar eclipses, (5) the time of the rising and setting of the sun, (6) the elevation of lunar cusps and (7) conjunction of planets.[67]

The arithmetical operations in the NP. are the same as in Bhāskarācārya's Līlāvati. This is not to suggest that the NP. is the borrower even though three verses in the Līlāvati (47, 48, 135) are found in the NP. (54.28, 29, 45).

The astronomical portion from the NP. except (4), (5), (6), and (7) is the same as in the Sūrya-Siddhānta. Though 186 verses of this portion are common to the NP. and the Sūrya Siddhānta, both the works might be independent borrowers from a common source.

The Jātaka portion of the NP. (ch. 55) and Varāhamihira's Bṛhajjātaka are practically identical in contents though textually the verses cannot be so claimed.

But the Saṁhitā portion in the NP. (ch. 56) is a digest of the Nārada Saṁhitā and the fact that in the 755 verses of the NP. we find about 300 quotations from the Nārada Saṁhitā shows how the NP. is indebted to the Nārada Saṁhitā, though the possibility of a common source cannot be ruled out.[68]

6. Chandas (Metrics)

Literature comprising the Vedāṅga on metrics is meagre. The AP. gives a detailed summary of the chandas śāstra in chs. 328-335.

As compared with AP. and GP. NP.'s treatment of metrics in 21 verses is brief (Kiñcillakṣaṇa). Naturally, it is merely an outline of the Vedic and classical metres, (including the syllabic (Varṇa) and the mātrā varieties. He explains the eight syllabic feet (gaṇas) and the variation of laghu and guru syllables (short and long), in them. He also explains the Sama (even-footed), Ardha-sama and Viṣama types of metres and the 26 classes of chandas depending on the number of syllables from one to twentysix per pāda (feet) of a regular metre. A metre in which the pāda exceeds 26 syllables is called a Daṇḍaka having names like Caṇḍa, Vṛṣṭi, etc. (I.57.1-10).

It is by a variation in the distribution of laghu (short) and guru (long) syllables that a great variety of new, subordinate metres takes place (I.57.14-21).

V. THE NĀRADA PURĀṆA AND TANTRISM

Tantrism has a special importance in the NP. It devotes 29 chapters (NP.I.63-91) to Tantrism. After hearing the discourse on Mokṣadharma in the 2nd pāda of the NP. (I.chs.45-49

68. Dr. K. Damodaran Nambiar has traced all the quotations in the three branches of Jyotiṣa to the Līlāvatī, the Sūrya Siddhānta and the Nārada Saṁhitā, vide PJ. Jan.1974, pp. 103-112 of his dissertation on the Nārada Purāṇa.

and 59-62), Nārada asks Sanatkumāra about the Bhāgavata Tantra or the Mahā Tantra whereby one can realize Viṣṇu (I.63.8-10). Sanatkumāra gives a comprehensive discourse which covers Pāśupata-darśana (I.63), procedure of initiation (I.64), the Pādukā-mantra and the procedure of its chanting (I.65), procedure of chanting the Gāyatrī Mantra and performance of the Sandhyā-prayer and worship of one's deity (I.66,67), system of worship and chanting the Mantra of Gaṇeśa (I.66), of Mahā Viṣṇu (I.70), of Piṭhadevatās and of Hayagrīva (I.72), of Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma (I-73) and of Hanūmān (I.74). Hanūmān receives more attention than Rāma, for we are told about his exploits (I.79), the lighting of lamps before Hanūmān (I.75) and the protective hymn (kavaca) of Hanūmān (I.78) and also the mantra, lamp-lighting and Kavaca of Kārtavīrya Arjuna (I.76, 77).

NP. gives also the Yantravidhi in addition to the procedure regarding mantra-japa of planets (I.69) (such as the Sun, the Moon, the Mars, the Mercury, the Jupiter and the Venus), of Nṛsiṁha (I.71).

The Rādhā cult is more enthusiastically propagated, as in addition to propitiation by Kṛṣṇa-mantra (I.80,81) and the Rādhā-kṛṣṇa-sahasra-nāma narrated by god Śiva to Nārada (I.82), we are informed of the mantras of the five Prakṛtis — rays or portions of Rādhā (I.83) and the procedure regarding the mantras and yantras of the sixteen incarnations of Rādhā (I.88). Allied with it is the Śakti cult under different names like Mahākālī, Mahālakṣmī and Mahāsarasvatī as can be seen from procedures about the mantras of Devī (I.85), Yakṣiṇī mantras, Yakṣīṇī being an incarnation of the deity of speech (I.85), mantras regarding goddesses Bagalā and others (regarded as incarnations of Mahā-lakṣmī) (I.86), the procedure about the four Mantras of Durgā (I.87), the Kavaca and Sahasranāma of Lalitā (I.89). Lastly the eulogy (stotra) and the procedure about the mantras of god Śiva (Maheśvara) receives attention (I.91).

Thus the Bhāgavata Tantra in the NP. includes :

1. Vaiṣṇava (with special emphasis), (2) Śākta; (3) Śaiva, (4) Pañcāyatana (Viṣṇu, Śiva, Devī, Gaṇeśa and Sūrya), (5) Hanūmat and other (e.g. Kārtavīrya mantra, planet-worship) cults.[69]

It seems that this part was composed in the hey-day of Tantrism (700-1000 A.D.) when Hindus, Buddhists and Jainas enthusiastically followed the Tantra form of worship.[70] The synthetic tendency in Brahmanic Tantras as the inclusion of these diverse cults under the Bhāgavata Tantra shows post-Śaṅkara (After 800 A.D.) period of the composition of this part.

Though NP. glorifies the Bhāgavata Tantra as the great and the best Tantra[71] leading to attainment (of the realisation) of Viṣṇu[72], conducive to the accomplishment of people's desires[73] and 'revealing all gods', it is careful to emphasize that the first priority to one's duties according to one's caste and stage of life (varṇāśrama-dharma)[74] be given; 'one should never neglect them even mentally' even after getting initiation (dikṣā).[75]

Importance of Mantra

In Tantrism much importance is attached to Mantra or incantation of a formula sacred to a deity. The NP. regards the two syllables in mantra as signifying 'omniscience' (man) and protection or liberation from Saṁsāra (tra).[76] Mantras are classified as Male, female and neuter according as they are concluded with the sound hum or phaṭ (masc) dviṭh or svāhā (Fem.) and namaḥ (neut). The male deities preside over man-tras while Vidyās are presided over by female deities and they are recommended in six kinds of Karmas. Mantras are classified as pertaining to fire (Āgneya) when they are R-ending or are used with Oṁ or Svāhā and as pertaining to the moon (Saumya) when associated with Bhṛgubīja (Saṁ) and Pīyūṣabīja (Vaṁ). The Āgneya mantras are 'awakened' when one's breath flows through the right nostril (Piṅgalā) and the Saumya mantras awakened when the breath flows through the left nostril (Iḍā) and all mantras become active when the breath flows through both (called Suṣumṇā).[77] The Āgneya mantras are to be used in evil or cruel acts and Saumya mantras for mild ones. The mantras are again classified as Śānta (Quiescent), Jñāna (knowledge-giving) and Raudra (Terrific). A Śānta mantra can be transformed into Raudra mantra by adding huṁ or phaṭ.[78]

As Defective mantras are ineffective in protecting the Sādhaka and give no Siddhi even if muttered for one crore of Kalpas (I.64.60) the NP. enumerates the defects of mantras[79] and explains the meaning of the technical defects as given below.[80]

If a defective mantra is muttered while one is seated on the Yonimudrāsana (a Siddhāsana-like posture), it becomes effective. (vv. 60-62)./

Technical term for the defective mantra[60]	Characteristics
Chinna (broken)	: A mantra associated or dissociated with Vahni-bija or conjoined with a vowel (svara-sahita) at its beginning, middle or end. It may recur three to five times (verse 21).
Ruddha (obstructed)	: (A mantra) having two bhūmibijas (Laṁ) in the beginning, middle or end. (verse. 22).
Śakti-hina (weak)	: A mantra having three Oṁkāras and Varṇas (Huṁ) is 'Lakṣmī'. Bereft of these is Śakti-hina, (v. 23).

Procedure of Initiation[81]

(i) Suitability of the Pupil

Before a pupil is initiated into a particular mantra, the most popular method to test the suitability of the pupil to receive that mantra is to draw an esoteric diagram —generally a square divided into 16 equal squares. The first line of four squares is to be filled by the first four letters of the alphabet — a, ā, etc. The fifth letter is to be written in the South-east corner of the square and in this way all the squares are consecutively filled by letters of the alphabet in their usual order. The first letter of the mantra is to be given and the first letter of the name of the pupil to be initiated in the mantra are located in this square. The counting of the squares is clockwise. It begins from the square where the first letter of the pupil's name stands. If both the initial letters (of the pupil's name and of the mantra) come in the first square of the first row, the mantra is Siddha (completely achieved). If the initial letter of the mantra is found in the squares of the second row (from the row of squares containing the first letter of the pupil's name, the mantra is Sādhya (worth accomplishing). If the intial letter of the mantra be in the third row, the mantra is susiddha (already mastered) but if in the fourth row, the mantra is hostile (ari). If the initial letters of both the mantra and of the pupil come in the first, second, third and fourth squares of the first row, the mantra is regarded as Siddha-Siddha, Siddha-Sādhya, Siddha-Susiddha and Siddhāri in due order. If they come in the four squares of the second-row, the mantra is respectively Sādhya-Siddha Sādhya-Sādhya, Sādhya-Susiddha and Sādhyāri. If in the squares of the third row, the mantra is looked upon as Susiddha-Siddha, Susiddha-Sādhya, Susiddha-Susiddha and Susiddhāri, respectively and if they both are in the fourth row, the mantra is Ari-siddha, Ari-Sādhya, Ari-Susiddha and Ari-ari respectively.

Mantra Siddhi

The Siddha-Siddha mantras become accomplished and effective when the prescribed number of their chantings is duly completed. Twice that number of chantings is required in the case of Siddha-Sādhya, Sādhya-Siddha, Sādhya-Susiddha, Susiddha-Siddha mantras. A Sādhya-Sādhya mantra takes a long time for mastering while Susiddha-Susiddha becomes immediately effective. But Ari types of mantras are dangerous. If Siddhāri and Susiddhāri is chanted, it destroys the chanter's household; Sādhyāri mantra destroys his relatives; Ari-Siddha, his sons; Ari-Sādhya, his daughter; Ari-Susiddha, his wife and Ari-Ari, the chanter himself.[82]

81. NP. I.65.

Deity-wise classification

Mantras are also classified according to deities, viz : (1) Rāma-mantras (2) Kṛṣṇa-mantras (3) Rādhā-mantras (4) Śākta-mantras (5) Sūrya-mantras (6) Gaṇeśa mantras (7) Śiva mantras. Out of these, Vaiṣṇava mantras are the excellentmost (Sarvottamottamāḥ). Out of them, the Rāma-mantras[83] are crorefold greater in efficacy (koṭi-koṭi-guṇādhikāḥ). Out of Rāma-mantras that of six-letters (ṣaḍakṣara) is of the greatest efficacy.[84]

(ii) Procedure of Initiation

The initiation of the mantra (mantra-dikṣā) is as per following procedure :

1. The pupil to pay obeisance to the guru's (spiritual teacher's) wooden sandals (pādukās) and having worshipped him with cloth, ornaments, etc., to request him to initiate him in the mantra.

2. After entering the sacrificial place (yajña-maṇḍala) the guru utters Astra mantras to drive out all evils and prepares a mystical diagram (maṇḍala) called Sarvatobhadra. Having worshipped the fire-god along with ten kalās (digits), he places a pot before him and performs a sacrifice to the twelve kalās of the sun-god. He chants the main mantra of viloma-mātṛkās and filling the pot with pure water worships the sixteen digits of the moon-god in the pot. Covering the pot with two garments, he puts in it herbs, nine jewels and tender sprouts of Panasa (Jackfruit-tree), Āmra (Mango), Aśvattha (pippala), Vaṭa (banyan) and Bakula (Mimusops elengi) and thus worships the deity to be propitiated (iṣṭa-devatā) . The guru seats the pupil on the sacred altar, sprinkles water over him, places the sprouts on the pupil's head. Chanting one hundred and eight times the Mūla mantra in his mind, the guru sprinkles water over him. The pupil performs ācamana (sipping of water), puts on new clothes, bows to his guru, sits in front of him. The guru places his right hand on the pupil's head and repeats the mantra eight times in the ear of the pupil. The pupil bows down to the guru and the guru blesses him with all the desirable objects (health, wealth, fame, etc.). After paying respects and dakṣiṇā (religious gift) to his guru, the pupil returns home and worships his deity in the 'Pañcāyatana' set-up (In this set-up the main deity, say Viṣṇu, is in the middle and the remaining four gods like the sun-god, Devī, Gaṇeśa, Śiva[85] are around him.

Yogic significance of the mūla vidyā :[86]

This knowledge of the Supreme (Mūlavidyā) is practised by 'waking up' the Kuṇḍalinī and leading her through Suṣumṇā nāḍī upto the Sahasrāra kamala in the crown of the head where Kuṇḍalinī is to be submerged (sam-magni-kṛiya) in the reservoir of nectar thereof.[87] In directing how the kuṇḍalinī is to be taken from one cakra (nerve-plexus ?) to another, NP. describes each cakra or Lotus with its petals and the bījas on them, the deity presiding over the particular cakra and what amounts to Japa is to be dedicated to that deity. For example, the first Cakra is a lotus of four petals with four bījas, viz. va, śa, ṣa, and sa. Its presiding deity is Gaṇeśa with pāśa (a noose), aṅkuśa (a goad), Sudhā pātra (a vessel of nectar) and modaka (sweetmeat of a particular type) in his hand. A japa for 600 times is prescribed for this deity. The cakras are (1) Mūlādhāra, (2) Svādhiṣṭhāna, (3) Maṇipūra (4) Anāhata (5) Viśuddha, (6) Ājñā and the description in the NP. tallies with those given in texts on Yoga. After concentrating on the supreme Soul there, the Kuṇḍalinī should be brought back to its original place at Mūlādhāra Cakra.

Every person breathes 21600 times per day. Basing the Mantra-chanting on one's breathing is called Ajapā-Gāyatrī or Haṁsa-Gāyatrī and the pupil should determine to perform it.

WORSHIP

In describing the ideal, pure life of such an initiated pupil, the NP. chalks out a programme or a time-table from getting up at dawn[88], during the course of which worship of the deity occupies an important place. The deity may be represented by a Yantra, a Śālagrāma, a jewel, an image of gold, silver, etc. or a Bāṇaliṅga. As a Yantra has special place in Tantrism, a few words about it are necessary.

YANTRA

A Yantra is a geometrical diagram engraved on a hard medium like a stone or a metal or painted on a paper with mantrabijas inscribed therein. "It is a development or product of mantra and the deity implied in the mantra. The deity worshipped on a Yantra becomes immediately propitious."[89] A Yantra may resemble a maṇḍala as an outward figure, but a maṇḍala can be employed in the worship of any deity, while a yantra is specifically meant for a particular deity for a special purpose.

The NP. describes the preparation and the efficacy of some yantras such as :

1. Trailokya-mohana-yantra is to be inscribed on a white Bhūrja patra (a leaf of the birch tree). If duly worshipped, it helps one accomplish one's desired objects.[90]
2. [91]Nārasiṁha-yantra is to be inscribed on a metal (gold or copper) — gives success, influence and protection.
3. [92]Sarva-vaśaṅkara yantra (giving ability to control all).
4. [93]Kālāntaka (destroyer or preventer of death) to be inscribed on a Bhūrja leaf.

WORSHIP

As idol-worship was in vogue before the time of Pāṇini[96] and the Gṛhyasūtras[97], its discussion in the NP. is natural. According to it, worship confers accomplishment of the desires of the worshipper (Sādhakā' bhiṣṭa-siddhidā[98]). The NP. classifies worship as follows :

1. Āturī : Performed by a sick person. He should look concentratedly at the idol (of the sun) and offer flowers while muttering the prescribed mantras.
2. Sautiki : During the period of mourning or delivery of a near relative woman, only mental worship during this period of impurity is prescribed.
3. Trāsi : While under intimidating circumstances or duress, the devotee is to offer worship with whatever material is available.
4. Sādhanābhāvini : If material of worship is not available even leaves or fruits will do. Nay even mental worship is advised.
5. Durbodhī : Worship by the ignorant, the aged and by women.[99]

The NP. recommends the Pañcāyatana system of worship in which the group of deities, viz. Viṣṇu, Śiva, Devī, Gaṇeśa and the sun-god are to be worshipped together, the main deity to be worshipped occupies the central position and the remaining four surround that deity.[100] This obviously points out to post-Śaṅkara (800 A.D.) period.

In different regions in India different methods of worship and articles for it are found, and they have a sanction both textual and that of custom. Special instructions in the NP. regarding worship are noted :

1. A disfigured (crooked, burnt, distorted, etc.) idol should not be worshipped.[101]
2. Simultaneous worship of two conch-shells, two cakra-śilās, two idols of the Gaṇeśa or of the sun-god and of three idols of Śakti in a house is not advisable.[102]
3. According to NP. Arghya is a mixture of flowers, unbroken rice-grains (Akṣata), barley, ends of Kuśa grass, sesame, mustard, sandal paste and Dūrvādala (young and tender leaves of grass), while Ācamanīya is water mixed with Japāpuṣpa, Kaṅkola and cloves (lavaṅga).
4. Vessels of conch-shells are prohibited for the worship of the sun-god and Śiva.[103]
5. Red clothes are to be offered to Śakti, the sungod, and Gaṇeśa, yellow to Viṣṇu and white to Śiva.[104]

The deities and the special flowers to be offered to them are also mentioned in the NP., but being of little interest it is passed over.

The details of the worship of a deity right from the drawing of a maṇḍala upto its end when the Tirtha is to be sipped and the Naivedya to be partaken of is given in NP. I.67 (for which vide the translation and annotations of that chapter).

Special Tantric Procedures :

The NP. belonged to the age when Tantrism (Hindu, Jain, Buddhist) was popular and widely practised. The very fact that the NP. devotes 29 chapters to Tantrism and prescribes both right and even abominable 'left' practices (Vāmācāra) gives credence to the theory that the author of the NP. belonged to East India as the eastern states like Assam, Bengal and Orissa were noted for such practices since olden times. The NP. records the following types of Tantric Ṣaṭ-karmas :

101. NP. I.67.33.
102. Ibid. 67.120-121.
103. Ibid. 67.27-29.
104. Ibid. 67.56.

1. Pauṣṭika (bringing peace and prosperity or propitiatory).
2. Vaśya (Helpful in controlling others).
3. Stambhana (Paralysing the other party).
4. Vidveṣa (creating animosity).
5. Uccāṭana (expulsion, extirpation).
6. Māraṇa (Annihilation, killing).

Durgā confers these powers if she is propitiated in the prescribed way (I.87.22-30). A number of Mantras (of various deities) have this efficacy. It may appear strange, but even an auspicious deity like Hanūmān is credited to give these evil powers, if propitiated in the special Tantric procedure (I.73.40-45). The Kārtavīrya Mantra was supposed to endow the initiated with the above-mentioned powers (I.76.30-34).

1. Pauṣṭika : There are auspicious practices like chanting of Śānti Mantras, worship of deities, performance of a homa, taking of medicines. A number of mantras with the technique of its Japa, homa, worship, etc. are given in this section, in connection with the propitiation of various deities e.g. for god Gaṇeśa (ch. 68) planets including the sun-god (ch. 69) etc. Muttering of mantras while preparing medicines had magic effects) such as a barren woman giving birth to a son. (ch. 68.81-84). The mantras of the deities had a healing effect; for example repetition of the Lakṣmaṇa mantra a hundred thousand times heals the patient from veneral diseases (ch. 73.158-160). The chanting of Hanūmān mantra 900 times at night for ten days and performance of Homa has the efficacy of curing the trouble of goblins, planetary troubles and diseases (I.74.17-19).

2. Vaśya or Vaśikaraṇa (Bringing under control). Flowers seem to be an important factor in charming others and influencing them. If Lakṣmaṇa mantra is chanted one hundred thousand times followed by a homa with ten thousand lotuses, it enables a man to marry a girl of his liking (NP. I.73.166-67). If one offers different types of lotuses to god Gaṇeśa, one is able to influence royal personages like the king or the queen (NP. I.68.37). If one thousand Kumuda (night blossoming lotuses) are offered as Homa while muttering the Viṣṇu mantra, all kings come under one's control (70.200). While chanting Nṛsiṁha, the sacrificer can control the whole world.[105]

3. Stambhana (the magical power of stupefying or paralysing). If while muttering the Nṛsiṁha Mantra, flowers of the Madhūka (Bassia Latifolia) tree and pieces of Dhātri (emblica officinalis) are offered, one attains the power of stupefying others.[106] Even a minor deity like Mātaṅgeśvarī if propitiated with a Homa of a mixture of salt and turmeric powder, can grant this magical power.[107]

4. Vidveṣa (creating discord)

For attaining this power the procedure is a bit elaborate. For example, for attaining this power from the gracious good Hanūmān, one should draw a Yantra on the hide of a donkey and chanting the mantra of Hanūmān, one should perform a homa with Hayamāra (Nerium tinctorium) flowers.[108]

5. Uccāṭana (Extirpation)

In order to extirpate terrible goblins and spirits causing epilepsy (apasmāra), one should mutter the Jvālā-mālini-mantra one hundred thousand times and worship Nṛhari with the performance of a Homa with cow's ghee.[109] If the deity Hanūmān is to be propitiated for this purpose, one hundred thousand chantings of the deity's mantra and ten thousand Āhutis of sesame in fire are recommended. Thereby the haunting devil yells loudly and frees the haunted person.[110] If the deity is lord Kṛṣṇa, the mantra describing Hari attacking the hostile forces with fiery arrows, is to be chanted one thousand times every day, for the period of a week. When the total of seven thousand chantings is completed, the enemy is extirpated in a week.[111]

6. Māraṇa (Total annihilation)

A number of mantras of various deities is credited to have this power. Even the mantra of a king Arjuna Kārtavīrya, if chanted and a Homa with mustard, garlic, Ariṣṭa (Sapindus emarginatus) and cotton is performed gives such a power.[112] Durgā, if propitiated by 'left-hand practices' (Vāmācāra) confers this power.[113]

Black magic and left hand practices

These records in the NP. show that the author must be hailing from East India as the states of Assam and Bengal were the strongholds of these immoral and obscene rites practised by the Hindus and the Buddhists. It may be the 'twilight speech' (Sandhyā Bhāṣā) of the Siddhas of ancient times who camouflaged their spiritual experience and procedures by using terms with apparent un-gentlemanly significance. But if that be not the case in the NP. some of the specimens quoted in the footnote[114] are not complimentary to the then standard of morality.

VI. RELIGIOUS SECTS IN THE NĀRADA PURĀṆA

After the discussion of Tantrism in the NP. and on its background, some important religious sects may briefly be noted.

112. NP. I. 76.30-31.

113. Ibid., I. 87.25-30.

114. I refer here only to one chapter pertaining to goddess Kāli (I.85) :

If one wants the power of speech he should gaze at the female organ and chant Kālimantra for 10,000 times (20). If he performs the japa at midnight in a cemetary, in a naked condition, letting down his (matted hair), he attains all Siddhis or (Supernormal powers) (21). If he sits naked on the chest of a dead body in a cemetary and while chanting the Kāli mantra, worships the goddess with one thousand Arka (calotropis Gigantea) flowers sprinkled with his own semen, the person becomes a king ere long (22-23). If one concentrates his attention on the female organ in the monthly course and mutters the Kāli mantra awhile, he certainly becomes a fascinating poet (24). If he meditates upon Mahākālī fighting with Mahākāla, while he himself is having sexual intercourse, and performs even one thousand chantings of the Kālī mantra he becomes just like another god Śaṅkara (25-26).

The whole section is abominable. Let me conclude with one instance of the practice of offering bali to the goddess which is supposed to give supernatural power.

The aspirant is to sit on a corpse (at night) on the 8th or 14th of the dark half of the month. It may be in a cemetary, or a temple but a lonely place. While looking, touching or 'going' (cohabiting) a woman, he should offer as bali a person killed in a battle or a babe of six months only. (70-72).

The use of wine, fish and flesh in worshipping female deities was quite common (I.90.2').

The Pāñca-rātras and Vaiṣṇavism

The aversion of the writers on Dharma Śāstra against this originally non-Vedic sect and its final acceptance and amalgamation into Vaiṣṇavism cannot be discussed here for want of space. But since the 3rd cent. A.D. (the approximate date of the Viṣṇu Purāṇa), Purāṇas accepted Pāñcarātra as their own and all Vaiṣṇava Purāṇas including the Bhāgavata have accepted it. The elaborate form of the Pāñcarātra worship and the Tantric procedures have been prescribed by the NP. for the propitiation of all deities, irrespective of their being Vaiṣṇavites, though NP. shows them to be born of Viṣṇu — Kṛṣṇa or Rādhā.

Vaiṣṇavism

The NP. being a Vaiṣṇavite Purāṇa, identifies Mahā-Viṣṇu with the Para Brahman. He is the God of gods, the Ādi-deva (the first God), the Śabda-brahman and of the form of spiritual sound (nāda-rūpa) and consciousness (Cidrūpa).[115] He is imperishable (akṣara), infinite (ananta), the Lord of the Universe (Viśveśvara) and the Veda incarnate.[116] Gods Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva are the manifestations of Mahā-Viṣṇu for the creation, protection and dissolution of the universe.[117]

The NP. knows the usual ten incarnations of Viṣṇu.[117a] but deals with only three, viz. Nṛsiṁha,[118] Rāma[119] and Kṛṣṇa,[120] though strangely enough that is in the context of Tantrism and, curiously Hanūmān is given more importance[121] than Rāma and the anonymous cowherdess of the Bh.P. is assigned the position of a Supreme goddess.[122] This development of the Rādhā-cult shows the comparatively recent date of this section.

Just as God Mahā-Viṣṇu manifests himself in the Trinity of Brahmā, Viṣṇu (a lesser deity than Mahā-Viṣṇu) and Śiva Kṛṣṇa — an incarnation of Mahā-Viṣṇu is credited with creating Nārāyaṇa from the left side of his body, Brahmā from his navel and Śiva being his (left) half and these three gods are appointed by Kṛṣṇa with the functions of creation, protection and destruction of the Universe — functions assigned to the Trinity of gods in the Mbh. and other Purāṇas.

The special feature of the NP. is the application of Tāntrika rites to incarnations of Viṣṇu such as Nṛsiṁha, Rāma and Kṛṣṇa and the Super-goddess treatment given to Rādhā (as the highest deity in the Tantra form of worship, with other deities like Mahā-lakṣmī, Durgā holding a secondary place). even though Mahālakṣmī was born from Rādhā and Durgā from Kṛṣna (NP. I 83. 13-29). The Supreme importance of the Ekādaśī Vrata and the influence of Pāñcarātra school are undeniable.

Śaivism

The NP. though a Vaiṣṇava purāṇa, regards Śiva as Viṣṇu's alter-ego who fulfils the desires of all.[123] Viṣṇu does not spare even goddess Pārvatī for talking lightly of Śiva.[124] King Bhagīratha propitiated god Śiva[125] and secured the descent of the Gaṅgā. The NP. describes the Tāṇḍava dance of Śiva before Jaimini.[126] The glory of the worship of Śivaliṅga (NP. I.79) and the ascription of many holy places to Śiva (NP.II. 74) shows the great regards paid to that deity. Out of the family of Śiva, Gaṇeśa has a special place in the Tantra form of worship, with special Mantras and Gaṇeśa Gāyatrī, etc. He is the chief of Gaṇas, remover of obstacles, brilliant as the rising sun, is the creator and destroyer of the universe. In addition to his usual description of elephant-headedness, etc., he is regarded as a Dvija. An elaborate worship Japa, etc. in the Tantric way is detailed in NP. I. 68.

Pāśupata

The NP. though Vaiṣṇavite, gives a more detailed treatment to the Pāśupata darśana than do the so-called Śaivite

123. NP. I.16.71-74.

Purāṇas. It insists on the observance of the Varṇāśrama-dharma, Yoga and Bhakti.

According to the NP. (I.63.13-124) the Pāśupata school regards Paśupati (Lord Śiva), Paśu (an animal i.e. the jiva) and Pāśa (bondage) as three fundamentals. Pati i.e. Lord Śiva is all in all about the universe and he grants salvation despite the karmas of the Paśu. Paśus are classified into three : Kala (tainted with mala or ignorance), Talapākala (possessing mala and karmans), and Sakala (affected by mala, māyā and Karma) — the last suffers from transmigration in Saṁsāra. Unlike later Śaivism, NP. holds that there are five Pāśas each resulting from mala (ignorance), Karman, Māyā (delusion), tirodhāna-śakti (obscuring power) and Bindu (the last being the special pāśa in the NP.). All these pāśas can obscure the powers of the paśu, viz. the powers of vision, knowledge, action and bindu-śakti — the power of attaining Mokṣa. The Supreme soul (Paramātman) is constituted of Sat (being, existence), cit (consciousness) and Ānanda (spiritual bliss). It is the Śaiva Tejas endowed with powers of knowledge and action.

When the Bindu-pāśa is reinforced with Cit, it becomes endowed with Jñāna-Kriyā-Śakti. Though the NP. enumerates many Tattvas (principles) like Śiva, Śakti, Vidyā, (knowledge), Kāla (Time), there is only one Tattva called Śiva (Śivākhya) which possesses all Potencies (Śaktis). He blesses his devotees with the same form as himself (Śiva-Sāmānya-rūpa) endowed with bliss and salvation. Śiva is the Kartā, Māyā, the Upādāna (material cause) and his śaktis, Karaṇa (the Instrumental cause). Kalā, Kāla niyati Vidyā, rāga, Prakṛti and Guṇas are the Products of Māyā wherewith the universe is created.

The NP. advises all to cut asunder the Pāśas by following Varṇāśramadharma and practice of Yoga and Bhakti, by getting oneself initiated in Pāsupata Tantra.

3 Śāktism

According to the NP. Rādhā is the chief deity — Śakti — in Śāktism. She is ever associated with Lord Kṛṣṇa. Mahā-Lakṣmī, Mahāsarasvatī, Durgā, Sāvitrī, Devī, etc. are her part incarnations (aṁśāvatāras)[127] or aspects of Rādhā. Rādhā was born from Kṛṣṇa's person and lives resplendently

127. NP. I.-83.10-32.

in the Goloka. Rādhā is the Primordial Nature (Mūla Prakṛti), the goddess of all gods and is known as the Illusive Power of Viṣṇu (Viṣṇumāyā), Kṛṣṇa-māyā, the mother of god Brahmā (Vairāja-janani). Although she has thirtytwo attendants, her two friends Candravatī and Lalitā are chief and are the heads of two groups of goddesses.[128]

Mahālakṣmī and Śrī

Goddess Mahālakṣmī was born from the left side of Rādhā. She is fair in complexion, bedecked in jewels and seated in a lotus.[129] Mahālakṣmī assumed the form of Śrī in a previous Kalpa to destroy demons like Mahiṣa. She dwells in the Aravinda forest. She is the goddess of wealth and is represented as seated in a lotus, being sprinkled by four elephants with nectar. She wears a silk Sari and a crown and her hands represent the Vara (gifting a boon) and Abhaya (protection from fear) mudrās and holds a garland and a lotus in the other two hands.[130]

Though Mahālakṣmī is herself an incarnation, her incarnations are the three-eyed goddesses Tripurā (NP. I. 86.3, 16-17) Annapūrṇeśī (I. 86.63-69) and the formidable goddess Bagalāmukhī (I. 86.82-88). Bagalā is represented to be of golden complexion, wielding in her arms a thunder-bolt, a noose (pāśa), a hammer (mudgara) and wearing a moon on her forehead. These incarnations show influence of or synthesis with Śaivism.

Durgā

This most important Śaivite (and Śākta) goddess with a crescent moon on the forehead and one thousand hands was (according to the NP.) born from Kṛṣṇa's person and was given to Śiva in marriage (I. 83.17-19, 27-29). Creating a special region (Devī-loka) for herself, she continues to perform penance and has three incarnations per day and is the main cause of creation (I. 83.70-78).

Durgā has taken the following incarnations :

(1) Chinnamasta-Ramā — a terrific deity with broken head, dishevelled hair and drinking her own blood (I. 87.1-8).

128. NP. I. 83.44-47; 88.7-15.
129. Ibid., I. 83.50-53.
130. Ibid., I. 58-60.

(2) Tripura-bhairavi — A three-eyed goddess wearing a red garment and a garland of skulls; with two hands she expresses boon-giving (Vara) and protective (Abhaya) mudrās and has a rosary of beads and Vidyā in the other two hands. She has the refulgence of a thousand suns (I. 87.41-62).

(3) Mātaṅgī — This hideous goddess is black, and has profuse hair with a crescent-moon on the forehead. She is bedecked with ornaments of conch-shells and represented to be intoxicated and playing on a lute (I. 87.100-130).

(4) Dhūmāvatī — A wicked fierce widow like deity with lean body, long breasts, scattered hair, broken teeth and pale complexion. She is ever hungry and thirsty but is seated in a chariot with a heron on her flag. She destroys enemies (I.87.156-160).

The Śākta influence on the Kṛṣṇa-born Durgā is obvious. But it is Rādhā and not Durgā who is the main deity of Śāktism in the NP.

Sarasvati

Another important Kṛṣṇa-born deity is Sarasvatī. She is born from Kṛṣṇa's mouth. She is white in complexion, with a face like the full-moon, holding a lute and a book in her hands and is seated on a white swan. Kṛṣṇa sent this goddess of speech to Vaikuṇṭha for the company of Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa (I. 83.30-31, 96-97).

The incarnations of Sarasvatī are three :—

(1) Mahāsarasvati — In appearance she is like Sarasvatī. She lived in the Himālayas for killing demons Śumbha and Niśumbha. After accomplishing her task she entered the Mānasa lake (I. 84.78-84).

(2) Kālikā — NP. regards Kālikā as Sarasvatī's incarnation. She is dark in colour and wields a sword and a skull in two hands and while the other two express Vara (Boon-giving) and Abhaya (Protection) (NP. I.85 1-7).

(3) Tārā — A three-eyed deity, blue in complexion, with a crescent moon on her forehead but is seated on a dead body (I. 85.35-41).

Sāvitri : According to the NP., this goddess was born along with Brahmā from Kṛṣṇa's umbilical region. She is bright as a thousand suns and the Vedas are born from her (Brahma-Yoni). She has three incarnations in three parts of the day — at dawn, noon and the dusk (as described in the Sandhyā-Prayers of three times) and is thus associated with Brahmā, Rudra and Viṣṇu (I. 83.20-22; 109-117 and also vide I. 27.44-58).

Devī

The NP. calls her the mother of the universe (Jagadambikā), the greatest Śakti of Śiva, creator of the whole universe. With a smile eternally playing on her countenance, this three-eyed goddess, lustrous like the rising sun, wears the Moon on her forehead. She wields a noose (Pāśa) and a goad (aṅkuśa) in her two hands and expresses Vara and Abhaya with the other two (I. 84.1-17).

VII. RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY IN THE NĀRADA PURĀṆA

A good deal of ground concerning religion and philosophy in the NP. has been covered in the previous two sections. Only a few remaining points will be briefly noted :

Varṇāśramadharma

The NP. is a staunch supporter of Varṇāśrama dharma. Endorsing the social application of the concept of the Cosmic Man in the Puruṣa Sūkta (RV.X.90) and the insistence on the maintenance of that order in the Mbh.[131], the NP. repeats the duties of Varṇas (castes) and Āśramas (stages in life) in I.14, I. (chapters 24-30 also 31-32 and 43). Though the NP. waxes so eloquent on the importance of Tantrism in twentynine chapters (I.63-91), it warns that even after getting initiated, one should never even mentally transgress one's Varṇāśramadharma.[132] The social disintegration described in the 'predictions' about the Kali age was a historical reality to Purāṇa writers.[133] Hence, all Purāṇas insisted on the observance of the Varṇāśramadharma.

The NP. is, however, aware of the classless stage of society in ancient times. It quotes Mbh. Śānti 188.10-20 as the rationale of the division of society into Varṇas as being due to the moral deterioration of the people.[134] It, however, assures that by observing one's prescribed duties one becomes a Muni[135] (sage) and by neglecting them he should be known as a heretic (Pāṣaṇḍa).[136] These duties need not be elaborated here as the Ācāradharma is detailed in Smṛtis, Mbh. Śānti. chs. 189, 192 and 193 and are repeated many times in the NP. (I.14, I.chs. 24-30, 31, 32, 43).

131. Mbh. Śānti. 57.15.
132. NP. I. 63.114.
133. R. C. Hazra — PRHRC pp. 193-227.

Cosmogony :

In cosmogony the NP. follows the Sāṅkhya Vedānta theories as given in the Mbh. Śanti. chapters 182-184. (vide sarga above).

About other points :

The existence and eternal nature of the Jīva[137] is stated in the NP. in the words of the Mbh. Śānti. 187.1-31. It is by the practice of Yoga that one realizes the nature of the soul, its distinctness from the body, its transmigration due to his Karmas, its non-relation to pleasure and pain.[138] The teaching of Mokṣadharma, viz., the soul's difference from the eleven sense-organs (5 organs of actions and 5 cognitive senses+1 mind), its unrelatedness to actions (Karmas) whether Sāttvic, Rājasic or Tāmasic, the necessity of controlling sense organs and performance of acts disinterestedly (niṣkāmakarma)[139] is the same (even textually) as that in the Mbh. Śānti. 219.2-28, 44-52.

Yoga (NP. I. 33)

According to the NP., Yoga is of two types — Karma Yoga and Jñāna Yoga. A follower of the Karma Yoga worships god Viṣṇu, observes Vratas and listens to Purāṇas. Observance of the five Yamas like non-violence, truth, kindness and renunciation of jealousy are common to both the Yogas.[140] By both the Yogas, one can realize the identity of the Para and Apara Ātmans.[141] It is the Māyā which creates diversity in the nature of the soul. An aspirant after Mokṣa should destroy the delusion by means of Yoga.[142]

The NP. discusses the eight steps of Yoga (the aṣṭāṅga Yoga). The NP. follows Patañjali in the treatment of Yoga, though there are minor differences such as addition of Akrodha and Anasūyā (Absence of anger and jealousy) in Yama (the 1st. Yogāṅga) and Haripūjana (specifically of Viṣṇu and not Patañjali's vague (Īśvara-praṇidhāna) and Sandhyopāsanā in the Niyamas,[143] (The 2nd aṅga of Yoga). It appears that the 30 Āsanas (physical postures) recommended in the NP. 33.12-15 were popular at the time and region of the author of the NP.

According to the NP., breath-control (Prāṇāyāma) may be sa-bija or nir-bija (i.e. accompanied or non-accompanied with the mental pronunciation or muttering of the mantra). If so accompanied it is sa-garbha and more effective.[144] Dhyāna (meditation) is perfect concentration on God or chanting Praṇava (OM) while meditating on Nārāyaṇa, as the Praṇava is the combination of the Trinity of gods, viz., Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra — nay, as a matter of fact of the Brahman[145] itself. Due to contemplation, the Yogī acquires vicāra, vitarka and viveka and gradually attains Nirvāṇa.[146]

The whole course of Yoga is again succinctly retold later in the dialogue of Keśidhvaja and Khāṇḍīkya in NP.I.47. It shows that it is the Vaiṣṇavite Yoga with Vedantic basis.

Bhakti Yoga

The NP. is eloquent in describing the efficacy and greatness of Bhakti. It is the prime cause and life-giving force of all Siddhis (NP. I.4.3-4)—a veritable wish-yielding cow (Kāmadhenu). The Parābhakti destroys all sins like a conflagration burning down the forest of sins. A devotee of Viṣṇu attains success in life here and liberation from Saṁsāra hereafter (NP. I. 1.78-79)—

141. NP. I. 33.57.
142. Ibid., I. 33.37-72.
143. Ibid., I. 33.87.
144. Ibid. I. 33.119.
145. Ibid. I. 33.153-160.
146. Ibid. I. 44.83-105.
(A quotation from Mbh. Śānti. 195.1-22) even the worship of Viṣṇu's devotees leads to the region of Viṣṇu and he who repeats the name of Viṣṇu is honoured by gods (NP. I. 3.53-56). Such Bhakti is achieved through association with god's devotees if one has the good luck or merits to his credit (NP. I. 3.53-56).

The NP. classifies Bhakti on the basis of guṇas, viz., Sattva, Rajas and Tamas, as follows :

1. Tāmasi-bhakti of a low (adhamā) nature : By this Viṣṇu is worshipped in order to destroy others.
2. Tāmasi-bhakti of a middle (Madhyamā) type : Dishonest worship of Nārāyaṇa like the love of a lewd woman (svairiṇi) to her husband.
3. Tāmasi-bhakti of the excellent (Uttamā) type : A competitive type of Bhakti, when a person jealously competes with others in performance of Bhakti.
4. Rājasi Bhakti—The lowest type (adhamā) : Worship of Hari for getting wealth, grains, prosperity.
5. Rājasi Bhakti of the middle (madhyamā) : Worship of Viṣṇu for gaining fame and popularity.
6. Rājasi Bhakti of the best type : Worship of Hari for securing salokatā mukti (residence in Hari's region).
7. Sāttviki Bhakti — The lowest type : Worship of Hari for destruction of one's sins.
8. Sāttviki Bhakti — The middle type : Service to Hari as per his will.
9. Sāttviki Bhakti — Uttamā : Voluntary service (Dāsya Bhakti) to Viṣṇu to please him.
10. Uttamottamā : The most excellent: the Devotee realises himself to be Viṣṇu and the universe is within him.[147]

In the next chapter (NP. I.16) the NP. gives another threefold classification depending on the states of the mind.

1. Śraddhā-Bhakti — the devotee realises that the Universe (including himself) is Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu is the cause of everything. He is to be worshipped as per prescribed rules.

2. Samatā-Bhakti — The devotee realizes that Viṣṇu is omnipresent in all beings and nothing is different from him.

3. Śānti Bhakti — The state of mind when the devotee regards friends and foes alike and faces with pleasure whatever comes to him.[148]

147. NP. I. 15.138-151.
148. Ibid., I. 16.31-35.

VIII. THE INTERPRETATIONS OF 'BHAGAVAT' and 'BHĀGAVATA'

As Bhagavān is the object of the Bhakti, the NP. gives different interpretations of the term Bhagavān.

1. Bhagavān : The Brahman which is inexpressible in words is called Bhagavat for the purpose of worship (in the Bhakti cult).
2. An artificial interpretation of each syllable in Bha-ga-vat.
   Bha = (1) the knowable, (2) the knower.
   Ga. = (1) the creator.
   (2) the father of Āgamas (Āgama-pitā)
   Bhaga = The six excellences from Prowess to Renunciation.
   Va = That in whom the bhūtas reside and whom he prevades.
3. One who knows both Vidyā and Avidyā, the creation and destruction of bhūtas and one endowed with entire knowledge, power, prosperity, prowess and brilliance.[149]

Bhāgavatas

Though the word Bhāgavata is derived from Bhagavat, the NP. paints an ideal devotee in I.5.46-76. Bhāgavata is applied to both Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava devotees. He is self-controlled, quiescent, interested in listening to the Sat-kathās (stories about the gods as in Purāṇas), is devoted to the name of the Lord, performances of sacrifice, doing works for public welfare, observes the Ekādaśī Vrata and performs Karmas for God.

IX. THE DHARMA ŚĀSTRA

The NP. is specially interested in Dharma Śāstra. It discusses in details topics like Dāna (religious gifts I.13), Prāyaścitta (expiatory rites), Tithis, Śrāddha, (I.chs. 24-30), Vratas 'religious vows' (I. chs. 17-23) II, chs. 1-37, Tirthas 'sacred places' (I. 12 II.39).

It closely follows the injunctions in Smṛtis and other Purāṇas. It also elaborates the doctrine of Karmavipāka which holds out hopes of redemption even to the worst sinners. There is very little that can be claimed as the original contribution of the NP. except the decisions about the day of Ekādaśī and such other matters of special interest to Vaiṣṇavas.

The NP. (and the Bnr) are treated as authorities on the Dharmaśāstra and are frequently quoted as authorities by such great mediaeval writers like Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa, Hemādri, Mādhavācārya, Vācaspati Miśra and others.

X. THE NP. AND THE MAHĀPURĀṆAS

NP. chapters 92-109, are very important, as they give some idea about the contents of the Mahāpurāṇas before the final redaction of the NP. (in the 10th cent. A.D.). As the annotations to the above chapters show, the contents and divisions in the present published Purāṇas are different from those given in the NP. The extant Purāṇas differ from the NP. in the following respects :

1. The total number of verses recorded in the NP. and the actual number of verses in the extant Mahāpurāṇas. For example the NP. (and AP. Brv. Vāyu, and Bh.P. itself) gives 18000 as the total number of verses in the Bh.P. but actually the Gītā Press edition of the Bh.P. contains 14,579 verses.[150]
2. The nomenclature of different parts of the Purāṇas as given in the NP. is different in their extant versions. For example, the Vāyu Purāṇa states (in 103.44) that it has the following four Pādas (sections) (1) Prakriyā (2) Anuṣaṅga (3) Upodghāta and (4) Upasaṁhāra and calls itself a four-footed Purāṇa. But the NP. gives Pūrvabhāga and Uttarabhāga as the divisions of the Vāyu (vide NP.I.95.7).
3. The details of contents given in the NP. and those found in the extant Purāṇas are different. There are both additions and deletions. For example, NP. I.92.34 mentions the story of Rāma in the contents of the Br.P. but it is not found in the printed (G.M.) edition of the same. So also NP. I. 95.7-15 mentions the Revā Māhātmya in the Vāyu but the printed texts (both Anandashram and Guru Mandal editions) do not give these chapters.* A number of such differences show that the texts of Purāṇas available to the author of the NP. were different than those in the extant Purāṇas. But all the additions to the extant versions of the Purāṇas (as compared with the NP.) need not be considered 'spurious' simply because it is not mentioned in the NP. It is the MSS-evidence which is more important in deciding the genuineness of certain verses or portions of a Purāṇa rather than its inclusion or exclusion in the NP. NP. Part II is definitely a later interpolation and 'spurious' even though the last redactor of the NP. interpolated a few verses (NP. I. 97.11-18) to legitimise NP. Part II.[151]

150. For other such differences vide NP. Part IV annotations, Nos. 13, 28, 17 etc.

XI. THE AUTHOR

The author of the present Nārada Purāṇa is not Nārada. He is simply a listener to the discourses of his brothers Sanaka, Sanandana and others. At the end of NP. Part I, he departs and goes finally to Nārāyaṇa (NP. I. 125.6-24). The author or the last redactor of the present work may be presumed to be some Vyāsa who opts to observe silence about himself.

There are, however, some indications in the NP. itself which supply some clues about his sub-caste, region, time, etc. as follows:

1. NP. I. 27.38-67 give the details about Sandhyā (twilight prayer) which every twice-born has to perform. The details of the Sandhyā show that the author of the NP. was presumably a Mādhyandina Brāhmaṇa, a follower of the Kātyāyana Sūtra (vide annotation no. 331 and 332).

2. NP. I. 28 deals with the rite of Śrāddha. We find that the NP. and the Kātyāyana Śrāddha Sūtra use the same full Mantras, prescribe the repetition of the word Madhu thrice in addition to the Gāyatrī and Madhumatī verses, prescribe the recital of the same texts while Brāhmaṇas are being fed, and agree with each other in many details. The procedure of Śrāddha observed by Mādhyandina Brahmins of Bengal is similar to that given in the NP. (probably because Raghunandana's Yajurvedi-Śrāddha-tattva which they follow in Bengal is based on Kātyāyana's Śrāddha-Śātra). The similarity regarding the procedure of Śrāddha may perhaps be due to the author's being a Mādhyandina Brahmin and resident of the Eastern region (Bengal-Orissa).

*Also Revā Khaṇḍa of 232 chs. and caturaśīti-liṅga-Māhātmya 84 chs. in the SKP., Lalitā Episode of 40 chs. in Bd.P. are not mentioned in the NP.

151. The differences between the contents of extant Purāṇas and those recorded in the NP. are discussed in the annotations of chs. 92-109.

3. As noted above in the section on the NP. and Tantrism, the NP. propagates enthusiastically the Rādhā Cult. The anonymous cowherdess in the Bh.P. is the highest deity here. Śiva recites her Sahasra-nāma (I.82). The five Prakṛtis are but rays of Rādhā (I.83). This exaltation of Rādhā provides favourable background for the subsequent development of Gauḍīya-Vaiṣṇavism.

4. The NP. shows a high popularity of Tantrism especially of the 'left hand' (Vāmācāra) cult. As remarked in the same section, the eastern states of India, viz., Bengal, Assam and Orissa were ths strong-holds of Vāmācāra practices both in Brahmanical and Buddhist Societies.

5. The importance of Rādhā in the 'Left hand' practices, the procedure regarding the Mantras and Yantras of the sixteen incarnation, of Rādhā (NP. I.88) and the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa relations in the NP. might be the back-ground of Sahajīya Vaiṣṇavism and other obscure religious cults that thrived in Bengal and other adjacent areas in the mediaeval times.

6. Sections in Purāṇas in the NP. (for example those of the Padma Purāṇa) agree with those given in the Bengal MSS of that Purāṇa (vide note no. 13 on NP. I.93).

The evidence given above tends to show that the author of the NP. was probably a Mādhyandina Vaiṣṇava Brahmin from the eastern states — probably the Bengal-Orissa area.

XII. CONCLUDING REMARKS

The translation of the NP. is based on the text in the Venkateshwar Press edition Bombay (Śaka 1845) = A.D. 1923 the only available edition of the NP. Unfortunately the editors of that text did not consider the syntactic aspect of the text. An Anuṣṭubh verse with three lines i.e. six feet, is common in Purāṇas; they should have added one line of Anuṣṭubh from the next verse to an otherwise incomplete sentence, so that the whole chapter would have been smoothly readable. In the interest of completing the sentences, I had to bring together the (b) and (a) lines of consecutive but different verses (e.g. 29b-30a) and translate them. A. S. Gupta in the edition of the Kūrma Purāṇa has many times added two pādas (one line from the next anuṣṭubh verse to such verses and his edition of the Kūrma Purāṇa as compared with that of the Veṅkaṭeśvara Press of the same Purāṇa is more readable.

This translation is faithful to the text of the Venkateshwar Press edition of the NP. — emendations are rarely attempted and evidence for their adoption is recorded in annotations.

CHAPTER ONE

The Dialogue between Sūta[1] and the Sages

1. Om, obeisance to the holy preceptors. Om, bow to Lord Gaṇeśa.[2] Om, salutations to glorious Lord Vāsudeva.[3] Om, after making obeisance to Nārāyaṇa[4] as well as to Nara,[5] the most excellent among men, and also to goddess Sarasvatī,[6] one should begin the recitation of Jaya[7] (the Nārada Purāṇa).

Om, obeisance to Veda-Vyāsa.[8] I bow to Upendra (Lord Viṣṇu), who abides (permanently) in Vṛndāvana[9] and is the shrine of Bliss unto Indirā (goddess Lakṣmī); who abounds in compassion and is greater than the greatest and whose form constitutes the highest Bliss.

2. I worship that Supreme primordial Lord whose form is the purest Consciousness (cid-rūpa); who is the greatest (of all beings), and whose parts called Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Maheśa (Śiva) are (the deities) who accomplish (the cycle of creation, maintenance and destruction of) the world.[10]

3. Śaunaka[11] and other noble-souled sages, the expounders of the Brahman, performed a penance in the great forest named Naimiṣa,[12] with a desire to attain Final Liberation.

4. They had conquered their sense-organs; had full control over their diet; they were saintly persons of truthful exploits. With greatest devotion, they worshipped the eternal, primordial Viṣṇu.

5. They were above jealousy and were conversant with all holy rites. They were devoutly engaged in blessing the world and had no feeling of my-ness (sense of personal possession). They were devoid of egotism and their minds revelled in the transcendental Ātman.

6. They had renounced all passions and longings and were sinless; they were endowed with self-control and other good qualities. With matted hair and the hide of black-antelope as their upper garments, they led a celibate life (Lit. they observed the vow of celibacy).

7. They eulogised the Supreme Brahman, the eye of the universe. All of them were of equal prowess. They were the knowers of the meaning and reality of the sacred scriptures. They performed penance in the Naimiṣa forest.

8. Some of them worshipped the Lord of sacrifices by performance of sacrifices; others worshipped the Deity, the Embodiment of spiritual knowledge, by means of the path of knowledge; some worshipped Nārāyaṇa with devotion par excellence.

9. Desirous of understanding the means of righteousness, wealth, love and Final Beatitude (the four Puruṣārthas), those excellent noble-minded (high-souled) sages met in a congregation.

10. The sages of sublimated sexuality numbered twenty-six thousand. It is impossible to enumerate the disciples and the pupils of their disciples.

11. Those sages of sanctified souls (through meditation), of great prowess, met together. Devoid of passion and jealousy, they desired to do (something) to bless the world.

12. (The questions that made them ponder were :) What are the sacred places of pilgrimage (kṣetra), and the shrines or holy places (near the banks of sacred rivers, lakes, etc.) — the tirthas — ? How is liberation (from Saṁsāra) achieved by men distressed in their minds by worldly miseries (of three kinds).

13. How is the devotion of men unswervingly directed towards Hari ? By what means can one achieve the fruit of the three types of activities (viz. mental, verbal and physical) ?

14. On seeing the sages eagerly intent on asking him (these questions) in this manner, the intelligent Śaunaka spoke these words with palms joined in reverence, and bowing down with humility.

Śaunaka said :

15. In the holy hermitage of Siddhāśrama,[13] there lives Sūta, the most excellent of all the Paurāṇikas (exponents of the Purāṇas). With different types of sacrifices, he worships Janārdana of universal form.

16. That great sage, the son of Romaharṣaṇa, the quiescent disciple of Vyāsa knows this completely. He is the propounder of the Purāṇa texts. So the tradition goes.

17. On seeing piety and religious rites being (progressively) reduced (in quantity and quality) from Yuga to Yuga (successively) the slayer of Madhu (Lord Viṣṇu), assuming the form of Veda-Vyāsa classifies the Vedas.

18. O Brāhmaṇas, we have heard that the sage Veda-Vyāsa is Nārāyaṇa himself. And Sūta has been initiated into all sacred texts directly by Vyāsa.

19. Sūta has been instructed and initiated by that intelligent Veda-Vyāsa. He does know all the Purāṇas. There is none competent than he (in this respect) in this world.

20. In this world, he is the only knower of the import of all Purāṇas. He is intelligent, omniscient and quiescent. He knows the path of righteousness leading to final liberation as well as the entire corpus of (the theory and practice of) the paths of action and devotion.

21. O prominent sages, the sage Vyāsa has, for the benefit of the universe, expounded, in the Purāṇas all those topics that constitute the essence of the Vedas, the Vedāṅgas[14] (the ancillary subjects pertaining to Vedas) and the scriptures.

22. Sūta is indeed an ocean of knowledge. He proficiently knows the real nature of (and the exact truth about) everything. Hence, we shall ask him. So said Śaunaka to the sages.

23. Then all those delighted sages embraced Śaunaka, the most excellent of those conversant with the realm of speech. "Well-spoken. Well-advised", said they (to express their approval).

24. Thereafter, those sages went to the holy Siddhāśrama in the forest. It abounded in groups of deer. It was graced with the residence of sages (living therein).

25. It was beautified with charming trees and creepers (full of abundant) flowers and fruits, and was spotted with lakes of crystalline water and was inhabited by persons warmly hospitable to guests (and strangers arriving there).

26. They (the sages of the Naimiṣa forest) saw the son of Romaharṣaṇa worshipping the infinite unvanquished Lord Nārāyaṇa, by means of the Agniṣṭoma[15] sacrifice.

27. Suitably honoured by Sūta, those sages of well-known powers, remained there in the hall of sacrifice, awaiting the concluding rites of ablution (Avabhṛtha).

28. Afterwards, when Sūta, the excellent-most of all Paurāṇikas completed the rites of Avabhṛtha ablution, those residents of the Naimiṣa forest asked him, as he seated himself comfortably.

The sages said :

29. O strict observer of religious vows we who ought to be hospitable to you as hosts, have come here as your guests. However, be pleased to honour us duly by means of homage in the form of charitable gift of perfect knowledge.

30. Whereas the heaven-dwelling gods live by drinking the nectarine juice from the digits of the moon, the earth-dwelling gods (the Brāhmaṇas) do so by drinking the nectarine juice of the perfect knowledge exuding from your mouth, O sage.

31.* (Who is that lord) by whom all this (the universe) was created, who is the support of all this, who is the Soul of all this, in whom, O dear one, everything is well established and in whom everything will get dissolved ?

32.* By what does Viṣṇu become propitiated ? How is he worshipped by men ? What is the code of conduct of life for the people in the various castes and walks of life ? How is the guest to be worshipped ?

33. What is that whereby the holy rites shall be fruitful? What is the means of salvation for men? What is achieved by men through devotion ? And of what nature is devotion ?

34. O Sūta, the most excellent of all sages, explain these things, dispelling every doubtful factor. Who is not keenly desirous to hear the nectarine words of yours ?

Sūta said :

35. Listen ye all, O sages. I shall recount what is desired by you. This has been narrated to the noble-souled Nārada by those sages the chief of whom was Sanaka.[16]

(*Better if 31 and 32 are taken together. This (31) verse then becomes a sort of an adjectival clause describing Viṣṇu in the next verse).

36. This Purāṇa named after Nārada is on a par with the Vedas in regard to its import (artha). It is destructive of all sins It wards off the influence of all evil planets.

37. It is conducive to piety and destructive of the effects of evil dreams. It yields as fruits worldly pleasures as well as salvation. Containing narratives of Nārâyaṇa, it is the cause of everything blessed and auspicious.

38. It brings about piety, wealth, love and liberation.[17] It is highly efficacious as it yields unprecedented merit as its fruit. Listen to it with great concentration.

39. One may be defiled by great sins[18] or subsidiary ones.[19] But on hearing this divine Purāṇa pertaining to sages and ascetics, one shall regain purity.

40. On reading a single chapter of this Purāṇa one shall attain the benefit of (the performance of a) horse-sacrifice.[20] Similarly, on reading two chapters, one attains the spiritual rewards of performance of Rājasūya[21] sacrifice.

41-42. O Brahmins, by reading three chapters one attains the same merit as a man who takes bath in the waters of the Yamunā on the full-moon day in the month of Jyeṣṭha with the moon in the constellation Mūla, who observes fast with great purity, at Mathura and who duly worships Kṛṣṇa.

43-44. I shall explain (one thing more) very well. Even as I recount, listen well. A man who listens to ten chapters of this (Purāṇa) with feelings of earnest devotion, shall attain to the region of Brahmā and stay therein. He will be freed from sins accumulated in the course of ten thousand births. He shall be followed by a ten million members of his family.

45-48a. No doubt or hesitation need be entertained in this matter that he will attain the final beatitude. This is more blessed than the most blessed. It is pre-eminently the best of all sanctifying things. It is meritorious and destructive of (the effects of) evil dreams. O Brahmins, this must be listened to, assiduously. A man of faith who reads at least a verse or even half of a verse is immediately absolved of heaps of great sins. Since this is the secret of all secrets, it must be narrated only to good men. This must be made to be read in front of Viṣṇu, in the presence of Brahmins, in a holy place or shrine.

48b-49a : One shall not narrate this excellent Purāṇa to persons engaged in injuring the cause of Brâhmaṇas and to those persons who are religious-hypocrites like (proverbial) cranes (which are supposed to pretend meditation till a fish comes within their reach).

49b-50. This, being the means to liberation from saṁsāra, should be recounted to those who are devoted to the pious course of life and whose mind (ātman), with lust and other noxious qualities eschewed out, revels in the devotion to Viṣṇu. For Viṣṇu comprises within himself all gods and destroys the agonies and applications of those who remember him.

51-52. He is favourably disposed towards his pious devotees, O Brāhmaṇas. He becomes pleased only with devotion and nothing else. A man is freed from sins if he glorifies or remembers Viṣṇu's name even without faith. He attains to the Eternal region (Vaikuṇṭha) the unchanging region. Madhusūdana (the destroyer of the demon Madhu) is like the big forest conflagration unto the terrible jungle of worldly existence.

53. He quickly destroys all the sins of those who remember him, O excellent ones. This excellent Purāṇa which indicates that meaning and purpose should be listened to.

53a. By listening to it or reading it one is able to annihilate all sins.

53b-55. Only he who, with a devoted mind, is inclined to listen to this Purāṇa, has really accomplished his objects in life (Kṛta-kṛtya) and can be regarded as adept in understanding and interpreting all the scriptural precepts. O Brahmins, I consider that whatever merits are earned or austerities performed by him, are really fruitful.

56. (Unless one has a fund of merits) it is not possible for him to have devout inclination towards listening to God's stories or Purāṇa. Those good men who are the benefactors of the universe, are engaged in stories about the Supreme Spirit.

57a. The wicked or evil persons are exclusively devoted to sinful activities and are engaged in censure and quarrels.

57b-58. O excellent Brahmins, the merits (if any) earned by those vilest of men who (i) attribute laudatory nature to Purāṇas (or) (ii) who allege that the Purāṇas are merely laudatory passages (Artha-vāda)[22] become exhausted. (For the Purāṇas are really the means of eradication of all binding actions.

59. A person who speaks of Purāṇas as being arthavāda, falls into hell.[23] O excellent Brahmins, men duly pursue and attain other objects of worldly pleasure.

60-61a. But persons who are deluded do not do the same for accomplishing the Purāṇas. O excellent Brahmins, Purāṇas must be listened to with great devout feelings by the person who desires to accumulate merits without strain (trouble or exertion).

61b-62. Undoubtedly the sins incurred earlier by that person who feels inclined to listen to the Purāṇas are destroyed. Even while the Purāṇas exist, if a person, compelled by sins, feels drawn towards other gāthās (folk songs and fables) and is attached to them, he faces downfall.

63. A man engaged in associating himself with the good, worshipping the deities, and narrating or listening to noble stories of God as well as in imparting beneficial instructions, goes to the highest region of Viṣṇu. After death, he attains a brilliance comparable to that of Acyuta.

64. Hence, O prominent Brāhmaṇas, listen to this holy meritorious Purāṇa named after Nārada. On hearing this, a man becomes free from old age, rebirth, etc. His mind becomes stabilised in Acyuta.

65. The Purāṇa is excellent and highly pre-eminent. It grants the desired boons. By its own lustre, it has sanctified all the worlds. By remembering the primordial Deity that bestows the cherished objects, a man attains the state of salvation.

66. O Brahmins, he creates, protects and annihilates the universe by assuming different bodies of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Īśa. By contemplating in one's mind that primordial Lord the transcendental Ruler, one attains liberation.

67. He who is devoid of all such (varieties based on ignorance) and alternatives such as name, caste (birth), etc., who is the greatest among the great beings, who transcends the greatest, who is comprehensible only through the Vedānta and who reveals himself unto his devotees, is highly praised by all Purāṇas and Vedas.

68. Hence, that Lord of the worlds, the cause of liberation, the Eternal, Slayer of Mura[24] is competent to be worshipped. By remembering the great mystic secret, the cause of attainment of the Puruṣārthas (objectives) a man crosses the ocean of worldly existence.

Can we not take it as one sentence thus "Hence by remembering that Lord...whose worship is sufficiently efficacious...a man crosses...existence" ?

69. This should be recited only to righteous persons, the faithful ones and to ascetics devoid of passion, and to persons seeking salvation.

70. It should be recited in a holy place, in good assembly, in the temples in sacred places and sacred spots (near the bank of a holy river or lake) and in the presence of the gods (or images of gods) and the Brahmins.

71. Those who relate this excellent narrative in a place defiled with crumbs and other remnants of food are cooked in the terrible hell[26] all the long while till the dissolution of the world.

72. He who though infatuated, hypocrite and devoid of devotion, falsely pretends to listen to this Purāṇa is also similarly cooked in the everlasting terrible hell.

73-74. The man who carried on conversation with others in the middle of a holy discourse (about the Lord), goes to the terrible hell. Hence, O leading Brahmins the narrator and the listener should pay single-minded attention. This is the eternal path of righteousness. One without concentration of the mind does not understand anything.

75. Hence, one shall imbibe the nectarine story of Hari with concentration of mind. How can a man of confused mind appreciate the holy story ?

76-78. What happiness is achieved in the world by a man of confused intellect and mind? Hence, one shall eschew all desires which are the cause of misery and meditate on Lord Viṣṇu with the perfect concentration of the mind. If the eternal Lord Nārāyaṇa is somehow remembered even by a sinful person, he shall undoubtedly be delighted. Fruitful indeed is the life of that man who entertains highest devotion to Lord Nārāyaṇa, the eternal Lord of the universe. Salvation is as if just on the palm of his hand within his reach.

79. O excellent Brahmins, there is verily (absolutely) no doubt in this that the four objectives of human efforts, viz. Puruṣārthas of Virtue, Wealth, Love and Liberation are achieved by those who are devoutly attached to Hari.

NOTES

1. Sūta :

This term signifies a caste-name as well as a profession. As a caste, sūta is the pratiloma offspring born of a Kṣattriya male and a Brahmin woman vide the Dharma Sūtras of Gautama (4.15), Baudhāyana (1.9.9), and Viṣṇu (16.6) and the Smṛtis of Manu (10.11) and Yājñavalkya (1.93). Kauṭilīya Arthaśāstra, however, carefully distinguishes between the two. It states : Kṣattriyāt sūtaḥ./ Paurāṇikas tvanyaḥ Brahma-Kṣattrād viśeṣaḥ / (3.7.28-29) "The child born from a Kṣattriya man (and a Brāhmaṇa woman) is sūta. But Sūta — the reciter of purāṇas is different and is superior to Brāhmaṇas and Kṣattriyas.

According to Va.P. (1.60-61), god Brahmā compiled the Purāṇas before 'breathing out' the Vedas and the duty of preserving them (Purāṇas) was entrusted to Sūta who was mysteriously born out of the first sacrifice. As Vaṁśīdhara on Bh.P. 1.1.5 points out : as Sūta was born of fire (sacrificial fire)he was ipso fact a Brāhmaṇa. Sages like Śaunaka and others heard the Vedas in the form of the Bh.P. because he was a Brāhmaṇa for "a Śāstra is not to be heard from a low caste. Such hear ing is unacceptable like drinking milk from a pot of dog's hide". This Sūta, the reciter of the NP. is positively a Brāhmana as can be gathered from his description as the performer of Vedic sacrifices and other details given in NP. 1.1.15-28. The fact that Śaunaka along with other Brāhmaṇa sages approaches him for enlightenment, is an evidence of his being a Brāhmaṇa. This Sūta is a direct disciple of Vyāsa (sūtas tu Vyāsa-śāsitaḥ / v. 18 & v. 19 later). This means that his name should be Ro(Lo) ma-harṣaṇa, most probably a title meaning "One who makes the hair of the members of his audience, stand on their ends, by the recitation of Purāṇas" : Va.P. (1.1.16) states :

lomāni harṣayāṁ cakre śrotṛṇām yat subhāṣitaiḥ / karmaṇā prathitas tena loke smil-Loma-harṣaṇaḥ / /

The word Romaharṣaṇi if emended as Romaharṣaṇa gives appropriate sense and does not offend the metre here or in v. 25 below.

2. Gaṇeśa :

Literally "The lord or controller of gaṇas (which is variously interpreted as Pramatha-gaṇas or goblin attendants of god Śiva, or evil spirits presiding over troubles or hindrances). He is also known as Vighna-rāja (the ruler over impediments or difficulties). Hence, he is always invoked with a prayer at the beginning of every work big or small and of any nature, be it the writing of a book or constructing a building. He is regarded as a son of god Śiva and Pārvatī or only of Pārvatī who created him of herself alone. His image is elephant-headed. This is a substitute of his original head which was cut off by Śiva for not allowing him to see Pārvatī. BV.P. reports that Gaṇeśa was originally very beautiful and out of pride for her child, Pārvatī invited everyone to see him and Śani (the presiding deity of the planet Saturn) was one of them. He was very unwilling to see, as he knew the consequences of his seeing. But not daring to displease goddess Pārvati he looked at the child's face through the corner of his left eye. And lo ! The child's head fell off and remorsefully Śani withdrew his glance immediately. As Bv.P. puts it :

Śaneś ca dṛṣṭi-mātreṇa ciccheda mastakam mune /
cakṣur nivārayāmāsa tasthau namrānanaḥ Śaniḥ / /

BV.P.-III Gaṇapati-khaṇḍa. 12.6

Viṣṇu killed an elephant with his discus Śudarśana and fixed his head on that of Pārvati's child (BV.P.III. 12.10-20) who subsequently became known as Gajānana 'Elephant-headed god'. A cycle of legends has accumulated around the god Gaṇeśa which is treated not merely as a part (e.g. Gaṇapati khaṇḍa in BV.P.) of a Purāṇa, but there are two Upa-purāṇas on that God, viz. the Gaṇeśa Purāṇa and the Mudgala Purāṇa. There Gaṇeśa is the Para-Brahman himself who incarnates in this world for protection of the world as stated in BG. 4.7-8. The Gaṇeśa Gītā attributed to god Gaṇeśa (which forms a part of the Gaṇeśa Purāṇa) reminds one of the BG. at every step. He is one of the five principal deities of Neo-Hinduism (the others being gods Śiva, Viṣṇu, Sūrya or the Sun-god and goddess Śakti or Pārvati). There is a cult of this god known after him as Gāṇapatyas. Gaṇeśa images are found all over India and Greater India upto Japan and if Chaman Lal is correct (in his Hindu America) even in Central America. He is worshipped by Hindus both of the 'right' and 'left' form of worship and even by the Buddhists especially under the influence of Tantrism. Attempts are made to trace him to the Vedic period in the Brahmaṇas-pati sūkta (RV. 2.23.1 also Tait. S. 2, 3, 14, 3). Though Brahmaṇas-pati and Gaṇapati are connected with speech, 'elphant-headed-ness' is not the characteristic of that Rg-vedic deity, though both have some names (e.g. Gaṇapati) common. The elephant-headed god is expressly mentioned in the Maitrāyaṇī Saṁhitā (2.9.1) as follows :

tat-karaṭāya vidmahe, hasti-mukhāya dhīmahi /
tan no dantī pracodayāt / /

Tomes have been written on this god. An encyclopaedic dictionary in many volumes called Gaṇeśa Kośa in Marathi is available. As he is the god of learning, he is invoked at the beginning of all literary productions. Even Vyāsa employed him as the writer of the Mbh : (Mbh.Ādi. P. 1.75-79) Gaṇeśa is thus always saluted at the beginning of every Brahmanical literary work in ancient and mediaeval India.

3. Vāsudeva :

The deity that pervades the universe. The word is derived from $\sqrt{vas}$+ bāhulakāt uṇ — vāsu / vāsuś ca devaś ca / The omnipresence of this deity is emphasised in many Purāṇas. e.g. V.P.

sarvatrāśau samastaśca vasatyatreti vai yataḥ / tataḥ sa Vāsudeveti vidvadbhiḥ pari-gīyate / /

— V.P. 1.2.

sarvāṇi tatra bhūtāni vasanti paramātmani / bhūteṣvapi ca sarvātmā Vāsudevas tataḥ smṛtaḥ / /

— V.P. 6.5.80

So in Mbh. V.70.3 :

vasanāt sarva-bhūtānāṁ vasutvād deva-yonitaḥ /
Vāsudevas tato vedyo bṛhatvād Viṣṇur ucyate //

Many scholars hold the view that Vāsudeva, the Yādava hero, the cowherd boy Kṛṣṇa in Gokula, and the great philosopher exponent of the Bhagavad Gītā are one and the same person (Cf. K. M. Munshi : Glory that was Gurjara Deśa I, pp. 111-27) Historicity of Vāsudeva Kṛṣṇa is generally agreed. A comparison between the tenets of Ghora Aṅgirasa, the preceptor of Kṛṣṇa the son of Devaki in Chāndogya Upa. (3.16-19) and Vāsudeva Kṛṣṇa's in the BG., shows great affinity between the two. Vāsudeva Cult was in vogue at the time of Pāṇini, Megasthenes and Ardha Māgadhī Jain canon. It was pro-Vedic and earlier than the non-Vedic Pañcarātra system of Nārāyaṇa, though ultimately they amalgamated into one : Bhāgavatism. But before doing that the Vāsudeva cult or Bhāgavatism had to accept the doctrine of Vyūhas (Emanations) and absorb it in its doctrine of Incarnation (avatāra-vāda), treat Viṣṇu Purāṇa as their own along with the Bhagavad Gītā and adopt the worship of Lakṣmī. Bhāgavatism, however, sticks to its specific mantra : Om namo bhagavate Vāsudevāya and does not accept the Pāñcarātra mantra : Om namo Nārāyaṇāya. Hence all sacred texts of Bhāgavatism present obeisance to Lord Vāsudeva. For more details about Vāsudevism vide Intro. to the Bh. P. Pd.P. Uttara Khaṇḍa derives Vāsudeva from his father Vasudeva (Vasudevasya jātoṣau Vāsudevaḥ sanātanaḥ /) but generally most of the Purāṇas keep Vasudeva in the background. The identification of Vāsudeva and Nārāyaṇa was completed before the epic period. Thus K.P.I. 48.69 describes the sleeping Viṣṇu :

Sa eva paramaṁ Brahma Vāsudevaḥ sanātanaḥ /
śete Nārāyaṇaḥ śrīmān māyayā mohayan jagat / /

4. Nārāyaṇa :

The derivation : "A deity whose residence is (in) on the waters". The standard quotation to support this is :

āpo nārā iti proktā āpo vai nara-sūnavaḥ / ayanaṁ tasya tāḥ pūrvaṁ tena Nārāyaṇaḥ smṛtaḥ / /

— Manu 1, 10 and many purāṇas, also Mbh. Vana. 192.3.

Here the word 'Water' (āpaḥ) is used in the sense of primeval matter out of which the universe is formed. Śatapatha Br. 6.1.1.9 states : sā idaṁ sarvam āpnod yadidaṁ kiñ ca / yad āpnot tasmād āpaḥ / (As the chief deity of the Pāñcarātra system, Nārāyaṇa was out of Vedic fold. But the process of synthesis set in, and he was identified with Vāsudeva and Viṣṇu :

Nārāyaṇāya vidmahe, Vāsudevāya dhīmahi / tan no Viṣṇuḥ pracodayāt / /

— Maitrāyaṇī Saṁhitā (ibid)

It is possible that he was the god of sea-faring people (probably of Dravidians). His being a sea-god is testified in the Buddhist Avadāna Śataka where a merchant's wife goes to fulfil her pledge (about safe voyage) to the god Nārāyaṇa whose temple was on the sea shore. The four Emanations (Vyūhas) of Nārāyaṇa viz. Vāsudeva, Saṅkarṣaṇa, Pradyumna and Aniruddha is the central concept of the Pañcarātrins. (MBH. Śānti. 339.19-76) The anthropomorphic figure of Nārāyaṇa, the serpent coils that form his bed, and the waters on which this serpent floats, are triune manifestations of the single divine, imperishable cosmic energy underlying and inhabiting all the forms of life. In The Purāṇas and the Mbh. (e.g. 6.65.52) we are told that Viṣṇu sleeps on Śeṣa, Viṣṇu is Śeṣa, and Śeṣa is the form of the Supreme Being. Thus the fusion of Viṣṇu and Nārāyaṇa was complete long before the Epics.

In the Bh.P. 2.7.6 and Mbh. Śānti. 334-.9-12, he is the son of Dharma and Dakṣa's daughter Mūrti and was the brother of Nara. The MBH. adds that the Lord manifested Himself in four forms — Nara, Nārāyana, Hari and Kṛṣṇa, out of them Nārāyaṇa and Nara practised penance in a gold chariot at Badarikāśrama :

Kṛte yuge mahārāja purā svāyambhuvantare /
Naro Nārāyaṇas' caiva Hariḥ Kṛṣṇaḥ Svayambhuvaḥ / /
teṣāṁ Nārāyaṇa-Narau tapas-tepatur avyayau / /
Badaryāśramam āsādya śakaṭe kanakāmaye / /

Mbh. Śānti. 334.9.10.

Another derivation in Mbh.5.70.10 suggests that the god is called Nārāyaṇa as he is the resort of all people.
(narāṇām ayanāc cāpi tato Nārāyaṇaḥ smṛtaḥ)
(For more details vide Introduction : The Viṣṇu concept)

5. Nara :

An ancient sage, brother of Nārāyaṇa, performed penance for thousands of years at Badarikā (Mbh. Vana. 40.1) Alongwith Nārāyaṇa he fought with Asuras on the side of Devas on the Amṛta issue and was entrusted with its protection (Mbh. Ādi. 19.19-31). Arjuna is said to be the Lord's incarnation (vide Nārāyaṇa above). Devī Bhāgavata / IV. chs. 5 & 6. confirms the relation between Nara and Nārāyaṇa and their penance at Badarikāśrama for 1000 years, and adds that when Indra tried to disturb their penance by deputing heavenly damsels, Nārāyaṇa created Urvaśī and presented it to Indra. When despite that the damsels refused to return, Nārāyaṇa got enraged and was pacified by Nara by referring to the fight for Amrta. He is an eternal associate of Nārāyaṇa. He represents the eternal spirit, the Supreme Man.

6. Sarasvatī :

The goddess of speech, always invoked at the beginning of every Purāṇa and in Mbh. also a tradition faithfully observed by later Indian writers down to modern times. She is evolved out of the Vedic minor deity Vāc. BV.P.-Brahma-khaṇḍa 3.57 clearly identifies her with Vāc and she is the inspiring deity of poets and is of pure Sattva, by nature :

Vāg-adhiṣṭhātṛ-devī sā kavīnām iṣṭa-devatā /
śuddha-sattva-svarūpā ca śānta-rūpā Sarasvatī / /

She is regarded as one of the five Potencies of the Lord at the beginning of the world (BV.P.-Gaṇeśa-khaṇḍa 40.61.-7). In RV.X.125 she describes herself as a companion of all gods supporting gods like Indra, Agni, etc. and as bending Rudra's bow against Asuras. In the Śatapatha Br. 3.2.4.3-6 she helps in the barter for Soma from Gandharvas where she outwits the Gandharvas after securing Soma from them. In Nighaṇṭu 5.5. she is a deity of the atmosphere and probably Yâska identifies thunder as the Vâc of the middle region (Nirukta 11.27). She is regarded as the embodiment of literature as her body consists of Om, vowels and consonants — at least, that form of Sarasvati appeared before Yâjñavalkya when he received the Veda from the Sun-god (Mbh.Śânti. 318.14). As Mt.P. states she is the deity to be propitiated for proper grasp of Vedas, all Śâstras, and arts like dancing, music, etc. Here this is the traditional invocation as per practice of all Purâṇas.

7. Jaya :

Originally this verse was used at the beginning of the Mbh. where Jaya signifies the Mahâbhârata. But after its adoption by all the Purâṇas, it comes to mean the Purâṇa which adopts it for the invocation of Nârâyaṇa and Nara. The BS.P. states : "Eighteen Mahâpurâṇas, Rāmāyaṇa, Dharma Śâstra works of Viṣṇu and others, the holy texts of Śiva-dharma and the fifth Veda Mahâbhârata are called 'Jaya'.

aṣṭâdaśa-purâṇâni Râmasya caritaṁ tathâ / Viṣṇu-dharmâdi-śâstrâṇi Śiva-dharmaś ca Bhârata / / kârṣṇyaṁ ca pañcamo Vedo yan-Mahâ-Bhârataṁ smṛtam / jayeti nâma eteṣâm pravadanti manîṣiṇaḥ / / BS.P. 1.5

8. Veda Vyâsa : Vedaṁ vyasyati-pṛthak karoti'ti / vi + √as + aṇ) Vyâsa.

The classifier of the Veda. His other synonyms are : Dvaipâyana (The island-born-Satyavati, his mother gave birth to him on an island in the river), Pârâśarya (Son of sage Parâśara), Vyâsa, Bâdarâyaṇa (the author of the Śârîraka Sûtras of Vedânta, prob. from his place of residence). VP. states that god Viṣṇu assumed the form of Vyâsa and classified the Vedas

Vedam ekam catur-bhedaṁ kṛtvâ śâkhâ-śatair Vibhuḥ /
karoti bahulam bhûyo Veda-Vyâsa-svarûpa-dhṛk / /

His life is closely associated with the Kaurava-Pâṇḍava family, first as the father of their fathers and then in most of the important events in their lives. Vyâsa-vana (Mbh. Vana. 83.93), Vyâsa-sthalî (Mbh. Vana. 83.96-98) both places associated with his name are in and near Kuru-kṣetra. This shows that his major part of life was spent in that area.

NP.1. 1.17-18 confirm the belief tht Vyâsa was God Viṣṇu himself who classified the Vedas for righteousness, progressively eroded as yugas passed. The Mbh. composed by him is the digest of all Vedas and Śâstras. (MBH. Âdi-1.17-21 and later vv. 54-74). Bh.P. was the last work which, as advised by Nârada, gave him mental peace. All the Purâṇas, Mbh. and Brahma Sûtras are ascribed to him. He had written on all the subjects under the Sun. Vyâsocchiṣṭaṁ jagat sarvam is a well-deserved compliment to him.

9. Vṛndâvana :

Still well-known by the same name. It is in U.P. A sacred place of all Hindus irrespective of Vaiṣṇavism. It is named after Vṛndâ which according to BV.P. Kṛṣṇa-janma-khaṇḍa-Ch. 17, was the name of the daughter of King Kedâra. She was the incarnation of Lakṣmî. Sage Durvâsas gave her the Hari-mantra. She performed penance for 60,000 years and sought Viṣṇu as her husband. The forest place where she performed the penance, came to be known as Vṛndāvana :

Vṛndā yatra tapas tepe tat tu Vṛndāvanaṁ smṛtam /
BVP. Kṛṣṇa-janma-khaṇḍa 17.204.

In the same chapter, Nārāyaṇa states that Vṛndā is one of the 16 synonyms of Rādhā (Kṛṣṇa Vṛndāvanī Vṛndā Vṛndā-vana-vinodinī / ibid 17.21.b). The forest of Rādhā (with Kṛṣṇa) came to be called Vṛndāvana.

In the Devi-bhāgavata 7.30.69, Vyāsa gives a list of Śakti-pīṭhas (Specially holy shrines of goddess Śakti) out of which Vṛndāvana is one and is associated with Rādhā.

Rukmiṇī Dvāravatyā tu Rādhā Vṛndāvane vane /

The Bh.P. Skandha X gives many details of Vṛndāvana which are shown by guides to pilgrims today.

10. Loka-sādhakāḥ :

When Kṛṣṇa is identified with Para-Brahman, the gods in charge of the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe, naturally become his functionaries in carrying out the cycle of the creation etc. of the universe, and as such are called the servants (entrusted to accomplish the routine of this universe); and they are merely the rays of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

11. Śaunaka :

According to Mbh. Ādi. 1.19 and Anuśāsana 30.65 he was the son of Śunaka of Bhṛgu clan. In Mbh. he is shown to be the performer of a sacrifice of 12 years duration in the Naimiṣa forest (see below), and the Sūta, Ugraśravas (son of Vyāsa's disciple Roma-harṣaṇa) came to visit him. In NP.I. 1.3-14, Śaunaka practised austerities in the Naimiṣa forest and when he was asked some problems of world-interests by sages, he led them to Sūta at Siddhāśrama (see below Siddhāśrama).

12. Naimiṣāraṇya :

It is modern Nimsar at a distance of 20 miles from Sitapur and 45 miles to the Nirth-West of Lucknow. Nimsar is a railway station on the former Oudh-Rohilkhanda Railway. It is so called because Lord Viṣṇu destroyed the Asura army there, within the twinkling of the eye (nimiṣa). Sridhara on the Bh.P. 1.1.4 quotes from the VR.P. the etymology of this word as follows :

evam kṛtvā tato devo muniṁ Gauramukhaṁ tadā / uvāca nimiṣeṇedaṁ nihataṁ Dānavaṁ balam / / araṇyesmins tatas tvetam Naimiṣāraṇya-saṁjñitam / bhaviṣyati yathārthaṁ vai Brāhmaṇānāṁ viśeṣakam / /

The other more popular spelling is Naimiśa as is explained as a place where the felly of the wheel mentally created by god Brahmā, fell off. He instructed that to be a holy place where sacrifices, penance, etc., may be fruitfully performed. Va.P. 1.2.8 states :

bhramato dharma-cakrasya yatra nemir aśīryata /
karmaṇā tena vikhyātaṁ Naimiśam muni-pūjitam / /

This is quoted verbatim in Bd.P. 1.2.8. The Devī Bh. P. 1.2.28-32 gives the same etymology and adds that Kali has no entry (i.e. influence) in that forest.

There seems to be another Naimiṣāraṇya (probably near the Kuru region) mentioned in Chāndogya Upa. 1.2.13, also in Kāṭhaka Saṁhitā 10.6, Tāṇḍya Mahābrahmana 25.6.4. But the Naimiṣāraṇya in Purāṇas was on the banks of the Gomatī i.e. in U.P. which is Nimsar. Rāma performed his horse-sacrifice at that place :

yajña-vāṭaḥ 'ca sumahān Gomatyā Naimiṣe vane / ājñāpyatāṁ mahābāho tad hi puṇyam anantaram //
— V.R. 7.91.15.

it was also the place of Sītā's second ordeal in which she disappeared in the earth. (V.R.7. Sarga 97)

13. Siddhāśrama :

Many places called Siddhāśrama are mentioned in the Purāṇas e.g. One near Buxar in Shahabad district is connected with god Vāmana (his birth-place); another in Gujarat near Dvārakā where Kṛṣṇa and Rādhā were reunited acording to BV.P. Śrī-Kṛṣṇa-janma-khaṇḍa, Ch. 124.2-8

aṁśena devo devībhi Rukmiṇyādyābhir eva ca /
prayayau Dvārakāṁ ramyāṁ tasthau Siddhāśrame svayam / / etc.

But the Siddhāśrama in NP. is significantly described as to be yuktaṁ sarobhir acchodaiḥ (spotted with the lakes of crystalline, translucent water). The specific mention of acchoda lake shows that this Siddhāśrama must be on the bank of the Acchoda lake which is in Kashmir. It is now called Acchavata and is at a distance of 6 miles from Mārttaṇḍa.

14. Veda-vedāṅga-śāstra-vit :

Though a common traditional adjective, it covers the entire syllabus of former eminent Pandits. Vedas are four : Ṛg, Sāman, Yajus and Atharvan. The Vedāṅgas are six : 1. Śikṣā — "The science of proper articulation and pronunciation" of particular Veda, (2) Kalpa — "The ceremonials and rituals pertaining to that Veda", (3) chandas "The science of prosody", (4) Vyākaraṇa "Grammar" (5) Nirukta "Etymological explanations of Vedic words", (6) Jyotiṣ 'Astronomy'. These are ancillary to Vedas for the correct pronunciation and interpretation of the text and the correct application of Mantras in the Vedic ceremonials. śāstra from $\sqrt{śās}$-'to teach, to instruct'—Uṇādi 4.158 ṣṭran i.e.-stra, showing a manual or treatise teaching a subject systematically. According to Mt.P. 1.3.5 śāstras like Mīmāṁsā, Nyāya etc. came out of Brahmā's mouth after Veda, Vedāṅgas and Purāṇas. But unorthodox Śāstras like Pāśupata, Nakulīśa, Bhairava (tantra), being outside the Vedic fold should not be studied (A.P.)

vāmaṁ pāśupataṁ yogaṁ nakulaṁ caiva bhāiravam / aseuyam etat kathitaṁ Veda-bāhyaṁ tathetarat / /

15. Agniṣṭoma :

It is a kind of Soma sacrifice. This was regarded as being born out of the first mouth of god Brahmā :

Gāyatrīṁ ca ṛcaṁ caiva trivṛt-soma-rathāntare /
Agniṣṭomaṁ ca yajñānāṁ nirmame prathamān mukhāt / /
— Bd.P. 1.2.8.50

Va.P. 2.9.49 reads :

Agniṣṭomaṁ ca yajñānāṁ nirvame prathamān mukhāt /

It is a part of Jyotiṣṭoma. It is to be performed in the Spring. Study of the Vedas and being an agni-hotrin are the two pre-conditions of eligibility to perform this sacrifice. The main material is Soma and the deities invoked are Indra, Vāyu, etc.

16. Sanaka-mukhyaistu :

By the four mentally-created sons of Brahmā viz., Sanaka, Sananda (na), Sanātana and Sanatkumāra, of which Sanaka was the first to be enumerated. In Bh.P. 3.12. 4, 5 god Brahmā created these sons and ordered them to procreate. They transcended the path of karma and were perpetually celibate. They disobeyed Brahmā and followed the path of Liberation from Saṁsāra. Time had no power over them. They looked five years old. This child-like appearance deceived Jaya and Vijaya, Viṣṇu's attendants who did not allow them to see Viṣṇu. Being enraged they cursed them to be demons but assured them that Lord Viṣṇu will redeem them and they will rejoin their previous posts. Thus they were born as Hiraṇyākṣa, Hiraṇya-kaśipu and Lord Viṣṇu had to incarnate as Varāha and Nṛsiṁha to relieve them from their demonic birth. It is worth noting that in the Mbh., it is Sanatkumāra who is more active in propagating Vaiṣṇavism and not Sanaka. Even in NP.I. 2.1 sages ask Sūta where Nārada met Sanatkumāra, in spite of the seniority of Sanaka as mentioned here. They are always found in each others' company and are sometimes called collectively 'Kumāras' (Boy-sages). In Kāśī khaṇḍa we are told that they generally live in Janaloka. More description about them is given in the next chapter (vv. 3-5).

17. Puruṣārtha :

Principal objectives or goals in human life. Mādhava defines them as puruṣair arthyate iti (that after which men aspire (Sarvadarśana-saṅgraha). They are four in number : 1. Dharma—righteous behaviour, 2. artha — wealth, 3. kāma (Desires or love not superseding righteousness or dharma — BG.7.11), Mokṣa — Liberation from Saṁsāra. To this mediaeval Vaiṣṇavas added Bhakti (Devotion unto the Lord) as the fifth puruṣārtha. Manu advises all to strive for these energetically;

etac caturvidhaṁ vidyāt puruṣārtha-prayojanam / asya nityam anuṣṭhānaṁ samyak kuryād atandritaḥ / /

— Manu S.7.100

An advice endorsed by all Smṛti-writers and Purāna-compilers.

18. Mahā-pātaka :

Smṛti-writers regard the commission of the following acts as very heinous crimes, viz., Murder of a Brāhmaṇa, liquor-drinking, theft, adultery with one's preceptor's wife and complicity in these acts :

Brahma-hatyā, surā-pānaṁ steyaṁ gurvāṅganāgamaḥ / mahānti pātakānyāhus tat-saṁsargaś ca taiḥ saha / /

Also vide Yājñavalkya 3.227, Viṣṇu-Dharma Sūtra 35.

The rigour about saṁsarga (association) with a sinner is modified by later Nibandha-kāras. (Kane—Hist. Dh. Śāstra III.944).

19. upa-pātakas :

Minor sins. Smṛtis differ as to which are minor sins, and hence their lists differ in details. Manu and other writers give about 49 acts as minor sins. Most of them are anti-social in nature, e.g. abandoning one's parents or preceptor, adultery or incest, selling of one's wife or children, etc. The Smṛtis have provided different types of atonements (prāyaścittas) for these sins. The prāyaścittādhyāya is a common feature between Smṛtis and many Purāṇas.

20. Vāji-medha or Aśva-medha :

It is a sort of a Soma-yāga for absolute victory and only kings could perform it. It is the "king of sacrifices" as Śatapatha Br. 13.2.2.1 puts it. Its spiritual description Om Uṣā va aśvasya medhyasya śiraḥ| etc. is very famous, but is a later sublimation. Originally, even in the time of RV., the horse was killed for the sacrifice. Hence its name aśva-medha. But the orgy that was later associated with it in later Vedas, is absent in RV. It appears to be an Indo-European rite as Romans had their "October horse" similar in many details to ours. The Upaniṣads have spiritualised sacrifices, of which the spiritualization of the horse-sacrifice is quoted above. It appears that since the Aśvamedha of the Pāṇḍavas, this sacrifice was going out of vogue. Pali and Ardha Magadhi canons do not mention any Horse-sacrifice at the time of Buddha or Mahāvīra. It is after the revival of Hinduism that Hindu kings like Puṣyamitra (180 B.C.), Vākāṭaka Pravarasena I, etc. took fancy to perform this sacrifice. Muslim invasions from the 10th century became an effective check on the imperial sacrifices like Aśvamedha and Rājasūya.

21. Rājasūya :

A great sacrifice to be performed by a universal monarch (with the participation of tributary princes) at the time of his coronation, as a mark of his undisputed sovereignty rājā vai rāja-sūyeneṣṭvā bhavati as Śatapatha puts it. It is described in details in the Vājasaneyi Saṁhitā Adhyāya 9. kāṇḍikas 35 to Adhyāya 10. Kāṇḍikās 30. Yudhiṣṭhira's Rājasūya is described in Mbh. Sabhā Chs. 35-45 (In fact it starts with the expression of his desire for the great sacrifice fit to be performed by uncontested sovereigns Mbh. Sabhā. 13.30). In it abhiṣecanīya is the principal rite. In it the king is bathed with waters brought from seventeen sources in seventeen vessels of udumbara wood. It also fell in disuse. But curiously enough the Jain king Khārvela is credited to have performed a Rājasūya sacrifice (E.I. Vol.XX.79).

22. arthavāda :

It is a statement usually recommending a vidhi or ritual by stating the good arising from proper observance and evils befalling by its omission, and also adds historical instances to support its view. The Mīmāṁsakas have been discussing this topic of arthavāda 'Declamatory texts' for many generations. Thus Gadādhara in Śaktivāda states that according to Prabhākara the Arthavāda texts cannot be regarded as trustworthy. This view is accepted by NP. and hence its denunciation of those persons who regard Purāṇas as Arthavāda. But on this question of reliability of artha-vāda its trustworthy and useful character has been established (vide—Ganganath Jha — Pūrva-Mīmāṁsā in its Sources, pp. 179-81.

23. Naraka :

A place where retribution for sins is suffered. The number of such places is different. According to Śaṅkara Br. Sūtra 3.1.15, the hells are 7 in number. Manu 4.88-90 and Yājñavalkya believe in 21 hells, but their names differ. Bh.P. 5.26 enumerates 28 hells. According to RV. 4.5.5. and 7.104.3, a hell is a subterranean dark pit. Atharva Veda believes hell to be inhabited by ogresses and dissolute women. The list of sinners to be sent for a particular sin to a particular hell differs from Purāṇa to Purāṇa, e.g. Pd.P. Svarga-khaṇḍa 34, Pātāla khaṇḍa 48, Vp.2.6.7.32 BV.P. Prakṛti khaṇḍa ch.s 27 & 28. The descriptions in the Garuḍa, Mārkaṇḍeya (12.3-39) are terrible and are meant as deterrents against sinful acts.

24. Murāri :

Mura was the name of demon in charge of protecting the border of king Bhaumāsura (Naraka) of Prāg-jyotiṣapura. He screened Bhaumāsura's kingdom by planting 6000 nooses around that border. But Kṛṣṇa cut them all with his discus Sudarśana and killed the demon Mura (Mbh. Sabhā. 38.29 ff). According to Bh.P. 10.59.4-11, Mura was a demon of five heads who feeling secure about the defence of Naraka's capital, was deeply asleep in water. Kṛṣṇa cut the wire-defence by his sword, roused the demon from sleep by blowing his conch and severed his heads by his discus Sudarśana. Hence, he came to be known as Murāri.

CHAPTER TWO

Eulogy of Lord Viṣṇu

The sages enquired :

1. How did Sanatkumāra relate everyone of the religious duties to Nārada, the noble-souled sage ? How did these two come together ?

2. O Sūta ! In what place did those two expounders of the Brahman stay ? Where did they sing the songs of (the glories of) Hari ? Narrate that to us.

Sūta replied :

3. Sanaka and other great-souled (sages) were the mental sons[1] of god Brahmā; they were free from egotism or 'I-ness.' All of them observed perpetual celibacy.

4. I shall recount their names :— They were Sanaka, Sanandana, holy lord Sanatkumāra and he who is remembered as Sanātana.

5. They were devotees of Viṣṇu. These noble-souled sages were engaged in the meditation of Brahman. They resembled a thousand suns (in brilliance). They were desirous of salvation and were highly truthful.

6. O Brāhmaṇas ! Once (while) they started towards their desired destination, the peak of Meru[2] (to attend) god Brahmā's assembly, they saw on their way, the river Gaṅgā, originating from Lord Viṣṇu's foot (Viṣṇu-padi).[3]

7-8. On seeing it, they were about to take their bath in the waters of the Sītā[4] (a branch of the Gaṅgā). O excellent Brāhmaṇas ! In the meantime, the celestial sage Nārada came there. On seeing his elder brothers about to take their bath, he bowed to them with his palms joined in reverence. With great devotion and love, he invoked the names of the Slayer of Madhu.[5]

9-11. "Obeisance to you, O Nārāyaṇa, O Acyuta, O Ananta (Infinite one), O Vāsudeva, O Janārdana, O Lord of sacrifices, O Yajña-puruṣa[6], O Kṛṣṇa, O Viṣṇu, O Padmākṣa

(Lotus-eyed god), O Kamalā-kānta (Consort of goddess Lakṣmī), O Gaṅgā-janaka (the Proginator of the Gaṅgā), O Keśava, O Kṣīroda-śāyin (O Lord who couches in the milky ocean), O god of gods, O Dāmodara,[7] I bow to you. O Śri-Rāma,[8] O Viṣṇu, O Narasiṁha,[9] O Vāmana,[10] O Pradyumna,[11] O Saṅkarṣaṇa,[12] O Vāsudeva, O Unborn god (Aja), O Aniruddha,[13] O God of spotless splendour, O Murāri (Enemy of Mura), you save us perpetually from apprehensions."

12. Uttering the names of Hari in this way, and bowing down to the sages, his elder brothers, he (Nārada) sat along with them, and took bath with great pleasure.

13-14. All the five of them performed ablutions in the waters of the Sītā that dispel sins of the people, and performed the tarpaṇa[14] rites with reference to gods, sages and manes (pitṛs). They were absolved of their sins. O Brāhmaṇas ! They came up (from the river) and performed the twilight prayers, and their other prescribed duties. They then held various discussions and discourses based on the attributes of Nārāyaṇa.

15. When the sages had completed their sacred rites on the beautiful banks of the Gaṅgā, Nārada put these questions in the course of various discourses and narratives.

Nārada said :

16. O excellent sages, all of you are omniscient. You are exclusively devoted to the Lord. All of you are the spiritual lords of the universe, highly blessed and eternal.

17. O learned sages ! You are engaged in the (spiritual) uplift of the worlds, and entertain friendliness towards the indigent and the wretched. Hence, I (humbly) entreat you to relate the characteristics of the Lord.

18. How is Lord Hari realized — Hari, by whom the entire universe consisting of the mobiles and immobiles, is created, and the waters from whose feet constitute the holy Gaṅgā ?

19. How do the threefold religious acts of men become fruitful ? O honour-bestowing ones ! (Be pleased) to expound the characteristics of the perfect knowledge and penance.

20. How is the worship of a guest to be performed whereby

Viṣṇu becomes propitiated ? O lords ! Be gracious unto me. It behoves you to relate precisely and in details, these and other similar things considered to be mystic secrets, bringing satisfaction unto Hari.

Śaunaka said :

(Nārada begins the eulogy of Viṣṇu)

21. Obeisance to the Supreme Lord, who is greater than the greatest. He is immanent in the greater and the lesser beings. He is both endowed with attributes and still devoid of attributes (saguṇa and nirguṇa). Salutations unto Him.

22. Hail to the Lord devoid of Māyā;[15] Obeisance to the Deity termed Ātman, the possessor of the deluding Potency called Māyā and who constitutes the universe. I bow to the Lord of yogins, identical with Yoga and comprehensible through Yoga. Salutations to Viṣṇu.

23. Obeisance to the Perfect Knowledge, to one who can be realized through perfect knowledge, to the sole cause of all knowledge, to the Lord of perfect knowledge, to the Deity identical with Jñeya (object of knowledge). Jñātṛ, (the knower) and the Vijñāna-sampad (riches of perfect knowledge).[16]

24. Obeisance to the meditation, to the one comprehensible through meditation, to him who dispels the sins of the meditator, to the Lord of meditation, to the intelligent one, and to one who represents the identity between the dhyeya (object of meditation), dhyātṛ (the subject, the person who meditates).

25. I always bow down to that unborn primeval, real, truthful Lord of prayer, whose energy and power inspire the sun, moon, fire, the creator of the gods, the demigods known as Siddhas, Yakṣas and the Asuras, and the groups of serpents.

26. I take resort to that unborn Lord who assumes the form of Brahmā, and creates the worlds, who alone is the protector (of the worlds) assuming the forms of Brāhmaṇas and Viṣṇu, and who assumes the body called Rudra for dissolving the world, at the end of the Kalpas, and then lies (in the form of a small child) licking (the big toe of) his foot.

27. I seek refuge in that primordial Deity Viṣṇu — the Lord who shines in his region called Para (the transcendental), that Lord by reciting whose name, the mighty leader of elephants[17] was released from the terrible grip of the crocodile (I seek refuge in that primordial Viṣṇu).

28. He assumes the form of Śiva in regard to those possessing devotion unto Śiva; he assumes the form of Viṣṇu for the sake of those who are sanctified by meditation upon Hari. Ever and anon, I seek refuge in him alone, who causes physical bodies in accordance with the previous conception.

29. I bow always unto that son of Vasudeva who slew Keśin[18] and Naraka,[19] who, even as a boy lifted up a mountain[20] by means of the tip of his hand, and the God who habitually removes the burden of the Earth.

30. I salute to that unborn Lord who, incarnated in the terrific form of the Man-lion (from the pillar), tore up the chest of the demon (Hiraṇyakaśipu), as hard as the rock, and who protected Prahlāda, his own devotee.

31. I pay obeisance to that Supreme Primeval Person designated as the Self (ātman), who is embellished by means of the ether, etc., who is ever unsullied, Eternal and incomprehensible; who (though) the creator of the universe, is devoid of activities.

32. I worship that First Principle, the Soul (ātman) who stays as undivided one, with all his different forms, viz., Brahmā, Indra, Rudra, the fire-god,[21] the wind-god and the categories or classes of beings e.g. the mortals, demigods, like Gandharvas and Yakṣas, Asuras and gods (devas).

33. I have sought asylum in that from which all this (universe) became distinct, and was originated, sustained and in which it will get dissolved afterwards.

34. I have resorted (for refuge) to him who stands in the form of the universe, and appears to be involved in and attached to the world but who, in reality, is not attached at all, and is perfect.

35. I seek refuge in him who, though stationed in the heart (as antarātman), is not cognised by those whose selves or minds are deluded by Māyā, and who is the supreme-most and the purest of all.

36. I seek shelter in him who is of the nature of the perfect knowledge. He shines forth everywhere to those who refrain from all attachments, and whose souls or minds revel in the path of meditation.

37. When there was an impediment at the time of churning the ocean for the sake of nectar, he held the mount Mandara[32] on his back, for the welfare of the gods. I seek refuge in that Tortoise.[33]

38. With his pointed and curved fang, the Infinite Being lifted the earth from the ocean, and stabilised this entire universe. I bow down to that Boar.[34]

39. Desirous of protecting Prahlāda,[35] he tore up the rock-like hard chest of the demon Hiraṇyakaśipu and killed him. I pay obeisance to that Nṛsiṁha (Man-lion).

40. Having secured the gift of land from the son of Virocana (i.e. Bali), with two paces he covered the entire universe upto the region of god Brahmā, and handed over the same to gods. I bow down to that Ajita (the unconquered Lord).

41. Due to the crime committed by Kārtavīrya Arjuna of the Haihaya[36] clan, he destroyed, for twenty-one times, the race of Kṣatriyas. I bow down to that son of Jamadagni.[37]

42. He manifested himself in four forms (4 sons of Daśaratha). Surrounded by monkeys, he killed the army of the demons (Rākṣasas). I bow down to that Rāmacandra.

43. Assuming (lit. by resorting to) the two forms (viz. Śrīkṛṣṇa and Balarāma), he removed the burden of the earth and (ultimately) destroyed his own family. I worship that Śrīkṛṣṇa.

44. People of the three worlds beginning with the Earth see within their souls that pure Lord who is delighted within himself. I worship that Ruler of the universe who is resplendent and pure,[38] devoid of impurities.

45. Having massacred all the impure sinners by means of his sharp-edged sword,[39] at the end of the Kali Age, he re-established the Dharma at the beginning of the Kṛta Age. To him I salute.

46. I resort to him whose these and other innumerable forms are impossible to be enumerated by him (i.e. by any person) even in millions of years, O Pāṇḍavas. I worship him.

47. Even great sages, gods, demons (Asuras) and Manus[30] cannot[31] fully comprehend the greatness of his name. How can I, an insignificant person, worship him (with full realisation) ?

48. Even by hearing his name, men who have committed great sins attain sanctity. How can I, a weak-minded person of mean intellect, eulogise him (adequately) ?

49. If somehow or other (by a lucky chance) the sinners manage to glorify or hear his name, they become purified and the purified ones attain Liberation (from Saṁsāra).

50. I seek refuge in that deity of the form of perfect knowledge whom Yogins, freed from sins, perceive after stabilising their individual soul (ātman) in the (supreme) ātman.

51. The Sāṁkhyas[32] (followers of the path of knowledge) perceive Hari of perfect ātman, in everything. I worship that Ageless, Eternal (hence the First) Deity who is of the nature of perfect knowledge.

52. I salute Lord Hari who is immanent in all living beings, is quiescent, omniscient (perceiver of everything), who has thousands of heads[33] and who is very real (of positive existence).

53. I worship that unaging Supreme Ruler who stands the breadth of ten fingers above the universe of both past and the future, whether mobile or immobile.[34]

54. Again and again do I pay obeisance to that unborn mystic Deity, who is minuter than the minutest and greater than the greatest,[35] and the secret-most among the secrets.

55. I salute the Supreme Person, the Ruler of the universe who bestows his own region if he be meditated upon, remembered, worshipped, heard of or even bowed to.

56. As Nārada eulogised the great Lord thus, those great sages like Sanandana and others, with eyes bedimmed with tears of joy, became highly delighted, in the company of Nārada.

57. He who gets up early in the morning and reads this hymn to the Supreme Person (Viṣṇu) gets his soul purified of all sins, and attains to region of Viṣṇu (Vaikuṇṭha)

CHAPTER TWO

1. Mānasāḥ Sutāḥ :

Spiritual sons. These are collectively called Sanakādi (Sanaka and others). When they were created they were asked by god Brahmā to procreate the world, but they, being sāttvic incarnations, adopted the path of perpetual celibacy and devotion unto Lord Viṣṇu. These should be distinguished from another group of mānasa putras (mental sons) of god Brahmā who became the progenitors of the world. According to VP. 1.7.4.5, they are Bhṛgu, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Aṅgiras, Marīci, Dakṣa, Atri and Vasiṣṭha. Mbh Ādi 5.10 and 66.4 delete Bhṛgu, Dakṣa and Vasiṣṭha and give only six mental sons.

2. Meru-Śṛṅga :

The peak of mount Meru, the site of god Brahmā's abode, Manovatī. The city is situated on the main peak or rather plateau (middle) of the Meru and 10,000 yojanas in square-area. The Mt.P., ch. 113, states that Meru (or Sumeru) is bounded on the North by Uttara Kuru, on the South by Bhārata Varṣa, on the West by Ketu-māla and on the east by Bhadrāśva. Scholars regard Pamirs as Meru (K. L. Daftari — Astronomical Method : Application to the chronology of Ancient India, pp. 196-98, V. S. Agrawala — Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa — Eka Sāṁskṛtika Adhyayana, p. 139; S. M. Ali — The Geography of the Purāṇas 63-64) Dr. Harsha's ingenious identification of Mt. Altai ('A Mount of gold' — in Mongolia) with 'Meru, the Homeland of Aryans' in Vishveshwarānanda Bhārata-Bhāratī, Hoshiarpur, 1964 and accepted by Baldev Upadhyay in Purāṇa Vimarśa, pp. 319-20, deserves consideration.

3. Viṣṇupadī Gaṅgā :

According to Bh.P. 5.17.1-3, when Lord Viṣṇu, in his Vāmana incarnation, manifested his cosmic form and raised his left foot to cover the heavenly regions in the second step, he let the upper crest of the shell of the cosmic egg (brahmāṇḍa) go cracked by the nail of the big toe of his left foot, and through that opening rushed in the water covering the cosmic egg externally. The stream of water washed the feet of the Lord and was designated Bhagavatpadī. After a period of thousands of yugas, she descended on the top of the celestial regions called Viṣṇupada, where Dhruva, the son of Uttānapāda meditates on the Lord (*Bh.P.*5.23). It is due to her association with the feet of Lord Viṣṇu and its first descent on Viṣṇupada that Gaṅgā is known as Viṣṇupadī. In Brahma-Vaivarta P. Prakṛtikhaṇḍa 11.127-140, we are told that Gaṅgā went to Vaikuṇṭha by Rādhikā mantra, and by Viṣṇu's order flowed out of the lotus-feet of Viṣṇu. Hence, she is called Viṣṇupadī.

nirgatā Viṣṇu-pādābjāt tena Viṣṇupadī smṛtā / ibid. 140.

4. Sītā :

The Tārim-yarkand river called Sītā by Chinese (e.g. Hiuen Tsang) V. S. Agrawala identifies it with the Oxus (Mārkaṇḍeya P., p. 139). N. L. De remarks, "From the names of the places mentioned in the Brahmāṇḍa P. ch. 57 through which the Sitā flows, its identification with the Jaxartes appears to be correct (GDAMI 1.187).

5. Madhu-dviṣ :

The enemy-slayer of Madhu, an epithet of god Viṣṇu. Madhu and Kaiṭabha were demon-brothers who stole away the Vedas from god Brahmā, while Lord Viṣṇu was in his yogic trance (sleep). Brahmā sought Viṣṇu's help. Viṣṇu sought a boon from Madhu and his brother Kaiṭabha of killing them (Mbh. Vana. 203.30). Viṣṇu killed him by placing him on his lap. Hence, Viṣṇu came to be known as Madhusūdana (slayer of Madhu). Devī Bhāgavata X.11 supports the M*bh.* information of their birth from ear-wax, and their power due to the boons received from Devi, the rest is the same as in the M*bh.*

6. Yajña Puruṣa :

Lord Viṣṇu, the presiding deity of all sacrifices. In Bh.P. 2.7-11, He is described as 'sacrifice incarnate (for whom sacrifices are performed), and an embodiment of Vedas, the Soul of all deities. Vedas are his breath.

7. Dāmodara :

(I) One who is tied with a rope round the waist. Owing to complaints about his mischiefs by cowherdesses of Gokula, Lord Kṛṣṇa was so tied to a wooden mortar by his foster-mother, Yaśodā (Bh.P. 10.9.13-14). Hence (Kṛṣṇa's or Viṣṇu's epithet), also HV.63-14-26.

(II) One who is approachable through intellect enriched by Self-Control and such other means (damādi-Sādhanena utkṛṣṭā matir yā, tayā gamyate iti Dāmodaraḥ.

(III) One who carries universes in his abdomen

(III) dāmāni lokanāmāni tāni yasyodarāntare ten Dāmodaro devaḥ — Śaṅkara on Viṣṇusahasranāma

8. Śri Rāma :

The Seventh incarnation of Viṣṇu. The Hero of Vālmiki's epic the Rāmāyaṇa. The son of Daśaratha for whose word he exiled himself for fourrteen years, to a forest. He was an ideal king, a paragon of virtues.

9. Narasiṁha :

The fourth incarnation of god Viṣṇu. For saving the world from the tyranny of the demon-king Hiraṇyakaśipu, and for protecting his devotee Prahlāda, the demon-prince (Son of Hiraṇyakaśipu), the Lord manifested himself through a column in a half-lion-half-man form, and killed him on his own lap with his claws (thereby observing all the conditions of immortality in the boon conferred on him by god Brahmā). After killing Hiraṇyakaśipu and blessing Prahlāda, he disappeared. For details vide Bh.P. 7.8.18-33, Mbh.Sabhā. 38.29.

10. Vāmana :

Vedic Viṣṇu, the Sun-god and his three giant steps are famous in RV. 1-22.17, 18, etc. Śatapatha 1-2.5-7 is probably the source of the Purāṇic Vāmana episode in Purāṇas. He is the fifth incarnation of Viṣṇu. To re-instate Indra to his post in the celestial world, which was occupied by the pious demon king Bali, Viṣṇu was born of Kaśyapa and Aditi. As a short boy (Vāmana) whose investiture of thread was just performed, he went to Bali who was then performing a sacrifice on the bank of the Narmadā, and begged for three paces of land. Bali's preceptor Śukra saw through this ruse of Viṣṇu and opposed the gift. Bali was adamant. And as soon as Bali formally completed the gift with water, Viṣṇu suddenly manifested his cosmic form. He occupied the earth in one step, and the heavens in the second, and asked Bali space for the third step. King Bali, the great devotee of Viṣṇu offered his head for the third step. Viṣṇu pushed Bali down to the nether world where he was however provided with all the affluence of the celestial world. But Indra found the throne of the heaven vacant and occupied it.

— Bh.P. 8.19, Rām. Bāla. 29
Mbh.Sabhā 38.29, Padma P. vol. V
Uttarakhaṇḍa 'ch. 240.

11. Pradyumna :

According to purāṇas he is the god of Love burnt by god Śiva for disturbing his penance. He was then born as the son of Kṛṣṇa and Rukmiṇī. As the epithet is applied to Lord Viṣṇu, it implies his manifestation (Vyūha) as Pradyumna (Bh.P. 12.11.21), detailed in the Pañcarātra āgamas. He represents ahaṁkāra (Ego, 'I'-ness), and is the witness of the dreamless state of sleep. This is the Bhāgavata concept. According to the Ahirbudhnya saṁhitā, the difference between Prakṛti and Puruṣa starts in the Pradyumna stage. He actuates men to perform work (Ahirbudhnya 55.18). He is an intramundane vyūha and also a vibhava (incarnation) of Vāsudeva. It must in the āgamic sense that this epithet is applied to Viṣṇu.

12. Saṁkarṣaṇa :

N. of Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa's elder brother who in his embryonic stage was transferred from Yaśodā's womb to Rohiṇi's.

garbha-saṁkarṣaṇāt taṁ vai prāhuḥ Saṁkarṣaṇam bhuvi / Bh.P. 10.2.13.

But his identification with Viṣṇu is a Pañcarātra concept which regards him as a manifestation (Vyūha) of Viṣṇu Vāsudevaḥ Saṁkarṣaṇaḥ Pradyumnaḥ puruṣaḥ svayam !

Aniruddha iti Brahman mūrtivyūho'bhidhīyate ! !

Bh.P. 12.11.21.

The Bh.P. regards them as mere mūrti-vyūha or a part incarnation. With the Pāñcarātra Āgama, however, Saṁkarṣaṇa is an important vyūha and also a vibhāva. Saṁkarṣaṇa carries in him the whole of the universe, as if it is an atom. He is the support of the universe (aśeṣa-bhuvanādhāra). All the Śāstras have been produced by him and in him they disappear at the end of the universe (Ahirbudhnya 54.16).

13. Aniruddha :

The N. of a grandson of Kṛṣṇa and the son of Pradyumna, the romantic lover of Uṣā, the daughter of Bāṇāsura ((Mbh. Sabhā. 38) His identification with Viṣṇu, god Brahmā being born out of the lotus sprouted from his naval is accepted in Mbh.Bhīṣma 65.71; Śānti. 340.30-31. As noted above, the Bh.P. accepts him as a mūrti-vyūha — part incarnation of Viṣṇu. But his identification with Viṣṇu and its use as Viṣṇu's epithet is a Pāñcarātra concept wherein Aniruddha is both a vyūha (manifestation) as well as a vidyeśvara. There are some conflicting statements about the functions of Aniruddha in the Lakṣmī Tantra, Viṣvaksena saṁhitā, but to the Purāṇa writer, Aniruddha being a vyūha was probably enough to use it as an epithet of Viṣṇu. For details vide O.Schrader — Intro. to the Pañcarātra.

14. Tarpaṇa — (rites)

One of the five daily yajñas to be performed by men, in which libations of water to the gods, sages and the deceased ancestors are offered by mentioning their names.

tarpaṇaṁ ca śuciḥ kuryāt pratyahaṁ snātako dvijaḥ / devebhyaśca ṛṣibhyaśca pitṛbhyaśca yathākramam // — Śātātapa

15. Māyā

The illusion by virtue of which one considers the unreal universe as really existent, and as distinct from the Supreme Spirit. Lord Viṣṇu is above this illusion. Hence. he is called amāya (devoid of — transcendental to — Māyā). But Māyā is regarded as the deluding Potency of Viṣṇu. Hence, he is called the Lord of Māyā (Māyin) as well, in this verse. In the Varāha P., the presiding deity of the earth asks Viṣṇu to describe His Māyā potency to her. In reply Viṣṇu recounts in details how the whole universe works under the influence of his Māyā. It is also called yoga-Māyā resorting to which Kṛṣṇa (Viṣṇu) participated in the rāsa in the Bh.P. 10.30-31. Pañcadaśī 6.122-141 describes the Vedāntic concept of Māyā (as succinctly stated at the beginning). God Viṣṇu is not affected by the Māyā. Hence the epithet 'amāya'.

16.

In an advanced spiritual stage, the triad of the knower, knowledge and the object of knowledge or the meditator, meditation, and the object of meditation loses the distinctness of these components, and is realized as one. This is known as Tripuṭi-nirāsa. Here, all these trinities are merged in Viṣṇu and hence regarded as identical with Lord Viṣṇu.

17. Gajendra

King Indradyumna, the Pāṇḍyan king, born in the family of Svāyambhuva Manu, was a great devotee of Viṣṇu. While engaged in meditation during retirement from kingship, he did not notice the arrival of sage Agastya who, being enraged, cursed him to be an elephant. When he, as a king-elephant, entered the lake near mount Trikūṭa, a crocodile which was previously a Gandharva called Hūhū and was cursed to be a crocodile, caught hold of his leg. The elephant wanted to extricate its leg, but could not do so, despite a struggle for 1000 years. At last, finding all his strength exhausted and that he would be dragged into the water and meet death, he appealed to Lord Viṣṇu who relieved him by killing the alligator with his discus Sudarśana and both the elephant and the crocodile got absolved from their curses. This episode from Bh.P. 8 chs 2-4 is mentined here.

18. Keśin

A demon, follower of Kaṁsa; he possessed the power of 10,000 elephants. At the instance of Kaṁsa, he assumed the form of a horse and attacked Kṛṣṇa, and was killed by Kṛṣṇa at a place now known as Keśighāṭ at Vṛndāvana (UP.)VP.5.16. — MBH.Sabhā, ch. 38. In Mbh. Aśvamedhika 69.23, Kṛṣṇa declares to have killed Keśin as per dharma.

19. Naraka alias Bhaumāsura

A valiant asura — son of the goddess presiding over the earth. He was a king of Prāgjyotiṣa (Assam). He carried away and kept in confinement 16000 princesses and daughters of siddhas,, asuras, etc. He attacked the celestial region and defeating Indra carried away the ear-rings of Aditi, and the white umbrella, insignia of Indra's sovereignty. Indra appealed to Kṛṣṇa at Dvārakā. Kṛṣṇa, along with his queen Satyabhāmā, rode on Garuḍa, flew to Naraka's capital and slew him. He installed his son Bhagadatta on the throne at Prāgjyotiṣa, and released the 16000 princesses who subsequently married him. Bh.P. 10 dh.59., V.P 5.29

— HV. (Harivaṁśa) — Viṣṇu Parva ch. -63, Mbh. Sabhā 38, also Udyoga 48, 80-84.

20. Gotram

Mount Govardhana, 18 miles from Vṛndāvana in Mathurā district. In the village known as Paitho, Kṛṣṇa is said to have lifted up the mountain on his small finger, and held it as an umbrella over the heads of inmates of Nanda's Vraja and the cattle, to protect them from the deluge like rain-showers sent by Indra, to punish them for not offering him his annual sacrifice. The story is detailed in the following :

Mbh. Sabhā 41.9, udyoga 130.46

VP.5.Ch.11, HV. Viṣṇu P. ch. 18, Bh. P. 10.25

21. In the 1st half of this (No. 32) verse, in Brahmendra-Rudrānilavāyumarṭya: the underlined word be emended as anala instead of the present anila 'wind', as the word is followed by vāyu and anila-vāyu is tautologous.

22. Mandāra

The mount that was used as a churning-rod for churning the ocean, for obtaining nectar (amṛta) (Mbh.Ādi 18-6-8, 13, 16-21, Bh.P. 8.5-10). It is now identified with a hill two or three miles to the north of Bamsi, in the Bānkā sub-division of Bhāgalpur District. It is an isolated hill of about 700 feet height with a groove all round the middle, to indicate the impression of the coil of serpent Vāsuki. This groove is artificial and bears the marks of chisels.

23. Kūrma (A Tortoise)

The second, out of ten chief incarnations, of Viṣṇu. At the time of churning the ocean for getting the nectar, gods and demons/used the mount Mandāra as the churning-drill and serpent Vāsuki as the churning-rope. But mount Mandāra having no fixation of the bottom, began to sink down. God Viṣṇu then assumed the form of a tortoise with a back 100,000 yojanas in extent, got under the sinking mountain and lifted it up, and supported it till the nectar was churned out.

—Bh.P. 8.7.8-10, Agni P.3. VR.Bāla 45 (sarga).

24. Varāha

In Vedic Literature, Varāha is a manifestation of Prajāpati (Tait. Saṁhitā 7-1-5-1, Tait. Br. 1.1.6, Śatapatha 14.1.2.11) But in Purāṇas the Boar is an incarnation of Viṣṇu. This is usually regarded as the third, out of the ten main incarnations of Viṣṇu, (AP.—Agni Purāṇa-Ch.4), but according to the Bh.P.

1.3.7, it is the second incarnation which Viṣṇu, the presiding deity of sacrifices, undertook for lifting up the earth which sank down to the nether-world — rasātala (*Bh.P.*3.13.15), but *AP.*4.2 states that the killing of demon Hiraṇyākṣa is the main purpose. Bh.P. 3.13.18-45 describes the fight between Varāha and Hiraṇyākṣa in which the demon was killed, but he killed the demon as he came in the way of lifting up the earth, and stabilising it in its proper position. (also Mbh. Sabhā, ch. 38). MP. in ch. 5.247-48 details the symbolism of this incarnation. The description of yajña-varāha (in MP. 248. 67-73) beginning with Vedapādo yūpa-daṃṣṭraḥ Kratudantaś citīmukhaḥ, etc. has its echoes in VP. 6.16.23, Bd.P. — Prakriyā Pāda 5.9-23, Bm.P. 213.33.7 and even in Smṛtis like the Viṣṇu Smṛti 1.3-9. The image of yajña-Varāha, at Vihāra (ancient Varāhanagara), 8 miles from Vijāpur, N. Gujarat, shows the influence of the concept till 1000 A.D. Mahā-Varāha images at Udayagiri cave ...(circa 400 A.D.), at Bādāmī (Bijapur Dist. Karnataka) of the 7th cent. A.D., and at the Daśāvatāra cave at Ellora (circa 800 A.D.), show the hold of this avatāra on popular mind. It must, however, be noted that originally yajña-varāha is a Vedic concept with profound meaning with reference to Vedic cosmogony, though Purāṇa-writers draped it differently with their imagination, and a correspondence between the elements of sacrifices and the parts of Varāha's body is established.

25. Prahlāda or Prahrāda

Son of demon Hiraṇyakaśipu and Kayādhū. When Hiraṇyakaśipu went to perform penance, gods attacked his kingdom and Indra carried away Kayādhū who was pregnant, but Nārada rescued her and gave her asylum in his hermitage. It was while dwelling here that Prahlāda, in his mother's womb, was given instructions in spiritual matters (Bh.P. 7.7 10-16). He was sent by his father to Śukra's son for education, but he became a staunch devotee of god Viṣṇu — the enemy of their family. While testing the progress of his son, Hiraṇyakaśipu discovered this (Bh.P. 7.5.23-32), and used torture to correct him (Bh.P. 7.5.37-44; VP. 1.17.32-53, also ch. 18 to 20). In the final interview, Hiraṇyakaśipu asked Prahlāda if god Viṣṇu was the pillar of the audience hall, and Viṣṇu manifested himself as a Man-Lion from within, and killed Hiraṇyakaśipu. Prahlāda was crowned as the king. Vāmana P. chs. (7 & 8) describe his pilgrimage to Puṣkara, and fight with sages Nara and Nārāyaṇa and defeat by Nārāyaṇa. He is regarded as a great devotee of Lord Viṣṇu — mahābhāgavata (Bh.P. 6.3.20). When Viṣṇu incarnated as Vāmana and manifested his cosmic form to put down his grandson Bali, he praised Vāmana (Bh.P. 8.23.6). In the Mbh. also, he is a respectable figure. According to Bh.P. 5.18.7, he spends his remaining days as a devotee of god Viṣṇu as Man-Lion in the Harivarṣa — (Bh.P. 5.18.7).

26. Haihaya—Sahasrārjuna.

This refers to king Arjuna, the son of king Kṛtavīrya of the Haihaya clan— a branch of Yadus. According to Bh.P. 9.23.24-27, he was the lord of the entire earth. 'No other ruler of the earth can reach Arjuna's status in performance of sacrifices, munificent donations, yogic powers, scholarship, military victories'. He was a disciple of Datta who conferred on him 1000 arms, and thus he came to be known as Sahasrārjuna. (*Bd.*P.44). He ruled at Māhiṣmati (Mod. Maheśvara) on the right bank of the Narmadā in M.P. He defeated Rāvaṇa and kept him a captive. His glorious rule is described in *Bd.P.*58, *Mbh.Vana.*115, Anuśāsana 29.

The hereditary rivalry between Bhṛgus and Haihayas for supremacy in Western India, culminated in the raid of Jamadagnī's hermitage for the possession of Kāmadhenu (a wish-yielding cow) (*Bd.P.*chs 67-70, *Bh.P.*9,23. 24-28, Mbh. Vana 116.19-21). In a lightening reprisal, Paraśurāma killed Arjuna in a surprise attack near Māhiṣmatī—an act— strongly disapproved by Jamadagni (*Bh.P.*9.15.38-41).

The mention of annihilation of Kṣatriyas for 21 times in the above verse is a mythological representation of the struggle between Bhṛgus and Haihayas. Paraśurāma discomfited the Haihayas a number of times, but after his retirement, the Bhṛgus withdrew from Central and Western India and shifted to the North.

27. Jāmadagnya (Paraśurāma)

Paraśurāma, the son of Jamadagni of the Bhṛgu clan. A great military leader of his times. In the hereditary feud between Bhṛgus and Haihayas in which Jamadagni was killed, Paraśurāma defeated the Haihayas 21 times, which is inflated as "the annihilation of the Kṣattriya race for 21 times" (*Mbh. Ādi.*64.4, Vana 117. etc. *Bd.P.*ch.83. etc.) It appears that he was dissuaded from his ruthlessness by his elderly clansmen and he performed a sacrifice at Samantapañcaka (Kurukṣetra) where he gave to Kāśyapa as a gift, all the land conquered by him. Kāśyapa requested him to go out of the donated lands and find out for him some new place. He seems to be the first explorer of the land between the Western Ghats and the Arabian-sea, as people from Northern Koṅkaṇa to Kerala claim him as such. He finally retired to mount Mahendra—Eastern Ghats probably to Mahendra malei near Ganjam. After retirement, he had a scuffle with Rāma for breaking Śiva's bow (Mbh. Vana. ch.9) and with his disciple Bhiṣma for his refusal to marry Princess Ambā abducted by him.

He is popularly regarded as the 6th incarnation of Viṣṇu though he is called the 16th in the Bh.P. 1.3.20; 9.15.13. They suppose that he is one of the seven eternally living persons (cirajīvin). Also vide *M.P.*47, V.P. 4-7, 4-11.

28. Here nirmala and Śuddha are not tautological, God is both resplendent (nirmala) and pure (unmixed) despite his being antarātman the Inner Soul and Controller' of all, as mentioned in the 1st half.

29. This refers to Viṣṇu's future (the 10th) incarnation called Kalki who will terminate the Kali age by massacring all sinners, re-establish dharma and pave the way for the Golden Age (Kṛta yuga). He will be born in a place called Śāmbhala, as a son of a Brāhmaṇa Viṣṇuyaśas (*Bh.P.*1.3.25, *AP.*ch.16.8-10).

30. Manu

The mythical progenitor and Law-giver of the human race and the first sovereign of the entire world. His reign or life-span extends to 71 Caturyugas or roughly (71 × 36,00000 = 2566,00000 human years) V. Mani—Purāṇic Encyclopaedia, p. 482. But in Siddhānta-śiromaṇi on Kālamāna, manvantara = 30,67,20,00 human years. He is helped by seven sages, gods, Indra and his sons or kings. There are-14 Manus whose reigns taken together make one day or kalpa of god Brahmā. The fourteen Manus are as follows :

(1) Svâyambhuva, (2) Svârociṣa, (3) Auttami, (4) Tâmasa, (5)Raivata, (6) Cākṣuṣa (7) Vaivasvata (the present Manu) (8) Sâvarṇi, (9) Dakṣa-sâvarṇi, (10) Brahmasâvarṇi, (11) Dharmasâvarṇi, (12) Rudra-sâvarṇi, (13) Deva-Sâvarṇi, and (14) Indrasâvarṇi (*Bh.P.*8.13; V.P. 3.1, 3.2.)

31. Syntactically a defective verse for lack of a finite verb. The meaning is obvious. Hence 'cannot' is supplied to make the sentence complete.

32. Sāṁkhya

Used in the epic sense 'Path of knowledge' as in the *BG.*II Sāṁkhya yoga. It is the theistic Sâṁkhya Philosophy that is implied here. It may be noted that at the worst the Sâṅkhyas are Agnostic and not Atheist, as about God the Sūtra says 'God is not proved logically' (Īśvarāsiddheḥ/and not Īśvarābhāvāt/)

33-34. Echoes of the text of the *Puruṣa Sūkta,*viz.

Sahasra-Śīrṣā puruṣaḥ sahasrākṣaḥ sahasrapāt / sa bhūmim viśvato vṛtvā atyatiṣṭhad daśāṅgulam //

CHAPTER THREE

The Description Of The Sphere Of The Earth And Of Bhārata

Nārada enquired :

1. How did the Omnipresent Primordial Deity create Brahmā and others, formerly ?[1] O Sanaka, narrate this unto me, since your worship is omniscient.

Śri Sanaka narrated :

2. Nārāyaṇa is imperishable and Infinite. He is omnipresent and unsullied. This entire universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings is pervaded by him.

3. At the time of the first creation,[2] the self-luminous great Viṣṇu constituting the universe, presided over a differentiation in the guṇas, and created the three forms of the deities.

4-5. Formerly, the Lord created god Brahmā from the right part of his Person, for the purpose of creation (of the worlds), O sage; from the middle, he created Īśāna (the Master) called Rudra, who causes the dissolution of the universe. For the sake of protecting this universe, he created the immutable Viṣṇu from his left side. Some designate that imperishable Primordial Lord by the epithet Śiva, some by the name Viṣṇu (the Eternal Truth), while some call him Brahmā.

6. Viṣṇu's Supreme Śakti[3] (Energy) stimulating the process of the universe is both positive and negative (existent and non-existent) in nature, and is described 'Vidyā-avidyā' (Spiritual Knowledge and Ignorance or Nescience).

7. When the universe appears as distinct and separate from Great Viṣṇu, that is the accomplishment (effect) of Nescience which is the cause of misery.

8. O Nārada, when the conditioning factors such as the knower, the knowable etc. fuse together, and cease to exist, the knowledge or comprehension of the oneness of everything (in the universe) i.e. the existence of only one entity, viz., Brahman, is called Vidyā (spiritual lore).

9. Thus the Māyā of the great Viṣṇu, if seen as distinct and separate from him, bestows (i.e. involves one in) the worldly existence, but if realized with the consciousness of non-difference from him, it brings about the destruction of the Saṁsāra (or metempsychosis).

10. The entire universe of the mobile and immobile beings, has been originated from Viṣṇu's (illusive) potency. All these things whether they move or not are different from it.

11. Just as, by means of the conditioning factors (such as a pot, a room) the ether differs (as the ether conditioned by the pot, etc.), so also the entire universe appears different through the conditioning factor of avidyā (Nescience).

12. O Sage, even as Lord Hari pervades the entire universe so also does his (potency), just as the burning capacity of a (heated, fiery) coal manifests itself by pervading its substratum.

13. Some call this potency (Śakti), Umā,[4] others call it Lakṣmī, still others call it Bhāratī, Girijā and Ambikā.

14-15. The great sages designate her as Durgā, Bhadrakālī, Caṇḍī, Māheśvarī, Kaumārī, Vaiṣṇavī, Vārāhī, Aindrī, Śāmbhavī, Brāhmī, Vidyā (spiritual knowledge), Avidyā (Nescience), Māyā (The illusive potency of the Lord) and Parā Prakṛti (The Supreme Primordial Nature).

16. Śeṣaśakti is Viṣṇu's transcendental power, the cause of creation, etc. of the universe. It pervades the universe in its 'manifest-cum-unmanifest form', and abides therein.

17. One of these is the cause of creation, maintenance and dissolution, viz., Prakṛti (The Primordial Nature), Puruṣa, Kāla (Time), Vidhi (abidance of the opportune time or fate) and sthiti (steadiness or continuance in one state).

18. All this (universe) has been created by the deity assuming the form of Brahmā, but it is (authoritatively) stated that the Supreme Deity transcends him and is eternal.

19-22. The God who protects is called the Eternal Deity. The Lord who protects is the Puruṣa, greater than and beyond the worlds. What is greater than and beyond him is the highest imperishable region. (He is called) akṣara (the imperishable), Nirguṇa (devoid of attributes), Śuddha (pure), Paripūrṇa (perfect, complete) and Sanātana (eternal). The greatest being is called Kālarūpa. He is greater than the greatest, worthy of being meditated upon by yogins. He is the greatest ātman, the greatest bliss, devoid of all conditioning factors. He can be realised only through perfect knowledge. The greatest Being has Existence, Knowledge and Bliss for his physical bodies.

23. Although he is the greatest and the purest, He is accompanied by the Ego, and is then called dehin (the embodied soul) by persons of confused mind. Alas, the deception of Ignorance !

24. That greatest and purest Lord, on being differentiated through Sattva etc., assumes the forms of three Deities, and causes Creation, Sustenance and Dissolution.

25. The deity who is the creator of the universe is Brahmā. The deity from whose umbilical lotus Brahmā came out is the ātman, in the form of Bliss. O sage, none except him is so.

26. He is the immanent Soul. He pervades the universe. He is the Cosmic witness. He is unsullied, The great Īśvara abides both as different and non-different.

27. His śakti is the great māyā, the trustworthy upholder of the universe. In view of its being the material cause of the universe, it is called prakṛti by scholars.

28. Of Viṣṇu who was exerting for creation of the the worlds, at the time of the primordial creation, there evolved three-fold forms, viz. Prakṛti (primordial matter), Puruṣa and Kāla (Time-spirit).[5]

29. What men of purified souls perceive as the pure highest, resplendent asylum called Brahman, is the supreme region of Viṣṇu.

30. The pure, imperishable, infinite Maheśvara in this way assumed the form of Kāla (Time spirit), and with a form constituted of and affording support to guṇas (modifications of Prakṛti e.g. sattva etc.) the omnipresent Lord became the primary creator of the world.

31. When prakṛti became agitated[6] through the Lord of the world called Puruṣa, the principle of Mahat became manifested. Therefrom evolved the Buddhi (Intellect) from which originated the Ahaṁkāra (Cosmic Ego).

32. From the Cosmic Ego were evolved the subtle primary elements called the tanmātras and the subtle sense organs. All the gross elements were evolved out of the tanmātras for the creation of the universe.

33. Of the elements, viz., the ether, air, fire, water and the earth the former becomes the cause of the latter one, in the due order, O Nārada, the son of the lotus-born god Brahmā.

34. Thereafter, Lord Brahmā, the creator of the universe, (at first) created the tāmasa beings[7], viz., the sub-human beings such as creatures, beasts, birds, deer, etc.

35. Considering that the Deva-sarga (the creation of celestials) was non-productive and fruitless, god Brahmā the eternal lotus-born deity, conceived of and created the Mānuṣa-sarga (the creation of human beings).

36. Thereafter, he created Dakṣa and other sons who were exclusively devoted to the task of creation. All this entire universe including gods, demons and human beings, is occupied through these sons.

37. The following seven regions[8] are stationed above : (above the earth) Bhūḥ, Bhuvaḥ, Svaḥ, Mahaḥ, Jana, Tapas and Satya (each one is above the other).

38-39. There are seven nether worlds,[9] each below the other, viz., Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātala, Mahātala, Rasātala and Pātāla. He created the guardians of the worlds also, for all these regions.

40. He duly created the principal (seven) mountains and rivers in each of these worlds, and assigned specific means of livelihood befitting the residence of the respective worlds.

41. The mountain Meru, the resort of all gods, is located at the centre of the surface of the earth. The Lokāloka mountains[10] form the farthest end (limit) of the earth. In between them are the seven seas.

42. O, prominent Brāhmaṇas ! There are seven continents[11] and each continent has its own (chain of) principal mountains, and well-known rivers flowing therein, and the people thereof resemble the immortals i.e. gods.

43. The names of the continents are : Jambū, Plakṣa, Śālmala, Kuśa, Krauñca, Śāka, and Puṣkara. All of them are regions (traversed by) gods.

44. These seven continents are surrounded by seven oceans,[12] each having (for its liquid content) salt water, sugar-cane juice, wine, ghee, curds, milk and sweet water.

45. These continents and oceans should be understood (to have dimensions) in this manner : the latter one is double the former one in extent, and the same with the Lokāloka mountains.

46. The continent which is to the north of the salt sea, and to the south of the mountain Himālaya should be known as Bhārata Varṣa — the Indian continent. This continent confers the fruit of all actions.

47. O Nārada ! People perform three types of holy acts here, the fruit thereof is enjoyed in the following order : enjoyment of desired pleasures, land and affluence.

48. If any act whether auspicious or inauspicious is performed in Bhārata, the fruit thereof, being of a perishable nature, is enjoyed by the creatures elsewhere (in the other worlds).

49-51. Even today the celestials desire to secure birth in the Bhārata-varṣa. They think, "Great, auspicious, pure and everlasting merit has been accumulated by us. When shall we get the opportunity of being born in the Bhārata varṣa, where we shall attain to the supreme region (i.e. liberation) thanks to the great merits. Through charitable gifts or performance of different kinds of sacrifices or various types of penances, we shall attain to Lord Hari, the Ruler of the Universe, of eternal bliss and free from ailments."

52. O Nārada ! There is no one else in all the three worlds comparable in merits to that person who, after being born in Bhārata, is devoted to the worship of Viṣṇu.

53. A person habitually glorifying Lord Hari or a person beloved of his devotees or one who is eager to render service to the great persons, is worthy of being bowed down by the heaven-born gods.

54. A person delighting in the worship of Lord Hari or his devotees or a person regularly partaking of the leavings of the food of the devotees of Hari, attains to the highest region of Viṣṇu.

55. He who constantly utters the names of Viṣṇu, such as Nārāyaṇa, Kṛṣṇa, and Vāsudeva, and who is quiescent and devoted to non-violence, etc., is also worthy of being saluted by the foremost ones of gods.

56. It is traditionally remembered (i.e. laid down in Smṛtis) that he who constantly remembers (and mutters the divine names) Śiva, Nīlakaṇṭha and Śaṅkara[13] and is always engaged in doing good to all living beings, deserves to be worshipped by the celestials.

57. One devoted to his preceptors, a person meditating on Śiva, a man engaged in performing the duties prescribed for his own stage of life, one devoid of jealousy and one who is pure, is worthy of being adored by leaders of gods.

58. One who is a benefactor of Brāhmaṇas, one who cherishes faith (in the duties prescribed for) varṇas (classes in society and their duties), one who is ever devotedly engaged in propounding the Vedas, should be regarded as one who sanctifies all persons who sit in the same row to dine with him.[14]

59. A person who looks upon the pair of the Lords of gods consisting of Nārāyaṇa and Śiva equally without any discrimination, should always be saluted by god Brahmā. What need be said of persons like us ? (We must definitely worship him).

60. A person who has established perfect control over his senses and organs, is celibate, refrains from slandering others and invariably abstains from having any possession (or acceptance of monetary gifts), is, O Nārada, worthy of being worshipped even by gods.

61. One who is averse to such censurable acts as stealing, is full of gratefulness, is a man of purity and truthful speech and takes delight in rendering help to others, deserves to be worshipped by gods and demons.

62. He whose mind and intellect are inclined to listen to the exposition of the Vedas and the Purāṇas, and is keen in associating with the righteous persons, deserves respect and salutations from excellent ones amongst the gods.

63. Association with such persons be established by us — with persons who perform such and other sacred rites with perfect faith, in this continent of Bhārata.

64. If anyone, despite being a Brāhmaṇa, does not begin any one of these sacred or holy activities, he is a man of wicked actions, dullard in mind, and none else is more insensible than he.

65. Even after being born in Bhārata, a person who is totally averse to the performance of righteous acts, is like a person who prefers a pot of poison spurning aside the jar of nectar.

66. O sage, a person who does not sanctify himself by performing religious rites prescribed in the Vedas and the Smṛtis is the leader of sinners, confounder of his own self.

67. O prominent sage ! After attaining birth in the land of holy rites (i.e. Bhārata), if one does not abide by the path of righteousness (dharma), he is decried as the meanest of all, by knowers of the Vedas.

68. He who eschews auspicious rites and acts and performs evil deeds is (like a person who) abandons (the milk of) the wish-yielding cow (Kāmadhenu) and seeks the milk-like exudation from the sun plant (arka).

69. O leader of Brāhmaṇas ! In this way even the inhabitants of heaven like god Brahmā and others who are afraid of the termination of their period of enjoyment of pleasures, praise the land of Bhārata.

70. Hence, the excellent subcontinent of Bhārata should be regarded as exceedingly meritorious. It is accessible with great difficulty even to gods. It bestows the fruits of all holy rites and actions.

71. In the three worlds, there is no one comparable to that person who diligently attempts to perform good and righteous acts in this holy land.[15]

72. A man who is born in this land and who attempts to destroy and exhaust the balance of his actions in previous birth, is Lord Hari himself in the guise of a man. There is no doubt about this.

73. One who is desirous of attaining the highest worldly benefits or fruits, should vigilantly perform righteous and holy acts. If an act is performed, after dedicating with devotion the fruit thereof unto Lord Hari, that fruit is said to be ever lasting.[16]

74. If one is devoid of any desire for the fruits of actions, one shall not cause any such acts to be done. He should dedicate a pious and religious act (to Lord Hari) by saying, "May Lord Hari be hereby pleased with me".

75. All the worlds upto and including the region of god Brahmā are the bestowers of rebirth. But a person who has no desire for the fruit even of meritorious acts, attains to the highest region namely Mokṣa — Liberation from saṁsāra.

76. It is just for the propitiation of the Lord of the Universe, that one should perform sacred rites and actions prescribed in the Vedas as per his stage in life (āśrama). One who is desirous of renouncing all karmas altogether including even those prescribed for his āśrama (stage of life), attains to the Eternal Region.

77. Irrespective of one's desire for obtaining the fruit thereof, one should perform the holy rites in accordance with the injunctions laid down in the śāstras (for performance of sacred acts). One who is fallen from the conduct of life (performance of duties) befitting the stage of his life, is called "a fallen fellow" by wise persons.

78. A Brāhmaṇa devoted to righteous conduct shines forth with Brahmanical splendour. O Nārada ! Lord Viṣṇu also is propitious to him who is endowed with devotion.

79. If, after being born in the continent of Bhārata a person does not redeem himself, he is tortured in the terrible hell as long as the moon, the sun and the stars shine.

80. Real Dharma has Vāsudeva as the highest object. Penance is to be solely devoted to Vāsudeva. Perfect knowledge refers to Lord Vāsudeva and Lord Vāsudeva is the ultimate goal.

81. The entire Universe including the mobile and the immobile beings, from god Brahmā down to a clump of grass, is identical with Lord Vāsudeva. There is nothing else other than he.

82. He alone is god Brahmā, the Creator of the Universe as well as god Rudra, the destroyer of Tripuras (Three Cities). He alone has assumed the forms of gods, demons, and sacrifice. He alone constitutes this Brahmāṇḍa (Cosmic Egg). There is nothing else that is separate and distinct from him.

83. There is nothing else greater than he. There is nothing more minute or more immense than he.[17] All this wonderful Universe is pervaded by him. One should bow down to that Lord of gods, worthy of being praised.

CHAPTER THREE

The Descriptions of the sphere of the earth and of Bhārata

1. The description of the creation of the universe is the 1st characteristic of all Purāṇas. The famous verse enumerating 5 characteristics of Purāṇas :

Sargaśca prati-sargaśca vaṁśo manvantarāṇi ca /
Vaṁśānucaritaṁ ceti purāṇam pañca-lakṣaṇam // is found with slight modifications in *V.P.*3.6.25, *A.P.*1.14, BS.P. (Bhaviṣya Purāṇa) 2.5, *M.P.*64, Bd.P.-Prakriyā 1.38 etc. Naturally after eulogizing god Viṣṇu, (NP. is a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa), the NP. opens with the 1st topic, viz. creation of the universe, although the chapter is designated by the author as 'The description of the earth and that of Bhārata'.

2. Though NP. as a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa, treats Viṣṇu, as the Supreme Brahman, the theory of the evolution of the universe is strongly influenced by the Sāṅkhya theory of evolution. It is, of course, the Theistic Sāṅkhya and not the Agnostic. In the Primary Creation, the credit of the differentiations of three guṇas, the modes of Prakrti, into sattva, rajas and tamas, is given to the All-Pervading Viṣṇu who created the functionaries or Agents of the Creation, sustenance and destruction of the Universe, viz. Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra from himself. Vide vv.4 & 5 below.

3. The Vaiṣṇavī Śakti (the Supreme potency of Lord Viṣṇu) is the real force that stimulates the process (creation, etc.) of the universe. It is noteworthy that the Purāṇa author regards Vidyā (Spiritual Knowledge) and Avidyā (Nescience) as both sides of the same coin as it were. This potency of the Lord is called by various names such as Umā, Lakṣmī, etc. vide vv. 13-15 below. And also of BVP-Kṛṣṇa-Janma-Khaṇḍa 118.35 where Śakti (Pārvatī) tells the Śaiva pantheon : 'I am Mahālakṣmī in Vaikuṇṭha, Rādhā in Goloka, Śivā in the region of Śiva, and Sarasvatī in the abode of god Brahmā.'

4. Although the purāṇa-writer appears to give synonyms of Vaiṣṇavī śakti, he is actually describing or summarizing the various aspects of this potency. Thus Māyā emphasizes the illusive power, Vidyā, the Spiritual Knowledge, Avidyā, Nescience, Parā Prakrti, the Supreme Primordial nature, and the Śaktis of various gods like Brāhmī, Aindrī, etc. are given to emphasize that whatever feats these gods achieve are due to the motive force of Viṣṇu.

5. *Kālah svabhāvo niyatir yadṛcchā. etc.—SV.Up.*1.2

N.P. broadly follows the concept of Time, as delineated in the Bh.P. e.g. 3.10.11 ff, 3.26.18ff. etc. According to the Bh.P., Time is the Supra-phenomenal Reality. It pre-exists creation. Its primary function is to disturb the equilibrium of the guṇas of Prakṛti and thus set in motion the process of creation. It is a complex concept and appears to be a mixture of three aspects—God, the Power of God and the Time sequence. Time as a power of motivation does not simply stop with disturbing the equilibrium of the tri-partite matter (guṇa-mayī ātma-māyā), but pursues the creative process at every stage. If God is the agent-cause of creation, Time is the efficient cause. Creation takes place through the force or operation of Time. It is classified as : (i) Prākṛta (material) (ii) Vaikṛta (elemental) and (iii) Prākṛta-Vaikṛta (mixed, material-cum-elemental). The Bh.P. states that the following 10 types of creations are brought about by the motive-force of Kāla :

I. Prākṛta : (i) mahat, (ii) ahaṁkāra (ego), (iii) tanmātras (subtle sense-organs), (iv) External sense-organs, (v) presiding deities of senses and the mind, (vi) avidyā (with its five 'knots').

II. Vaikṛta : (i) vegetations (ii) animals (iii) human beings.

III. Prākṛta-Vaikṛta : (i) Divinely human souls, e.g. Sanatkumāra, etc. It is called Kaumāra sarga.

V.P. 5.1-25, MK P. 47 and other Purāṇas enumerate 9 (nine) types of creations as follows :

I. Prākṛta: (i) Brāhma vide mahat of the Bh.P. (ii) bhūta vide tantmātras of the Bh.P. (iii) Vaikārika corresponds to (iv) & (v) of Prākṛta creation of the Bh.P.

II. Vaikṛta : (i) mukhya or Tāmasa creation of immobiles and immovables :

mukhyā vai sthāvarāḥ smṛtāḥ /—V.P.1.5.21

(ii) tiryak—(birds and beasts) (iii) deva (celestial beings) (iv) mānuṣa (human beings) (v) anugraha—(both Sāttvika and Tāmasa) vide VP. 1.5.24.

About this II-v MK.P. 47.28 and Vāyu P. 6.57 state :

Pañcamo'nugrahasargaś caturdhā sa vyavasthitaḥ / viparyayeṇa śaktyā ca tuṣṭyā siddhyā tathaiva ca //

Bh.P. & other purāṇas agree about the 3rd type of creation.

6. This is the Prākṛta creation.

7. This is the Vaikṛta creation, vide 65 above.

8. These seven lokas represent the different parts of the upper half of the Cosmic Man's (Virāja-Puruṣa's body. Vedic cosmogony as found in the Puruṣa (RV.X.90), Nāsadīya (RV X. 129) and Hiraṇyagarbha (RV.X.121) sūktas presuppose cosmic water, Viṣnu, the primordial creator and three worlds : Pṛthvī, Antarikṣa and Dyau—the earth, intermediate space and the sky. Bh.P. adopted these three worlds as bhū, bhuva and Svar respectively. But the still upper regions mahar, jana, tapas and satya is a later—purāṇic—contribution. Even Bh.P. has vague idea about these four upper regions. They are separated from the lower three worlds by a boundary mountain Lokālokācala which shuts out the light of the sun and other luminaries to these higher four worlds.

These seven lokas are also regarded as the 'planes' of existence, the lowest being over terrestrial globe (bhū) and the highest, satya—the region of god Brahmā.—Bh.P.5.22 V.P. 2.7, Vāyu 50.

9. These represent the lower part of the body of the Cosmic Man. These regions are below our earth and do not receive the light of the Sun (Bh.P. 5.24.11). In Atala lives Bala, the son of Maya. Vitala is the region of god Śiva with His divine Consort Bhavānī. In Sutala reigns Bali with Lord Viṣṇu as his door-keeper. Mahātala is the region of serpents and Rasātala, that of Daityas, Dānavas and Paṇis. Talātala is the residence of Maya, under the protection of god Śiva. The last of the nether-world is Pātāla, the kingdom of Vāsuki, the serpent king. All these regions are held together by Saṅkarṣaṇa (The principle of gravitation (*Bh.P.*5.ch.24 & 5.25.1). To regard Mexico as Pātāla and identify the Mayas thereof with demon Maya of Purāṇas is only a clever theory of Chamanlal in Hindu America though it must be conceded that he made out a good case for it. *Bh.P.*5.24, VP. 2.7, Vāyu 50.1-48.

10. Lokāloka mountain :

This mountain is the dividing range between Loka i.e. regions illuminated by the Sun and other heavenly bodies and Aloka—those regions like mahar, jana, tapas and satya which do not receive such light. It is beyond the 'sea of sweet water' and encircles it. All the seven great continents and seven oceans etc. lie between Mount Meru and Lokāloka mountain—the distance between them being twelve and half crores of yojanas. The tract beyond the ocean of 'fresh water' upto Lokāloka mountain is 'a land of gold shining like a sheet of mirror. Nothing that goes or is dropped there ever returns'. God Brahmā has posted four big elephants, viz. Ṛṣabha, Puṣkara, Vāmana and Aparājita in four cardinal points beyond that mountain, for retaining the stability of the world—*Bh.P.*5.20.34-39.

11. Seven Continents :

The dominant cosmographical conception of the Purāṇas is th at of the earth consisting of seven concentric island-continents (saptadvīpā Vasundharā). Each continent has its own chain of principal mountains, river-systems. The names of these continents, as enumerated in the next (43rd) verse, are : Jambū, Plakṣa, Śālmala, Kuśa, Krauñca, Śāka and Puṣkara. This order of dvīpas is found also in *VP.*2.4, *Bh.P.*5.20 but M.P. 121, 122, AP. 108.1-3 differs, though all begin with Jambūdvīpa. The following is briefly the Purāṇic conception of these dvīpas :

(1) Jambū dvīpa with mount Meru or Sumeru at the centre and surrounded by the ocean of Lavaṇa (salt water). It is identified with India and the land around it as Bhārata varṣa—a prominent part thereof is 'to the north of the salt sea and south of the Himālayas' (NP. 1.3.46 below) and the glorification of this holy land from vv.47-72 below leaves no doubt that India is the land so praised.

(2) Plakṣa—Surrounding the Lavaṇa ocean and surr ounded by the ocean of Ikṣu (sugarcane juice).

(3) Śālmali—Surrounding the Ikṣu ocean and surrounded by the ocean of Surā (wine); probably Chaldea—chal-dia<śālmali dvīpa : Ancient region SW Asia on the Euphrates and Persian Gulf (Webster—College Dict. P. 1106), if the derivation recorded by N.L. De in GDAM I, p.175 be correct. But the rivers Nivṛtti and Vitṛṣṇā mentioned by him in Brahmāṇḍa P. Ch.53 are not traced in Jagdish Shastri's new edition (Motilal Banarsidass, Delhi) either at ch.19 describing Plakṣadvīpa or ch. 53 as mentioned by De at the corresponding ch. therein.)

(4) Kuśa—Surrounding the Surā ocean and surrounded by Sarpis (Ghee) ocean. Purāṇas state that the source of the Nile is in a lake in the Kuśa dvīpa. It is, of course, a region in Africa. Ancient Persian inscriptions mention a country called 'Kusha' and its people 'Kushiya' "There is no doubt that Kusha was situated in North East Africa beyond Egypt" D. C. Sircar—GAMI P. 25. Probably it is Ethiopia.

(5) Krauñca—Surrounding sarpis ocean and surrounded by the ocean of Dadhi (curds).

(6) Śāka—Surrounding the Dadhi ocean and surrounded by the ocean of Milk. It is obviously the land of Śakas or Scythians of the Greeks. Dr. Ray Choudhary identifies it with Seistan (<Śākasthāna) in Eastern Iran, the land of the Māgi and of the Mihira cult and its inhabitants. The Maga-dvijas worshipped Sūrya-rūpadharo Hariḥ. There had been three settlements of Śakas—modern Mesopotemia, Helmund in Eastern part of Iran and Seistan. D.C. Sircar weighs the evidence and states, "Śaka-dvīpa in the original Purāṇic conception...is the Śaka settlement in the Oxus and Jaxartes valleys in Central Asia" (GAMI. P. 25).

(7) Puṣkara—Surrounded by Surā sāgara 'A portion of Central Asia commencing from the north of the Oxus including Western Tartary. Perhaps it has preserved its name in Bhushkara or Bokhara'—N.L. De GADMI, p. 163.

It will be seen that though the idea of concentric islands is poetic, there is some geographical reality about some lands in these Purāṇas. This conception of sapta-dvīpā vasumatī is as old as Patañjali (187-151 B.C.) and has strongly influenced Jain works like Tiloya pannatti : GAMI, pp. 22-24.

12. Seven Seas surrounding these island continents are traditionally mentioned as in v.44-B.

lavaṇekṣu-surā-sarpir-dadhi-kṣīra-jalaiḥ samam /

i.e. seas consisting of (1) Salt water, (2) Sugar-cane juice (3) wine, (4) ghee, (5) curds, (6) milk and (7) sweet water. N.L. De locates them as follows :

(1) Lavaṇa (salt water) : The Indian Ocean surrounding Jambū dvīpa or India.

(2) Ikṣu—(Sugar cane juice). Ikṣu is another name for the Oxus (V.P. 2.4.66 mentions this as a river). De explains, "Here the river is taken as a sea."

(3) Surā (wine)—Corruption of the sea of Sarain, another name for the Caspian sea and it formed the Southern or south-eastern boundary of Kuśa dvīpa.

(4) Sarpis or Ghṛta (Clarified butter)—It is a corruption of the Erythraen sea or the Persian Gulf and formed the boundary of Śālmali-dvīpa or Chaldia i.e. Assyria.

(5) Dadhi—(curds) : The sea of Aral, Dadhi is Sanskritisation of Dahi (Dahae) the name of a Scythic tribe which lived in the upper Jaxartes and evidently on the shores of this lake, it formed the boundary of Krauñca dvīpa.

(6) Kṣīra (Milk) : It is a corruption of Shirwan sea, as the Caspian sea was called, and it formed the northern boundary of Śāka dvīpa.

(7) Jala i.e. Svādujala (sweet water)—Perhaps a corruption of Tchadun, a river in Mongolia forming a boundary of or flowing through Plakṣa dvīpa—GDAMI, p. 179.

Rivers and seas were formerly designated by the same word. Hence some rivers came to be understood as 'seas' in Purāṇas. The extent of some seas like the Caspian and the Aral were different (much larger than at present) in ancient times. But the unanimous tradition in Purāṇas shows a race-memory and not a geographer's report of an expedition. The above is enough to show that geography in Purāṇas is not all imagination, but had some basis in reality.

13. Though NP. is a purāṇa of the Viṣṇu group, it does not show the bitterness of later Vaiṣṇavas against Śiva. On the contrary, it advocates the oneness of Śiva and Viṣṇu both being the forms of Para-Brahman. vv.4-5 above state that the trinity—Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra are the forms of Nārāyaṇa or Mahāviṣṇu. This is the breadth of outlook consistently shown by the N.P.

14. Paṅkti-pāvanaḥ : Paṅkti is a row of diners. The Dharmaśāstra prohibits sitting in the same paṅkti with undeserving persons. But some highly religious persons sanctify the row of diners by sitting with them in the same row for dining. The 'sanctifiers of rows of diners' are persons who know the 6 aṅgas of the Veda, who have studied the Jyeṣṭha-sāman, who have enkindled the Nāciketa fire, who know the three madhu verses, who have studied the text called triṣuparṇa, who maintain 5 fires, have taken ceremonial bath after finishing Vedic studies (snātaka), know the mantras and Brāhmaṇas of their respective Veda, who have studied Dharma-śāstra and who are born of a woman married in the Brāhma form. paṅkti-pāvanaḥ ṣaḍaṅga-vij jyeṣṭha — sāmikas tri-ṇāciketas tri-madhus tri-suparṇaḥ, pañcāgniḥ snātako mantra-brāhmaṇa-vid dharmajño brahmadeyānusantānaḥ //

—Gautama dh.Sū XV. 29.

In this jyeṣṭha-sāmaka is the reciter of udu tyam (RV.I.50.1) and 'citram' (R. I.115.1) which constitute the sāman of the Talavakāras. (Haradatta on Gaut. above).

The nāciketa fire is described in Tait.Br.III.11.7 & 8 and Kaṭha Up. I. 1.17-18.

Tri-madhu is the reciter of RV.I.91-6-8 each of which begins with the word madhu. It can, however, be claimed that this term refers to the knower of madhu-vidyā mentioned in *Śatapatha BR.*IV.1.5.18 and Br.Up. II.5.16. But this vidyā does not explain the word tri in tri-madhu. triṣuparṇa are the anuvākas of *Tait.Ar.Q.*48-50 brahmaetu mām, madhu etu mām etc. in this side of the country, but Haradatta alternately suggests the 3 verses in RV. X.114. 4-6 (ekaḥ Suparṇaḥ, etc.)

The topic is discussed in Baudhāyana Dh. Sū. II.8.2, Āpastamba Dh.Sū. II.7.17 21-22, Manu III. 184-86, versified Śaṅkha. Smṛti 14.1-8 MBh. Anuśāsana 90.34, Vāyu P. chs. 79 & 83, and other Purāṇas which give long lists of such 'sanctifier Brāhmaṇas'. The list in NP.I.3.57-58 above is already covered in the above-mentioned works.

15. The glorification of Bhārata in the above verses is common to a number of Purāṇas e.g. Bm.P. 27.2, 70.21-24, 143.8-11, VP. 2.3.2, 22-26. The common verses in these Purāṇas suggest that they belong to some ancient common source

16. Verses 73-76 advocate Niṣkāmakarma-yoga, NP. insists that a person should perform all the religious rites etc. prescribed for his particular social class (varṇa) and stage of life (āśrama) in śāstras, without coveting for its fruit but should dedicate it to the Lord. As BG 9.27 says whatever one does should be dedicated to Me (the Lord).

yat karoṣi yad aśnāsi yaj juhoṣi dadāsi yat / yat tapasyasi Kaunteya tat kuruṣva madarpaṇam //

As Śaṅkara, the great advaitin happily put it in his famous hymn parā pujā (the supreme worship)

yad yat karma karomi tat tad akhilaṁ Śambho tavārādhanam /

'Whatever act I do, Lord Śiva, each and everything of it is thy worship.'

17. An echo of upaniṣadic mantra aṇoraṇīyān mahato mahīyān etc. —Kaṭha 2.2—,2.20, Śvet. Up. 3.20 mahānārāyaṇa 8.3, Kaivalya 20.

CHAPTER FOUR

Anecdote of Mārkaṇḍeya[1]

Sanaka said:

1. All pious rites performed with religious faith confer blessings in accordance with one's cherished desires. Every thing is achieved through faith. It is through faith in him that Hari is propitiated.

2. Acts of devotion should be performed devoutly (and with reverential faith). All holy rites should be performed with devotion. O excellent Brâhmaṇa ! Holy rites lacking in faith never become fruitful.

3. Just as the light (of the sun, etc.) is the cause of the activities of creatures, so also, devotion is the ultimate cause of all Siddhis[2] (complete accomplishments of objects or acquisition of super-human powers).

4. Just as water is regarded to be the enlivening factor in all the world, similarly, devotion is laid down (i.e. regarded) as the life-inspiring force in all Siddhis (spiritual attainments).

5. Just as all creatures live by resorting to the earth (as their support), so also, one should accomplish all objects by taking recourse to devotion.

6. A person endowed with Śraddhā (earnest faith) attains the Puruṣārtha — the end of human life — called Dharma (righteousness); the possessor of Śraddhā secures wealth; the desire for enjoyment (Kāma) — the third objective of human life, is realized through faith, and a man of faith attains salvation (Mokṣa).

7. O Excellent Sage ! Lord Hari is not pleased with charitable gifts, austere penances or sacrifices with sumptuous monetary gifts, should these acts be devoid of devotion.

8. Charitable gifts of heaps of gold as huge as the mount Meru, and donated billions of times — if they be devoid of devotion — result only in wastage of wealth.

9. The penance performed without devotion is but the desiccation of the body. The offering of oblations to gods in sacrificial fire, if it be without devotion, is fruitless like the oblations consigned to ashes.

10. Whatever sacred rite, howsoever insignificant it may be, if performed with faith, certainly becomes the bestower of perpetual happiness.

11. O Brāhmaṇa ! A thousand horse-sacrifices or any other holy rite enjoined in the Vedas, (in fact) everything is fruitless, if it is performed without devotion.

12. Devotion to Hari is the highest blessing to men. It is remembered (in sacred texts) to be comparable to a Kāma-Dhenu[3] (Wish-yielding heavenly cow). Alas ! The pity of it is that, when it (such a wish-yielding cow) is available, ignorant fools gulp and quaff the poison of saṁsāra (worldly existence).

13. O Son of Aja (God Brahmā) ! The following constitute the cream and quint-essence of this terrestrial existence which is otherwise worthless :—association with the devotees of Lord Hari, devotion to him and forbearance.

14. O Brāhmaṇa ! Know that devotion, charitable gifts and other holy acts are futile in the case of people whose minds are defiled with jealousy, and that Lord Hari is still further away from them.

15. Hari is far off from them who are greatly distressed to see the affluence of others, those whose minds revel in hypocritical religious activities, and those engaged in wrong and futile actions.

16. Hari is still further away from those who falsely interpret the Dharma to those who inquire about the highest religious duties, and from those whose minds are not devoted to religious and virtuous acts.

17. Dharma (the path of righteousness) is laid down by the Vedas.[4] The Vedas are identical with the Supreme Deity Nārāyaṇa. Hence, Hari is far off from those who have no faith in the Vedas.

18. If the days in the life of a person simply come and go without his performance of righteous acts, such a man is like the bellows of a blacksmith which mechanically inhales and exhales the air, and is not a living being. (The man simply breathes but does not lead a real life).

19. O Son of god Brahmā ! The principal aims in human life or Puruṣārthas, viz. Dharma, (righteousness), Artha— (wealth), Kāma — (love) and Mokṣa (liberation) are realized only by men of faith and not otherwise.

20. He who, without infringing his prescribed code of conduct, is engrossed in devotion to Hari, goes to the abode of Lord Viṣṇu which is visualized only by the seers.

21. O leader of sages ! He who performs religious rites befitting the stage of his life as enjoined by the Vedas, and who is wholly absorbed in contemplating Hari, attains the highest region.

22. Ācāra (good and righteous conduct of life) is the source of Dharma,[5] of which Lord Viṣṇu, the Imperishable, is the Master. God Hari is always worshipped by those who observe the righteous conduct befitting their āśrama (stage of life).

23. A person fallen from the course of conduct prescribed for his stage of life, should be regarded as an apostate even though he might have mastered the Vedas, the Upaniṣads and the ancillary subjects of the Vedas, for he is excluded from holy rites (or duties laid down in the śāstras).

24. Although a person is solely devoted to Lord Hari or is wholly engaged in contemplating him, he is called an apostate or fallen from the religious path, if he swerves from the prescribed code of conduct laid down for his stage of life (āśrama).

25. O excellent Brāhmaṇa ! Neither the Veda nor devotion unto Hari or to the great god Śiva, sanctifies the confounded fellow who has fallen from his ācāra (the prescribed code of behaviour).

26. O Brāhmaṇa ! Pilgrimage to holy places, ablutions in sacred waters or performance of sacrifices of different types, cannot save one who has forsaken his ācāra (righteous conduct).

27. Heaven is attained through ācāra; happiness is derived through observing the code of righteous conduct; Liberation from saṁsāra is secured through ācāra. What is there which is not obtainable through ācāra ?

28. O excellent Sage ! Reverential devotion is laid down as the primary cause of all ācāras, yogas and even of devotedness to Hari.

29. Lord Viṣṇu bestows the desired objects and fruits only when worshipped with devotion. Hence, adoration of God is glorified as the mother of all the worlds.

30. Just as all creatures come to life by resorting to their mother, so also all righteous persons live by taking recourse to pious devotion.

31. If a person endowed with the course of conduct befitting his āśrama, is also devoted to Lord Hari, O son of god Brahmā, there is no one equal to such a person in the three worlds.

32. Holy rites fructify through devotion. Hari is pleased with holy rites. Perfect knowledge dawns when he is pleased, and Liberation from saṁsāra is attained through perfect knowledge.

33. Piety is generated by contacts with the votaries of the God and such contacts are secured by men, thanks to the merit accumulated in the previous births.

34. Saintly people abiding by the rules of conduct to be observed by men according to their respective castes and stages in life, and ardently desirous of engaging in the devotion of God, and free from passions and other blemishes, are the preceptors of the world.

35. Association with saintly souls, the greatest achievement, cannot be secured by people who are not self-possessed, O Brāhmaṇa. If it be acquired at all, it should be known as being due to the merits earned in previous births.

36. Associations with the good take place in case of a person, when the sins accumulated earlier, have been completely annihilated; otherwise it does not come about.

37. During the day time, the Sun dispells the external darkness by means of the clusters of his rays, but saintly persons remove the internal darkness of ignorance at all times by means of the streams of light, in the form of wise sayings.

38. Few and rare are the persons who are eagerly desirous of being devoted to the Lord in this world. Perpetual peace accrues to him who comes in contact with such persons.

Nārada enquired :

39. What are the characteristics of the Bhāgavatas (devotees of the Lord) ? What holy acts do they perform ? What regions do they attain to ? Narrate to me everything (about these) precisely.

40. You are indeed the real devotee of the discus-bearing Lord of gods, the divine consort of goddess Lakṣmī. There is no one else better qualified and competent than you to recount this.

Sanaka said :

41. Listen to that esoteric secret which the Lord of the Universe confided to the intelligent Mārkaṇḍeya, as he (the Lord) woke up from his yogic slumber, O Brāhamaṇa.

42. That Supreme-most refulgent god Viṣṇu is the Eternal Lord of the Devas. He is the Creater of the Universe as well as the pervader of the same, and has assumed the forms of Śiva (destroyer of the Universe) as well as Brahmā (the creator of the Universe).

43-44. At the end of the yugas, he manifested himself in an immensely huge form as Rudra and swallowed up the whole Universe as one morsel. When the whole Universe became a vast sheet of cosmic water after the destruction of the mobile and immobile creation, the Lord, the only residual soul Hari, lies on the leaf of a banyan tree. The hairs over his body are embellished by innumerable lotus-born deities (Brahmās) and others.

45-46. The god sanctifies every one by means of the cool water of the Gaṅgā issuing out of his big toe. The Lord is subtler than the subtlest, yet he assumes an immense form and swallows the Universe.

46. Endowed with all Super-human potencies (Śaktis), he lay resting on the leaf of a banyan tree. At that spot stood the highly blessed devotee of Nārāyaṇa, the sage Mārkaṇḍeya who was observing all the sports of the great Lord.

The sages said :

47. O Sage ! Formerly, we heard that in that terrible period (of Universal deluge) when the mobile and immobile creation had already perished, it was Lord Hari alone who remained there.

48. When the whole Universe had become one single cosmic ocean and when all the mobile and immobile beings were annihilated, how is it that he (Mārkaṇḍeya) alone was spared by god Hari who had swallowed everything.

49. O Sūta ! Exceedingly great is our curiosity in this regard. Who will forsooth get lethargic and idle at the opportunity of imbibing the nectar of the glory of Lord Hari ?

Sūta replied :

50-51. There was a highly blessed sage well-known by the name Mṛkaṇḍu. He performed an austere penance at the important sacred place known as Śālagrāma,[8] the great holy centre. For the duration of ten thousand Yugas, he repeated the sacred mystic syllable Om, observing fast all the while. He exercised forbearance, control over his sense-organs, and practised truthfulness (in thought, word and deed).

52. Looking upon all living beings as his own ātman (self), he performed that great penance entertaining no desire for worldly pleasures, and was solicitous for the welfare of all creatures, and held his sense-organs under control.

53. Afraid of his penance, Indra and all other gods sought refuge in the highest god Nārāyaṇa who is free from all ailments.

54. After reaching the northern shore of the Milky Ocean, the residents of the celestial region eulogised Lord Viṣṇu, the god with a lotus in his navel, the Supreme Lord of all gods, and the preceptor of the universe.

The gods submitted :

55. O Nārāyaṇa, the imperishable, infinite Lord, the protector of those who seek asylum in you, do protect us who, being afraid of Mṛkaṇḍu's penance, have sought refuge in you.

56. Victory to the Supreme Lord of the chiefs of gods ! Victory to the wielder of the conch (Pāñcajanya), and the mace Kaumodaki ! Hail to you whose form is the Universe and who is the cause of the Brahmāṇḍa. (the cosmic age or the Universe).

57. Obeisance to you the Lord of gods. We bow to you the sanctifier of the worlds. Hail to you the Lord of the Universe and the witness of the Universe.

58. Obeisance to you who are comprehensible through meditation. Hail to you who are the object of contemplation. Obeisance to you whose form is contemplated and who is the witness of meditation.

59. Obeisance to you the slayer of the Demon Keśin and the destroyer of Madhu. Hail to you the great ātman (the Supreme soul) who assume the form of the earth, etc. and whose form is sentience itself.

60. Hail to the eldest (eternal) God, the pure and attributeless one, yet whose nature is guṇa. Obeisance to you who are devoid of form yet who possess your own form and manifest yourself into many forms.

61. Obeisance to the Lord friendly to Brāhmaṇas. Hail to you, O Kṛṣṇa,[7] the protector and benefactor of cows and Brāhmaṇas. Hail to you Govinda, the benefactor of the Universe.

62. Bow to Hiraṇya-garbha.[8] Obeisance to the Lord who assumes the form of god Brahmā and others. Hail to you who manifest yourself in the form of the sun and other gods. Obeisance to you, the enjoyer of the oblations of food offered to gods and deceased ancestors (havya and kavya).

63. Obeisance to the Eternal Deity worthy of respect. Hail to you whose form constitutes perpetual bliss. Bow to you who destroy the distress of those who remember you. Obeisance to you again and again."

64. On hearing the eulogy sung by the devas, Lord Viṣṇu, the Divine Consort of goddess Lakṣmī, the wielder of the conch (Pāñcajanya), discus (Sudarśana) and the mace (Kaumodaki) manifested himself to them.

65-67. On seeing him, the multitude of gods made obeisance to him — the Lord whose eyes resembled the petals of a full blown lotus, whose lustre equalled the combined effulgence of a hundred million suns, whose person was bedecked all over with ornaments, whose chest was characterised by Śrivatsa (a curl of golden hair on Viṣṇu's bosom), who was being eulogised by great sages and was surrounded by his prominent attendants (Pārṣadas). The brilliance of the devas was eclipsed by the majestic lustre of the Lord. With great joy, they bowed down to him laying themselves prostrate before him, touching the ground with eight parts of their bodies.[9]

68. The Lord who was propitiated, addressed devas in a voice deep and majestic like the rumbling of clouds. thus giving delight to Indra and other devas who bowed down to him.

The Lord said :

69. O gods ! I do understand your mental agony caused to you by the penance of Mṛkaṇḍu. But that sage is the foremost one among the saintly people and will not trouble you.

70. O excellent gods ! Whether endowed with affluence or bedevilled by adversities, the good shall by no means cause any harm unto others even in dreams.

71. Himself being harassed continuously by enemies called the 'worldly pleasures,' how can the highly intelligent one be hostile towards others, instead of protecting himself.

72. How can the excellent one who is himself ever molested by three types of distresses (originating from the physical body, the external world and extra-mundane sources), be competent (or inclined) to trouble others ?

73. He who always troubles others mentally, verbally or physically, and who is always in the grip of passions, etc. is called a person of confounded mind.

74. The man who renders service to the world even at the risk of his life, and is devoid of rivalry or jealousy, is said to be an excellent man both here and hereafter.

75. A person troubled with fear or with suspicion is always miserable and a fearless or nonsuspicious person shall always be happy. Return to your abodes and rest assured that he will not play false to you.

76-77. I am the Protector of you all. Be happy and sport about as you please." After granting this boon to them, the Lord with the beauty and lustre of the atasi flowers (a blue flower) vanished there immediately even as the gods were simply gazing on. Delighted in their minds, all the multitudes of gods returned to the celestial world whence they had come.

78-79. Being pleased and propitiated in his mind, Hari revealed himself to Mṛkaṇḍu. Mṛkaṇḍu was surprised to see the formless Supreme Brahman, the self-luminous unsullied Acyuta resembling the atasi flowers in complexion and clad in yellow garments, holding in his hands ḍivine weapons.

80. Opening his eyes from meditation, he (Mṛkaṇḍu) saw in front of him, Lord Hari of pleasing appearance, the quiescent creator of the world possessing and radiating lustre all around the world.

With his hair standing on their ends on his body, with tears of joy welling up in the eyes, Mṛkaṇḍu prostrated himself like a staff in front of the Eternal Lord of gods.

82. Washing the feet of the Lord with tears of delight and joining together his palms over his head, he began to eulogise.

Mṛkaṇḍu said :

83. Obeisance to the Supreme Lord who is the Paramātman, the great self. Hail to you who are greater than the greatest and transcendental (to everything else). Bow to you whose greatness is unfathomable and who redeem your devotees from enemies and are the most eminent one.

84. I worship the supreme Deity, the ruler of the Universe worthy of being praised — the Deity who is devoid of false notion such as name, caste,etc., and whose form is opposed to and unconnected with such defects as śabda (words) and who, though possessed of many forms, is unsullied by them.

85. I worship the Eternal Lord of all, the ancient Person knowable through the Upaniṣads (Vedānta), whose form is the universe itself (including god Brahmā and others), who is beyond comparison and who is merciful to his devotees.

86. I bow down to that great holy Deity who redeems his devotees from saṁsāra, and who reveals himself to those who are free from all blemishes, those completely absorbed in meditation, those free from desires and those who have no delusion.

87. I bow down to the merciful great Lord Viṣṇu, the destroyer of the distress and mental agony of those who remember him, the protector of those who seek refuge in him, worthy of being served by the universe and the asylum of the world."

88. Being thus praised by that great sage, god Viṣṇu, the wielder of conch (Pāñcajanya), discus (Sudarśana) and the mace (Kaumodaki) was highly pleased.

89. Embracing the sage with all his four long arms, the Lord said with great pleasure, "O Sage, a strict observer of religious vows ! Seek any boon.

90. O sinless sage ! I am delighted by your penance as well as this hymn of praise. Choose whatever boon you have cherished in your mind, O highly virtuous sage."

Mṛkaṇḍu said :

91. "O God of gods ! O Lord of the universe ! I am certainly satisfied and have all my objects achieved by your manifestation to me, since it is remembered (in śāstras) that your vision is impossible to those who are devoid of merit.

92-93. I perceive you whom even god Brahmā and others cannot see. Even the yogins who have fulfilled their vows, are extremely righteous, are initiated (in sacrifices or sacred lores), are devoid of passions and jealousy, cannot perceive you. I now visualise you who are the highest resort. What other boon should I choose ? O Janārdana, O Preceptor of the universe, I am perfectly satisfied with this vision only.

94. O Acyuta ! Even by mere remembrance of your name persons with heinous sins, attain to your highest region, what then after getting your audience and a view ?"

The glorious Lord said :

95. O Learned Brāhmaṇa ! What you spoke is true. I am really pleased with you. Never can my vision be fruitless.

96. Learned men always say, "God Viṣṇu treates his devotees as members of his family." I shall bear it out. My devotees would not utter what is untrue.

97. Hence, being propitiated by your penance, I shall become your son. He (my incarnation) will be endowed with all good qualities. He will be handsome and long-lived.

98. The family in which I incarnate, attains salvation. O excellent sage ! What is there that cannot be achieved in the three worlds, if I am pleased.

99. After addressing thus, the Lord of devas vanished then and there, even as the sage was watching. The sage Mṛkaṇḍu completed his penance.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Anecdote of Mārkaṇḍeya

1. The story of the immortal sage Mārkaṇḍeya and his vision of Viṣṇu as an infant lying on a banyan leaf on the cosmic waters of the great deluge that submerged the universe, is common to many Purāṇas, e.g. Bh.P. 12 chs. 8, 9, 10 Mbh. Vana—a whole sub-parvan chs. 182-231 devoted to Mārkaṇḍeya's dialogues with Yudhiṣṭhira. Out of them, chs 188-89 contain the story of the deluge. His conquest of death is described in Bh.P. 4.1.45, Pd.P.—Sṛṣṭi-Khaṇḍa, ch. 33 & Narasiṁha P. ch. 7.

2. Siddhis—super human powers also called vibhūtis; PYS (Pātañjala Yoga Sūtra) 3.45 enumerates the following 8 super-normal or mystic powers :

1. atomization (aṇimā),
2. levitation (laghimā)
3. magnification (mahiman)
4. extension (Prāpti). A yogi can touch the moon with his finger-tip.
5. efficacy—non-obstruction to desires (Prākāmya)
6. mastery of elements (Vaśitva)
7. sovereignty over the creation (Iśitva)
8. capacity to determine (the course of) things (sarva-kāmāvasāyitā)

Vyāsa and Vācaspati Miśra elaborate the details of these Supernormal powers in Yogabhāṣya and Tattva-vaiśāradī coms. respectively.

The belief in the acquisition of such powers is common to Buddhists, Jainas and the followers of different Tantras and still survives in Indian masses.

3. Kāmadhenu :

A mythical wish-yielding cow. She was one of the jewels i.e. important finds that came out, when gods and demons churned the ocean, for obtaining nectar (amṛta). (Bh.P. 8.8.1) Mbh.Ādi 18.36 ff.) Bh.P. calls her Havirdhānī (probably from her function in sacrifices), while Mbh. gives Surabhi as her name. She is regarded as Dakṣa's daughter who married Kaśyapa (*VP.*1.15), and gave birth to a cow called Nandinī which the sage Vasiṣṭha retained as his own (Mbh. 98.8-9). Jamadagni had a Kāmadhenu called Havirdhānī which Sahasrārjuna carried away per force to Māhismatī. But the fact that Havirdhānī did not defend herself, and prevent the raid on Jamadagni's hermitage, as Nandinī did against Viśvāmitra (Mbh-Ādi 174.22-43 also Śalya 40.21-22) shows her powerlessness. In addition to Havirdhānī (which should be distinguished from Surabhi and Nandinī) there appear to be more Kāmadhenus in purāṇas (e.g. one at Varuṇa's sacrifice). Surabhi is regarded as the progenitor of all cows. She performed penance and was given permanent residence in Goloka (Mbh.Anuśāsana 83.29-39).

4. Cf. Vedoktaḥ paramo dharmaḥ / Mbh. Anu. 141.65. The sources of religion are : Śruti, smṛti and śiṣṭācāra (The vedic texts, the smṛti compilations and the code of conduct followed by śiṣṭas or leaders of the society). As Baudhāyana Dh.Sū : 1.1-4. states :

upadiṣṭo dharmaḥ prati-vedaṁ—smārto dvitīyaḥ /
tṛtīyaḥ śiṣṭāgamaḥ (शिष्टागमः) —a view endorsed by Mbh. Vana. 207.83, śānti. 354.6.

5. Cf. ācāraḥ prathamo dharmaḥ. In fact, the whole of dharma-śāstra revolves round the ācāra (code of conduct) of all varṇas (classes of societies) and āśramas (the stage of life of the individual). Hence, in ancient smṛtis like Manu and Yājñavalkya, we find sages requesting Manu and Yājñavalkya to impart instructions in the ācāra-dharmas (code of conduct) of varṇas & āśramas. For example Yājñavalkyasmṛti opens with the request :

varṇāśrameṭarāṇāṁ no brūhi dharmān aśeṣataḥ / 1.1

Cf. Manu 1.2

The whole discourse from vv.22-31 emphasizes the importance of ācāra (code of conduct), prescribed for the varṇas and āśramas—classes in society and stages of one's life.

6. Śālagrāma :

A place situated near the source of the Gaṇḍak. It is mentioned in the Padma P.—Pātāla khaṇḍa ch.78 and Bh.P. 5.7.8. (as Pulahāśrama) and in *BV.P.*2.13. The short course of Gaṇḍaka near Muktināth is called Śāligrāmi, as the bed abounds in black pebbles called śāligrāma.

7. The epithets Kṛṣṇa, Govinda are used for addressing God Viṣṇu as the Vedic god and the historical hero (Vāsudeva Kṛṣṇa) came to be fused long before the NP. and other purāṇas were written.

8. Hiraṇya-garbha :

Originally this epithet was used for god Brahmā who was born from the cosmic golden egg. But it is used to designate Viṣṇu as he was the father or procreator of that 'golden egg'—Hiraṇya-garbha—sambhūti-kāraṇaṁ hiraṇmayam aṇḍaṁ yad-vīrya-sambhūtam, tadasya garbha iti Hiraṇyagarbhaḥ /—Śaṅkara on Viṣṇusahasranāma, verse 57.

9. aṣṭāṅgair avanīm gatā :

The usual concept of a respectful obeisance consists of prostration of the following eight limbs of the body—two feet, two knees, two palms, chest and head, on the ground. But the real concept requires the laying down of the mind or intellect, speech and sight as well.

Jānubhyāṁ ca tathā padbhyām pāṇibhyām urasā dhiyā / śirasā vacasā dṛṣṭyā praṇāmo'ṣṭāṅga īritaḥ // quoted in ASD, p. 67

CHAPTER FIVE

The Description of Mārkaṇḍeya's Life[1]

Nārada said :

1. O Brāhmaṇa sage ! Be pleased to narrate to me how the glorious Lord became the son of Mṛkaṇḍu and what Hari did after being born in the family of Bhārgava.

2. It is heard mentioned in the purāṇas that Mārkaṇḍeya, the long-lived sage, perceived the māyā of Viṣṇu, at the time of Deluge (dissolution of the world).

Sanaka replied :

3. Listen, O Nārada. I shall narrate to you this ancient story about the sage Mārkaṇḍeya which is closely connected with devotion to Viṣṇu.

4. At the conclusion of his penance, the excellent sage Mṛkaṇḍu entered the householders' stage, and gladly performed the duties prescribed for householders. He was self-controlled, quiescent and contented.

5. His wife was pure, attentive and always devoted to her husband. She was chaste and true to her husband in thought, word and deed.

6. At the proper time, she conceived in her womb the child born of a ray of the majestic lustre of Hari. At the end of the tenth month, she gave birth to an exceedingly brilliant son.

7. On seeing the son endowed with all auspicious characteristics, that sage was extremely delighted. He caused all the prescribed post-natal auspicious rites[2] to be performed in accordance with the śāstric injunctions.

8-9. The boy grew up there like the moon in the bright half of the month, O prominent Brāhmaṇa. He invested the boy with the sacred thread, in his fifth year. With great joy, he imparted instructions to him in the Vedic lore and in scriptures on dharma. "O son ! The Brāhmaṇas should always be paid respects when seen. As per sacred precepts, the practice has been enjoined and observed.

10. After worshipping the sun with offerings of libation of water (with joining together of palms i.e. performing Sandhyā-vandana) thrice a day, Vedic rites should be performed with due attention to the study of the Vedas.

11. Hari should always be worshipped through observance of celibacy and performance of penance. All forbidden acts such as conversation with the wicked (or on improper topics) should be avoided.

12. One should always associate oneself with saintly persons engaged in devotion to Viṣṇu. One should never entertain hatred or hostility to any one and one should perceive activities conducive to the welfare of all.

13-15. O son ! Performance of sacrifices, Vedic studies and granting of charitable gifts should always be carried on by you." Ordered thus by his father, Mārkaṇḍeya, the prominent sage, abided by the path of righteousness, constantly contemplating on Hari. The highly fortunate (or the illustrious) sage was compassionate, a lover of dharma or piety. He was self-possessed and true of word. His splendour was like that of the Sun. He was self-controlled, quiescent, deeply learned and wise, and proficient in the knowledge of the true nature of Brahman.

16. He performed a great penance that gave delight to Lord Acyuta. The Lord of the universe was propitiated by the intelligent Mārkaṇḍeya.

17. Acyuta conferred on him the boon of being competent to compose a purāṇa saṁhitā[3] (known as the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa)[3] Hence, the sage Mārkaṇḍeya is remembered as Nārāyaṇa.

18-20. He was long-lived. He was also a great devotee of the discus-bearing Lord of devas (Viṣṇu). O Brāhmaṇa, when the universe was converted into one vast sheet of Cosmic water, Janārdana did not absorb him in himself in order to show to him his prowess. The learned son of Mṛkaṇḍu, endowed with devotion to Viṣṇu, floated like a shattered dry leaf in that extremely terrible mass of water. As long as Hari lay there in his yogic slumber, Mārkaṇḍeya too remained there.

21-23.[4] I shall now describe to you the extent or the duration of that period. Listen to it, as I recount it : The time unit kāṣṭhā is made up of fifteen times winking of eyes (nimeṣas). O son of god Brahmā, thirty kāṣṭhās should be known as making one kalā (eight seconds). A Kṣaṇa (four minutes) should be known as made up of thirty kalās. Six kṣaṇas constitute a ghaṭikā (twenty-four minutes). Two ghaṭikās constitute one muhūrta (forty-eight minutes). Thirty muhūrtas constitute a day (of twenty-four hours). Thirty days or two fortnights make one month.

24. Two months constitute one ṛtu (a season). Three such ṛtus make one ayana. (time from one solstice to another). Two such ayanas make one year, which constitutes one complete day (day and night) of devas.

25. They say that the Uttarāyaṇa (northward transit of the sun) is the day of gods, and Dakṣiṇāyana (southward transit of the sun) is their night. A human month is said to be one day of the pitṛs (manes).

26. The day of the pitṛs is from one new moon day to another (lit. when the sun comes into contact with the moon). A thousand celestial years constitute the period of a kalpa, and twelve yugas constitute one yuga of gods.

27. Two thousand divine yugas make two brāhma kalpas and according to human calculations, seventy-one divine yugas constitute a manvantara.

28. O sage, fourteen such manvantaras make one day of god Brahmā. The extent of the night is declared to be the same as that of the day.

29-30. O leading Brāhmaṇa, at that time, all the three worlds perish. Listen to the extent of time according to human calculations. O sage, a thousand cycles of four yugas make one day of Brahmā. Similarly, the months and the years of god Brahmā should be known (calculated).

31. O Brāhmaṇas, according to his calculations the period of two parārdhas should be known as one day of Viṣṇu. The period of night is also said to be of the same extent.

32. In the middle of that terrible deluge of water, the son of Mṛkaṇḍu lay like a withered leaf for that period. He was sustained by the spiritual potency of god Viṣṇu. He stood near Hari meditating on the Supreme Soul.

33. When the proper time came, the Deity, waking up from yogic slumber, assumed the form of god Brahmā and created this universe, consisting of the mobile and immobile beings.

34. Noticing the recession of water and the creation of the universe, the son of Mṛkaṇḍu was surprised as well as was extremely delighted. He saluted the feet of Hari.

35. With palms joined in reverence over his head, the great sage Mārkaṇḍeya eulogised the Deity whose body is constituted solely of perpetual bliss. He praised him in desired and desirable, appropriate words.

Mārkaṇḍeya said :

36. I bow unto Janārdana, the God with thousands of heads, Nārāyaṇa, free from ailments, Vāsudeva, who needs no other support, himself being the support of all.

37. I pay obeisance to Janārdana who is beyond all measures (immeasurable), who is un-aging and eternal, whose person consists of pure perpetual bliss, who cannot be specifically pointed out, and whose nature surpasses imagination.

38. I bow unto Janārdana who is imperishable, who is the Eternal Supreme Being, universal-eyed (Omnipresent and Omniscient) who is the source of the universe, who is quiescent and who constitutes all principles (enumerated by Sāṅkhyas).

39. I pay my deep respects to Janārdana, the ancient Puruṣa, the master of all super-human potencies, the sole receptacle for all perfect knowledge and whose form is greater than the greatest.

40. I bow to Janārdana who is the highest splendour, the greatest abode, whose region is the holiest and supremest and who is both multiformed and single.

41. I bow unto Janārdana who is existence or entity, knowledge and bliss incarnate; whose region is higher than the highest; who is the most pre-eminent, eternal Deity.

42. I pay respects to Janārdana who is endowed with attributes as well as is transcendental to them; who is quiescent and beyond the deluding potency Māyā, and yet is its (Māyā's) master; who is formless yet has many forms.

43. My obeisance to that Janārdana, the primordial Deity, the Ruler of the universe, who creates, preserves and annihilates it.

44. O great Lord ! Embodiment of Supreme bliss, who are compassionate to those who seek refuge. O Ocean of mercy ! Be pleased to save me, O Lord, who are beyond the comprehension of the mind. My obeisance to you."

45. Lord Viṣṇu, the preceptor of the universe, the wielder of conch, discus and mace, addressed Mārkaṇḍeya with great pleasure, as the prominent Brāhmaṇa Mārkaṇḍeya was thus eulogising him.

The Lord said :

46. Those who are the devotees of the Lord in this world, those whose minds are devotedly directed towards the glorious Lord, are called the Bhāgavatas (devotees of the Supreme Lord). Undoubtedly, I am always pleased with them and I protect them.

47. O excellent Brāhmaṇa ! It is I alone who, assuming the forms of devotees, protect the world in that guise. concealing my direct personality.

Mārkaṇḍeya said :

48. What are the characteristics of real Bhāgavatas ? By performance of which holy rites are they born ? I am extremely eager to hear this.

The Lord said :

49. O Excellent sage, listen to the characteristics of the Bhāgavatas. It is impossible to recount in details their capacity and prowess; even in a hundred million years.

50. The excellent Bhāgavatas are those who are the benefactors of all living beings, are devoid of jealousy and covetousness, who are quiescent and who exercise self-control.

51. Those who do not trouble others mentally, verbally and physically and those who are disposed to renounce their possessions and property (or those who refrain from accepting gifts), are regarded as Bhāgavatas.

52. The devotees of Viṣṇu as well as those who are devoutly attached to listening to the stories of the pious and who are of sāttvic temperament — all these are excellent Bhāgavatas.

53. Those excellent men who serve their parents regarding them (respectable) like the sacred river Gaṅgā and god Śiva, the ruler of the universe,are excellent Bhāgavatas.

54. Those who are engaged in the worship of gods and those who are helpmates or assistants in that worship, and those who appreciate the worship on seeing it, — all are excellent Bhāgavatas.

55. Those who are intent on serving the observers of religious vows and ascetics, and those who abstain from reviling others and entertaining contempt for them, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

56. Those excellent men who speak words beneficial to others and those who appreciate the merits of others in the world are indeed (regarded) as Bhāgavatas.

57. Those excellent persons who perceive all living beings like their own ātman and those who are equally disposed towards enemies as well as friends, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

58. Those who propound the sacred scriptures (dharma-śāstras) and those who are keen on making truthful statements and who render service to pious men, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

59. Those who give exposition of the purāṇas, those who listen to them and those who are devotees of the narrators of the purāṇas are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

60. Those persons who constantly render service to cows and Brâhmaṇas, and those who are interested in the pilgrimage to holy places, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

61. Those men who rejoice on seeing the prosperity of others, and those who are devoted to the repetitions of the name of Hari, are excellent Bhāgavatas.

62. Those who are interested in laying out parks and groves, those who maintain lakes in good repairs, and those who dig wells and tanks, are excellent Bhāgavatas.

63. Those who get big lakes and tanks constructed, those who build temples and those who are engaged (in repeating in undertone) the Gāyatri mantra[5] are excellent Bhāgavatas.

64. Those who feel overjoyed on hearing the names of Hari and appreciate the same and those who get their hair standing on the ends through joy, all over their body (at the mention of Hari's name), are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

65. Those men who bow down on seeing the grove of Tulasi[6] (basil) plants, and those who embellish their ears with Tulasī twigs are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas

66. Those men who are delighted on inhaling the fragrance of the Tulasī plant, or the soil at its root, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

67. Those who are engaged in conducting their lives according to their injunctions prescribed for their particular āśrama (stages in life), those who reverently receive and worship guests, and those who explain the meaning of the vedas, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

68. Those to whom god Śiva is dear, those who are devoted to Śiva, and those who revel in worshipping the feet of Śiva, and those who wear the tripuṇḍra mark (three horizontal parallel lines of ashes) on their foreheads, are indeed prominent Bhāgavatas.

69. Those who repeat the names of Hari as well as of god Śiva, the Supreme ātman, and those who are bedecked with Rudrākṣa-beads[7] are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

70. Those who worship the great god Śiva by means of sacrifices, with liberal sacrificial fees to the priests, or adore Hari the same way with great devotion, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

71. Those who expound the scriptures as known (to them to the best of their knowledge) to others and those who appreciate and assimilate only the good qualities everywhere, are indeed known as Bhāgavatas.

72. Those who regard god Śiva the great ruler of the world, and Viṣṇu the Supreme Soul, with equal attitude, are indeed spoken as Bhāgavatas.

73. Those who take delight in performing sacrificial rites in honour of Śiva and those who revel in the repetition of the mantra with five syllables (viz. Om Namaḥ Śivāya) and those who are engaged in contemplating god Śiva are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

74. Those who are engaged in serving waters to the thirsty, and those who are intent on catering the gifts of cooked food (to the hungry), and who observe the ekādaśī vow (consisting of complete fast and meditation on the eleventh day of each fortnight, as prescribed in the Śāstras) are indeed eminently good Bhāgavatas.

75. Those who take delight in gifting away cows and those who are interested in getting virgins married (at their own cost) and those who perform holy rites dedicating the fruits thereof unto me, are indeed excellent Bhāgavatas.

76. O Brâhmaṇa sage, some of the categories of Bhāgavatas have been mentioned by me here. It is impossible to recount them wholly even in hundreds and millions of years even by me.

77. Hence, O prominent Brâhmaṇa ! You also be well-behaved for all time to come, offering refuge to all beings, being a friend unto them, exercising self-control and ardently interested in dharma.

78. Until the end of this yuga, practice dharma in all respects, and be engaged in the meditation of my form (mūrti). You will thus attain to the highest nirvāṇa[8] (liberation).

79. After granting the boon thus to his devotee, the son of Mṛkaṇḍu, the Lord of the devas, the ocean of mercy, vanished then and there.

80. Mārkaṇḍeya, the extremely blessed sage, was always engrossed in devotion to Hari. He practised the great dharma and duly performed sacrifices.

81. He performed a great penance in the highly sacred place Śâlagrâma. After wiping of all the hoarded karmas (actions and their consequences) by means of meditation, he attained the great nirvāṇa.

82. Hence, a person who adores Hari, the benefactor of all creatures, undoubtedly attains whatever is mentally desired by him.

Sanaka said :

83. O excellent Brâhmaṇa ! In this way the greatness of devotion unto the Lord, about which a query was made by you, has been completely recounted by me in details. What else do you wish to hear.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Description of Mārkaṇḍeya's Life

1. The present chapter gives only a glimpse of Mārkaṇḍeya's life, viz, the vision of the end of the world and of god Viṣṇu as an infant lying on the leaf of a banyan tree, floating on the cosmic ocean. The object of this chapter is to detail, to Nārada, the characteristics of a true devotee of Viṣṇu in reply to his question in Supra 4.39-40. Though Mārkaṇḍeya is called 'a long-lived sage' in this ch. (v.2), the Bh.P. tells us that he was destined to die in boyhood, but he propitiated god Śiva and secured the life of 14 kalpas from him. (Bh.P. 4.1.45). The Mbh. shows him to have close contacts with Pāṇḍavas. The name of his wife was Dhūmorṇā (Mbh.Anu. 146.4.).

2. Jātakaṁ kārayāmāsa maṅgalaṁ vidhipūrvakam /

The term Jātaka seems to be used in the sense of jātakarma as required by the qualifying adjectives maṅgala (auspicious) and vidhi-pūrvaka (according to Śāstric injunctions). It is a rite of hoary antiquity as it is mentioned in Tait. Saṁhitā II.2.5.3-4. It was a common rite supported in various Gṛhya-sūtras e.g. Āpastamba 15.1.7, Āśvalāyana I.15.1-4, Khādira II.2.32-34, Pāraskara I 16, Hiraṇyakeśi II.3.2 II.4-5 and others. They differ inter se in minor details, but the main idea is to ensure the longevity and prosperity of the child by invoking divine grace. Thus, according to Āśvalāyana, the father, while giving ghee and honey with gold rubbed in it (probably in a golden spoon), utters the mantra investing the child with Veda (wisdom) and longevity (of hundred years). He touches the child's shoulders muttering the mantras to make them hard and powerful. A secret name is to be given to the child (by the father) on the very day of the birth of the child.

The original form and procedure has changed over the centuries and is influenced by custom in different states of India. The 'naming ceremony' has assumed a great importance now-a-days, and other formal rites e.g. homa, aṁsābhimarṣaṇa (touching the child on the shoulder, etc.) have been practically relegated to the past.

3. This implies the Markāṇḍeya Purāṇa. It is in the form of a conversation between Jaimini, the disciple of Vyāsa, and Mārkaṇḍeya, in which Mārkaṇḍeya solves some of the problems about the Mahābhārata, raised by Jaimini. It is a small work of 137 chapters (about 9000 verses). According to European scholars, it is an ancient and important work. The life and teachings of Madālasā, Durgā saptaśatī are some of the specially important topics in it. It was translated into English by Pargiter in the Bibliotheca Indica series Calcutta, 1888-1905.

4. There appear to be some divergent views about the calculation of time. Thus, the Bh.P. 3.11.5-8 gives the following measures of time :

2 paramāṇus = 1 aṇu;
3 aṇus = 1 trasareṇu:
3 trasareṇu = 1 truṭi;

100 truṭis	1 vedha;
3 vedhas	lava;
3 lavas	nimiṣa;
3 nimiṣas	kṣaṇa;
5 kṣaṇas	kāṣṭhā;
15 kāṣṭhās	laghu;
15 laghus	nāḍikā (or ghaṭikā); .
2 naḍikās	muhūrta
6 or 7 nāḍikās	yāma or prahara

The NP. gives the ving measures :

15 nimiṣas	kāṣṭhā
30 kāṣṭhās	kalā (= 8 seconds)
30 kalās	kṣaṇa (= 4 minutes)
6 kṣaṇas	1 ghaṭikā (= 24 minutes)
2 ghaṭikās	1 muhūrta (= 48 minutes)
30 muhūrtas	1 day (24 hours)
15 days	1 pakṣa
2 pakṣas	1 month = 1 day of Pitṛs
2 months	1 ṛtu (season)
3 ṛtus	1 ayana
2 ayanas	1 year = 1 complete day of gods, (uttarāyaṇa being the day-time and dakṣiṇāyana the night of gods)
1000 years of gods	1 kalpa
12 human yugas	1 yuga of gods
2000 celestial yugas	2 Brāhma kalpa
71 divine yugas	1 manvantara
14 manvantaras	1 day of god Brahmā 1000 caturyugis (cycles of 4 yugas) of men (?)
2 parārdhas	1 day of Viṣṇu (i.e. 12 hours of Viṣṇu)

Siddhānta-Śiromaṇi, a standard work on old astronomy, gives the calculation in human years (in kāla-mānādhyāya) as follows :

18 nimeṣas = 1 kāṣṭhā; 30 kāṣṭhās = 1 kalā; 30 kalās = 1 ghaṭi; 2 ghaṭis or 60 kalās = 1 muhūrta ; 60 ghaṭis = 30 muhūrtas = 1 day (24 hours) ; 15 days = 1 Pakṣa ; 2 pakṣas = 1 month ; 6 months = 1 ayana (dakṣiṇāyana = the night of gods; uttarāyaṇa = the day of gods)

2 ayanas = 1 year		= 1 complete day of gods.
30 (human)	years	= 1 month of gods.
360 (human)	years	= 1 year of gods.
96000? (human)	years	= 1000 years of gods (?) It is 360,000 human years ?
43,20,00,0	years	= caturyugi (a cycle of 4 yugas)
30,67,20,00	years	= 1 manvantara (or 71 caturyugi)
4,29,40,80,000	years	= 14 manvantaras
2,59,20,000	years	the twilight-time between the manvantaras
4,32,00,00,000	years	= 1 day of god Brahmā.

The night of god Brahmā is of the same duration.

It will be noted that the NP. and some other Purāṇas do not take into account the Twilight period of manvantaras and there is some confusion of terminology in Bh.P. & NP. Thus kṣaṇa in NP. is a bigger unit than kāṣṭhās, while in the Bh.P. 5 kṣaṇas make a kāṣṭhā. There is some confusion in the Bh.P. about the duration of yāma (3 hours) which is equated with 6 or 7 ghaṭikās. A critique of the 'astronomy' in purāṇas & siddhānta śiromaṇi and other works is beyond the scope of this note.

5. It is perhaps the most famous Ṛc in praise of the Sun god :

tat savitur vareṇyaṁ bhargo devasya dhīmahi dhiyo yo naḥ pracodayāt /

RV. 3.62.10, *Tait.S.*1.5.6.4, 4-1.11.1; *Vāj.S.*3.35, 22.9

and in a no. of Vedic works vide Bloomfield: Vedic Concordance, p. 392. It is designated as Sāvitrī or Gāyatrī throughout Vedic and Sanskrit literature.

6. Tulasī or the Basil plant.

This fragrant plant is regarded as the most beloved to god Viṣṇu. It is regarded as Mahālakṣmi, the divine consort of Viṣṇu who assumed the form of this plant.

According to Devī Bhāgavata, goddess Mahālakṣmī, in response to King Dharmadhvaja's penance, incarnated as his daughter 'Tulasī', and herself performed penance for obtaining Lord Viṣṇu as her husband, but was destined to become the wife of Kṛṣṇa's aṁśa Sudāman (who was then born as Śaṅkhacūḍa) for some time. Śaṅkhacūḍa was invincible because of Tulasī's chastity. Viṣṇu sent god Śiva to fight with Śaṅkhacūḍa, and himself went in the form of Śaṅkhacūḍa to Tulasī. Unsuspecting, she consented to her husband's wish for intercourse, but finding difference in his sexual approach, she jumped and before she could curse that imposter, Viṣṇu manifested himself and explained to her that Śaṅkhacūḍa who was Sudāman cursed by Rādhā, is now redeemed of the curse, and returned to Goloka, and that now she should give up her body transforming it into the river Gaṇḍaka (?) and Tulasī plant and return to Vaikuṇṭha. Since then the Tulasī plant is dear to Viṣṇu (Devībhāgavata 9—chs.17-75). She is called Tulasī as she was matchless (*Ibid.*9.25.24), and she is regarded as "the purifier of the universe", and "bestower of devotion to Hari and final emancipation" (*Ibid.*9 25.43). In Pd.P. Kriyā yogasāra khaṇḍa, ch.24, we have the glorification of the Tulasī sung in the exaggerated way of purāṇas as "absolvent of all sins", "healer from all ailments" (ibid.24.26) "yielding all wishes" (ibid 24.45), etc.

7. Rudrākṣa—Elaco carpus seed.

It is an instance of how popular etymologies became purāṇic stories. The word consists of two words Rudra & akṣa (eye). According to Devī Bhāgavata 11.4.7-10, god Śiva explains to Nārāyaṇa : "when gods approached me to kill Tripura, I sat contemplating, with my eyes open for 1000 divine years, how to kill him. From the strain, some tears dropped from my eyes, which were transformed into Rudrākṣas". Rudrākṣa beads are sacred to Śaivites as Tulasī beads to Vaiṣṇavites. The various varieties and the spiritual benefits accruing from using them are elaborated in the above work—Skandha 11 chs. 4, 5, 6, 7. The final benefit being :

rudrākṣa-dhāraṇāt sadyaḥ sarva-pāpaiḥ pramucyate /

—ibid. 11.7.42.

One is absolved of all sins by wearing the rudrākṣas.

8. nirvāṇa

The conceptions of nirvāṇa. vaikuṇṭha etc. are mixed up in purāṇas, the main idea being the cessation of rebirth or termination of saṁsāra, anāvṛtti as *Br.Sū.*4.4.22 puts it. The term nirvāṇa occurs in BG.2.72, 5.24, 25, 26 and need not be regarded as a borrowal from the Buddhists. The Buddhist nirvāṇa is not 'nothingness' or 'void', but an approach to the Vedantic concept of Mukti (R. D. Ranade—Vedanta, The culmination of Indian thought, pp. 156-57. Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, Bombay 1970.) But the purāṇic concept is a mixture of Dvaita and Advaita points of view, for sometimes the devotees are said to retain their individuality in Vaikuṇṭha.

CHAPTER SIX

The Glory of the Gaṅgā[1]

Sūta said :

1. On hearing the glorification of devotion unto the Lord, Nārada was pleased, and he again asked Sanaka, the master of spiritual knowledge and philosophy.

Nārada said :

2. O Master of interpreting scriptural precepts ! Kindly tell me the truth as to what is the excellent-most of all the places of pilgrimage and the sacred-most of all sacred spots.

Sanaka replied :

3. O Brāhmaṇa ! Listen to this utmost secret which bestows all riches and which is the holy thing that destroys the effects of evil dreams, and the auspicious thing that is conducive to virtue and destructive of sins.

4. This should be listened to even by sages. It for-ever wards off the influence of evil planets, subdues all ailments and causes longevity.

5. Great sages say that the confluence of the Gaṅgā and Yamunā[2] is the most excellent of all sacred spots, and the most sacred of all holy places.

6. All divinities headed by god Brahmā, all sages and all Manus, desirous of acquiring merits, resort to this sacred confluence of waters, with dark and white hues.

7. The Gaṅgā should be known as a merit-giving holy river since it has its source from the feet of Viṣṇu, O Brāhmaṇa, and the Yamunā[2] is born of the Sun. Hence their confluence is bound to be very auspicious.

8. O Sage, the Gaṅgā is the most distinguished of all rivers. When remembered, it destroys the distress and absolves the rememberers of all sins and removes all harms and injuries.

9. O great sage ! The holy place called Prayāga[3] should be known as the sacred-most, and the most meritorious of all the holy spots on the earth, delimited by the oceans.

10. It was here that god Brahmā performed a sacrifice to propitiate the Lord of the goddess Lakṣmī. All sages also similarly perform different sacrifices for him.

11. The meritorious ablutions in all other sacred waters (taken together) do not deserve to be even a fraction, one-sixteenth of the merits accrued from the ablution with a drop of water of the Gaṅgā.

12. Even a man staying a hundred yojanas away from the Gaṅgā and uttering repeatedly the name of Gaṅgā, is also released from all sins. What then of a person who actually performs ablution in the water of the Gaṅgā ?

13. The goddess (viz. the holy river Gaṅgā) originating from Viṣṇu's feet and held over the head respectfully by the Lord of the Universe (viz. Śiva), deserves to be resorted to by sages and gods. What need be said that it should be resorted to by hapless human beings ?

14. If the sand of the Gaṅgā is applied on the forehead by excellent persons, it should be known that a brilliant (third) eye[4] will be developed there beneath a crescent moon (the devotee will have a similarity of form like god Śiva).

15. Bath taken into the Gaṅgā is highly meritorious. It is difficult to have it even to the resident of celestial regions. It bestows the Sārūpya[5] (similarity in form) with Viṣṇu. What more can be said to be greater than this ?

16. Even sinners taking their bath there in the Gaṅgā become absolved of all their sins. Seated in a great aerial car, they proceed ahead to the highest region (Vaikuṇṭha).[6]

17. By taking their bath therein (in the Gaṅgā), noble-souled persons redeem thousands of members on the sides of their father's family and mother's family,, and go to the region of Viṣṇu.

18. O Brāhmaṇa ! There is no doubt in this that he who remembers the Gaṅgā attains the merit of performing ablutions in all the sacred waters and staying in all the holy places.

19. By the sight of a person who has taken a bath in the Gaṅgā, even a sinner attains to the celestial world. One should become over-Lord of gods merely by touching my body (i.e. the waters of the Gaṅgā).

20. The mud and dust from the root of the Tulasī plant, the foot of a Brāhmaṇa or from the bed of the river Gaṅgā confers upon people assimilation type of mukti-sārupyatā— (similarity of form) with Acyuta.

21. Extremely rare indeed are the following : viz. the Gaṅgā, the Tulasī plant, unflinching devotion to Hari and devoted attachment to the expounder of the Dharmas, (among the people).

22. A man endowed with devotion, who applies over his head the dust from the feet of the expounder of the sacred dharmas, or the dust and mud taken from the bed of the Gaṅgā, or from the root of the Tulasī plant, attains Viṣṇu's region.

23. He who ardently desires and yearns, "When shall I go to the Gaṅgā ? When shall I see that river ?", goes to the region of Viṣṇu.

24. It is not possible even for Viṣṇu to describe adequately the greatness of the Gaṅgā even in hundreds of years. Of what use is a garrulous talk by others, O Brāhmaṇa ?

25. It is exceedingly surprising that the Māyā deludes the entire universe, and that people do fall into the hell, despite the existence of the name of the Gaṅgā.

26. The name of the Gaṅgā is glorified as one that dispels the misery of the worldly existence. Similarly renowned is the plant Tulasī and devotion to the expounder of Hari's glory.

27. He who mentions, even for once, the two syllables Gaṅ-gā, becomes completely liberated from all sins, and goes to the region of Viṣṇu.

28. He who goes within three yojanas (one yojana = 12.8 km) of the Gaṅgā, becomes absolved from all sins, and attains to the region of the Sun.

29. The river Gaṅgā is highly meritorious. If resorted to, with great devotion, when the Sun is in Meṣa (the sign Aries of the Zodiac) and Tulā (Libra, the 7th sign of the zodiac as well as in the month of Mṛgaśirṣa, it sanctifies the entire universe.

30-31. There are many holy rivers, viz. the Godāvarī,[7] the Bhīmarathi,[8] the Kṛṣṇā,[9] the Revā,[10] the Sarasvatī,[11] Tuṅgabhadrā[12] the Kāverī,[13] the Kālindī,[14] the Bāhudā,[15] the Vetravatī,[16] the Tāmraparṇī,[17] the Sarayū,[18] etc. Among all these rivers, the Gaṅgā is remembered (in Smṛti works) as the holiest of all, O excellent Brāhmaṇa.

32. Just as the Omnipresent Viṣṇu stays, by pervading the whole of the universe, similarly, the Gaṅgā is all-pervading and destroys all sins.

33. The Gaṅgā is as if a nurse unto the universe. It sanctifies the world when bathed in it, or when its waters are drunk. Thus it is Pāvanī (purifier). What a pity, that it is not resorted to by men !

34. Vārāṇasī[19] is well-known as the holiest of all holy centres, and the sacred-most of all sacred spots. It is resorted to by all Devas.

35. Only those two persons are intelligent: learned and well informed, and the men of Vedic learning by whom the word Kāśi[20] is frequently heard.

36. O excellent Brāhmaṇa ! Those who remember the sacred place Avimukta[21] (i.e. Kāśī) shake off all their sins, and proceed to the region of god Śiva.

37. A man, even if standing at a distance of hundred yojanas from it, remembers the holy place avimukta, attains to the region of no ailment i.e. Mokṣa, although he may be full of many sins.

38. O Brāhmaṇa ! If at the time of breathing his last, a person remembers avimukta (at the last moment), he is released from sins and goes to the region of god Śiva.

39. The person enjoys the merits resulting from remembering Kāśī, in the heaven. At the end of that period, he is born as the sole emperor of the earth, and then after going to Kāśī, he attains salvation.

40. What need there is of a long exposition regarding the merits of Vārāṇasī ? The fulfilment of the four-fold aims of human life (Puruṣārthas) is not far from those who at least take the name of Kāśī.

41. The confluence of the Gaṅgā and the Yamunā is superior even to Kāśī, O Brāhmaṇa. For, merely by having a look at it, men reach the highest goal (Liberation).

42. If ablution is performed anywhere in the Gaṅgā when the Sun is in the Makara (capricorn) sign of the zodiac, it sanctifies the universe by a bath in it or by drinking its water.

it takes the whole universe to the capital of heaven (Indra's city)[23].

43. Even god Śaṅkara, the benefactor of the world who assumes the form of a liṅga,[23] is always devoted to the Gaṅgā. How can its greatness be adequately described ?

44. The Liṅga assumes the form of Hari. Lord Hari assumes the form of the Liṅga. There is not even the slightest difference between these two. One who differentiates between these, is a person of evil intellect.

45. Only sinners, immersed in the ocean of ignorance, seek to make any difference between Hari and Śaṅkara, the glorious Lords without beginning or end.

46. They (i.e. learned men) say that Lord Hari who is the ruler of all the worlds and the ultimate cause (of all the causes), assumes the form of Rudra at the end of the Yugas.

47. It is Lord Rudra who protects the entire universe in the form of Viṣṇu, and creates it assuming the form of Brahmā. In the final analysis, god Śiva alone is all these three.

48. The man who differentiates between Lord Hari, god Śiva and god Brahmā, goes to the exceedingly terrible hell.

49. This is the conclusion of all scriptures that he who sees Hara, Hari and Brahmā all constituting the same deity attains the supreme bliss.

50. God Viṣṇu (Janārdana) who is omniscient and beginningless, and who is the omnipresent Lord and Creator of the worlds, is ever present there (at Kāśī) in the form of a Liṅga.

51. The Liṅga of Lord Kāśī-Viśveśvara[24] is called Jyotir-liṅga. On seeing it, the excellent one of men merges in the supreme light of Brahman.

52. If Kāśī, the sanctifier of the three worlds, is circumambulated,[25] it is as good as the circle-ambulation of the whole earth consisting of seven continents, oceans and mountains.

53. There are spotless (brilliant) mūrtis (images) of Śiva or Acyuta made of metals, clay, wood or stone or their representations in paintings, etc. But Lord Hari is present in them all.

54. God Hari is present wherever there is a grove of Tulasi plants or where there is a cluster of lotuses, or where the purāṇas are being read, O Brāhmaṇa.

55. The propounder of the text of the purāṇas is also called Hari. Men who are devoted to them have (to their credit the merit of performing) bath in the Gaṅgā every day.

56. It is stated in Smṛtis that pious inclination to listen to the purāṇas is on a par with the ablutions in the Gaṅgā, and devotion unto the propounder is comparable to bath into Prayāga.

57. He who, by recounting the purāṇa dharmas, redeems and uplifts the entire world that is sunk and immersed in the ocean of worldly existence, is glorified as Hari himself.

58. There is no other sacred water like that of the Gaṅgā. There is no greater teacher than (honour, self-confidence. There is no other deity like Viṣṇu, and there is no other primary principle (or Brahman[26]) other than the spiritual preceptor.

59. Just as the Brāhmaṇa is the most excellent of all castes, or the moon is the best of all constellations, and just as the ocean is the best of all rivers, so the Gaṅgā is remembered as the greatest river.

60. There is no kinsman on a par with calmness; there is no greater penance than truthfulness : no other acquisition is greater than liberation from saṁsāra, and there is no other river on a par with the Gaṅgā.

61. The great name of the Gaṅgā is like a forest conflagration unto the jungle of sins. The Gaṅgā is the healer of the sickness called saṁsāra (worldly existence); hence, it should be resorted to with assiduity.

62. The Gāyatrī mantra and the river Gaṅgā both of these are remembered to be the destroyers of all sins, O Brāhmaṇa. A person who is lacking in devotion to these two, should be known as a fallen fellow, O Brāhmaṇa.

63. The Gāyatrī is the mother of all Vedic metres, the Gaṅgā is the mother of the world. Both of them are the cause of destruction of all sins.

64. If any one is favoured by Gāyatrī, the Gaṅgā too is pleased with him. Both of these possess the potency of Viṣṇu and both equally bestow desired objects as well as renown.

65. Both of them are quite pure. They are, as it were, the fructification of the Puruṣārthas (desired objectives of human life, viz. righteousness, wealth, love and liberation from saṁsāra).

These great and excellent ones function for conferring blessings on the world.

66. Rare indeed and very difficult to attain are the Gāyatrī, the Gaṅgā, devotion to the Tulasī plant and devotion of Sāttvic nature to Hari.

67. O ! How blessed is the Gaṅgā ! On being remembered, it destroys sins, on being seen it bestows the region of Hari. When its water is drunk, it grants sārūpya (similarity of form like Viṣṇu). And men who perform ablutions therein, attain the excellent region of Viṣṇu.

68. God Nārāyaṇa, the Creater of the Universe, Vāsudeva, the eternal deity, is the bestower of the fruits of all desired objects, to persons who are devoted to regular ablutions in the waters of Gaṅgā.

69. The excellent person who is sprinkled with at least a drop of water of Gaṅgā, is liberated from all sins and he attains the highest region, Vaikuṇṭha.

70. It is only by taking in just a drop of its water that a descendant in the family of King Sagara,[27] eschewed the state of Rākṣasa and attained to the supreme region.

CHAPTER SIX

The Glory of the Gaṅgā

1. The Gaṅgā

The holiest of the rivers in India. It is eulogized since Vedic times (e.g. RV. 10.75.5, Tait. Ār. 10.1.13, Mahānārāyaṇa Up. 5.4) The Mbh & VR are full of semi-historical legends about it e.g. Gaṅgā's marriage with king Śantanu (Mbh. ādi.chs 96 to 98). King Bhagīratha's success in bringing down the Gaṅgā on the earth (Mbh. Vana. chs 108, 109, VR. Bāla cantos 43, 44 Bd.ch.97) seems to be a saga of the attempts of 3 generations of kings of Ayodhyā to irrigate the parched plains of the U.P. in their kingdom. During the course of flowing, the river was swallowed up and allowed to flow by king Jahnu, and hence it came to be known as his daughter Jāhnavī. This is an allegorical description of the major changes in the course of the river. There are six Jahnu-āśramas, e.g. 1st, at Bhairavaghati near Gangotri at the confluence of the Bhāgīrathī and the Jāhnavī; the 2nd at Kanauj, the last being at Jamnagar 4 miles to the West of Nadia (De-GDAMI 61-62). The description of the descent of the Gaṅgā (Bh.P. 5.17.2-9 & Mbh Bhiṣma 6.88-50) is a traditional memory of the land which the Indo-Aryans left behind in some ancient past, where from 'mount Meru' (prob. Pamirs), big rivers like the Sītā, the Alakanandā, the Cakṣu and the Bhadrā flowed in four directions. Geographers have now identified them and have shown that there is much truth in the racial memory couched in poetical terms in Purāṇas (vide N.L. De GDAMI under respective heads; also D. P. Misra—Proto-history of India).

The Gaṅgā came to be regarded so holy unanimously, due to the purity of its water, which does not deteriorate even after long storage. The scientists and engineers of the Roorkee university have experimentally shown that this is due to the presence of (1) radio-active-minerals, (2) bacteriophages and (3) metallic compounds in the river-bed which possess bacteri-cidal properties (The Sunday Standard, Bombay dt. 26-9-76, p.8). The ancient Hindus discovered this undeteriorating quality of the Gaṅgā water by their experience, and it has been the practice in many homes to keep vases or container of the Gaṅgā water for daily worship, and to use it to purify a dying person of sins, by pouring some drops of Gaṅgā-water in his mouth. This purity led to the belief that not only bath in the Gaṅgā or drinking a few drops of its water, but even remembering the name of the river had sanctifying influence. Most of the Purāṇas contain some verses or chapters on the glorification of Gaṅgā or Gaṅgā-māhātmya. As expected, some verses are common to many Gaṅgā-māhātmyas.

2. Yamunā or Kālindī

Next to the Gaṅgā, the Yamunā is regarded as the No. 2 holy river in India. It is mentioned along with the Gaṅgā since-Vedic Times (vide Gaṅgā above). It is regarded as the daughter of the-Sun-god and Yama's sister (DeviP. ch. 45). It rises in Kālinda-giri (a portion of the 'bandara-puccha'—mountain, De—GDAMI, p. 215), and hence is called Kālindī. The comparatively dark colour of its waters is attributed to the bath of god Śiva who, after the death of his first wife Satī, was in an excited mood, in which condition, being shot at by Kāmadeva (Cupid), became intolerably troubled and jumped into the Yamunā to extinguish the fire of his agony, changing the colour of its water to darkness (Vāmana P. ch. 6). The association of Kṛṣṇa's līlās (sports) on its banks, and his rāsa līlā with gopīs (which some believe continues unending), has immortalised the river in the hearts of Indians. It, being a very sacred river since the Vedic times, kings like Ambariṣa, Bharata, Śantanu performed sacrifices on its bank (Mbh. vana chs 90, 129, 162; Droṇa 68.8). Its confluence with the Gaṅgā at Prayāga (Allahabad) made it a highly sacred place to Hindus.

3. Prayāga.

Modern Allahabad. A very sacred place due to the confluence of the two holiest rivers—the Gaṅgā and the Yamunā. The Sarasvatī is supposed to join this confluence and hence it is called triveṇī-saṅgama. According to Mbh, at Prayāga deities right from Brahmā, guardians of the world and the cardinal points (Lokapāla, Dikpāla), pitṛs (manes) great sages, Nāgas and even god Mahāviṣṇu are present here. If one bathes at the triveṇī confluence one gets the merit of performing the horse-sacrifice and the Rājasūya together. (Vana 85.70-86).

Purūravas, the son of Ilā, probably the leader of the earliest Indo-Aryan colonizers from Ilāvarta selected this then strategically important site and established his capital here. It was then called Pratiṣṭhāna—a permanent settlement. Here Nahuṣa, Yayāti, Puru, Duṣyanta and Bharata reigned (Brahma P. Chs 10-12). This place is now called Jhusi, and is a part of the precincts of Prayāga. This sacred place is highly praised in Pd.P. Svarga khaṇḍa, chs 41,42,43. Km P. regards this as "the most blessed, heaven-giving, auspicious, meritorious and sanctifying" of all sacred places (1.38.12), and recommends that death at Prayāga leads to the highest region (Ibid. V.5). There is the celebrated Akṣaya Vaṭa (undecaying banyan tree) in the fort which Akbar built in 1581 A.D. on the ruins of a Hindu fort. Pd.P. Svarga 43.11 recommends death at the foot of this tree. According to Hiuen Tsiang, people used to end their life at this banyan tree for attaining heaven. The Khairha plate of Yaśaḥ-Karṇadeva (1073 A.D.) records that king Gāṅgeya obtained release along with his 100 wives at the famous banyan tree of Prayāga.

Prāpte prayāga-vaṭa-mūlaniveśa-bandhau
Sārdhaṁ śatena gṛhiṇībhir amutra muktim

Ep. Indi.XII. 205 p.211.

Prayāga still holds powerful influence on all religious minded Hindus.

4. The eye on the forehead

The identification of Rudra and Fire—Sacrificial fire in later Vedic times, seems to have transferred The Kapālāgni, fire on the circular earthen plate for baking Purodāś which is kept near the yajña-kuṇḍa, to the Kapāla (forhead of śiva as Kapāla means both 'earthen plate' and 'a forehead'. But according to Purāṇas, God Śiva has three eyes, the two normal eyes are the sun and the moon, and the third eye is the Fire-god. He opens it only to destroy the enemy (like Kāmadeva) or the universe. Although popular belief attributes the opening of the third eye of fire due to the playful shutting of his two eyes by his divine consort Pārvatī. Mbh.Anu, 140.33-38 attributes the fire to Nārāyaṇa which after burning (a part of) the Himalaya subsided and submitted itself at Kṛṣṇa's feet. In NP. this reference is to glorify the efficacy of the application of the sand of the Gaṅgā to one's forehead as it gives the applier sārūpya (similarity of form) like god Śiva.

5. Sārūpya

This is a type or state of Liberation in which the liberated soul has the appearance or form like the deity. The Bh.P. enumerates five such types as follows :

sārṣṭi-sārūpya-sālokya-sāmīpyaikatvam apyuta /

Out of these, sālokatā—residence in the same region of the Deity (e.g. Vaikuṇṭha, Kailāsa), samīpatā—Being in the proximity of the Deity, sarūpatā or sārupya—as above, sāyujyatā—Intimate union or absorption into the Deity, sārṣṭitā or sārṣṭya—is the last stage consisting of equality with the Supreme Being in power and all the divine attributes of the Deity.

6. Vaikuṇṭha

The region of Mahāviṣṇu (Bh. P.9.4.60). The Vedic seers regarded Viṣṇu's place as supreme and glowing like an extensive 'eye' in heaven (RV. 1.22.20) and contains the eternal source of honey (RV.1.154.5). Its location was high up in the sky. The Bh.P. thinks that it is beyond the three worlds, and is endowed with innate splendour. It has elaborated and remodelled earlier ideas about the abode of Viṣṇu. The Vaikuṇṭha dhāman is the highest region of Viṣṇu endowed with an outer garden called-Naiḥśreyas. It is liberation incarnate and has the privilege of simultaneous revelry of all the six seasons bursting upon the wish-yielding tree. It abounds in singing birds, golden chariots, women with explosive beauty and captivating smiles yet evoking no baser passions, etc. (Bh.P.3.15. 16-22 also vide 2.9. 10-17). Later purāṇas like Pd.P. Svarga khaṇḍa regarded it as situated on a higher plane than the region of Brahmā and is 18 crore yojanas (=144 crores of miles) far above the earth.

bhūr-lokāt-parisaṅkhyātaḥ koṭir aṣṭādaśa prabho /

(vide Śabda-kalpa-druma IV.p.507). It is called Vaikuṇṭha as it is a stage of existence free from worldly limitations (kuṇṭhā).

7. The Godāvarī

Also called the Gautamī, as the sage Gautama brought down the Gaṅgā to redeem him from cow-slaughter. It rises in Nasik district near a village, Tryambak, famous for the jyotir-liṅga 'Tryambakeśvara'. Rāma, along with his consort Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa, is said to have stayed for the most part of their exile at Pañcavaṭī near Nasik (Mbh.Vana 277.41 also VR.Araṇya Kāṇḍa). Every twelfth year, when the planet Jupiter is in the Leo sign of the Zodiac, thousands of pilgrims from all parts of India flock to bathe in the Godāvarī near Trymbak and Nasik. It flows through Maharashtra and Andhra Pradesh and falls into the Bay of Bengal near Rajamahendrī.

The Mbh. regards it as one of the holiest rivers in India and bath in it confers the fruit of go-medha and life in the region of Vāsuki (Mbh. Vana 85.33, 88.2), and bath in the Godāvarī at Janasthāna (Nasik) bestows one with royal fortune (Mbh.Anu 25.29).

8. The Bhīmarathī

Also called Bhīmarathā and Bhīmā? The Mbh regards it as one of the holiest rivers in India which absolves one of all sins (Vana 88.3 Bhīṣma 9.20). It rises near Bhīmāśaṅkara, one of the twelve jyotir-liṅgas, in the Western Ghats, in Poona District and joins the Kṛṣṇā near Raychur. The famous Vaiṣṇavite centre Pandharpur and the sacred shrine of Viṭṭhala is on the bank of the Bhīmarathī which, due to its crescent shape there, is called Candrabhāgā. Balarāma had visited this place during his pilgrimage (Bh.P. 10.79.12).

9. The Kṛṣṇā—

The river is mentioned in the Mbh. Bhīṣma 9.33, Bh.P. 5.19.18, VR. Kiṣkindhā 4). It rises at Mahabaleśvara in Western Ghats in Satara district, flows through Maharashtra, Karnatak and Andhra Pradeśa and falls into the Bay of Bengal at Sippelar near Masulipatam (De—GDAMI, p. 104). In purāṇas it is always associated with the Veṇā, Veṇṇā, Veṇṇī, or the Veṇvā and the Mbh. Vana 85.37-38 states that bath at the devahrada (prob. confluence) of the Kṛṣṇā and Veṇṇā confers the memory of one's previous births, D.C. Sircar is not correct when he says, 'The Veṇvā is the modern Varṇā running between the Satara and Kolhapur districts GAMI. (Studies in The Geography of Ancient and Medieval India, p. 59).

Apart from the name of Satara dist. instead of that of Sangli for the location of the Vārṇā, the main fact remains that there is a river called the Veṇṇā in Satara district—a sister of the Kṛṣṇā as its source is the same—which joins the Kṛṣṇā in Satara district.

The late Prof. Dr. (Mrs.) Irawati Karve, from the Deccan College, Poona, told me that on sociological grounds the Kanhan and the Benna from Vidarbha have a better claim to be ancient Kṛṣṇā and Veṇṇā, as the culture of the people in the present Kṛṣṇā—Veṇṇā valley is pro-Dravidian, and the derivation Kanhan<Kṛṣṇā and Bennā<Veṇṇa is quite plausible.

10. The Revā

So called because of the roaring sound created by its current while breaking its way through the Amarkantaka mountain.

bhitvā śailaṁ ca vipulaṁ prayātyevaṁ mahārṇavam / bhrāmayantī diśaḥ sarvā raveṇa mahatā purā // plāvayantī virājantī tena Revā iti smṛtā //
—Sk.P. V. Revā khaṇḍa 6.37-38

In fact, the major part of the Revā khaṇḍa naturally glorifies the Revā or Narmadā. The Bh.P. distinguishes between the Revā and the Narmadā (Bh.P. 5.19.18). Sk.P. (1.1.31.103, *V.*1.56.6 and I.1.18.153) reconciles this by stating that though the Revā and the Narmada were originally different, they joined together and formed the Southern Gaṅgā. It forms the traditional boundary between the North and South India (Bh.P. 5.19.18). It rises in the Amarkaṇṭak hills and falls into the Gulf of Cambay near Broach. Maheshwar (ancient Māhiṣmati of king Sahasrārjuna, a Jyotir-liṅga, Omkāra Māndhātā , are on its bank. It is regarded as highly meritorious to go round the course of this river. *Pd.P.Svarga.*chs 17-22. glorify the Narmadā. Balarāma visited this river during his pilgrimage (Bh.P. 10.79.21).

11. The Sarasvatī

Though now practically non-existent in its pristine glory, the Sarasvatī is a very famous river from the Vedic times and is mentioned in RV. 6.61, 7.95.1-2, 10.17.7-9. From RV.7.95.1-2, it appears to be a mighty river flowing to the Arabian sea. It rises in the Sirmur hills of the Siwalik range in the Himalayas. The fountain—the source of the river—was at the foot of a Plakṣa (Indian fig.) tree, and it became known as Plakṣāvataraṇa or Plakṣa-prasravaṇa, now a place of pilgrimage. It emerges into the plain at Ād-Badri in the Ambala District. It disappears at Chalaur, but reappears at Bhavānī-pura; then it disappears at Balchappar, but again appears at Bara Khera. It is later joined by the Mārkaṇḍā at Urnali near Pehoa and the joint stream under the name Sarasvatī falls into the Ghaggar which is believed to have the name Sarasvatī in ancient times.

Vedic seers prayed the river for glorious treasures, and milk, and wished to stay on her banks for ever. The Atharva veda describes Maruts ploughing barley on its banks. The spread of Aryan culture from the land of the Sarasvatī to Kosala is symbolically described in the Śatapatha I.4.1.10 ff. as the carrying of sacrificial fire by Videgha Māthava to the east. The Mbh. and the purāṇas speak of its disappearance at Vinaśana-tīrtha near Sirsa. It is associated with sages Dadhīca (Mbh.Vana 100.13,) Vasiṣṭha (Śalya 42.29) and Vyāsa (Bh.P. I.1.4.15.4-15). Sacrifices were performed on its banks by kings like Matināra (Ādi 95.26-27), Yayāti, Nahuṣa, Puru and later by Kṛṣṇa. Vidura and Balarāma visited it as pilgrims (Bh.P. 3-1.22 & 10.78.18). After the death of Kṛṣṇa, his 16000 wives drowned themselves to death in the Sarasvatī (Mbh.Svarga 5.25). The archaeological explorations of the Sarasvatī—Ghaggar—Hakra bed proved that the Vedic and epic tradition about the Sarasvatī being once a mighty river with a continuous and perennial flow down to the Arabian Sea, is correct. According to the evidence available, the river dried up due to serious seismic disturbances towards the end of the Vedic period. The hydrographical and archaeological investigations by Suraj Bhan have shown that in the late Harappan times, the desiccation of the river had already started resulting in the shifting of her settlements to the upper valley (The Sunday Standard, Bombay 19-9-76). Hence the fervent prayers in Vedas not to deprive the seer of its water. Purāṇic stories of Sarasvatī carrying Vaḍavānala to the sea, and her disappearance through the fear of being touched by Ābhīras and other wild tribes.

The rejuvenation of the Sarasvatī by diverting surplus waters of the Yamunā, Rākhī and other rivers would transform the desert of Rajasthan into a granary of India.

12. The Tuṅgabhadrā

A trībutary of the Kṛṣṇā. It is due to the confluence of two rivers, the Tuṅgā and the Bhadrā (at Kudali in Shimoga dist., Karnatak) that the river came to be called Tuṅgabhadrā. It joins the Kṛṣṇā beyond Curnool. The ancient Kiṣkiṇḍhā of Sugriva was situated on its bank. It is also called Tuṅga-veṇī (Mbh.Bhīṣma 9.27) and is a very holy river (*Bh.P.*5.19.18).

13. The Kāverī

One of the holiest rivers in India. It rises from a fountain Candra Tīrtha (KP.2.37) in the Brahmagiri mountain in Coorg. Famous sacred places like Śriraṅgam, Trichanapalli and Kumbhakoṇam are on its banks. The Kaveri falls at Śiva samudra are famous for natural beauty. According to Sk.P. God Śiva gave this river to sage Agastya who carried it in his Kamaṇḍalu (a water-bowl of gourd), and while Agastya was deep in meditation at Brahmagiri, Gaṇapati, at the request of Indra, upset the bowl and secured the river for the parched region of South India. (Mentioned as a very holy river in Mbh. Vana 85.12 and Bh.P. 5.19.18).

14. The Kālindī

15. The Bāhudā

Modern scholars differ on its identification. Pargiter identifies it with the Rāmagaṅgā which joins the Gaṅgā near Kanauj (His. *MK.P.*ch. 57). De regards it as Dhavalā (modern Dhumelā or Buḍhī Rāptī) a tributary of the Rāptī (GDAMI, p.16). The sage Likhita got his arm restored by bathing in this river; hence it is called arm-giver or Bāhudā—(*Mbh. Śānti.*23.39-40). Gaurī, wife of king Prasenajit was cursed by her husband and was transformed into a river called Bāhudā. Observance of fast and celibacy for one night on this river confers a godhood in heaven (Mbh. Vana 84.67-68; 95.4).

16. The Vetravatī

Modern Betwā, a tributary of the Yamunā. A river of all India importance (Mbh.Bhīṣma 16-19).

17. The Tāmraparṇī.

Also the Tāmbraparṇī, Tāmbravari. It rises in the Agastya-kūṭa mountain, and joins the gulf of Manar celebrated for pearlfishery. Pandyan king Malayadhvaja stayed after retirement from kingship here (Bh.P. 4.28.35, 5.19.18).

18. The Sarayū

The Ghagra or Gogra in Oudh on which Avodhya was situated. The river rises in Kumaun and after its confluence with the Kālī-nadī, it is called the Śarayū or 'Ghagra'. According to Mbh, it is one of the seven streams of the Gaṅgā (Ādi 169.20-21). Vasiṣṭha brought it to the Mānasa lake whence it dashed forth as the Sarayū from that lake (Anu. 155.23-24). From a Tīrtha called Gopratāra in Sarayu, Rāma along with all his followers, went to His highest abode. Mere remembrance of the river sanctifies a person (Anu. 165.21).

19. Vārāṇasī

Also known as Kāśī, Avimukta-kṣetra, Mahāśmaśāna, Rudra-kṣetra or Ānandavana in Purāṇas.

It is the holiest town in India where two great religions Hinduism (Brāhmanism) and Buddhism flourished. Originally Vārāṇasī was the capital of the ancient State (Janapada) Kāśī and is so mentioned in the Mahāgovinda Suttanta in Dīgha Nikāya II.235 (also vide the Aṅguttara Nikāya (I.213, IV. 252, 256) and the Bhagavatī— XV. Uddesa I) The name is derived from the river-names the Varunā (Vāraṇā) and Āsī which join there, and the myth of one king Banār giving his name to Benares is an instance of popular etymology. Kāśis the early Aryan settlers, selected this then strategically important site, due to the protection afforded by the rivers the Gaṅgā, the Varunā and the Āsī against the hostile aboriginals, and an all the year round safe route of communications with the Aryan colonies to their West. Havel in his Benares, the sacred city states that Vārāṇasī might have been the centre of primitive Sun-worship, and Brāhmaṇas glorified it in all their purāṇas and the Skandha purāṇa devoted one full book (Part IV) as Kāśī khaṇḍa for describing all the sacred places and legends connected with Kāśī. The Buddha selected Vārāṇasī for his 1st sermon—'setting the wheel of dharma in motion', and the Aśokan Stūpa at Sāranāth commemorates the site of the 1st sermon of the Buddha. Pārśvanātha, the historical founder of Jainism belonged to Vārāṇasī. This glory of Vārāṇasī attracted Muslim invasions which razed to the ground its ancient glory. It, however, continued to be the centre of learning despite political and religious troubles, and great saints like Caitanya, Rāmānanda, Vallabha, Kabīr, Ekanāth, Tulasīdās visited the place and settled there for some part of their life and some permanently. In the 18th century, the Marathas who controlled the Moghul rulers of Delhi, used their influence in the rebuilding of ancient shrines and religious institutions thereof, and the present temple of Viśvanātha was built by Rani Ahilya Bai of Indore in 1777. It is hoped that Vārāṇasī may regain its ancient glory in the post-independence period.

20. Kāśī

Though Kāśī is identified with Vārāṇasī here, it is originally the name of a state (Janapada) colonised by an Indo-Aryan tribe Kāśis. Kāśi as a Janapada is recorded in Brahmanical, Buddhist and Jain sources as mentioned above. The Kāśi clan of Aryans seems to be allied with the Kassites who conquered Babylon in 1700 B.C., even though the Aryanisation of the region called Kāśī was at a later Vedic period. Kāśi (and its joint name Kāśī-kosala) often occurs in the Brāhmaṇa period. It was an independent state at the time of the Buddha, but soon after submitted to and formed a part of the empire of Magadha. As noted above Vārāṇasī was its capital but today both are the parts of the same city-complex. The author of Skandapurāṇa is conscious of the bigger geographical extent of Kāśī and calls that section of Skanda Purāṇa as Kāśī-khaṇḍa and not Vārāṇasī-māhātmya or some such name. Now, most of us regard Kāśī and Vārāṇasī as identical.

21. Avimukta

As per SKP.IV. (Kāśikhaṇḍa) i.39.71-78 God Śiva manifested himself here and did not leave the place and that the sight of the liṅga confers complete liberation from Saṁsāra. Hence, the significance of the name avimuktaka.

22. It is called Amarāvatī.

23. Liṅga

The word means 'a distinguishing mark' 'characteristic' and is used in this sense by all Brāhmaṇa and non-Brāhmaṇa śāstric writers e.g. Br.Sū.4.1.2 liṅgâcca. For stating nudity as the distinguishing mark of a Śramaṇa, Kundakunda (in Pravacanasāra 3.25) says : uvayaraṇam jiṇamagge liṅgaṁ jaha-jadarūvam idi bhaṇitaṃ The Śiva-liṅga is the symbol of the sacrificial fire ablaze. Rudra is identified with the Fire in RV.2.1.6, 3.2.5. etc. in AV.7.87.1. and in the Tait.Saṁhitā 5.4.3.1 etc. The 8 epithets Śarva, Bhava, Paśupati, etc. are common to Rudra and Agni (AV.15.5.1-7, Śatapatha Br.1.7.3.8). The burial of skulls of animals under some sacrificial altars explains his epithets as "dweller in crematory", "five-facedness" etc. if Tait. Saṁhitā 5.7.10.1 is properly explained. The Liṅga as a 'phallic symbol' shows the ignorance of the Vedic identification of Rudra and the Sacrificial fire. It may be noted that some female deities e.g. Madālasā, the divine spouse of Khaṇḍobā—an incarnation of god Śiva, has a Liṅga as her representation, along with that of her spouse Śiva or Khāṇḍobā. Śiva Liṅgas are found on the heads of gods like Viṭṭhala of Pandharpur and goddesses like Viśālākṣī. G.B. Dandage of Kolhapur in his Rudra, Yajña āṇi Śiva-liṅga (Kolhapur 1970) has made out a good case about the identity of Rudra and Sacrificial fire and shown the weakness of the Phallic worship theory.

24. Kāśī Viśveśvara :

The presiding Deity of Kāśī and the main Jyotir-liṅga in the 12 Jyotir-liṅgas in India, it is glorified very highly in the Kāśī Khaṇḍa (Sk.P. IV.ii.ch.99) according to which it is the Liṅga par excellence (ibid verse 51). It means, to the best of the knowledge of the author of Sk.P. Kāśī khaṇḍa, god Śiva is represented in the form a liṅga at this place since time immemorial. The facts are otherwise. In the 7th cent. A.D., when Hiuen Tsiang visited the place, there was an august brass statue of about 100 feet height of god Mahādeva. To quote his words : "The statue of Deva Maheśvara, made of brass, is somewhat less than 100feet high. Its appearance is grave and majestic, and it appears as though really living." The iconoclastic fervour of Muslims razed important Hindu statues, images, shrines and the stones were used to construct their mosques and buildings even as far as Jaunpur (N.L. De-GDAMI, pp. 23-25). The fortunes of this god had their ups and downs, as Vārāṇasī changed hands from Hindus to Buddhists, ultimately to rest for sometime with the Hindu kings of Kanauj. But the temple and the Deity suffered worst at the hands of Muslims, in spite of attempts of Hindu chiefs under Moghuls, like Raja Todarmal and Hindu religious leaders. Sikhs and Marathas sealed the fate of the Moghul empire, and a Maratha queen Rani Ahilyabai Holkar of Indore built the present temple of Kāśī Viśveśvara in 1777.

25. Kāśī-pradakṣiṇā

This is a religious custom to show respect to a sacred place, shrine or town in which the Deity is situated. It consists of circumambulating the sacred object showing our right side to the deity after saluting it.

prasārya dakṣiṇaṁ hastaṁ svayaṁ namra-śiraḥ punaḥ / dakṣiṇaṁ darśayan pārśvam manasā'pi ca dakṣinaḥ //

Kālikā and other purāṇas quoted in Śabda-kalpa-druma Part III.pp.273-74.

26. tattva=Brahman, paramātmā.

27. King Sagara SKD (Śabda-kalpa-druma) Vol.II.p. 581.

A king worth remembering at dawn and dusk (*Mbh.Anu.*165.49) Posthumous son of king Bāhuka of the Ikṣvāku dynasty who, being deprived of his kingdom by Tālajaṁghas lived in exile in a forest near the hermitage of sage Aurva. His younger wife Yādavī who was pregnant, wanted to immolate herself after Bāhuka's death, but was prohibited from doing so by Aurva who told her that, the child in her womb, was destined to be an emperor of the world. The senior queen who was issueless became jealous of her younger co-wife and administered poison to her, with a view to kill the child in its embryonic stage. But as fortune would have it, a son along with the poison (sagara) was born. (Bm.P. 2.3.48-49). The child grew up in Aurva's hermitage and presumed Aurva to be his father. The mother told him the story of her life, and Sagara determined to reconquer Ayodhyā. In the meanwhile, Vasiṣṭha and the citizens of Ayodhyā whose struggle of liberation was going on, got a leader in Sagara, and he reconquered his father's kingdom and ruled at Ayodhyā.

Sagara subdued the Tālajaṅghas and became the absolute monarch of the world. From his queen Sumati, he had a son Asamañjasa who troubled his subjects, and was exiled for that. He had 60,000 sons from the lump of flesh delivered by his second wife Keśinī.

Sagara performed 99 horse-sacrifices, but when he was to perform the 100th sacrifice, Indra, being afraid of losing his position, stole the horse and kept it near sage Kapila's hermitage in the nether world. Sagara's 60000 sons traced the horse by means of its hoof-prints, and dug down to Pātāla. The horse was near the hermitage of Kapila, who was immersed in meditation. Thinking him to be the horse-thief, they attacked him only to get reduced to ashes. (Mbh. Vana 107.33).

Sagara retired making Aṁśumān, the son of prince Asamañjasa, as the next (MBH. Vana 107.64) king and performed penance for bringing down the Gaṅgā on the ashes in Aurvāśrama. (Bh.P.9.8.5-31). He was strictly Vegetarian (Mbh.Anu. 115.66).

CHAPTER SEVEN

The Glory of the Gaṅgā (contd.)

Nārada enquired :

1. O excellent sage ! It behoves you to relate to me who this Sagara was, and which descendant of the family of Sagara, was freed from the state of being a Rākṣasa (demon).

Sanaka narrated :

2. O prominent sage ! Listen to the pre-eminent greatness of the Gaṅgā, by mere contact with whose sacred waters, the whole dynasty of Sagara was sanctificd, and attained the region of Viṣṇu, which is the excellent-most of all excellences in the world, O Brāhmaṇa !

3. In the Solar race, there was born a king named Bāhu[1], the son of king Vṛka. Exclusively devoted to righteousness in duty, he enjoyed and ruled the whole earth righteously.

4. The Brāhmaṇas, the Kṣatriyas, the Vaiśyas, the Śūdras and other living beings were established by him in their respective dharmas (duties). King Bāhu was (in the real sense of the term) the Lord of the subjects. (viśāmpati).

5. In each of the seven continents[2] (of the earth), he performed seven horse-sacrifices. He propitiated (to their heart's content) the Brāhmaṇas by means of cows, lands, gold, garments and such other gifts.

6. As per advice given in the treatises on politics, he subdued and controlled the enemies, as he pleased. He considered himself as having achieved his ambition in life by removing the troubles and miseries of others.

7. The people in his land always offered exquisite sandlewood as gifts. All the people in his kingdom were bedecked in very costly (divine) ornaments, and they were happy, O Sage.

8-9. The earth yielded rich food-grains without being ploughed. It was full of fruits and flowers. The king of the devas showered rain on the earth at the proper time, O excellent sage. In time of calamities, due to indulgence in unrighteousness, the subjects were protected as per dharma (duties of kingship).

10. Once, great arrogance which is destructive of all riches and the cause of transgressions and failures, and which was accompanied by jealousy, took possession of that king.

11. "I am the monarch, the powerful protector of all the worlds. I am the performer of great sacrifices. Who else is more worthy of being worshipped than I ?

12. I am affluent and clever. All enemies have been subdued by me. I am the knower of the principles (the real knowledge) of the Vedas, and of the ancillaries of Vedas (Vedāṅgas), and am expert in the science and art of politics.

13. I am invincible. Unchallengeable and unthwarted is my Lordship (Supremacy). Who else is superior to me in this world ?" As arrogance increased in him, he became also jealous of others.

14. O excellent sage ! As sequel to jealousy, passion too crept into that king. When all these possess a man, he undoubtedly goes to ruin.

15. Youth, affluence, power and authority as well as indiscretion—even one of these is sure to bring about mishaps and ruin. What then, when all these four operate collectively ?[a]

16. O Brāhmaṇa ! The jealousy that held sway over him was very great. It was antagonistic to all his worldly interests, was destructive of all his riches and even of his physical body.

17. If wealth begins to over-influence a person whose mind is affected by envy, know that it is like the fire in combination with gusts of wind which consume husk.

18. Neither here nor hereafter can there be any happiness to persons whose minds are affected by jealousy, whose conduct of life is full of hypocrisy, and who always use harsh words.

19. To men of harsh speech whose minds are possessed of jealousy, even the beloved wife, the sons or other kith and kin are enemies.

20. If anyone harbours in his mind any lustful desire on seeing another man's wife that is nothing but an axe that brings about the destruction of all his riches. There is no doubt about this.

21. O sage ! If a man wishes to attempt to bring about the destruction of his own well-being that man of crooked intellect harbours malicious thoughts on seeing the good of others.

22. O Brāhmaṇa ! If a man feels inclined to incur the loss of friendship, progeny, house, landed property, riches, food grains, etc., and cattle and other animals, he may very well indulge in jealousy all along.

23. As his mind was possessed of jealousy and he became more impudent, the powerful kings of Haihaya[4] and Tālajaṅgha[5] families became his enemies.

24. If the Lord of Lakṣmī is favourable to any one, his fortune flourishes, but if he is adverse to him, his fortune dwindles down.

25. O Nārada ! Sons, grand-sons, riches, food-grains, homestead, etc. favour one, only as long as the Lord of Lakṣmī casts favourable side-glances mercifully.

26. O prominent Brāhmaṇa ! Even the foolish, blind, deaf and stupid persons become heroic, praise-worthy and discriminating, if they are glanced at favourably by Mādhava, the Consort of Lakṣmī.

27. There is no doubt that the good fortune of a person who is contaminated with jealousy, etc., dwindles down and that particularly hatred towards all living beings is generated in his mind.

28. If a man hates continuously some one or the other, all his blessings and religious merits perish, O excellent sage.

29. Viṣṇu becomes averse to him in whom jealousy goes on increasing. After this, that person's wealth, stock of grains, lands and affluence are definitely destroyed.

30. Egotism and arrogance destroy the power of discrimination, as a consequence of which, adversities befall living beings. One should, therefore, eschew egotism.

31-32. He who becomes puffed with pride precipitates his ruin erelong. The king whose mind was possessed with jealousy put up a continuous terrible fight for the period of a month with his enemies, the Haihayas and the Tālajaṅghas in which he was ultimately defeated. He then repaired to the forest.

33. Although Bāhu was dejected, he felt great pleasure on seeing a great lake. He was then accompanied by his pregnant wife.

34. It was a great miracle that perceiving the nature or temperament of the king whose mind was possessed of jealousy, all the birds residing in the lake hid themselves.

35. While the birds were hastily entering their respective abodes, they exclaimed : "Alas ! How painful it is ! What a terrible form has come down here !"

36. Accompanied by both of his wives, the king joyously entered the lake, drank its water that gave him abundant pleasure. He, thereafter, went and rested under a tree.

37. While the king Bāhu was proceeding to the forest, the subjects, though erstwhile protected by him, exclaimed "Fie ! Fie", after considering Bāhu's evil propensities.

38. O Brāhmaṇa ! A man endowed with good qualities, whoever he may be, is worthy of being praised by every one. A person devoid of good qualities, is censured by men, though he may be possessed of all kind of riches.

39. There is nothing comparable to ignominy in this world which is as painful as death. When Bāhu went to the forest, the people of his kingdom felt much relief and pleasure, as though an inflammation of the eye had subsided.

40. O excellent Brāhmaṇa ! Censured on many occasions, Bāhu remained in the forest like a dead man, with his fame in the world destroyed, and activities cut off.

41. "There is no death like ignominy (ill-reputation); there is no enemy like anger; there is no sin like slandering and there is no intoxicating liquor like delusion.

42. There is no ill fame like jealousy; there is no fire like passions; there is no snare like attachment; there is no poison like intimate contact (sexual intercourse)."

43. Being extremely dejected, Bāhu lamented in this and many other ways. Due to mental agony as well as to old age, the limbs of his body became wasted and feeble.

44. After the passage of a great deal of time, the king Bāhu was overwhelmed with sickness, and he died in the vicinity of the hermitage of sage Aurva,[6] O excellent sage !

45. His younger wife became very miserable. After lamenting for a long time, she thought of going with him (to the other world, by immolating herself in the fire), even though she was pregnant.

46. Deeply grieving she brought the fuel herself and prepared the funeral pyre. After placing (Bāhu's body) on the pyre, she began to ascend the pyre herself.

47. In the meantime, the intelligent sage Aurva, the receptacle of spiritual lustre, understood all this by means of his deep trance.

48. With the vision of their perfect knowledge, the noble-souled prominent sages who are cognizant of whatever exists in the three units of time—the past, the future and the present—and who are devoid of jealousy, see everything.

49. The most meritorious sage, Aurva, the store-house or treasure of brilliance accrued through penance, reached the place where the beloved wife of Bāhu was standing.

50. On seeing that she was about to ascend the funeral pyre, that leading sage spoke to her these words, based on dharma, O excellent sage !

Aurva said :

51. "O chaste lady ! O beloved wife of the excellent king ! Please do not proceed ahead with this risky venture. An emperor, verily the slayer of enemies, stays within your womb.

52. O blessed princess ! The following (ladies) do not ascend a funeral pyre, viz. those with infant children (depending on them), pregnant women, those whose monthly course has not yet started, and women in the menses.[7]

53. Means for expiation for Brāhmaṇa-slaughter and other sins have been mentioned by excellent men;[8] but there is no expiation for an imposter, a person who slanders, and killing a child in embryonic stage.

54. O observer of good vows ! There is no atonement for an atheist,[9] an ungrateful fellow, a person indifferent to dharma and a treacherous fellow.

55. Hence, O splendid lady ! It does not behove you to commit this great sin. The misery that has befallen you shall subside completely."

56. Thus advised by the sage, the chaste lady believed in his blessings. Taking up the lotus-like feet of her husband (in her hands), she lamented very much and was extremely distressed.

57. The sage Aurva who was an adept in the interpretation of scriptural texts, consoled her again, "O Princess do not cry. Later on, you will attain prosperity in due course.

58. O extremely blessed lady ! Please do not shed tears. The dead body should now be cremated by good men. Hence, controlling your grief, perform the rites befitting the occasion.

59. The god of Death is impartially alike to all, be he a learned man or a fool, an indigent fellow or a person in affluent circumstances, a wicked person or a man of good behaviour.

60-61. I consider it so in a city(?).[19] Indigence is surpassed in this respect here. Whatever is the past, ancient act (karma), it is directed in this world. I consider that the fate alone is the cause of this, and men are simply conditioned thereby.

62. O lady of lotus face ! All creatures have to succumb to the influence of the god of Death, whether one is even in the womb or in infancy or in youth or in old age.

63. It is Lord Govinda who destroys or protects creatures that are conditioned by and are at the mercy of their own actions. Ignorant persons super-impose a false belief on the creatures that are but casual causes.

64. Hence, O lady of pious observances, shed off your sorrow, and be happy. Perform the funeral rites of your husband. Try to be steady (in mind) through sensible discrimination and thought.

65. This physical body (of ours) is surrounded by ten thousands of miseries and ailments. It is subject to much pain and torture. It has only a semblance of happiness, but is full of sufferings. It is fettered by the bonds of actions."

66. Consoling her thus, the highly intelligent sage made her perform all the funeral rites. That gentle lady controlled her grief, bowed down to that prominent sage and said to him.

67. "What is surprising there that good men always wish for the benefits and well-being of others, as it is not for their own enjoyment that trees bear fruits on the earth.

68. He who, realising the miseries of others, enlightens them through good advice, is the veritable Lord Viṣṇu, the main-stay of sattva guṇa, for he is ready to render service to others.

69. He who feels miserable at the miseries and sorrows of others, and who feels delighted at the happiness of other people, is himself Hari, the Lord of the worlds, who has assumed a human form.

70. Scriptures have been heard and learnt by good men only to relieve others of their misery. It is for the destruction of the misery of every individual : So say the pious men.

71. Misery cannot affect anyone at a place where good men function. How can there be darkness when the sun shines?"

72. Speaking these and similar words, that lady performed all the other (funeral) rites of her husband, on the bank of that lake, in accordance with the instructions of that sage.

73. As the sage was standing by, the king appearing brilliant like the king of gods, rose out of the funeral pyre and ascended an excellent aerial car. After bowing down to Aurva, the leader of sages, he attained to the Supreme Abode.

74. Persons whether defiled by great sins[11] or by subsidiary types[11a] of sins, do attain to the Supreme Region when graciously glanced at by great men.

75. If a highly meritorious person looks (favourably) at the dead body or its ashes or the column of smoke (going up from the funeral pyre), the dead man attains the highest goal, O excellent one.

76. O Nārada ! After performing the funeral rites of her husband, she went to the hermitage of the sage and accompanied by her co-wife, she rendered service to him.

CHAPTER SEVEN

1. Bāhu alias Bāhuka (1.7.3)

A king of the solar race; The eighth descendant from Hariścandra. The Bh. P. and other Purāṇas do not attribute his loss of throne to his arrogance as in NP. (vide below VV 10-15). The Purāṇic account shows a struggle for supremacy over the Indo-Gangetic plain between the Ikṣvākus of Ayodhyā and the Yadus i.e. Haihayas from Māhiṣmati. In that hereditary feud, Bāhu lost his throne and had to spend the rest of his life in exile—which he did in the vicinity of sage Aurva's hermitage.

2. (I.7.5). They are (1) Jambū (2) Plakṣa, (3) Śālmali (4) Kuśa (5) Krauñca (6) Śāka, (7) Puṣkara.

3. (I.7.15-30) This verse is found in other works like Hitopadeśa, Pañcatantra, etc.

In ancient India, a number of wise-sayings in a verse form, on subjects like ethics and politics (nīti), renunciation (vairāgya), right conduct (Sadācāra) etc. were handed down by oral transmission. These were called gāthās and Subhāṣitas and were found in practically in the same verbal form in Sanskrit, Pāli and Prākrits (with the necessary phonetic and other changes). This fund of commonsense and wisdom is the legacy of all Indians.

4. Haihayas (I.7.23).

The dynasty founded by Haihaya, the great-grandson of Yadu :

Yadu→Sahasrajit→Śatajit→Haihaya. Kārtavirya Arjuna or rather Sahasrārjuna about whom the Bh.P. 9.23.25 states : "Other rulers of the earth cannot reach the status of Kārtavirya, in point of performance of sacrifices, munificent donations, asceticism, yogic powers, scholarship, victories, etc., In the traditional feud between Bhṛgus who had family ties with Ikṣvākus, the rivals of Haihayas and Haihayas, belonged to this dynasty. Sahasrārjuna was killed in a surprise attack by Paraśurāma. But after Paraśurāma's retirement, Sahasrārjuna's grandson Tālajaṅgha—probably an epithet to indicate his long marches—reasserted his supremacy by inflicting a crushing defeat on Ikṣvākus of Ayodhyā, the supporters and relatives of Bhṛgus (who had already left Western India and took refuge to the North), and King Bāhuka or Bāhu of Ayodhyā spent his life in exile near the hermitage of Aurva, a sage of the Bhṛgu clan.

5. Tālajaṅghas (N.P.I. 7.23 & 31-32).

Tālajaṅgha was the grandson of Sahasrārjuna who recovered the original position of his kingdom. The Tālajaṅghas were comprised of five clans or groups of people : (1) Vitihotras, (2) Śaryātis (3) The Bhojas, (4) the Āvantis and (5) the Tuṇḍikeras. He conquered his hereditary enemies, the Ikṣvākus and drove out King Bāhu in exile. Their dominion stretched from the gulf of Cambay (the Bhṛgus vacated Western India before the Tālajaṅghas) to the Gangetic doab. But King Sagara, son of the exiled King Bāhu, consolidated his position, destroyed the Haihaya power completely and the glorious Māhiṣmatī was soon forgotten (Bh.P.IX.23, 9.8.5B.7.A, Pargiter A I H T. PP.267-71).

6. Aurva (I.7.44)

A great sage, scientist-cum-statesman of the Bhṛgu clan. He was the son of Cyavana and Āruṣī, the daughter of Manu. The Bhṛgus were an affluent, militant community. Once the Haihaya King, Sahasrārjuna was in need of money and the Haihayas approached the Bhṛgus who did pay the tax levied. But one of Haihayas being over-exacting, dug up the house of a Bhṛgu and got enormous wealth. This led to the exploration compaign of all the houses of the Bhṛgus who resisted and the Haihayas started the genocide of Bhṛgus (if we are to believe Mbh. Ādi.179.5.6—which is a Bhṛgu recension). All women of the Bhṛgu clan hid themselves in the caves of the Himālayas (Ibid 177.21). While fleeing, Āruṣi concealed her garbha in her thigh, but a Brāhmaṇa woman informer reported to Haihayas about Āruṣī's escape though pregnant. When Haihayas arrested her, the child came forth from his mother's thigh. Hence he was called Aurva—Thigh-born. The Kṣattriya pursuers became blind by Aurva's lustre. They regained their eyesight when they begged pardon. But Mbh. Ādi 177.1-6 shows that by the time the Haihayas reached Aurva and his mother, he must have been a grown up boy, expert in Vedas and the accessories, as his being in the womb for 100 years and studying the Vedas in the embryonic stage is a purāṇic way of statement. It appears that Aurva was a scientist who was then developing a fire-missile capable of destroying the world (like the Hibomb of to-day) and the very terrific glare of the missile at that stage blinded the Haihayas. But he continued his researches and to quote the Mbh: "With a desire to avenge the massacre of Bhrgus, he decided upon a weapon of universal distruction" (Ādi. 178. 10-11). Aurva's penance (his development of a fire-missile) sent a cold shudder through the spine of 'the world' and his ancestors (i.e. senior members of the Bhṛgu clan). Like great thinkers of today protesting against the military use of atomic energy, they dissuaded him from the effort. "while I was in my mother's womb, I heard the wailing of my mothers (Bhārgava women). When Bhṛgus right from 'wombs' were massacred, nobody came to help my mothers. Then why should I spare the Kṣattriyas now?" growled Aurva (Mbh. Ādi. 179-5-14). It appears that the senior Bhṛgus anyhow dissuaded him from his resolve and the fire-weapon was thrown into the sea which as submarine fire still burns the sea water (and is called Vaḍavāgni). Ibid. 179.21-2.

It appears that Aurva's hermitage was near the kingdom of Ayodhyā. The political support of Ikṣvākus and the geographical distance between Ayodhyā and Māhiṣmatī enabled Aurva to carry on his researches undisturbed.

Aurva seems to have a long life. He lived to see the destruction of the Haihayas by his great grandson (Aurva—Ṛcika—Jamadagni—Paraśurāma) Paraśurāma.

When the grandson of Sahasrārjuna, Tālajaṅgha marched against King Bāhu of Ayodhyā—for it was really a struggle for supremacy in the Indo-Gangetic plain between the kings of the Solar and Lunar Races (and the Bhṛgus, partisans of Ikṣvākus) when King Bāhu was expelled, he took shelter with-Aurva. Why Tālajaṅghas did not attack Aurva's hermitage and execute the King is a mystery. May be inefficient intelligence service, pre-occupation with the rebel population of Ayodhyā who continued resistance under the leadership of Vasiṣṭha, the communication difficulties with their distant capital Māhiṣmatī to conduct a protracted war or possibly the deterrent of Aurva's secret missiles—it is anybody's guess.

But the fact remains that Aurva could bring up Bāhu's son Sagara in his hermitage, give him the necessary training and see to it that under Sagara's leadership, the freedom-struggle of Ayodhyā resulted in the expulsion of Tālajaṅghas. King Sagara, however, ruthlessly continued his struggle till the Tālajaṅgha power was wiped out of the Indo-Gangetic plain and crushed permanently—a feat which the much-glorified Paraśurāma could not achieve. But the Mbh. Anu. 153.11 a Bhṛgu recension gives the credit solely to Aurva !

(2) Bh.P. IX.8.8; IX.23.28.
(3) Bmd. P. 2.3.48.1-25

7. (I.7.52)

This verse is quoted by Parāśara Mādhava II.1.P.58 and Smṛti-muktāphala I P. 162 (where it is ascribed to Aurva) as an authority prohibiting self-immolation (Satī) of women under these conditions.

bāla-saṁvardhanaṁ tyktvā bālāpatyā na gacchati / rajasvalā sūtikā ca rakṣed garbhaṁ ca garbhiṇī // attributed to Bṛhaspati in Parāśara Mādhava. Smṛti-Candrikā (on Vyavahāra, p. 254) regards celibate life in widowhood as superior to the rewards of self-immolation to fire.

8. (I.7.53)

Although Brahma-hatyā (murder of a Brāhmaṇa) is regarded as the most heinous sin (mahā-pātaka) and the murderer was to meet death, the Bhaviṣya Purāṇa states that Manu has given thirteen alternative expiatory rites for this sin : Quoted by Kullūka on Manu XI.72-82; Prāyaścitta-Viveka, p. 63. Commenting on this, Govindānanda in his com. Tattvārtha-Kaumudī has given the details of these 13 alternative expiations (prāyaścittas).

9. (I.7.54) Nāstika :

This term includes not merely those who deny the existence of God, but those who do not accept the authority of the Vedas. It includes Jainas, Bauddhas, Pāśupatas and such heretics. One should take bath along with the clothes if one is touched by them (Ṣaṭ-triṁśan-mata quoted in Prāyaścitta-Prakaraṇa P.110 and Smṛti-candrikā I.P.118). The contents of VV.54 & 55 are repeated again in Chs. 14, 15, etc.

10. (I.7.60)

Although the word nagare vā occurs at the beginning of verse 60, it is better to take it with verse 59 and translate "Death overtakes one or in a city".

11. (I.7.74) Mahāpātakas : Major i.e. very grievous sins.

NP. I.15.22 b and 23a enumerates these. They are (1) murder of a Brāhmaṇa, (2) drinking of spirituous liquor, (3) stealing, (4) defiling the bed of one's preceptor (by enjoying his wife) and (5) association with any one of the above four sinners. That chapter details what actions amount to Brāhmaṇa-slaughter, etc.

Mahāpātakas should be distinguished from Ati-pātakas; the former can be expiated by undergoing some severe penance, etc., but the latter is beyond redemption. In the list of Atipātakas, Viṣṇu Dharma Sūtra 34.1 includes sexual intercourse with one's mother, daughter or daughter-in-law.

11A. (I.7.74) Upapātakas : Minor sins.

The number of minor sins is large and varies from Smṛti to Smṛti and from time to time. Yājñavalkya enumerates fifty-one minor sins. The most important one of the minor sins is killing a cow and the expiation for all upa-pātakas is the same, viz. that prescribed for killing a cow. It consists of Cāndrāyaṇa, Parāka, Gosava (subsisting on cow's milk for one month). If minor sins are repeated, the man loses his caste and becomes fallen. (Viśvarūpa on Yājñavalkya III.229-36).

CHAPTER EIGHT

The Glory of the Gaṅgā (Contd).

Sanaka said

1. O leading sage ! Thus, in the hermitage of Aurva, the two wives of Bāhu continued to render services with the feeling of devotion, every day.

2. O Brāhmaṇa ! After the lapse of half the year, the elder queen became evil-minded towards the good fortune of her co-wife (since she was pregnant)

3. Then poison was administered to the junior queen by the elder sinful lady.[1] But the poison was not effective, thanks to her service to the sage.

4. As she served the sage very well by scrubbing and smearing the ground (with cowdung, etc.) and other activities, the poison became digested as the effect of her holy (meritorious) acts.

5. After three more months, she, all of whose sins were wiped out due to her services (to the sage), gave birth to her son along with the poison, at a highly auspicious time.

6. O ! What sin in the world is there which association with righteous men does not destroy ? What happiness does it not give unto the men of meritorious acts ?

7. Services rendered unto the noble-souled, immediately destroyed the sins committed knowingly or otherwise or those one is compelled to do by others.

8. Even the dull attains to the state of being worshipped in this world, thanks to the association with the good, even as a digit of the moon when accepted (on his forehead) by god Śiva (became so to the world).

9. O leading Brāhmaṇa ! Indeed, association with the good always bestows on men the greatest prosperity, both here and hereafter. Hence good men are the worthiest to be worshipped.

10. O leading sage ! Who is competent to describe adequately the good qualities of the great ? It was miraculous that the poison that was administered to the child in the womb became digested (and came out after) three months.

11. On seeing the son born along with the poison, the sage, a receptacle of brilliance, performed the post-natal rites[2] and named the son Sagara[3] (a child with the poison).

12. The child's mother brought up the boy Sagara with great affection. The prominent sage performed the rites of tonsure[4] and the investiture with the sacred thread in the appropriate manner.

13 & 14. Observing that Sagara had outgrown the stage of early childhood, and that he was very capable, the leader of sages who was a past master in the knowledge of mantras, taught him scriptures (science and arts) that were befitting and essential for kingship. He granted him mastery over (the use of weapons) and miraculous missiles alongwith the requisite mantras (incantation of mystic formulae), O sage. Sagara was trained well by that sage Aurva.

15. The virtuous Sagara became powerful, righteous, grateful and intelligent. He possessed all good qualities. Every day he brought sacrificial twigs, kuśa grass, water, flowers, etc., for immense splendour.

16. On one occasion Sagara, full of modesty, and storehouse of good qualities, bowed down to his mother with palm joined in reverence and inquired.

Sagara inquired

17. "O mother ! Where is my father ? What is his name ? In which family was he born ? Kindly narrate to me all these details as I am interested in hearing about them.

18-20. Those who are devoid of father in this world, are as good as dead ones, even though they may be alive. A person whose father is alive is comparable to Kubera, the lord of wealth, even though he may be indigent. He who is bereft of both father and mother has no happiness. Just as a foolish person devoid of virtues is censured both here and hereafter, so also futile is the life (lit. birth) of a parentless orphan, of an ignorant fellow, of a thoughtless person, of a childless man, and of one immersed in debt.[5]

21. Like a night devoid of the moon, like a lake devoid of lotuses and like a woman devoid of her husband is a boy without his father.

22. A child without his father is like a creature without a virtue, or like a householder not practising holy religious rites or like a person from Vaiśya community (whose main job is agriculture and tending of cows) without having any cattle or animals.

23. A child without his father is like a statement devoid of truth, or like an assembly without good men or like a penance without (the sense of) mercifulness.

24. A child without his father is like a forest without trees, or like a river devoid of water or a horse without quickness or speed.

25. O mother ! just as a man engaged in begging is considered despicable and wretched, so also a son without his father is overwhelmed by many miseries."

26. Hearing what was so far spoken by her son, the poor miserable mother sighed deeply, and in reply to his questions, she narrated to him everything as it had taken place.

27. On hearing it, Sagara flung into rage and with his eyes turned red due to fury, he immediately took the pledge: 'I shall kill the enemies one and all'.

28. After circumambulating the sage Aurva and bowing down to his mother, he set out and was given a due send-off by the sage himself.

29. Starting from the hermitage of Aurva, the pure and truthful Sagara approached with great pleasure Vasiṣṭha,[6] his family preceptor.

30. He bowed down to Vasiṣṭha, his noble-souled preceptor. He reported to him everything, although the sage had known it all through his vision of knowledge.

31. Prince Sagara acquired the miraculous missiles specially empowered by gods Indra, Varuṇa, Brahmā and Agni, through that sage (Vasiṣṭha). So also he obtained from him a sword and a bow comparable to Indra's thunderbolt.

32. Honoured by the blessings of the sage and permitted by him, Sagara paid respects to Vasiṣṭha and started immediately.

33. Only with his single bow, that heroic prince converted his enemies alongwith their sons, grandsons and followers into residents of the other world (i.e. slew them).

34. His enemies were distressed by the fire generated from the arrows discharged from his bow. Some of them perished, while others became frightened and fled.

35. Some of them lay dead on anthills with their hair dishevelled and scattered. Some of them ate grass. Even as they were naked some entered water (to hide themselves).

36. In their ardent desire to save their lives the Śakas, the Yavanas as well as other kings immediately sought refuge in Vasiṣṭha.

37. Getting the intelligence through his spies, of the approach of his enemies to his preceptor, Bāhu's son, now the conqueror of the world, promptly came to the presence of his preceptor.

38. On hearing that Bâhu's son has arrived, Vasiṣṭha reflected for a while as he wanted to save Bāhu's enemies who had sought refuge in him and also to carry out what his disciple had conveyed to him.

39. He made Śabaras[7] shave off their heads and made Yavanas wear long tresses of hair. He made Andhras retain the moustaches but shave off their heads. All these were ex-communicated from the Vedic fold.

40. On seeing that they had been made no better than dead by sage Vasiṣṭha, Sagara laughingly said to his preceptor, the store-house of penance.

Sagara said :

41. "O Sir, in vain do you try to protect these wicked persons. By all means I shall see to it, that all these fellows who deprived my father of his ancestral land are killed.

42-43. If in spite of being capable of annihilating the enemies of righteousness, one were to neglect them and look upon the entire world at first, as being one's relatives, he himself becomes the cause of total destruction. For those very wicked persons, if powerless, pretend (lit. outwardly resort to) extreme piety to be extremely righteous.

44. Alas ! All the (pseudo-) righteous acts (mentioned above) are done fraudulently to deceive others. The wicked ones are sinfully disposed by nature. So long as one's army is powerful, they behave and perform good acts or obey.

45. A person who desires to gain his own ultimate good, should not believe in the assumption of the role of servants or slaves by the enemies, in the professions of loving friendliness of prostitutes and in the innocent appearance of serpents.

46. Showing off their teeth, the wicked always indulge in jokes and pleasantries (while we are powerful). But when there is a reversal of one's power, they quickly show those very teeth (in a different way).

47. Vile persons at first (while in power) speak stern and abusive language with their tongue. But when they become powerless, they use it to speak in extremely pitiable words.

48. He who desires his welfare and he who is adept in treatises on polity, shall not believe in the outward goodness or (pseudo-) equability or equanimity of wicked persons.

49. Undoubtedly, a person who believes in the following is no better than dead :—a wicked man who (outwardly) shows submission, a friend who indulges in roguery and a wife of evil unfaithful nature.

50. Hence, verily, please do not afford protection to these persons who are like cows in (outward) appearance but are (cruel) like tigers in their deeds. After killing all these wicked persons, I shall rule over the earth with your grace".

51. On hearing his words, Vasiṣṭha, the excellent sage, was highly pleased with him. Stroking (patting) Sagara's body gently with his hands (to express his approbation), he spoke to him as follows:

Vasiṣṭha said :

52. "Well done ! Well done ! O blessed one. What you speak is the truth, O prince of noble rites. Still you will attain great peace of mind by paying heed to my words.

53. These persons who stood against your pledge have already been killed by me. Tell me, what fame can accrue to you by killing those who have already been killed ?

54. O Lord of the Earth, all creatures are fettered by shackles of their own actions. They are, however, already killed by their own sinful acts. Why do you kill them again ?

55. This is the decisive conclusion of all scriptures that the physical body produced by sins is already killed at the outset by those very sins, but the soul is impregnable because it is full and perfect.

56. Creatures are but instruments in the enjoyment of fruits of their own actions. The karmas are the outcome or the result of Fate (lit. have the Fate as their root). The entire universe is subject to the control of Fate.

57. Since Fate alone is the protector of the good and the chastiser of the wicked what is it that can be achieved by men who are not free (have no free will). Tell me.

58. The physical body is born through sin and it functions through sin. Why did you attempt to kill even after knowing that all this is rooted in evil ?

59. Though the soul (ātman) is pure, it is called the embodied one, by learned men, since it abides in the body. Hence, O king, there is no doubt in this that the physical body is rooted in evil.

60. O son of Bāhu, what renown can come to you by killing the body rooted in evil ? Thinking decisively (on these lines) O son, do not do them to death"

61. On hearing these words of the preceptor, the prince refrained from his angry venture. The sage patted his son-like disciple with his hands and consoled him.

62. Then (sage Vasiṣṭha) expert in the Atharva Veda performed the coronation ceremony[8] of the noble-souled Sagara with the co-operation of sages who were strict observers of religious vows.

63. He (Sagara) had two wives, Keśinī and Sumati. They were the daughters of Vidarbha of Kāśyapa's family.

64. Seeing that Sagara was well established in his kingdom the sage Aurva, the store-house of penance, came from the forest and after holding conversation with the king, returned to his hermitage.

65. On one occasion the sage Aurva who knew the Bhārgava mantra was requested by the two queens of that king. He granted them the boon of having children.

66. The prominent sage, the knower of the past, the present and the future, remained in meditation for a moment. Giving delight to the queens Keśinī and Sumati, he addressed them thus.

Aurva said :

67. "One of you will give birth to a single son who will keep the continuity of your race. The other will give birth to sixty thousand sons O blessed ladies; choose either of the boons for the sake of having children.

68. On hearing the words of the sage Aurva, O Nārada, queen Keśinī chose a single son who will be the cause of perpetuation of their family life.

69. According to the boon sixty thousand sons were born of Sumati, O excellent sage, and the son of Keśinī was Asamañjas by name.

70. Asamañjas committed mischievous pranks like a mad man. On seeing him (act that way) the other sons of Sagara too became evil-minded and ill-behaved.

71. On seeing their childhood thus vitiated (by these mischievous deeds), king Sagara, the son of Bāhu, pondered over anxiously about the despicable activities of his son as brought about Fate.

72. He reflected : "Alas ! Extremely painful indeed is the association with the wicked persons. Fire is always beaten by blacksmiths for its only fault of being in contact with iron.

73. Asamañjas had a son named Aṁśumān. He was a knower of scriptures, righteous and engaged in what was beneficial to his grandfather. He was endowed with all good qualities.

74. But all the sons of Sagara committed evil deeds and harassed the people. They always created obstacles in the undertaking of holy rites of those who practised them regularly.

75. They drove off the gods (to whom oblations were offered) and partook of all sacrificial offerings duly submitted by the Brāhmaṇas.

76. They always brought by force celestial ladies like Rambhā and others dragging them by the tresses of their hair, and the sons of Sagara enjoyed them against their will.

77. Those wicked fellows were addicted to the drinking of wine. They plucked and brought the flowers of Pārijāta and other celestial trees and adorned their bodies with them.

78. Those great sinners but very powerful ones, abducted women who were well-behaved and chaste and destroyed men of good conduct. They even began fighting with their friends.

79. On seeing this, the gods, the leader of whom was Indra, became extremely distressed. They began to think deeply of the means of bringing about their destruction.

80. Taking a decision in the matter, all the Devas assuming disguised forms approached Kapila, the Lord of the chiefs of gods, who was at that time present in the Nether world.

81. The gods prostrated themselves on the ground before him like a staff and extolled him who was meditating in his mind on the Ātman, who is the very embodiment of pure and absolute bliss. They eulogised him as follows :

The gods prayed :

82. "Obeisance to you, the yogin who are absorbed and delightfully engaged in Sāṅkhya-Yoga; salutations to you who are Lord Viṣṇu Himself, disguised in the form of a human being, but who is all the while victorious (Jiṣṇu).

83. Bow to the devotee of the Supreme Lord; obeisance to you who are the Cause and bestower of benediction to all the world. Salutations to you who like the forest conflagration are the destroyer of the forest of Saṁsāra; we bow to you who are like a bridge affording protection to (the observers of) Dharma.

84. We bow again and again to you who are the great one totally devoid of passions and attachment. Be pleased to save us who have been afflicted by the sons of Sagara and have approached to you as a refuge for protection."

Kapila said :

85. "O excellent gods, only those who seek destruction of their own fame, power, wealth and longevity, harass the world. There is nothing surprising in this.

86. O gods, know that a person who intends to harass innocent persons in this world, is one who is engaging himself in the enjoyment of sins.

87. No doubt need be entertained in that that the Fate quickly destroys a person who continuously harrasses others physically, mentally or Verbally.

88. These sons of Sagara will meet their death in a very few days." When this assurance was given by that noble-souled sage Kapila, the heaven-dwellers bowed to him duly and returned to the celestial world.

89. In the mean-time, Sagara began to perform the Yajña (sacrifice) called Hayamedha (horse-sacrifice) with the help and guidance of Vasiṣṭha and other great sages.

90. Indra, the Lord of gods, took off the horse that was fixed for that sacrifice and placed it in the Nether world where Kapila was staying.

91. In order to find out the horse taken away by Indra with his physical body invisible, the sons of Sagara were extremely surprised and they wandered over the earth and other worlds in search of it.

92. When they could not trace the horse, they attempted to make their way to the Pātāla, the nether-world. And each one of them severally dug up the earth's surface to a depth of a Yojana (eight miles).

93. The earth dug out by them, they scattered on the shores of the ocean. All the sons of Sagara reached Pātāla through that passage.

94-96. The sons of Sagara who were perplexed and mad with arrogance searched for the horse. There they beheld the noble-souled Kapila dazzling with the lustre of ten million suns together, absorbed in meditation. And they espied the sacrificial horse near him. On seeing the sage they became very furious. With great speed they rushed at him and attacked him with the intention of killing him.

97-98. They shouted to one another : "Let him be struck down. Let him be struck. Let him be slain. Let him be killed. Let him be taken captive. Let him be quickly taken prisoner. It is he only by whom the horse is taken away and like a stork he pretends to be absorbed in meditation, showing off to be a saint. Alas ! There are wicked persons in this world who put up a great show (of saintliness)".

99-100. Shouting thus, they laughed and jeered at Kapila, the leader of sages who had exercised perfect control over his sense organs and stabilized his mind in the Ātman. As he was absorbed in meditation, Kapila did not notice their activities.

101. Those sons of Sagara whose death was imminent, lost their sense and kicked the sage, while others caught hold of his arms.

102. When the sage left off his trance, he was surprised (to see all this). In a deep majestic voice, he spoke to them who caused harassment to the world.

103. "The following persons lose their power of discrimination viz. those who are intoxicated with the arrogance of affluence; those who are oppressed with hunger; the passionate ones and those who are puffed with self-conceit.

104. The earth blazes internally continuously by merely being the receptacle of a treasure. What wonder is there when men blazed forth after enjoying the same ?

105. What is surprising in it, if wicked men annoy and harass the good people ? The force of the current in a river makes the trees on the bank fall down.

106. Misfortune, old age and foolishness always occur where there is wealth, youth and learning.

107. By whom can the greatness of Kanaka (gold) be described adequately ? Alas ! It is wonderful that similarity in name (viz. kanaka) makes the Dhattura plant (the thorn-apple tree) cause intoxication. (The word kanaka means Dhattura as well).

108. If a wicked person became endowed with affluence, that very same fortune of being affluent is destructive of the world, just as the violent gust of a wind is a friend of fire and poison that of a serpent.

109. Alas ! One blinded with the arrogance of his wealth does not see, though he may look on. If he sees wherein lies his welfare and interest, he sees properly."

110. Uttering these words, the infuriated Kapila created and discharged fire out of his eyes. The fire reduced the sons of Sagara to ashes instantaneously.

111. On seeing the fire issuing forth from the eyes of Kapila, the residents of the nether-world thought that the time of the dissolution of the universe had arrived prematurely. And they screamed out in their excess of sorrow.

112. All the reptiles and Rākṣasas were scorched by that fire. They entered into the ocean immediately. Indeed the fury of saintly persons is simply unbearable.

113. Thereafter a messenger of gods came to the place of the sacrifice of the king. He reported everything that had taken place to the king who was desirous of performing that sacrifice.

114. On hearing those words of the messenger the emperor Sagara, the knower of everything, became extremely glad and remarked, "The wicked ones have been tamed and subdued by the Fate.

115. Whether it be the mother or the father or the brother or the son, whoever commits a sin should be considered to be an enemy.

116. This is the decision arrived at in the scriptures—one should consider that person as the greatest enemy who is engaged in evil actions and who entertains hostility to all the people."

117. O eminent sage, Sagara did not feel sorry for the loss of his sons; for, the death of a person of evil conduct, enthuses good people.

118. Since the Smṛti[10] text ordains that a person who has no son is not eligible to perform a sacrifice, the king installed his grandson Aṁśumān as his son.

119. Moreover, the king, the knower of the essentials about sacrifice, deputed the son of Asamañjas with the assignment of bringing back the horse.—the son who was highly intelligent and the most excellent one among those who were skilled in speech.

120. It is reported that when he went to the entrance to that hollow chasm, he saw there pre-eminent sage Kapila, a mass of brilliance. And he prostrated himself before the sage, touching the ground with eight limbs of his body.

121. With his palms joined in reverence, he stood humbly before the sage. He addressed that eternal Lord of gods who was of quiescent and serene mind, as follows :

Aṁśumān said :

122. O Brāhmaṇa sage, kindly forgive the wicked offence committed by my uncles. Indeed, saintly persons who are engaged in rendering help to others are essentially of a forbearing nature.

123. Saintly persons show mercy even to the wicked. Indeed, the moon does not withdraw its beams of moon-light from the abode of a cāṇḍāla.

124. A good man, even when he is harassed and troubled, gives happiness to all. Just as the moon that is being eaten by the immortals gives the greatest pleasure and satisfaction to everyone.

125. Even when split and cut to pieces, the sandle wood renders everything fragrant. So is also a good person.

126. O Supreme Being, prominent sages, by their penance, forbearance and ācāra (behaviour and activities) know the excellent attributes of puruṣottama (Supreme Man), and they know that you are that Supreme Person yourself born to chastise and discipline the world.

127. Salutations to you, O Brâhmaṇa sage. Obeisance to you who are the embodiment of Brahman. Bow to you who are by nature favourable and friendly to Brâhmaṇas and engaged in meditation on the Brahman."

128. The sage who was thus eulogised by him evinced his delight on his countenance. He said, "O sinless one, I am highly pleased with you. Seek any boon of me."

129. When the sage spoke to him thus, Aṁśumān bowed down to him and requested, "Be pleased to take our ancestors to the world of Brahman".

130. Thereafter the highly delighted sage assured him, "Your grandson will bring down the Gaṅgā respectfully and lead your ancestors to the heaven.

131. The Gaṅgā, the river of holy waters, brought down by your grandson shall absolve these your ancestors of all their sins and lead them to the highest region.

132. O dear child, take this horse back so that the sacrifice can be completed". Accordingly reaching the vicinity of his grand-father, Aṁśumān related everything that happened and submitted the horse too.

133. Sagara performed his sacrifice by means of the sacrificial animal in the company of the Brâhmaṇas (sacrificial priests). He propitiated Lord Viṣṇu by performing penance and attained the region of Hari.

134. A son was born to Aṁśumān. He became famous as Dilīpa. From him was borne Bhagīratha who brought the Gaṅgā from the heaven.

135. O sage, God Brahmā who was pleased with the penance of Bhagīratha, bestowed the Gaṅgā on him. He (Bhagīratha) then began to think how to hold the water-fall of the Gaṅgā.

136. Thereafter, he propitiated god Śiva and brought the heavenly river to the earth. He helped his ancestors to go to the heaven as they became sanctified by touching the waters of the Gaṅgā.

137. A king named Sudâs was born in the family of Bhagīratha. His son Mitrasaha was well-known in all the worlds.

138. That son of Sudâs got the form of a Râkṣasa due to the curse of Vasiṣṭha. When the drops of the water of the Gaṅgā were sprinkled over him that king became liberated again.

CHAPTER EIGHT

The Glory of the Gaṅgā (contd.)

1. According to BN. (Bṛhan-Nāradīya) Aurva had one queen only with whom he spent his exile. That queen was poisoned by his enemies (Haihayas and Tālajaṅghas) and not by her cowife as in the NP. (BN.7.41-48). It was due to the merit accrued in the service of the sage Aurva, which did not kill her or the child in the embryo (BN.8.2-3).

2. Jātakarma—

The rites to be performed after the birth of a child. It is a very old rite, as it is mentioned in *Tait.Sam.*II.2.5.3-4. In Upaniṣadic times, it consisted of a homa, repeating thrice the word 'speech' in the child's ear, making it lick curds, honey and ghee in a gold spoon, giving the child its secret name (nāmakaraṇa), putting the child to the breast (by the mother), and addressing the mother with mantra. A great deal of these was dropped, and a variety of practices arose in the Gṛhya-sūtras and Smṛtis. Now-a-days some ceremonies (with little connection with Gṛhya-sūtras) are performed on the 5th and 6th day after birth.

3. This is a popular etymology, but is supported by Bh.P. IX.8.4. The Sagara-legend is very popular with Purāṇas, vide Va.P. 3.88.123-67; Br.P. III.Ch.s 47-55, Śiva P.-Umā saṁhitā 38.29-57.

4. Caula or Cūḍākarma—

The first cutting of the hair on the child's head. It is a rite the purpose of which is keeping a lock of hair. According to Gṛhyasūtras, it is to be performed in the third year from birth. After cutting the hair on an auspicious day, feeding of Brāhmaṇas, receiving their benedictions, the cut hair are to be so disposed as nobody can find them.

5. Are subhāṣitas describing the greatness of one's father.

6. Vasiṣṭha—

Name of the family preceptor of Sagara and other kings of the solar race. There appear at least three different persons called Vasiṣṭha : (1) The son of god Brahmā, who died at the time of the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice, (ii) Born from the sacrificial fire of god Brahmā and died by king Nimi's curse, and (iii) Born from a pot by Mitrāvaruṇa and a brother of the sage Agastya. In all these births the same woman—Arundhatī—took new births and married him. It is difficult to say which of these Vasiṣṭhas composed or 'saw' the Eighth Maṇḍala of the Ṛgveda, who carried on a feud with Viśvāmitra and who, after king Bāhuka, carried on the struggle against the Tālajaṅghas and inspired and helped Sagara to overthrow them. It seems to be a family of royal priests, loyal to kings of the solar race for many generations, and a variety of episodes in the life of these have clustered around Vasiṣṭha as if he was a single individual.

7. Out of these tribes, Śabaras were the aboriginal hill-tribe, Yavanas or the Ionians were Indo-Greeks who settled in the former NWF. province and adjoining areas, while Andhras s probably the Pkt. form of Āndhras who were once beyond the border of Aryan India. Here their custom of cutting the hair and moustaches are recorded. *Bh.P.*IX.8 records the story of king Sagara and in verses 5B to 7A mentions Tālajaṅghas, Yavanas, Śakas, Haihayas and Barbaras as the tribes subdued by king Sagara.

8. Royal coronation was a very important solemn ceremony. Different procedures of coronation are given in the Aitareya, Gopatha and Sāmavidhāna Brāhmaṇas and in Purāṇas like Brahma and Viṣṇudharmottara. The purāṇic procedures were probably meant for Śūdra kings. The mediaeval writers tried for a synthesis of these procedures. For example, Rājanīti Prakāśa states that following the dictum of Śabara on Jaimini II.4.9, the coronation rite should comprehend all the different items mentioned in several Vedic texts (if not contradictory to each other) or the royal priest should follow that which is nearest to his own branch of Veda.

> —Rājanītiprakāśa, p. 112.

The last was the easiest solution of the problem. Descriptions of the various procedures of such coronation is beyond the scope of this note.

As Vasiṣṭha's expertise in the Atharva Veda is mentioned here. It appears that the author of NP. implies here the procedure of coronation laid down in the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa which belongs to the Atharva Veda and prescribes mantras from the Atharva Veda for the various acts prescribed in this ceremony. (For details see Rājanītiprakāśa, pp. 42-43, Rājadharma Kaustubha, pp. 335-36).

9. Asamañjasa's pranks and his exile are confirmed in the Mbh. Vana 107.43 and Śānti 57.7-9. But *Bh.P.*IX.8.16-19 states that Asamañjasa was a yogī. He showed himself outwardly as being unreasonable. When he departed as an exile from Ayodhyā, he showed people that all their children were alive and returned them to their parents hale and hearty and that king Sagara was filled with remorse at his order of banishment.

10. This vague reference to Smṛti could not be located but in the Mbh.Ādi. 119.15-22 King Pāṇḍu deplores that a sonless person has no entrance in heaven even if he pleases gods with sacrifices and sages with learning.

CHAPTER NINE

The Glory of the Gaṅgā

Nārada said :

1. How was the excellent king, the son of Sudās,[1] cursed by Vasiṣṭha ? How was he purified again by means of ablution in the drops of the waters of the Gaṅgā.

2. O brother, it behoves you to relate to me completely all these things. The episode of the Gaṅgā is conducive to the blessedness both of those who listen as well as those who relate it.

Sanaka said :

3. The son of Sudās was the knower of all Dharmas. He knew everything and was possessed of all good qualities and was pious and pure. He enjoyed the whole of the earth, giving delight to his subjects like their own father.

4. Just as this earth consisting of seven oceans[2] was protected and ruled over by Sagara in former time, he ruled over the earth and did not oppose any Dharma.

5. Blessed with sons and grand-sons,[3] endowed with all prosperity and glory, he enjoyed the earth for thirty eight thousand years and still retained his youth.

6. Enthusiastic over hunting expeditions, the royal son of Sudās entered the forest which was carefully cleared by his trustworthy ministers, along with his army.

7. Accompanied by Niṣāda hunters, he killed various groups of animals. That knower of Dharma became thirsty and came to the river Revā (Narmadā).

8. O sage, the son of Sudās took his bath there and performed the daily rites. After taking food along with his ministers, he stayed there for the night.

9. Thereafter he got up early in the morning and performed all the forenoon rites. Accompanied by his ministers, he wandered in the forest on the banks of the Narmadā.

10. Alone, the lord of the Earth wandered from one forest to the other. Keeping the bow drawn till the tip of the arrow reached his ear, he chased a deer.

11. Mounted on a horse, the king who intensely chased the deer, left his army far behind. There he saw in a cave a tiger couple engaged in sexual intercourse.[4]

12.14. He abandoned his pursuit of the deer and came in front of the tiger couple. He was conversent with the science called Dhanurveda. He fitted an arrow to his bow and discharged the arrow at the tigress and made her fall down with the shaft of sharp point and depressed joints (nata-parva). As the tigress fell down, she changed herself into hideous ogress thirty six Yojanas in length. She roared like the rumbling clouds and thunder.

14-15. On seeing his beloved wife fallen down, the tiger giant hatefully threatened the king, "I shall take revenge for this". After saying so, he vanished there. The king who was frightened in his mind, returned and rejoined his army in the forest. He reported everything that had happened and came back to his capital city.

15-18. The king, the son of Sudās, began to suspect that the demon would perpetrate something terrible. So from that time, he gave up hunting altogether, O Nārada. After a lapse of a great deal of time, the king with a happy mind began to perform a horse-sacrifice in the company of (under the direction of) Vasiṣṭha and other sages. After offering oblations to Brahmā and other gods according to the injunctions of the Śāstras and concluding the sacrifice, Vasiṣṭha and the performer of the sacrifice who had taken the final holy oblations went out.

19. In the meanwhile, the demon whose wife had been killed by the king, came there angrily in order to wreak revenge on the king

20. When the preceptor Vasiṣṭha had gone out, the demon disguised himself as Vasiṣṭha. Approaching the king at that time, he told, "I want to take food here". I desire to eat meat."[5]

21. Instantly the Rākṣasa assumed the guise of the royal cook, cooked human flesh and presented it to the king. The king held it in a vessel of gold and stood awaiting the arrival of the preceptor.

22. The humble son of Sudās respectfully served the flesh kept in that gold vessel, to the preceptor when he came there.

23. On seeing the preparation, the preceptor wondered what it was and began to reflect

24. By means of his concentration of mind (Samādhi), he came to know that it was human flesh "O ! How depraved in character is this king that he has served this forbidden food to me !"

25. Along with this surprise, the sage felt great indignation and annoyance. "O lord of the earth, this prohibited food has been given to me with a view to bringing about my ruin.

26. Hence, let this be your regular diet. Human flesh, the food fit only for the Rākṣasas has been given to me by you.

27. Hence, O king, assume the status of a Rākṣasa which is accustomed to this (human flesh) as the usual diet." When the preceptor uttered this imprecation to him, the son of Sudās was agitated and overwhelmed with fear.

28. Trembling with fear, he immediately submitted, "I have been so commanded by your holiness yourself !" Urged by this statement, Vasiṣṭha reconsidered the situation.

29. With his divine vision, he came to know that the king was deceived by the Rākṣasa. The king on his part took up water in his hand and was about to curse Vasiṣṭha.

30. Seeing the king enraged and attempting to curse his preceptor, his beloved queen Madayantī, a strict observer of religious vows, intervened thus.

Madayanti said :

31. "O scion of a noble Kṣatriya family, it behoves you to curb your anger. There is no doubt in this that the Karman which you alone have to experience, has visited upon you.

32. The stupid fellow who roars and grunts saying HUṂ and TUṂ to one's preceptor, becomes a Brahma-rākṣasa in a forest, in a waterless tract.

33. This is the decisive conclusion of the scriptures that those who have conquered the sense-organs, those who have controlled their irate nature and those who are engaged in serving the preceptor, go to the abode of Brahmā."

34. Dissuaded by her, the king eschewed his wrath. He appreciated the intercession of his wife. He thought to himself, "Where shall I throw this water (taken for uttering the curse."

35. It is certain that the spot where this water is sprinkled will be reduced to ashes." Thinking thus, he poured the water on his own feet, of his own accord.

36. By the mere contact of that water his feet took the variegated complexion of black and white. So, thenceforth, he became known as Kalmāṣapāda (one whose feet are black and white in complexion.)

37. The intelligent king Kalmāṣapāda was then consoled by his beloved wife. Excessively frightened in his mind, he saluted his preceptor and bowed down to his feet.

38. Resorting with palms joined with reverence, the king, an adept in political stratagems humbly submitted thus ! "O holy sir, be pleased to forgive me about everything (that has happened), but the fact of the matter is that no offence or sin has been committed by me."

39. Hearing this, the sad sage heaved a deep sigh and he censured himself for his own thoughtlessness. He said to the king."

40. "Absence of discrimination is the greatest cause of all adversities.[5a] There is no doubt about this that one who is devoid of discrimination is no better than a beast.

41. Indeed, this king had not known the mischief of the Rākṣasa. What he did was proper. It was I who was thoughtless and ignorant. Hence I committed the sin of cursing him.

42. He who is controlled by discretion and thoughtfulness—whoever he may be—invariably attains bliss. He who lacks discretion, whoever he may be, meets with the opposite of bliss."

43. After saying this to himself, the sage replied to the king, "This curse will not be permanent. It will last for twelve years.

44. Being sprinkled over with the drops of the waters of the Gaṅgā, you will give up the physical form of a Rākṣasa. Reassuming your original form, you will enjoy this earth.

45. Your sins will be dispelled through the perfect knowledge as a result of the sprinkling of the drops of the waters of the Gaṅgā. You will be solely devoted to the service of Lord Hari and will attain the highest spiritual peace."

46. After saying this to the king, Vasiṣṭha, the knower of the Atharva Veda, returned to his hermitage. The king also filled with grief, took up the physical form of a Rākṣasa.

47. He was particularly oppressed with hunger and thirst and was always furious. With a complexion as dark as the night in the dark fortnight, and terrific in appearance, he wandered over the tenantless forest.

48. There he killed and devoured different kinds of beasts, men, reptiles, birds and monkeys.

49. Even the ground allround became terrible and it became spotted with various colours, as it was littered with innumerable bones, bodies out of which all blood was sucked and the hairs of the dead bodies mixed with blood.

50. In the course of three seasons (i.e. six months) he rendered the land of a hundred yojanas in extent, very miserable, and then went over to another forest.

51. Even there also, he continued to eat human flesh every day. He then went to the banks of the Narmadā resorted to by the sages and Siddhas.

52. Moving about on the banks of the Narmadā, that Rākṣasa (king) who frightened all the world, happened to see a certain sage engaged in amorous sports with his beloved.[6]

53. Scorched by the fire of hunger, he rushed at the sage and caught hold of him with great force, like a hunter catching the fawn of a deer.

54. On seeing her husband struggling within the grip of the demon, the highly frightened Brāhmaṇa lady entreated to him with palms joined in reverence over her head.

The Brāhmaṇa lady prayed :

55. "O tiger among kings, save me who am now extremely frightened. Be pleased to make my desire fulfilled by restoring my beloved husband who is dearer to me than my very life breath.

56. You are not a real Rākṣasa. You are a king born of the solar race, by the name Mitrasaha. Hence protect me, a helpless woman, in this forest, devoid of human population.

57. A woman bereft of her husband, is comparable to a dead person, though she may be alive. Still, O suppressor of enemies, what more can I say about widowhood in the early age?

58. I do not know either my mother or my father. I do not know any other kinsman. My husband alone is the greatest relative unto me. He is my very life.

59. O Lord of the people, you know all the Dharmas. You know how ladies ought to make their livelihood. Hence, save me who am a woman having no kinsman and a lady (mother) having an infant child (in the arms).

60. How can I live in this tenantless forest without my husband ? O sir, I am your daughter. Be pleased to save me, by bestowing upon me my husband, as a charitable gift.

61. Highly intelligent men say:—"There never has been or there can never be in future a nobler charitable gift than that of saving one's life." Please give unto me the charitable gift of my vital breath (viz. my husband)."

62. After praying him thus, she fell at the feet of the Rākṣasa. Though implored thus by the Brāhmaṇa woman, the Rākṣasa devoured the Brāhmaṇa like a tiger devouring the fawn of a spotted antelope.

63. That chaste wife of the Brāhmaṇa lamented very much. Becoming infuriated again, she cursed the king, though he had already been cursed.[7]

64. "Inasmuch as you have forcibly killed my husband who was engaged in sexual inter-course, hence the moment you are united with a woman, you will die."

65. After cursing him thus the indignant Brāhmaṇa lady uttered another imprecation once again on him : "Since you had devoured my husband, your Rākṣasahood will be permanent."

66. On hearing these two curses uttered by her, the Rākṣasa flew in rage and was as if emitting sparks of fire due to anger.

The Rākṣasa said :

67. "O wicked woman, why have you heaped two curses on me in vain (without any reason) ? As my offence was only one, it would have been but proper to pronounce one imprecation on me.

68. O vilest of wicked woman, since you have uttered a second curse on me, you will go to the state of a female ghost (Piśācī) just now to-day, along with your son."

69. The Brāhmaṇa woman, who was cursed by him thus, immediately assumed a ghostly form. She was distressed with hunger. The terrible woman along with her son went on screaming aloud.

70. Screaming loudly in that tenantless forest, the Rākṣasa and the Piśāca woman went to the forest, on the bank of Narmadā inhabited by Rākṣasas.

71. At that place, there lived a demon who was tormented with miseries and was antagonistic to the world. He had assumed the physical form of a Rākṣasa, because he was indifferent towards his preceptor.

72. On seeing the Rākṣasa and the Piśācī coming to his banyan tree (occupied by him), the Brāhmaṇa demon (Brahma-Rākṣasa) already on that banyan tree said furiously:—

73. "O terrible ones, why have you both come to this abode fondly occupied by me. Certainly you must tell me for what sins of yours, you have become like this."

74. On hearing his words, the son of Sudās related to him everything that was committed by himself as well as by that lady. Thereafter he said to him thus.

Sudās's Son Said :

75. O highly blessed one, who are you ? Please tell me what was done by you before. It behoves you to relate everything to me, your friend, out of your great friendliness.

76. Indeed, that wicked-minded fellow, whoever he might be, but who deceived his friend, experiences the fruit of his sins and undergoes tortures in hell, for ten thousand Yugas.

77. All miseries of creatures are diminished (and disappear) at the sight of a friend. Hence, no sensible person shall practice deception on his friends."

78. O Nārada, the Brahma-Rākṣasa, already on the banyan tree, who was thus urged by Kalmāṣapāda, spoke these virtuous words delightfully :

The Brahma-Rākṣasa said :

79. "Formerly, I was a Brāhmaṇa in the country called Magadha. I had mastered the Vedas and was wellknown by the name Somadatta.[8] I was devoted to the practice of Dharma.

80. O blessed one, I became too much elated and arrogant due to my learning, wealth and youthful age. I showed indifference towards my preceptor and consequently I was reduced to this stage (of being a Brahma-Rākṣasa).

81. I am unable to derive any happiness. I am fed up with the food I take (?) since I am distressed. Formerly, hundreds and thousands of Brāhmaṇas were devoured by me.

82. Still I was tormented by hunger and thirst. I was afflicted by internal agony. I created a terror in the whole universe and I was always engaged in eating flesh.

83. Disrespect and indifference to the preceptor lead to Rākṣasa-hood in human beings. This has indeed been experienced by me. Hence, no one in prosperity shall do like-wise."

Kalmāṣapāda said :

84. "Of what nature is a preceptor as laid down in Śāstras ? Who was panegyrized by you formerly ? O friend, tell me everything. I am extremely curious and anxious to know it."

The Brahma-Rākṣasa said :

85. "There are many categories of preceptors[9]. All of them are worthy of being worshipped and honoured respectfully. O friend, listen with single-minded attention as I narrated them (viz. categories of preceptors).

86-88. They are as follows:—One who teaches the Vedas, one who explains the connection between the Vedic passage and its interpretation (i.e. the interpreter of the Vedas), the expounder of the scriptures, the exponent of the Dharmas, the instructor in moral philosophy (or politics), one who initiates in the Mantras, one who explains the Mantras, one who dispels doubts in Vedic passages, one who instructs in religious observances and vows, one who saves from dangerous situation, one who provides with food, the father-in-law, the maternal uncle, the eldest brother, the father, one who invests the sacred thread, the impregnator and the consecrator, O excellent friend.

89. These are said to be the preceptors. They deserve to be worshipped and bowed with great respect."

Kalmāṣapāda enquired :

90. "O friend, many preceptors have been mentioned by you. Who is the most excellent of all these ? Or, are all of them of equal status ? Tell me precisely."

The Brahma-Rakṣasa replied :

91-92. "Very nice ! A very good question ! O highly intelligent one. I shall explain to you what has been enquired by you of me. The narration of the glory of preceptors, listening to that glory and approbation of the same—all these accord welfare unto all. Hence, I shall explain now:—There is no doubt in this that all these are equally worthy of being worshipped at all times.

93-94. Still, however, listen to me. I shall relate to you the essential and crucial decision of the scriptures (in the matter). The teacher of the Vedas, the person who explains the Mantras, the father and expounder of the Dharma—these are regarded to be special types of preceptors in the Smṛti texts. O lord of the earth, listen as to who should be regarded as the most excellent of all these.

95-96. I shall explain unto you what has been proclaimed by the knowers of the principles and interpretations of all scriptures. That learned man who explains the Purāṇas along with the Dharmas which contribute to the snapping asunder of the noose of the worldly existence, is the most excellent preceptor. It is from the Purāṇas that one knows the various rites proper for the worship of Devas and the fruit (one achieves) of the worship of the deities.

97-98A. Hence, O king, gods and sages say that the Purāṇas constitute the essence of the meaning of all Vedic passages. The expounder of the Purāṇas is, therefore, the greatest of all the preceptors.

98B-100. The man who strives to cross the ocean of worldly existence should listen to the Purāṇas—so says the classifier of the scriptures (i.e. the sage Vyāsa). O king, it was he who laid down in details all the Dharmas in the Purāṇas. Logic or reasoning is only for the sake of arguments in dispute. Ethics or politics is the means for worldly affairs and Purāṇas indeed are conducive to the happiness both here and hereafter, O highly intelligent one.

101. The intellect (or mind) of a person who always listens to the Purāṇas with great devotion becomes free from impurities. He shall be devoted again to Dharma.

102. O king, thanks to listening to the Purāṇas, auspicious devotion towards the Lord of Lakṣmī, is thereby engendered. The intellect of men who are the devotees of Viṣṇu is engaged in Dharma.

103-105A. Sins are destroyed due to Dharma and the knowledge becomes pure. Those who are well versed in the ancient lore say thus:—"Those who are desirous of attaining the fruits of Puruṣārthas, viz. Dharma, wealth, love and liberation from Saṁsāra, should listen to the Purāṇas." On the beautiful banks of the Gaṅgā, I heard all the topics on religion or Dharma from sage Gautama, who was omniscient and expounder of the Brahman or the Vedas.

105B-107. Once, I went to perform the worship of god Śiva. Although he (Gautama) was present, I did not make obeisance to him. But Gautama, the highly intelligent sage, the very receptacle of great lustre was calm. He rejoiced at the proper performance of the rites as mentioned in the Mantras and since Lord Śiva, the preceptor of all the universe, was worshipped by me.

108-110A. Since disrespect was shown towards the preceptor, he (Śiva) turned me into a Rākṣasa. If a person, knowingly or unknowingly, shows contempt and disrespect towards the preceptor, his intelligence, learning, wealth and all holy observances perish. O king, the learned men say that if a man renders service unto the preceptors with great respect, he is endowed with affluence.

110B-112A. I am burnt by that curse. Internally I am being consumed by the fire of hunger. O excellent king, I do not know when I shall be liberated." O prominent Brāhmaṇa (Nārada), when the Brahma-Rākṣasa residing on the banyan tree was discussing thus, the sins of both of them were dispelled, as they were engaged in discussion on the topics of Dharma.

112B-113. In the meantime, a highly righteous Brāhmaṇa came there. He was born in the land of Kaliṅga (Orissa) He was known by the name Garga.[10] He was carrying the holy water of the Gaṅgā on his shoulders. He was eulogising Lord Viśveśvara.

114-115. He was singing the names of Lord Śiva. With a thrill of joy, his hair over his body stood on their ends. On seeing the sage arrive, the Piśāci and the Rākṣasa rushed at him, raising their arms aloft and saying:—"Our break-fast has arrived !" But they stood away on hearing the names recited by him, as they were unable to attack him. The Rākṣasa said as follows:—

116. "O highly blessed Brāhmaṇa, salutations to you who are a noble-souled one. Thanks to the greatness of the recitation of the names of God, we, the Rākṣasas, have to stay away at a distance.

117. O Brāhmaṇa, thousands and millions of Brāhmaṇas have been formerly devoured by us. It is the covering shield of the holy names of Viṣṇu that protects you from the great fear of death.

118. O respected sir, that even we, the Rākṣasas have attained great tranquility and solace by merely listening to (his hallowing) names, is due to the greatness of Acyuta.

119. O highly blessed one, you are in every respect free from attachment and passion. Be pleased to absolve us of the heaps of sins, by making us perform the ablution with the waters of the Gaṅgā, by sprinkling it over us.

120. Wise and learned persons proclaim that he who redeems his own Ātman by engaging himself in service to Hari, shall redeem the entire universe.

121. Except by Hari's name which is the panacea for all terrible ills of the worldly existence, by what other means can liberation, which is so very difficult to attain everywhere, be secured ?

122. Just as a person trying to cross a river or a sea by means of a raft of iron, sinks under water, similarly, how can they who have not performed meritorious acts, redeem others ?

123. O ! The conduct of life of great men is conducive to the happiness of every one, just as the moon contributes to the delight of all.

124. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, whatever sacred and holy waters are there on the earth, they are not equal in holiness even to a particle of the waters of the Gaṅgā.

125. A drop of the water of the Gaṅgā, of the size of a mustard seed mixed with the Tulasī leaf, definitely sanctifies twentyone generations.

126. Hence, O highly blessed Brāhmaṇa, O expert one in the meanings of all scriptures, protect us, the perpetrators of sinful acts, by giving us the water of the Gaṅgā."

127. On hearing this excellent discourse on the greatness of the Gaṅgā related by those Rākṣasas, the excellent Brāhmaṇa was very much surprised.

128. (He thought) "Even in these (Rākṣasas,) there is such a devotion towards the Gaṅgā, the mother of the worlds. How much more there should be devotion of the great men of meritorious deeds who are endowed with sound perfect knowledge ?"

129. Then the excellent Brāhmaṇa mentally came to a conclusion on the Dharma that a devotee who is a benefactor of all living beings attains the highest region.

130. Then the Brāhmaṇa, full of mercy, sprinkled the excellent waters of the Gaṅgā mixed with a Tulasī leaf over the Rākṣasas.

131. On being sprinkled by the drops of water of the size of a mustard, those Rākṣasas gave up their Rākṣasa state and became refulgent like Devas.

132. The Brāhmaṇa lady accompanied by her son and her husband—Brāhmaṇa Somadatta—became prominent among gods resembling a hundred million suns in brilliance.

133. They were distinctly characterised by conches, discuses and the iron maces. They attained to Sārūpya (similarity in form) with Hari. Eulogising the Brāhmaṇa very much, they went to the abode of Hari, i.e. Vaikuṇṭha.

134. The king Kalmāṣapāda regained his own (Royal) form. On seeing those sinless Brāhmaṇas being liberated, he began to think deeply.

135. When the king was extremely distressed and miserable, a mysterious secret voice uttered in deep sonorous tone this great statement based on Dharma :

136. "O highly blessed king, it does not behove you to be miserable. O king, at the end of your enjoyment of pleasures, you also will attain to the highest beatitude (Mokṣa).

137. There is no doubt that those who have washed off their sins by means of good acts and who are engaged in devotion to Hari, attain to the highest region of Viṣṇu.

138. Those who are merciful towards all living beings, those who function along the path of Dharma and those who are eagerly devoted to the worship of the preceptor, attain to the highest region."

139. On hearing this utterance of Bhāratī (Goddess of speech), the excellent king attained deep mental satisfaction and tranquillity and remembered the words of his preceptor.

140. With great delight, he praised his preceptor, that Brāhmaṇa (from Kaliṅga) and Lord Viṣṇu. He narrated all his former story to that Brāhmaṇa.

141. O sage, thereafter, the king made obeisance to the Brāhmaṇa from Kaliṅga duly. Repeating the names of Viṣṇu, he immediately proceeded to Vārāṇasī.[11]

142. He took bath in the Gaṅgā there for six months and paid visits to god Sadāśiva. King Mitrasaha thereby became free from the curse of the Brāhmaṇa lady.

143. Thereafter, he went to his capital city. O excellent sage, he was then crowned by the noble-souled Vasiṣṭha. He protected his own kingdom thereafter.

144. He ruled over the entire earth. He enjoyed all worldly pleasures except that from his queen. He got a son begot by Vasiṣṭha. Ultimately the excellent king attained salvation.

145. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, it is not surprising that the man who praises the excellences of Viṣṇu and Vārāṇasī listens to them and muses over them and drinks the water of the Gaṅgā, becomes liberated from Saṁsāra.

146. Hence, O leading Brāhmaṇa, it is not possible to reach the other shore of the great glory of the Gaṅgā (i.e. to describe it exhaustively), even to the lords of gods, viz. Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva.

147. Undoubtedly, by merely remembering the names of the Gaṅgā, a man becomes absolved of millions of heinous sins and attains to Brahmā's abode.

148. If the name 'Gaṅgā' is repeated even once, one is immediately liberated from all sins, and he is honoured in the region of god Brahmā.[12]

CHAPTER NINE

The Glory of the Gaṅgā

1. Saudāsa, the son of Sudās was, according to Bh.P.IX.45, the 8th descendant from Bhagīratha who brought the Gaṅgā to the earth. His real name was Mitra-saha, but he came to be known as Kalmāṣa-pāda. The legend of king Mitra-saha, better known as Kalmāṣapāda is given in details in the Mbh.Ādi chs. 175, 176, 181, Śānti 234.30 and *Anu.*137.18, in the *Bh.*P. IX.45. 20-38, Śiva P.—IV ch.10 and a brief reference in VR I.70.39-40. The legend differs slightly in different Purāṇas. The main facts as given in the Mbh. are as follows : Mitrasaha and queen Madayantī, a happy royal couple was ruling over Ayodhyā. On one occasion, while the king, dog-tired with the fatigue of hunting, was returning, he was confronted by a sage Śakti at a narrow pass. The quarrel arose who was to give way to whom and the enraged sage cursed the king to be a demon (Mbh.Ādi 175. 1-14). Vasiṣṭha's rival Viśvāmitra instigated a demon 'Kiṅkara' to possess the king and made him serve human flesh to a sage who cursed the king to be an ogre. Viśvāmitra instigated him to eat Śakti (Vasiṣṭha's son who cursed him) and the rest of the sons of Vasiṣṭha. When he approached to eat up Vasiṣṭha, he sprinkled him with water charged with a mantra and restored him to his original status as king of Ayodhyā (Ādi. 176.26). Unfortunately during his demonic state, king Mitrasaha ate up a Brāhmaṇa out of a couple at the time of their sexual intercourse. The Brāhmaṇa woman Āṅgirasī cursed him that he would meet death if he touched a woman. Hence, he had to request Vasiṣṭha to procreate a son from his queen Madayantī. The Bh.P. agrees with this basic episode. The N.P., however, adds some spicy material and gives an interesting story.

2. Sapta-sāgarāḥ :

The traditional list of seven seas and their identification by N. L. De (p.179) is as follows : (1) Lavaṇa (salt) or the Indian Ocean, (2) Kṣīra (milk) —the Shirwan or the Caspian sea, (3) Surā (wine)—a corruption or rather Sanskritisation of the Sea of Sarain, a part of the Caspian Sea forming the south-eastern boundary of Kuśa-dvīpa. (4) Ghṛta (Ghee)—Derived from Erythraen sea or the Persian Gulf forming the boundary of Śālmala-dvīpa or Chaldia or Assyria (5) Ikṣu (sugar-cane juice)—Ikṣu is the Oxus—the river and sea having a common term—here taken as a sea. It formed the southern boundary of Puṣkara-dvīpa (Puṣkara—Bhushkara or-Bokhara), (6) Dadhi (curds) is a Sanskritisation of Dahi (Dahae), a scythic tribe living on the shore of the Sea of Aral. Hence, the Aral sea. It formed the boundary of Krauñca dvīpa. (7) Svādu perhaps a corruption of Tehadun, a river in Mongolia flowing through Plakṣa dvīpa. Like Ikṣu a river-name used for the sea—De, p. 179.

3. Saudāsa in the Mbh. is childless but in the NP., he is blessed with sons and grandsons.

4. The episode that a couple of Rākṣasas assumed the form of tigers and were engaged in sexual intercourse and that king Saudāsa killed the female partner and was threatened by the male-partner after assuming his demon form is an addition of the NP.

5. The episode that the demon assumed the form of Vasiṣṭha and requested to send human flesh to his hermitage and the king innocently sent it and got cursed is not in Mbh. but in the Uttara Rāmāyaṇa (vide Puranic Encyclopaedia, p. 377).

5A. Cf. Sahasā vidadhīta na kriyām aviveka̤ḥ paramāpadām padam—Kirāta. II.30

6. According to the Mbh.Ādi 175.40, he was Vasiṣṭha's son, Śakti who cursed him to be a demon for not giving him the way (Ibid. 175.13-14).

7. The Brāhmaṇa woman's imprecation and Kalmāṣapāda's counter-curse turning the lady and her child into goblins (piśācas) and their joint wandering have no basis in the Mbh. and but are NP.'s contribution. The Śiva P. however, endorses Kalmāṣapāda being cursed by a Brāhmana lady but not his counter-curse to that lady.

8. The Somadatta episode is not in the Mbh. but it is probably NP.'s contribution.

9. The term guru connotes an elderly person. Viṣṇu Dharma Sūtra 32.1-2 states that the father, mother and preceptor (ācārya) are the highest gurus. Manu (II.225-32) and Mt.P. 210.20-27 compare them to the three sacred fires maintained by an Agnihotrin. Devala extends the title to five, including in them elder brother and husband. (Smṛti-candrikā I, p.35). In the list given here in the NP. the first eight gurus can be included under 'preceptor', the next two under 'maintainer' (employer, husband), the next three have traditionally the status of a father—a status extended to the last three, viz., the performer of upanayana which admits one to Vedic studies and of Saṁskāras and the progenitor.

10. The episode of Garga, a Brāhmaṇa from Kaliṅga, liberating Kalmāṣapāda and the Brāhmaṇa-Ogre Somadatta, with sprinkling of the water of the Gaṅgā has no basis in the Mbh. In Mbh. the sage Vasiṣṭha redeems him sprinkling him with water charged with mantras. No mention of the Gaṅgā water is in Mbh.Ādi 176.26-30. NP. contributes this to glorify the efficacy of the water of the Gaṅgā.

11. King Kalmāṣapāda's sojourn at Vārāṇasi for six months for redemption from the curse of the Brāhmaṇa woman is NP.'s contribution with no basis in the Mbh. or Bh.P.

12. In NP. II chs. 39 and 40 we find the glory of the Gaṅgā repeated and many of these verses in the Chs. on the glory of the Gaṅgā are echoed therein.

CHAPTER TEN

The Defeat of the Devas by Bali[1]

Nārada said :

1. O brother, if I am considered worthy of being blessed by you, kindly narrate to me the origin and other details of the river that is called the Gaṅgā and that has its source from the feet of Viṣṇu.[2]

Sanaka narrated :

2. O Nārada, listen. I shall relate to you, O sinless one, the source or the origin of the Gaṅgā that bestows merits on the speakers as well as on the listeners, and destroys their sins.

3. There was a certain sage, Kaśyapa, who was the father of Indra and other gods. Diti and Aditi, the daughters of Dakṣa, were his wives.

4. Aditi was the mother of all Devas or gods and Diti was the mother of Daityas. O Brāhmaṇa, those two wives of Kaśyapa and their sons vied with each other, seeking to vanquish the other.

5. The Daityas were called Pūrvadevas, as they had been always senior to Devas. The first Daitya, the son of Diti, was the powerful Hiraṇyakaśipu.

6. Prahlāda, the extremely noble and the righteous-most Daitya, was his son. Prahlāda's son Virocana was a great devotee of Brāhmaṇas.

7. His son was the extremely brilliant and valorous Bali. O sage, he alone was the real leader of the armies of Daityas.

8. He was endowed with great strength. He enjoyed this earth. After conquering the entire earth, he became desirous of conquering the heaven.

9. O excellent sage, his elephants were in billions. The number of his horses and the chariots came to as many. For every elephant, the number of foot-soldiers was five hundred. How can his excellent army be described adequately ?

10. His ministers were Kumbhāṇḍa and Kūpakarṇa who surpassed the leaders of millions of ministers. Bali had a hundred sons, the eldest of whom was Bāṇa. He was equal to his father in heroism and prowess.

11. Bali was actuated by a desire of vanquishing the gods. He started the campaign accompanied by a great army. Through banners and umbrellas, he reminded the people of the flashes of lightning which were the billows on the ocean in the form of the sky.

12. Arriving at the city of the slayer of Vṛtra (viz. Amarāvatī), the demon laid siege to it through Daityas, strong and vehement like lions. The thunder-bolt-bearing Indra and other gods came out of the city for fighting with them.

13. A terrible battle ensued thereafter between the gods and Daityas, with shouts like thunders of clouds at the end of the universe, mixed with the sounds of big drums.

14. In that extremely terrible battle, Daityas discharged volleys of arrows on the army of Devas. The gods too retaliated like-wise on the army of Daityas.

15. Yelling sounds and shouts came up from both the armies (such as 'Kill', 'Tear', 'Hit', 'Split', 'Annihilate', 'Strike down', etc.

16-17. The whole world was filled with various sounds such as the sounds of conches, whistling arrows,[3] kettle-drums, the roaring sound of the shouting demons, the creaking of the chariots, the hissing of the arrows, the neighing of horses, the trumpeting of the elephants and the twanging sound of the bow-strings.

18. Beholding the fire that originated from the mutual friction of the shafts discharged by gods and Asuras, the whole universe regarded it as an untimely Pralaya (the dissolution of the world).

19. The army of the enemies of gods, wielding a stream of refulgent weapons shone like the night over-cast with clouds with streaks of lightning flashing across.

20. In that war, the agile, active and valorous gods, by means of their arrows, smashed to smithereens the huge boulders of mountainous rocks, hurled by the Asuras.

21. Some of them confronted the elephants with their elephants, the chariots by means of their chariots, the horses with other horses. Some hit them with the handles of maces and iron bars.

22. Some of them, on being hit with Parighas (Iron clubs), fell into the marsh of blood. Some of them whose vital breath had come out i.e. (died), occupied the aerial cars.

23. Those Daityas who were forcibly killed by the gods in the battle, assumed the forms of devas and rushed at demons.

24. Then the extremely terrible hosts of demons who became infuriated on being beaten soundly by the gods, hit back gods by means of various kinds of weapons (such as)

25-27. Rocks, Bhindipālas (a cubit-long wooden club), swords, axes, tomaras, (Javelins), Parighas (Iron clubs), daggers, spears, discus, pointed poniards, pestles, goads, plough-shares, Paṭṭiśas (a spear with sharp points) śaktis, stones, Śataghnis (a cylinderical piece of wood studded with iron pikes and capable of killing hundreds of people), nooses, mailed fists, tridents, pointed iron spikes and pounding rods. The battle grew more and more tumultuous and fierce through the confrontation between the chariots, horses, elephants and foot-soldiers.

28. The gods hurled various kinds of weapons at Daityas. In this way, the extremely terrible battle continued for eight thousand years.

29. When the army of Daityas became powerful, the defeated heaven-dwellers abandoned their celestial region in great fright and fled precipitately.

30-33. The defeated gods disguised themselves as human beings and wandered over the earth. The son of Virocana, Bali, was devotedly attached to Nārāyaṇa. He enjoyed the three worlds without any obstruction to his overlordship. His prosperity flourished. The mighty Daitya desirous of propitiating Viṣṇu, performed many horse-sacrifices. He discharged the duties of Indra in the heaven as well as those of the guardians of cardinal points. The king of Daityas began to partake of oblations offered in all various sacrifices performed by Brāhmaṇas for propitiating Devas. On seeing her sons in such a plight Aditi, the mother of Devas, became distressed.

34-35A. She thought to herself, "I am staying in vain", and then she went to the mountain Himālaya. Wishing for the prosperity of Indra and the defeat of Daityas, she who was devotedly attached to meditation on Hari, performed a severe penance.

35B-38A. While performing the penance she did it in the sitting posture for some time and then performed it while in a standing posture. For a long time, she stood on only one leg. Thereafter, she stood on the tip of her feet. For some time her diet was fruits. Thereafter, she subsisted on the withered leaves fallen down from trees. Then she lived only on water. Afterwards she gave up food altogether and subsisted on air only. She began to meditate on the Supreme Ātman through her individual Ātman. She contemplated on the Deity, the embodiment of existence, knowledge and bliss. O Nārada she performed the penance for one thousand divine years.[4]

38B-41. On hearing of that unending penance of Aditi, Daityas, expert in their science of creating illusions, assumed the form of Devas as per command of Bali. They approached Aditi and said, "O mother, why do you perform this penance desiccating your body. If Daityas come to know of this, great misery may befall us. Leave off this (penance) causing so much misery and drying up your body. Learned men do not approve of a meritorious act which requires to be achieved only with very great difficulty and troubles. Those who are eager to achieve Dharma should assiduously preserve and take care of their body.

42. Those who neglect their body are the slayers of Ātman. O fortunate and blessed lady, stay here happily. Please do not cause grief to us, your sons.

43-45A. O mother, undoubtedly those who are devoid of their mothers are no better than dead, whether they be cows or other animals or even trees. None of these derives any happiness without their mother. Whether one is an indigent fellow or an ailing one, or one in exile in a foreign land, one derives the greatest joy at the mere sight of one's mother.

45B-46. One may perhaps develop aversion to food, water, richs, etc. and even to lovely women. But there is none who turns his face away from his mother. If one has neither a mother nor a chaste wife devoted to religion (righteousness) and loyally attached to her husband at home, he should rather betake himself to the forest.

47. A person devoid of his mother is like the righteous path of life devoid of devotion to Nārāyaṇa, or like wealth which is not enjoyed in any decent manner or like house-hold without a wife or a son.

48. Hence, O gentle lady, save us who are your sons and who are extremely distressed".

Even though she was thus importuned by Daityas, Aditi did not get disturbed from her trance.

49. When Daityas found that in spite of their speech to her, Aditi was still absorbed in meditation on Hari, they were extremely infuriated and wanted to kill her.

50. Due to fury, their eyes turned red. They roared like clouds at the end of the Kalpa (when the universe is dissolved). By the gnashing of the tips of their curved fangs (in anger), they created fire which burnt down the forest instantaneously.

51-52. The forest extended to a hundred Yojanas. It was teeming with various kinds of living beings. The very same fire burnt Daityas who had gone there to destroy Aditi.

Only Aditi, the mother of gods, remained alive. She had been meditating on Acyuta (Viṣṇu) for hundreds of years. She was protected by the Sudarśana discus of Viṣṇu who killed Daityas and took pity on his own devotees.

CHAPTER TEN

The Description of the Defeat of Devas by Bali

1. The legend of Bali, his generosity, truthfulness, valour and nobility of character overshadow the greatness of Viṣṇu who deceived him by begging three feet of land as a pigmy, and assuming a cosmic form, pressed him down to the nether world, is very popular with Purāṇas. We find it is *Mbh.*III.272. 61-76, *Bh.P.*VIII.chs. 15, 18 to 23, AP. 4.5-11, *Bd.P.*2.73.75-87, *AP.*I.41. 79-103, KP I.16.1-69, Va.P. 36.74-86, to mention a few. The transformation of the Vedic sun-god Viṣṇu into Purāṇic Trivikrama and its fusion with Bali legend is interesting.

It is significant that practically for every generation of Diti, the exterminator is some form of Viṣṇu. Thus Hiraṇyākṣa : Varāha, Hiraṇyakaśipu : Nṛsiṁha, Bali : Vāmana, Bāṇa : Kṛṣṇa—these pairs indicate a stubborn resistance of Diti's family to the descendants of Aditi's family—the socalled 'gods'—probably a historical family feud in days of yore.

This legend is given here to glorify the Gaṅgā. While God Viṣṇu, in his Trivikrama form, tried to cover the heavens, his toe-nail struck against the outer crust of the universe and from the crack created by the toe-nail, rushed in the cosmic waters that envelop this universe. That is the source of the Gaṅgā which flowed down Viṣṇu's feet. (vide infra. I.11. 179-182).

2. As indicated there, the attribution of a heavenly source to the Gaṅgā is a part of the racial memory of Indo-Aryans, who still remembered in a legendary form, their stay in the Meru (Pamir) region. S.M. Ali in the Geography of the Purāṇas, describes graphically the geneses of the 'descent of the Gaṅgā and why the Gaṅgā came to be called Tripathagā. His conclusions are as follow :

"It will be realised from the above discussion that the Purāṇas intend to bring out three stages in the evolution of the Gaṅgā :

(i) They connect it with the heavens by comparing and identifying it with the Milky Way. This is the celestial stage.

(ii) As the snow falls on the high mountains they identify the snow cap of High Asia which covers its high range and its central knot, the Pamirs, the Gaṅgā is just a cover or belt of snow and ice at this stage. This is the Gaṅgā at its 'snowy stage'.

(iii) From this common source i.e. The Pamirs, the snowy Gaṅgā melts and divides itself into the four main rivers of Asia which radiate in different directions. The Gaṅgā at this stage becomes a stream or rather four streams of water.

The Purāṇas have thus rolled the accounts of the glaciers of Asia, the rivers of Asia and their origin into one, in a simple but colourful statement, which is repeated practically in all the Purāṇas.

—The Geography of the Purāṇas, pp. 63-64.

This description explains to some extent the legend of the descent of the Gaṅgā (Gaṅgāvataraṇa), in various Purāṇas.

3. Probably the correct reading must be śaṅkha-dundubhi-niddhvanaiḥ and not śara — as the Śaṅkha and dundubhi are sounded together in fighting and the sound of arrows (bāṇa-kreṅkāra) is mentioned below and its mention would be superfluous. It is probably the slip of the scribe of the MS in Devanāgarī script where instead of शंख, the scribe must have written शंर or शर, in the previous case, the editor of that MS. emended शंर as शर. This is my guess about the correct reading as the venkateshwar edition records.

4. One year of human beings (360 days) constitutes one day of gods. Thus one year of gods or divine year = 360 years of men. So Aditi performed penance for 1000 divine years or 360,000 human years.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

The Glory of the Gaṅgā : The Origin of the River

Nārada said :

1. You have mentioned, my brother, an extremely miraculous incident. How did that forest fire spare Aditi and burnt all Daityas in a moment ?

2. Be pleased to tell me in details about the immense inherent strength of Aditi that caused this special surprise. Indeed, prominent sages and good men are always engaged in tendering advice to others.

Sanaka replied :

3. O Nārada, listen to the greatness of those who revel in devotion to Hari.[1] Is there any person who is capable of harassing saintly persons engaged in the meditation of Hari ?

4. Gods Brahmā, Hari, Śiva and others, Siddhas and prominent leaders of sages — all stay permanently at the residence of a person who is engaged in devotion to Hari.

5. O highly blessed Nārada, Lord Hari is enshrined in the hearts of his devotees who are serene-minded and are always engaged in repeating his name. Need it be said that he abides in the hearts of those who are engaged in contemplating on him ?

6. Lakṣmī, the goddess of wealth, and all the deities stay only there, where a person is engaged in Śiva's[2] worship or where one devoted to the worship of Viṣṇu, resides.

7. Neither a fire nor a tyrant nor a thief can molest any person devoted to Viṣṇu's worship. Nor is he affected by diseases.

8. Neither ghosts nor evil spirits nor the Kūṣmāṇḍa (evil spirits), evil planets, nor the goblins that attack children nor Ḍākinīs (witches) nor Rākṣasas can dare to trouble a worshipper of Acyuta.

9. Those Bhūtas, Vetālas (goblins and genii) and others, who take delight in afflicting others, take to flight from the residence of an excellent devotee engaged in the worship of Hari and Lakṣmī.

10. All the sacred places and Deities stay there only, where a person who has subdued his sense-organs, or one who is a benefactor unto all, or one who is devoted to Dharma and holy rites, stays.

11. All fortunes and blessings are found at that place only where yogins stay even for a moment or a half. That spot is a holy place and that is a real penance-grove.

12. All troubles disappear at the mere utterance of Hari's names. What need be said of those who propitiate him through eulogies, worship or through meditation ?

13. O Brāhmaṇa, in this way, the whole forest along with Asuras was consumed by the fire. But Aditi was not even scorched, since she was protected by the discus of Viṣṇu.

14. Thereupon, the gracious-looking Lord with a pleasant countenance, and eyes large like the petals of a lotus, revealed himself just in front of her, wielding in his hands a conch, the discus Sudarśana, and the mace Kaumodakī.

15. Illuminating various quarters with the lustre of his refulgent teeth which appeared slightly as he smiled gently, and touching the beloved wife of Kaśyapa with his holy hand, the Lord said:

The glorious Lord said :

16. "O mother of Devas, I am pleased with you, by virtue of your propitiation through performance of penance for a long time. You are exhausted. You will certainly be blessed with good fortune.

17. Seek any boon that you cherish in your heart and I shall grant it to you. O gentle Lady, you need not be afraid. Good fortune will certainly come to your lot."

18. The mother of Devas who was thus addressed by the discus-bearing Lord of the gods bowed to him, and eulogised the Lord, the bestower of happiness unto all people.

Aditi prayed :

19. "Salutation to you O Janārdana, the Lord of the chiefs of Devas, O omnipresent one, you are the cause of the functioning of the world through Sattva and other Guṇas.

20. I bow to you who have innumerable forms and are still a formless one, to you who are the Supreme Soul.

Salutations to you who comprise all forms within yourself. Obeisance to you who possess all excellences and are still without an attribute.

21. I bow to you, the Lord of the worlds, the embodiment of Supreme spiritual knowledge. Salutations to the Deity ever favourably disposed to good devotees. Obeisance to you who are of auspicious nature.

22. For the achievement of desired object, I bow unto that Lord, the Primordial Person whose incarnated forms are worshipped by prominent sages.

23. I bow down to that Cause of the universe, the Controller of Māyā, yet devoid of Māyā (i.e. not influenced by her) whom the Śrutis do not know and who is beyond the comprehension of sages.

24. I salute to him whom all pay obeisance, who is of a mysteriously surprising vision; who is the cause of the removal of Māyā, whose form constitutes the whole of the universe, and who is the cause of the universe.

25. I offer obeisance unto the consort of Kamalā (the Goddess Lakṣmī). People who bow to his feet (lit. whose forehead is saved by the service rendered to the filaments of his lotus-like feet) attain the highest Siddhi (Mokṣa).

26. God Brahmā and other Devas do not comprehend his glory, but he is very close to his devotees. I salute that close associate of devotees.

27. Though he himself is absolutely unattached and companionless, the Lord who is the ocean of mercy, blesses with his contact, people who have renounced all association and attachment, and who are calm and quiet. I bow to him.

28. I salute to the Lord of sacrifices; one who is the very rite of performance of sacrifices; one who is established in the rites of sacrifices; one who bestows the fruit of sacrifices; one who enlightens people about the sacrificial rites.

29. I bow down to that Lord, who is the witness unto all the universe. By uttering his name, even Ajāmila,[3] the sinning soul, instantaneously attained to the Supreme region (Vaikuṇṭha).

30. Mahādeva is a form of Hari and Janārdana is in the form of Śiva. Thus, that Lord is the leader of the world. I bow down to that preceptor of the universe.

31. I bow to the Leader of all, the noose of whose Māyā binds and restrains Brahmā and other lords of gods who, therefore, do not know his essential, Supreme nature.

32. I salute to that witness of perfect wisdom who appears to be stationed far away, though (actually) he is enthroned in the lotus of the heart of Yogins. his very presence is beyond the scope of cognition by means of valid knowledge.

33. Obeisance unto that Lord from whose mouth was born the Brāhmaṇa, from whose arms, came forth the Kṣattriya; from whose thighs was born the Vaiśya and from whose feet the Śūdra was born.

34. From whose mind was evolved the moon, from whose eyes the sun was born, from whose mouth Agni the fire God and Indra came forth, from whose Prāṇa (vital breath) the wind-god was born.[4]

35. I bow to the Lord who is the embodiment of the Ṛk, Yajus and Sāman (Vedas), whose Ātman has permeated the seven notes of the musical scale.[5] I bow to you again and again—you whose form is comprised of six Aṅgas.[6]

36. O Lord, you are Indra, Pavana (the wind God), Soma (the moon God), you are Īśāna, you are the annihilator (of the world); you are Agni (the fire God) Nirṛti, (the Deity of death); you are Varuṇa, the Lord of the seas and also Divākara, the sun-god.

37. The celestial residents, the immobile beings, Piśācas, Rākṣasas, mountains, Siddhas, Gandharvas (Heavenly musicians), the rivers, earth and oceans — all these are your manifestations.

38. You alone are the Lord of the worlds; wherever you are, you are greater than the greatest; everything exists within your person; O Lord, my obeisance be to you for ever.

39. O protector of the helpless ! O omniscient Lord ! O Lord, who comprise within your body all living beings right upto the Lord of gods. O Janārdana, protect my sons who are harrassed by Daityas".

40. Eulogising him thus and bowing again and again unto the Lord, the mother of the Devas spoke with palms joined in reverence, and tears of joy drenching her bosom.

41. "O Lord of Devas; O the first cause of everything, it behoves you to bless me. Be pleased to grant unto my sons, the heaven-dwellers, prosperity, freedom from nuisance and troubles.

42. O indwelling soul of the world ! One immanent in the universe ! O omniscient ! Supreme Lord ! What is unknown to you, O Lord of Lakṣmī ? What is it that you make me long for (is already known to you) ?

43. I shall, however, tell you what appeals to my mind. O Lord of Devas, I have become as if bereaved of my sons. The existence of my sons is in vain and futile, as they are harassed by Daityas.

44. I do not wish to cause any harm unto Daityas, since they too are my sons.[7] O Lord of gods, without killing them, bless my sons with fortune and prosperity."

45. The Lord of the chiefs of Devas who was thus addressed again, became delighted. O Brāhmaṇa, he respectfully addressed the mother of Devas in words giving her delight.

The Lord said :

46. O gentle lady ! I am pleased with you. May good betide you. I shall, therefore, be your son, since O goddess, affection towards sons of one's co-wife is rare.

47. Men who read and recite this prayer composed by you will never be deficient in excellent riches and sons.

48. He who treats his own son as well as that of another person with equality, will never experience sorrow, due to separation or bereavement of his son. This is the eternal Dharma."

Aditi said :

49. "O Lord, I am unable to bear you (in my womb)—you who are the Supreme First Person, the greatest Being with innumerable cosmic eggs constituting the hair on your body; you, the Lord of all, the cause or creator of the world.

50. O Lord, how can I bear that Supreme chief of the leaders of gods, whose prowess even the Śrutis and all the deities cannot comprehend.

51. O Lord, you are the Puruṣottama (the Supreme Person), the eternal Lord (hence unborn), minuter than the minutest and greater than the greatest.[8] How can I bear you ?

52. How does that Lord, the very remembrance of whose name liberates a man, vitiated by great sins, deserve the birth among the rustic and the unrefined ?

53. May this incarnation of yours, O Lord, be like that of your other incarnations, like the boar, the fish. Who can comprehend your activities, O Lord of the universe?

54. I bow down to your lotus feet. I am devotedly attached to the remembrance of your names. O Lord, I contemplate exclusively on you. Do as you please."

Sanaka Said :

55. On hearing the words uttered by her, Janārdana, the Lord of Devas, granted to the mother of gods the boon of fearlessness (and security from dangers). He addressed her the following words:

The glorious Lord said :

56. "O highly blessed Lady, there is no doubt about the truth that has been uttered by you; however, O auspicious lady, I shall tell you the secret of secrets.

57. My votaries who are devoid of passionate attachment and hatred and are devoutly attached to me, who are devoid of jealousy and are free from hypocrisy, do perpetually bear me.

58. Those who are disinclined to cause injury to others, who are interested and engaged in devotion to Śiva, and who are intensely devoted to the listening of my stories, perpetually bear me.

59. O gentle Lady, even those chaste women who love their husbands like their very vital breath, and are exclusively devoted to their husbands and have eschewed malice and rivalry, perpetually bear me.

60. He who renders service to his parents, is a devotee to the preceptor, who likes to receive and serve guests, and who is benefactor unto the Brāhmaṇas, perpetually bears me.

61. Those who always take delight in visiting holy places, who are engaged in associating themselves with saintly people, and who are habitually obliging and favouring other people—all these perpetually bear me.

62. Those who are interested in helping others, those who are not desirous of the wealth of another person and who cherish no illicit desire when other men's wives are concerned—these bear me perpetually.

63. Those who always worship with Tulasī plant, those who are attached to the names of the Lord and those who carefully protect cows—all these bear me perpetually.

64. Those who desist from accepting monetary gifts, those who do not take food at another man's house and those who make gifts of food and water to the needy, do perpetually bear me.

65. O gentle Lady, you value your husband like your own vital breath; you are virtuous and you take delight in the welfare of all living beings. Hence, I shall assume the state of being your son and fulfil your desire."

66. After addressing thus to Aditi the mother of Devas, the Lord of the chiefs of Devas gave her the necklace from his neck and blessed her with fearlessness and protection from danger, and vanished.

67. The mother of the gods, the daughter of Dakṣa, bowed to the consort of Lakṣmī with extremely delighted mind and went back to her own abode.

68. Thereafter, the highly blessed Aditi, who was extremely glad and was respected all over the world, in due course of time gave birth to a son whom the whole world paid obeisance.

69. He was named Vāmana. He was holding a conch and a discus, in his hands. He was quiescent. He shone in the middle of the lunar sphere. The pot of nectar and curds mixed with cooked rice were in his hands.

70. He was Lord Viṣṇu himself resembling thousand suns in brilliance. His eyes were like a full blown lotus. He was adorned with all ornaments and was clad in yellow garment.

71. Realising that Hari who was worthy of being eulogised and was the sole leader of all the worlds, had manifested himself accompanied by hosts of sages, Kaśyapa was overwhelmed with joy. With palms joined in reverence, he bowed to him and began to praise him.

Kaśyapa prayed :

72. "I pay obeisance again and again to the cause (the creator) of all the worlds. I bow again and again to the protector of the entire universe. I salute again and again to the leader of immortal beings. Obeisance to the destroyer of Daityas.

73. Obeisance, obeisance to one who is the beloved of his devotees. Salutations to him who is beloved of the good people. I bow again and again to the annihilator of the wicked. My bow to the lord of the universe.

74. Salutations to Vāmana, the cause of the universe. Obeisance to Nārāyaṇa of infinite prowess. I bow to the wielder of the discus (Sudarśana), the sword (Nandaka), the mace (Kaumodakī) along with the Śārṅga bow. Obeisance be to that Supreme Person.

75. Salutations to the resident of the ocean of milk. Obeisance to one enthroned in the lotus-like heart of the pious. Obeisance to the Lord of immeasurable splendour of luminaries like the sun, etc. I bow again and again to the God glorified in holy stories.

76. I pay obeisance to him whose eyes are the sun and the moon. Salutations be to you, the bestower of the fruits of sacrifices. Salutations to the god who is the resplendent embodiment of sacrifice. Obeisance to you the lover of saintly persons (or beloved of saints).

77. Obeisance to the Primary Cause of the creative factors of the universe. Salutations to him who is beyond the range of sound, etc. Bow to you the bestower of divine bliss. I bow again and again to one who abides in the minds of his devotees.

78. Obeisance to you the dispeller of darkness (of ignorance). Salutations to you the supporter of the mount Mandara (at the time of churning the ocean for nectar). Bow to you who are designated as Yajñavārāha (Boar incarnation representing Yajña).[9] Salutations to the slayer of Hiraṇyākṣa.[10]

79. Obeisance to you who have assumed the form of a divine dwarf (Vāmana). Salutations to the annihilator of the Kṣattriya race (i.e. Paraśurāma).[11] I bow to you the suppressor of Rāvaṇa (i.e. Śrī Rāma). Obeisance to the elder brother of cow-herd Nanda's daughter (i.e. Śrī Kṛṣṇa).

80. O consort of goddess Lakṣmī, Obeisance to you. Salutations to you, the bestower of happiness. I bow again and again to you, the destroyer of the distress of those who remember you.

81. O Lord of sacrifices, O receptacle of sacrifices, O destroyer of obstacles to sacrifices, O embodiment of Yajña, O sacrificer incarnate, I worship you whose person is constituted of the various parts of Yajña."

82. Thus eulogised, Vâmana, the Lord of the earth, the sanctifier of the worlds, laughingly spoke thus, enhancing the delight of Kaśyapa.

The glorious Lord said :

83. "O dear father who are worshipped by gods, I am pleased with you. You will be blessed with good fortune. Ere long, I shall accomplish for you all your desires.

84. In the two previous births of mine, I had been a son unto both of you. Similarly, in this birth also I shall achieve what is excellent happiness for you."

85. In the meantime, the Daitya Bali began a great sacrifice of long duration with the help of his preceptor Kāvya (i.e. Śukra) and other great and prominent sages.

86. In that sacrifice, Viṣṇu accompanied by Lakṣmī had been invoked by the sages, the expounders of the Brahman or the Vedas, in order to accept the sacrificial offerings.

87. Taking leave of his mother and father, that Brāhmaṇa bachelor Vāmana, went over to the great sacrifice of the supremely affluent Daitya, that was being performed.

88. Vāmana, favourably disposed towards his devotees, fascinated the world with his smile. He was Hari himself who had come as if to take part of the sacrificial oblations offered by Bali, directly.

89. Hari is always present in the heart of persons endowed with devotion, irrespective of whether his votary is evil-minded or good-natured, whether he is insentient or benevolent.

90. On seeing Vāmana coming, the sages, blessed with the vision of spiritual knowledge, knew him to be Lord Nārāyaṇa. They stood up (to show him respect), along with the other members of assembly.

91. Having come to know of this, the preceptor of Daityas said to Bali in privacy. Indeed wicked men commit many acts without judging (estimating correctly) their own strength and weakness.

Śukra said :

92. "O gentle-natured Lord of Daityas, Viṣṇu who in the form of Vāmana (Dwarf) is born as the son of Aditi, will deprive you of your riches and glory.

93. O Lord of Asuras, he will pay a visit to your sacrifice. Nothing should be given to him by you. O learned one, please listen to my advice.

94. One's own intellect is conducive to happiness. Particularly so is the intellect (i.e. intellectual guidance) of the preceptor. The intellect of an enemy is destructive and a woman's intellect causes complete destruction (lit. dissolution).

95. He who is the benefactor of one's enemy should be especially killed straightway."

Bali replied :

96. "O preceptor, you should not tender such an advice which is contrary to the path of virtue. If Viṣṇu himself partakes of oblations or gifts, what can be better than that?

97. Learned men perform sacrifices for the purpose of propitiating Viṣṇu. If he personally comes and partakes of oblations offered, who can be superior to me on this earth ?

98. If anything is given to Viṣṇu, even by an indigent person, O preceptor, that is the greatest of charitable gifts. That gift which is so given, becomes ever-lasting in its benefits.

99. Even when simply remembered with great devotion, the Supreme Person sanctifies the rememberer. By whomsoever he is worshipped, he awards to him the highest state of existence i.e. Mokṣa.

100. Even when remembered by evil-minded persons, Hari dispels their sins, just as the fire even if touched unwillingly, (invariably) does burn.

101. If the two syllables HA-RI stay at the tip of the tongue, that man attains the region of Viṣṇu from which the return to Saṁsāra is very difficult (impossible).

102. Wise men say that he who constantly meditates on Govinda, without passionate attachment, etc. (to the worldly objects), goes to Viṣṇu's abode.

103. O highly blessed preceptor, if oblations are offered to the fire or to Brāhmaṇa with devotion to Hari, Viṣṇu becomes delighted with it (viz. oblations offered to fire or the gift given to a Brāhmaṇa.)

104. I am performing this excellent sacrifice for the propitiation of Hari. If Hari himself comes to it, I am undoubtedly satisfied and have accomplished my objects."

105. Even as the Lord of Daityas was speaking thus, Viṣṇu who had assumed the form of a Dwarf, entered the sacrificial hall that was charming (and resplendent) due to the consecrated fire.

106. On seeing Vāmana who had the refulgence of ten million suns and who was extremely handsome, Bali stood up suddenly and greeted him with palms folded in reverence.

107. He offered him a seat. After washing the feet of the Lord in the form of Vāmana, he (sprinkled the water of washing) over his own head and on the heads of other members of his family. He derived great joy thereby.

108. After duly offering Arghya (respectful offerings given to a distinguished guest) to Viṣṇu, the abode of the universe, Bali was greatly delighted. All the hairs over his body stood on their ends and tears of joy welled up in his eyes.

Bali said :

109. I have accomplished the purpose of my birth to-day. It is to-day that my sacrifice has become fruitful. My life has also become fruitful to-day. Undoubtedly, I have achieved the goal of human life and I am contented.

110. Extremely rare (opportunity of the) shower of nectar which never goes waste, has come to my lot. By your very arrival a great festival has been accomplished without entailing any strain.

111. There is no doubt in this that all these sages have also achieved their goal in life. Whatever penance they have formerly performed, has become fruitful to-day.

112. I am blessed and contented. I repeat that I am really blessed and contented. Undoubtedly, I have achieved the purpose of my life. Hence, obeisance unto you. Salutations unto you. Repeated bows to you.

113. I think that I should carry out your behest with your own permission. O Lord, command me who have been fired with great enthusiasm."

114. Thus urged by that Daitya who was consecrated (for the sacrifice), Vāmana said laughingly:—"Give unto me as much space as can be measured by my three steps, in order to stand in and perform the penance."

115. On hearing it, Bali said : "You have not requested for a kingdom. Not even a village or a city or even wealth has been requested for by you. What have you done ? (what a gift you have requested !)."

116. On hearing it, Viṣṇu who bears all bodies (by pervading them) said to Bali as if with a view to create detachment in him who was about to be deposed from his kingdom.

The glorious Lord said :

117. "O Lord of Daityas, listen to me. I shall tell you the great secret of secrets. Please tell me what can be realised through riches in the case of those who have eschewed all worldly contacts and attachment.

118. Think over this that I am the Inner Controller in all living beings. O Daitya, all these things existing in the universe are within me. Tell me what can be achieved by others (i.e. objects or gifts).

119. What can be realised by means of other external riches in the case of those who are devoid of attachment and hatred, who are quiescent and have eschewed Māyā and who are embodiment of eternal bliss ?

120. To those who perceive all living beings like their own Ātman (Self), to those whose minds are quite serene and to those to whom everything is non-different from the Ātman, who is the giver and what can be given ?

121. It is the decisive conclusion in all Scriptures that this Earth is subject to the control of the Kṣatriyas. All the people who abide by their behests, achieve the greatest happiness.

122. O Bali, the revenue of one-sixth part of the entire produce should be given to the king even by sages. This Earth should be granted to the Brāhmaṇas with special efforts.

123. The greatness of the charitable gift of land[12] cannot be adequately described, as such a kind of gift has never been offered before (in the past) nor will it ever be so (in future). Undoubtedly a donor of lands attains the Supreme Nirvāṇa (Emancipation from Saṁsāra).

124. By giving a small piece of land to a Brāhmaṇa who is well versed in the Vedas and maintains the sacrificial fires, the donor attains Brahmaloka (region of Brahman), return from which is difficult.

125. A donor of lands is said to be a giver of all. A giver of lands will attain emancipation from saṁsāra. It is to be known as the highest type of religious gift.[13] It absolves the donor of all sins.

126. Even if one is vitiated by five great sins or even by all kinds of sins, one is absolved from them by gifting away ten cubits of land (hasta=24 Aṅgulas or 18 inches).

127. He who bestows a charitable gift of land on a deserving person, shall attain the fruit of all kinds of charitable gifts. There is nothing in the three worlds which is equivalent to a charitable land grant.

128. O Bali, even in hundreds of years, I shall not be able to describe adequately the meritorious benefits of a person who donates lands to a Brāhmaṇa who has no means of livelihood.

129. O Lord of Daityas, he who gives in charity even a small piece of land to a person who has no means of subsistence, but who is interested in the worship of the Lord, is undoubtedly Viṣṇu himself.

130. There is no doubt in this that he, by whom a piece of land with a flourishing crop of sugarcane, wheat, pulses, areca palm and other trees is donated, is Lord Viṣṇu incarnate.

131. By donating even a small piece of land to an indigent Brāhmaṇa who has no means of livelihood and who is burdened with a big family, one shall attain Sāyujya (identity) with god Viṣṇu (by being absorbed into his divine essence).

132. By giving a piece of land sufficient for sowing one āḍhaka—full of grain to a Brāhmaṇa who is interested in divine worship, one attains the benefit of performing ablution in the holy Gaṅgā for three days.

133-134. Listen to the benefit one derives by giving a droṇikā of land (i.e. a piece of land sufficient to sow a droṇa or four āḍhakas of grain) to a Brāhmaṇa who is devoid of any means of subsistence and who is engaged in saintly conduct of life. Such a person attains that enormous merit which a man obtains by performing hundreds of ablutions in the Gaṅgā, pilgrimage to a hundred sacred places and performance of a hundred horse sacrifices.

135. I shall explain to you the merit that accrues to a person who gives a Khārikā of land (i.e. land sufficient for sowing 16 droṇas of grain) to an indigent Brāhmaṇa. Please be attentive to it, even as I relate it to you.

136. He, the donor, shall obtain that fruit which one obtains after performing thousands of horse sacrifices and hundreds of Vājapeya sacrifices on the bank of the holy Gaṅgā.

137. The gift of a land is glorified as a great gift[14] — a gift which surpasses all other kinds of donations. It subsides (i.e. absolves the donor of) all the sins and confers on him the benefit of liberation from saṁsāra.

138. O Lord of Daitya clans, listen to me as I shall relate to you an ancient anecdote in this connection. A person who listens to this with faith, shall obtain the merit of donating lands.

139. O Bali, formerly in the Brāhma Kalpa, there was a highly intelligent and excellent Brāhmaṇa by name Bhadramati. He was indigent and had no means of livelihood.

140. All scriptures have been ever heard (i.e. learnt) by that Brāhmaṇa who was expert in the knowledge of the Vedas. All the Purāṇas and treatises on the Dharmaśāstra had been mastered by him.

141. He had six wives, viz. Śruti, Sindhu, Yaśovatī, Kāminī, Mālinī and Śobhā.

142-143. O excellent Asura, from these wives he begot two hundred and forty sons. All of them suffered from perpetual starvation. On seeing his sons and wives starving with hunger and himself feeling the poignancy of hunger, the indigent Bhadramati lamented loudly with all his sense-organs afflicted and famished with hunger.

144. "Fie upon this life devoid of good fortune ! Shame upon that life wanting in wealth ! Fie upon that life which is wanting in virtue ! Fie upon that life which is devoid of good name !

145-147. Pity the life of a man bereft of prosperity and burdened with a number of children ! Alas ! Virtues, gentleness, scholarship, nobility of birth—all these do not shine in a man immersed in the ocean of destitution. Beloved wives, sons, grandsons, brothers, kinsmen and disciples—nay, all men forsake the man devoid of wealth. Only the fortunate one irrespective of his being a Brāhmaṇa or a Cāṇḍāla, is respectfully honoured.

148-149. A poor man is condemned in the world like a dead body. Alas ! If a person is endowed with wealth, he is hailed as a kind man though he may be ruthless; though he be deficient in all good qualities, he is still considered to be endowed with all virtues; though he be foolish, he is still regarded as a scholar. One is undoubtedly praiseworthy only if one is endowed with the virtue of being rich.

150. Alas ! Indigence is certainly miserable. Still more grievously painful is the wishful expectation (of getting something from others). Men overwhelmed with false wishful expectations (from others) experience everlasting misery.

151. Those who are the slaves of wishful expectations are the bondsmen or helots of the entire world. But the whole world submits to those who have subdued their wishful (but false) hopes.

152. Honour is said to be the everlasting wealth of great men in the world. If honour is ruined by the enemy called "hopeful expectation", one is faced with poverty.

153. Even an expert in the interpretation of all scriptural texts appears to be a fool if he is poverty-stricken. Who can rescue those persons in the grip of the great crocodile called "pennylessness" ?

154. O misery ! O misery ! Poverty itself is a great misery. There too, if one has numerous wives and sons, it is all the more painful."

155. After lamenting thus (lit. saying this) Bhadramati, the master of all scriptural topics, mentally thought about other religious rites (efficacious in) bestowing prosperity.

156. He came to the decision that charitable gift of lands is the most excellent of all charitable gifts. He who consents to a charitable gift, is as good as one who has formerly given it.

157. Dāna or a charitable gift is the greatest merit or virtue that enables one to reach (his destination). It bestows the fruit of all cherished desires. The gift of lands is glorified as the best of all dānas.

158-159. After making a gift of land, a man obtains whatever is most desirable to him". O Bali, after deciding thus, the intelligent and self-possessed Bhadramati went to the city named Kauśāmbī,[15] along with his wives and children. He approached the leading Brāhmaṇa thereof named Sughoṣa who was endowed with affluence. O Bali, he then requested Sughoṣa for a plot of land extending to five cubits (hastas).

160-162. Observing that he was a man burdened with a large family, Sughoṣa, who was virtuously inclined, honoured him with a delighted mind and addressed him thus : "O Bhadramati, I feel I have achieved my objectives in life. My life is fruitful. O Brāhmaṇa, thanks to your blessings, my family has become sanctified". After saying these words and honouring him suitably, the highly intelligent and virtuous Sughoṣa donated to him a plot of land extending to five cubits (hastas).

163-165a. (The mantra to be uttered at the time of donation) "The holy earth belongs to Viṣṇu. The Earth is protected by Viṣṇu. Thanks to the gift of this earth, may lord Janārdana be pleased with me". Sughoṣa conceived that excellent Brāhmaṇa to be Viṣṇu and worshipped him with the (above) Mantra and granted him that much land, O lord of Daityas !

165b-167. The Brāhmaṇa Bhadramati gave the piece of land as requested by that intelligent one who was a Brāhmaṇa devotee of Hari, well-versed in the Vedas and had a large family to support. Due to the merit accrued from the gift of the land, Sughoṣa along with ten million members of his family, attained Viṣṇu's abode on reaching which one ceases to worry and grieve. O Bali, since he sought glory and prosperity, Bhadramati also stayed in Viṣṇu's abode for ten thousand yugas along with the members of his family.

168-170. Similarly, he stayed in the region of Brahmā for ten thousand crores of yugas, and he attained the abode of Indra where he stayed for five kalpas. Thereafter, he came back to the Earth. He was endowed with every affluence, he was highly blessed. He could even remember his previous births. He enjoyed all excellent pleasures. Thereafter, O Daitya, Bhadramati became free from all desires. Devotedly attached to Viṣṇu, he gave his lands unto the Brāhmaṇas who had no means of livelihood.

171-172. Lord Viṣṇu became pleased with him. He conferred upon him all excellent rites and blessed him along with ten million members of his family, by bestowing upon them the highest emancipations from saṁsāra. Hence, O Lord of Daityas, interested in all holy rites, give unto me a plot of land measuring three steps. I shall perform penance there for the sake of salvation."

173b-176a. The delighted son of Virocana, thereafter, took up a pitcher filled with water[16] to grant the land to Vāmana[17] in the guise of a religious student. Viṣṇu, the omnipresent, realised that Kāvya (Śukra) was obstructing the flow of water (from the spout of the pitcher). He, therefore, introduced the tip of the Kuśa grass that was in his hand into the spout of the pitcher. At the tip of the blade of the darbha grass, there was the never-failing great weapon pertaining to Brahmā (Brahmāstra). It had the lustre of ten million suns. It was very fierce and was desirous of plucking the eye of Kāvya.

176b-177. "O preceptor, Bhārgava, see the gods or the demons with a single eye (probably implying "Look at them impartially")", so commanded the tip of the darbha grass which resembled a weapon. Bali granted Viṣṇu as much land as could be measured in three spaces.[18]

178. Viṣṇu that Soul of the Universe began to grow in size till he reached the abode of Brahmā. Hari who contains the Universe in his own person measured the world in two paces.

179-180. The refulgent Lord covered all the Regions delimited by the semi-spheroidal crust of the region of Brahmā. The outer crust of the egg of the Universe pierced by the tip of his tow was split into two.[19] Through it, the cosmic water enveloping the outer crust of the egg of the universe, rushed in many torrential currents and washed the feet of Viṣṇu — water that thereby became pure and sanctified the world.

181. The water was enveloping the egg of Brahmā (that is the Universe) from outside. It rushed in jets of currents. That water was extremely sacred and it sanctified god Brahmā and other gods.

182. It was served and resorted to by the seven sages (The Ursa Major). Then it fell on the top of mount Meru.

183. On seeing this miraculous phenomenon, gods of whom Brahmā was prominent, the sages and the Manus were overwhelmed with ecstatic delight and they eulogised him.

The gods said :

184. "Obeisance to the great Īśa (The Ruler of the Universe) whose form is the Supreme Self; Salutations to him who transcends the transcendents; bow to him that assumes the highest form; salutations to the Ātman of Brahmā. Obeisance to him whose Soul and Intellect take delight in the Brahman; bow to him whose activities are invariably unobstructed.

185. O great Īśa, the highest bliss, O Supreme Ātman, greater than the greatest. Obeisance to you the indwelling soul of all; O embodiment of the Universe, who are beyond the pale of valid means of knowledge, we bow to you.

186. Obeisance to you who (being immanent in the Universe) have eyes all round; salutation to you who have arms and heads all round; bow to you who course everywhere.

187. Thus eulogised by Brahmā and others, the great Viṣṇu granted the boon of fearlessness to the heavendwellers and the Eternal Lord of devas was over-joyed.

188. Due to Bali's inability to grant land for one more step, he imprisoned Bali, the son of Virocana. Thereafter, knowing that he was dedicated unto him, he (Viṣṇu) gave him (Bali) the dominion in the nether world called Rasātala for his residence. The Lord who is ever under the control of his devotees, became his (Bali's) doorkeeper.

Nārada said :

189. "What diet was assigned by Mahāviṣṇu to the son of Virocana, in the terrible region of Rasātala which is dangerous due to the fear of serpents ?"

Sanaka replied :

190-191. The oblations consigned to the fire without proper chanting of the Mantras, whatever is given to a non-deserving person, black magic for obtaining the means of enjoyment, what is consigned to the sacred fire, whatever is given in charity or holy rites performed by persons in an impure state—in fact all acts, etc. which bring about one's downfall—all these deserve to be Bali's means of enjoyment.

192. In this way god Viṣṇu gave the nether world called Rasātala to Bali along with all his Asuras. Offering fearlessness (a secure place) to all gods, Viṣṇu granted them heaven.

193. While he was being worshipped by the groups of immortals (gods), eulogised by great sages and sung about by Gandharvas, he once again resumed the form of the divine Dwarf (Vāmana).

194. Witnessing this great deed, the sages, the expounders of the Brahman, smiled at one another and bowed to the Supreme Person (Puruṣottama).

195. Lord Viṣṇu, the Soul abiding in all living beings, who had assumed the state of a Dwarf (Vāmana) fascinated the entire world and repaired to forest for performing penance.

196. Of such sanctifying power is the goddess Gaṅgā who originated from Viṣṇu's feet. By merely remembering her, one is liberated from all sins.

197. Whoever reads or listens to this narrative of the glory of the Gaṅgā, in a temple or on the banks of the river, shall obtain the fruit of the performance of a horse-sacrifice (Aśvamedha).

CHAPTER ELEVEN

The Glory of the Gaṅgā : The Origin of the River

1. Bhakti or devotion is a favourite topic of Purāṇa-writers. In *NP.*I.4.1-42, I.15.39-40, *Bh.P.*III. 29.1-45, XI.5.1-52, *KP.*II.11.68-106 etc. we find Bhakti is highly extolled.

2. Although the NP. is regarded as a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa, we find that Śiva worship is also glorified and Śiva and Viṣṇu are regarded as identical (vide verses 30, 58 below). The same is found in the so-called Śaivite Purāṇas. The authors of Purāṇas emphasize that the Brahman is one, and Śiva, Viṣṇu etc. are its designations or manifestation, and hence are equal or identical—a continuation of the Vedic Thought—ekaṁ sad viprā bahudhā vadanti /. *RV.*I.164. 46c. *AV.*IX.10.28c.

3. Ajāmiḷa, according to Bh.P. VI chs. 1-3, was an extremely sinful Brahmin of Kānyakubja. At the time of his death, he uttered the name 'Nārāyaṇa' with the intention of calling his son. But this utterance of the name of God saved him and he attained to Vaikuṇṭha. The story of Ajāmila is always mentioned as an instance of the efficacy of God's name.

4. A Purāṇic paraphrase of the *Puruṣa-sūkta RV.*X.90.12 & 13. The mantras are repeated in *AV.*XIX.6.6-7 Vāj.Saṁ. 31.11-12. The Sūkta has been paraphrased in other Purāṇas also, vide Bh.P. II.ch.6.

5. The notes of the Indian musical scale or gamut are seven. They are inumerated in the Amara Kośa as follows :

niṣādarṣabha-gāndhāra-ṣaḍja-madhyama-dhaivatāḥ / pañcamaś cetyamī sapta tantrīkaṇṭhotthitāḥ svarāḥ //

In common parlance they are stated as : sā, re, ga, ma, pa, dha, nī.

6. The six accessories (of the Vedas) are as follows : Śikṣā (phonetics), Kalpa (rules of rituals), Vyākaraṇa (Grammar), nirukta (etymology), Chandas (prosody), jyotiṣa (astronomy).

7. Aditi was Diti's sister and both the sisters married to Kaśyapa. Hence Diti's sons—Daityas—are Aditi's sons (i.e. step-sons) as well.

8. The expression aṇoraṇīyān, etc. was very popular in upaniṣads and found in Kaṭha 2.20, Śvet. 3.20, mahānārāyaṇa 8.3, Kaivalya 20. The continuity of Vedic Sūktas, Upaniṣadic mantras in purāṇas testify to the continuity of Vedic tradition (thought, expression, passages, etc.) during the Purāṇic age.

9. Originally yajña-varāha is an entirely Vedic concept having a profound meaning with reference to Vedic cosmogony. The VaP. first adopted it from Tait.Brāh. 1.2.13 (Sāyaṇa) and included it in the Sṛṣṭi-varṇana. The Mt.P. elaborated it at the fag end in ch. 238 where the correspondence between the various elements of sacrifice or Yajña and the different limbs of the body of Varāha as an animal, are mentioned.

There is a Yajña-Varāha image of 10th cent. A.D. at Vihāra (ancient Varāhanagara) 8 miles from Vijāpur in North Gujarat.

10. Here Kaśyapa bows to the previous incarnations of Vāmana (Viṣṇu), viz. the divine tortoise, the boar-incarnation who while uplifting the earth from the bottom of the ocean, killed demon Hiraṇyākṣa and the Man-Lion who tore up Hiraṇyakaśipu with his claws. The NP. wrongly names Hiraṇyākṣa whom Varāha killed, but the adjective vidārakāya implies the Man-Lion incarnation, who killed Hiraṇyakaśipu with his claws.

Yajña-varāha :

11. The author of the NP. makes Kaśyapa to pay obeisance to the future incarnations of Viṣṇu, viz. Paraśurāma, Rāma and Kṛṣṇa.

12. The gift of land has been highly praised as the most meritorious, from ancient times. Aparārka (pp.368-70) quotes many verses from the Viṣṇudharmottara, the Āditya Purāṇa and Matsya Purāṇa, KP.II.26.15 and states that there is no gift comparable to the gift of the land. Verses pertaining to land-grant are common not only in Purāṇas or Smṛti works but are recorded on inscriptions and copper-plates of such grants all over India, (vide Kane-Hist. Dhs. vol.II.ii., pp. 1271-77).

13. According to *Vasiṣṭha Smṛ.*29.19 gifts of cows, land and learning (Sarasvatī) are the supreme dānas (atidānas). Mbh.Anu. 62.2 however, regards gift of land as atidāna.

14. Cf. ati-dānāni sarvāṇi pṛthivīdānam ucyate /

Mbh.Anu. 62.2

15. Kauśāmbi—Modern Kosam, a village on the left bank of the Jamuna about 30 miles to the west of Allahabad. Formerly it was the capital of King Udayana of Vatsadeśa.

16. According to Āpastamba Dharma S. II.4.9.9-10 the donor has to pour water on the hands of the donee—sarvāṇyudaka-pūrvāṇi dānāni /

17. According to the legend of Viśvakarman Bhauvana narrated in the Aitareya Br. 39.7, and Śatapatha Br. XIII.7.1. 13-15, a king is not to gift land. When Viśvakarman was about to give away the earth to his sacrificial priest Kaśyapa, the earth manifested herself and strongly protested against it saying no man should give away land and threatened him that she would plunge herself in water and render his promise of gift fruitless :

na mâ martyaḥ Kaścana dātum arhati / Viśvakarman Bhauvana mâ didāsitha // nimaṅkṣyé'haṁ salilasya madhye moghas ta eṣa kaśyapāya Saṅgaraḥ //

This foresight and prudence in restrictions on landgrants were later not respected, and not only Pauranic Kings like Bali and Hariścandra, but historical persons vied with each other in donating lands, villages, etc., as can be seen from inscriptions, copper plates, sanads, etc.

18. This act of Bali is criticised even in subhāṣitas warning against excesses of good things :

ati-dānād Balir baddhaḥ...
ati sarvatra varjayet /

Smṛti texts have been very emphatic in prohibiting gifts causing detriment to the family. Thus Manu (XI.9) condemns charity causing misery to the members of his family as false dharma.

Śaktaḥ para-jane dātā svajane duḥkhajīvini / madhvāpāto viṣasvādaḥ sa dharmapratirūpakaḥ //

Yājñavalkya II.175 prescribes that no detriment to one's family be caused by one's gifts.

It can be argued that grant of three paces of land to a dwarf (Vāmana) was ridiculously insignificant and Bali never anticipated that the boy will be a cosmic person. But Śukra gave him clear warning that Viṣṇu was coming as Vāmana to deprive him of his kingdom. In the Bh.P. VIII.20.15 Śukra calls him an obstinate learned-fool who transgresses the order of his guru and curses him—rather predicts his fall.

Mahā-Viṣṇu might be physically a cosmic person pervading the heavens in one step, but morally Bali is much taller than Viṣṇu.

19. The story of Bali is introduced to explain how the Gaṅgā flowed into the universe, became pure by washing Viṣṇu's feet and descended on the mount Meru. For the actual phenomenon even at present vide S.M. Ali's account in Geography in the Purāṇas, pp. 63-64.

CHAPTER TWELVE

A dialogue between god Dharma and King Bhagiratha

Nārada inquired :

1. The great glory of the Gaṅgā has been heard. It is desirable, as it destroys all sins. Now, dear brother, tell me the characteristic of charitable gifts as well as of the persons deserving the same.[1]

Sanaka replied :

2. A Brāhmaṇa is the greatest preceptor of all classes in the society. Charitable gifts should be given to him by one who is desirous of securing perpetuation of the fruit of his charitable gifts.

3. Without any fear or reservation, a Brāhmaṇa should accept charitable gifts from all, but neither a Kṣatriya nor a Vaiśya should ever accept a charitable gift or a donation.

4. Whatever is given to one who is of a fiery temper or is sonless or is addicted to hypocritical conduct of life and one who avoids his righteous duties and acts prescribed for his caste and state in life, becomes futile.[2]

5. Whatever is donated to a person indulging in adultery with another man's wife or to one who covets the wealth of another person, or to one who is an astrologer in name only (an imposter), is useless.

6. Whatever is given in charity to a man whose mind is prejudiced with jealousy or to an ungrateful person, or to a cheat or to a person who officiates as a priest at the sacrifice of an unauthorized and ineligible person, is fruitless.

7. Whatever is given to one who is a perpetual beggar, or to one who is violent and wicked or to a vendor of liquors, is profitless.

8. Whatever is given to a person who sells the Vedas (teaches after receiving fees for teaching) or one who sells the Smṛtis (i.e. charges fees for giving the rulings from Smṛtis) or to one who makes money by performing holy rites, is valueless, O Brāhmaṇa !

9. Whatever is donated as a charitable gift to a person who makes a living by singing songs or one whose wife is an unchaste slut or a person who harasses others, becomes useless.

10. Whatever is given to the following persons is unproductive of merits : viz. one who makes a living by sword (a person belonging to the military profession); one who earns his livelihood by preparation of ink (or clerical profession) an idol worshipper by profession,[3] the village priest and a washerman.

11. Whatever is given to one who works as a cook for another, to a poet or to the remover of an ailment or to one who eats prohibited food, is futile.

12. Whatever is given in charity to one who habitually partakes of Śūdra's food or to one who cremates the corpses of Śūdras or to one who takes food prepared by an unchaste woman, becomes futile.

13. Whatever is donated in charity to one who sells the name of Viṣṇu (i.e. accepts money for the japa, etc. of Viṣṇu) or to one who has given up the performance of Sandhyā prayers and to one who is (as it were) burnt by acceptance of monetary gifts from evil men, is unproductive.

14. Whatever is given to one who sleeps during the day or to one who indulges in sexual intercourse during day time or to one who takes food at the time of twilight (both the dawn and the dusk) is ineffectual.

15. Whatever is donated in charity to a person vitiated by great sins or by one who is excommunicated by his kinsmen and relatives or to a person who is a Kuṇḍa[4] (an adulterine son of a woman by another person while her husband is alive) or by a person who is a gola[5] (the bastard son of a widow) is fruitless.

16. Whatever is given to a rogue or to a person who has married before his elder brother's marriage or one who has taken his share of ancestral property before his elder brother or an erring fellow or a henpecked husband or an extremely wicked person, is unproductive of merit.

17. Whatever is given to one who partakes of meat and wine or to a lecherous libertine, or by a greedy person or to a thief or to a treacherous back-biter, is valueless.

18. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, one should neither give any gift nor accept any donation from those who are engaged in sinful activities or those who are always censured by good people. O Nārada, a charitable gift must be given with special efforts to one who is engaged in good and noble activities.

19. That dāna (charitable gift) is excellent which is offered with faith, after dedication unto Viṣṇu and requested for by a deserving person.[6]

20. O Nārada, the gift that is offered to a deserving person with a desire to get its benefit either in this world or in the next, is remembered (in Smṛti works) to be mediocre.

21. That dāna is considered to be the meanest—the dāna or charitable gift that is offered with hypocrisy or for causing injury to others or is given in violation of the scriptural injunctions in the matter or to an undeserving person, and by an infuriated person or by a person lacking in faith.

22. The lowest type of charitable gift is only for the satisfaction of merely an act of giving (oblation ?). The mediocre dāna is for achieving selfish ends and the excellent type of dāna is for the propitiation of Lord Hari—so say excellent experts in the knowledge of Vedas.

23. Charitable gifts, enjoyment and destruction—these are the three ways of going away or spending of wealth.

24. The riches belonging to a person who neither gifts it away nor enjoys it himself, are the causes of his ruin. O Brāhmaṇa, wealth is that the fruit of which is Dharma and Dharma is that which propitiates god Viṣṇu.

25. Do not trees lead a life ? They live in this world for the sake of others, for they oblige others by providing them with their roots and fruits.

26-27. If men do not help others they are (no better than) dead, O prominent Brāhmaṇa. Those men who do not render service to others physically, mentally, by word of mouth or through money, should be considered as the most sinful persons. O Nārada, listen attentively to an ancient anecdote which I shall narrate to you in this connection.

28. In that story the characteristics of dāna (and other righteous deeds) have been described along with the greatness of the Gaṅgā, which destroys all sins.

29-30. It is in the form of a dialogue between king Bhagīratha and god Dharmarāja, as it is conducive to merit.

Formerly, there was a king named Bhagīratha, born in the lineage of Sagara. He ruled over the entire world consisting of seven continents, along with seven oceans. He was always engaged in righteous acts. He was truthful and very brave.

31. He was good-looking like the god of Love. He constantly performed sacrifices. In courage he was equal to the Himālaya and in piety (Dharma) he was equal to god Dharmarāja (god of Death). He was very intelligent.

32. He was richly endowed with all auspicious characteristics, O sage. He was an expert in all scriptural matters. He had all riches and prosperity. He gave delight to every one.

33. He was specially solicitous in offering hospitality to guests, and was engaged forever in the worship of Lord Vāsudeva. He was very valorous and a receptacle of good qualities. He was friendly, merciful and intelligent.

34. Having come to know that Bhagīratha was a king of this nature, god Dharmarāja became delighted. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, on one occasion he came down to see him.

35. The king greeted and honoured god Dharmarāja who had come to him, in accordance with the injunctions laid down in the scriptures (for receiving a distinguished guest). Dharmarāja who was pleased with him addressed him as follows :

God Dharmarāja said :

36. O king, you are the most excellent among the knowers of righteousness. You are famous in the three worlds. On hearing about your fame, Dharmarāja himself has come to see you personally.

37. Gods, fond of your excellent qualities, wish to see you, a truthful monarch engaged in the path of good and the welfare of all living beings.

38. O king, good qualities, saintly people and deities abide there where fame, morality or righteousness and affluence reside.

39. O highly blessed king, your conduct of life is splendid and exemplary. Your qualities such as striving for the welfare of all living beings, etc. are difficult to be found even in people like me".

40. When god Dharmarāja said this, Bhagīratha bowed down to him. Delighted yet overcome with a sense of modesty, he submitted to him in soft refined words.

Bhagiratha submitted :

41. "O Lord, the knower of all Dharmas (righteous duties), you are an impartial witness to everything. Filled with divine grace for me, be pleased to explain what I ask of you.

42. How many types of dharmas (sacred duties) are there ? What regions are reserved for persons who are righteous habitually ? How many kinds of tortures are there and to whom are they meted out ?

43. Who are the persons to be honoured by you and who are to be chastised ? O highly blessed one, it behoves you to mention all this in details."

Dharmarāja explained :

44. "Well done, O highly intelligent one, very well done. Your intellect is unblemished and powerful. I shall explain to you factually in details what are the righteous acts and what are the evil ones. Listen to it with faith and devotion.

45. Dharmas (righteous duties) have been proclaimed as being of various kinds. They are the bestowers of meritorious worlds. The tortures too are declared to be numerous and are very terrible to be viewed.

46. It is not possible to describe in details the examples of virtues and evils in hundreds and ten thousands of years. Hence, I shall mention them succinctly.

47. The gift of the means of livelihood to Brāhmaṇas is glorified as highly meritorious. Similarly, what is given unto a knower of spiritual lore is of ever-lasting benefit.

48. Listen to the meritorious benefits attained by one who bestows means of livelihood upon a scholar of scriptural texts who is burdened with a large family or upon a Vedic scholar blessed with all good qualities and stabilises him.

49. The twice-born donor accompanied by ten million members of his family on his mother's side and on his father's side, will enter Viṣṇu's abode and rejoice there for a period of a Kalpa.

50. Particles of dust on the earth can be counted. Drops of rain can be enumerated. But the benefits of providing Brāhmaṇas with means of livelihood cannot be estimated even by the Creator (god Brahmā).

51. A Brāhmaṇa is glorified as the embodiment of all deities. Who is competent to recount the merits of a person who provides him with the means of livelihood ?

52. He who is always a benefactor to Brāhmaṇas, has performed all sacrifices (i.e. he attains the same benefits as one who performs all sacrifices). He gets the credit of performing ablutions in all sacred waters and all types of penance have been performed by him.

53. He too who induces another to provide Brāhmaṇas with means of livelihood saying 'Give', attains the same merit as that of the donor. What need is there to expatiate on it ?

54. If a person constructs a lake or causes it to be dug through others, it is not possible to enumerate the merits of that person even with a span of life extending to a period of hundred years.

55. Even if a single wayfarer drinks the water of that lake, there is no doubt that all the sins of the digger of that lake are wiped out.

56. If a man is able to retain water on the surface of the earth, even for a single day, he will be absolved of all sins and shall reside in heaven, for a hundred years.

57. A person who associates himself with the work of digging a lake, according to his capacity, attains the fruit of the same (i.e. digging it himself), so also does the person who is glad at it or who persuades persons to do it.

58. If a man throws out of the tank mud of the size of a white mustard, he stays in the heaven for a hundred years, liberated from millions of sins.

59. O excellent king, the eternal Śruti states that if the deities or preceptors are pleased with any one, he shall derive the merit of digging lakes.

60. In this connection, O excellent king, I shall narrate to you a mythological anecdote on listening to which, one is undoubtedly liberated from all sins.

61. In the Gauḍa land, there was a very famous king named Vīrabhadraka. He was very valiant and learned. He was ever worshipful to Brāhmaṇas.

62. He was a follower of the code of conduct as prescribed in the Vedas and Smṛtis or scriptural texts and those handed down by family traditions. He increased his circle of friends. His queen named Campakamañjarī was a highly fortunate lady.

63. The great ministers of that king thought and pondered over what should be or should not be done. They always came to a decision in matters of Dharmas through Dharmaśāstras.

64. If a person, without consulting the Śāstric texts, gives a decision in matters of expiation (of sins), medical diagnosis, or astrological topics, he is called a Brāhmaṇa-slayer in Smṛtis.

65. Coming to this conclusion in his mind, the king always used to listen to the holy Dharmas as proclaimed by Manu and other Smṛti-writers, in accordance with injunctions.

66-67a. While the king was ruling that country according to Dharma (Śāstric rules of government), there was no person prone to injustice or mean in his kingdom. That realm of the king became equal to the celestial world, as it was being administered through Dharma. It was auspiciously blessed with good king.

67b-69. One day, the king went into a great forest for hunting. Surrounded by ministers and others he wandered till midday. Due to ill-luck, he did not get any game. He became tired. O king, surrounded by men, he chanced to see a lake. On seeing that dried up lake he thought.

70. "By whom and wherefor has this lake been built on an elevated piece of land? How can there be water here so that he, the king and his associates may survive?"

71. O excellent king, then it occurred to him to dig it further. By digging a pit to the depth of a cubit (about 18 inches), he found water.

72. By drinking that water the thirst of the king and that of the minister Buddhisāgara was quenched.

73-74. The minister Buddhisāgara, an expert in matters regarding Dharma, submitted to the king: "O king, formerly this lake had plenty of rain water. Today, I am inclined to build a strong embankment round it. May it please your majesty and grant me the permission for the same, O sinless Lord."

75. On hearing these words of the minister, the excellent king was highly delighted and the king himself undertook to construct it.

76-77. He entrusted that very minister with the work of that auspicious task. Then, at the behest of the king, the highly meritorious and gifted Buddhisāgara joyously attempted to convert that lake into a sea (i.e. a big lake) extending it to fifty Dhanus. (1 dhanu = 4 hastas or about 6 feet) all round.

78. Having constructed the lake deep with water and with a strong embankment of stones all round he reported the matter to the king in details.

79. O king, thereafter, all the thirsty way-farers roaming in forest (and beasts of the jungle as well) got splendid, translucent water for drinking from that lake.

80. One day, when his span of life in the world ended, that minister Buddhisāgara died. O lord, he came to my region, since I am the ruler and chastiser of the worlds.

81. Citragupta, the accountant of the deeds committed by men, was asked by me about him (the minister). He reported to me everything that he did during his life time.

82. He himself was the advisor in meritorious activities to the king. Hence, he deserved to ride in the Dharma—aerial chariot.

83. O king, when this was reported by Citragupta, Buddhisāgara was commanded by me to get into the aerial car called Dharma.

84. Then, after some time, O king, the ruler Vīrabhadraka died and came to my abode. With joy, he bowed to me.

85. O king, all the deeds done by him were completely inquired of by me. The merit accruing from the construction of the lake was reported by Citragupta.

86-87. Now please listen how the king was properly enlightened by me : "O king, formerly on the ridge of the sand dume, a quail had dug up with its beak and water to the depth of two aṅgulas (finger-breadths) had come up. Then after some time, O excellent king, a boar dug it up with its snout to the depth of a cubit (18 inches).

88-89. Then, on another occasion, it was made to extend to two hastas by this Kāli (a black heron.) O great king, in that dug up lake, water remained for two months. It was drunk by small wild animals which were afflicted with thirst.

90-93. O king, observer of holy vows, thereafter, at the end of three years, it was dug up to a depth of three hastas (cubits) by this elephant and more water sprang up. The water that stood there for three months (was drunk up) by the residents and animals roaming in the forest. Your honour visited that spot after the water had been completely dried up. O king, after digging to a depth of hasta, water rose up and it stood for a month. Then O king, on the advice of the minister you caused it to be dug up to an extent of 50 dhanus (about 300 feet). It abounded in water. The great lake was made more durable with bank built up of stones. Trees were planted all round rendering great help to all people.

94. O lord of the Universe, these five have got into the aerial car called Dharma, thanks to their respective merit. You too, get into it."

95. O king, on hearing this statement of mine, that king got into the aerial car as the sixth one, sharing equal amount of merit with them.

96. Thus, everything connected with the meritorious benefit accruing from constructing the lake has been narrated to you. After this, one is liberated from sins committed from birth till death.

97. The man who devoutly listens to and reads this discourse, derives all the merit that is credited to one for constructing a lake.

CHAPTER TWELVE

A dialogue between god Dharma and King Bhagīratha

1. Dāna or charitable gifts have been eulogized from Vedic times as can be seen from a number of Dāna-Stutis in the Ṛg-veda (Vide RV. I.125, V.61, VII.18.22-25 etc.). According to Manu I.86 (and the same verse is found in Parāśara I.23, Mbh. Śānti 232.28 & *Va.P.*8.65-66) Dāna or gifts constitute the main special feature of religious life in the present, Kali yuga (dānam ekaṁ Kalau yuge /). A number of Purāṇas have discussed this topic of Dāna e.g. *A.P.*209-213, Bm.P. 81-91, 205-206.

The NP. discusses this topic in the present chapter and in infra chs 31 and Uttarārdha Chs 41-42. Although a number of verses on this topic are common in Purāṇas, Smṛtis and the Mbh., a comparative table of these verses is beyond the scope of a note. Only occasionally common verses are noted.

2. Gives a list of persons unfit to receive gifts. The list of these unworthy persons includes characterless Brāhmaṇas, hypocrites, ignorant of Vedas, Brāhmaṇas who sell the Vedas or officiate at the sacrifices of ineligible persons covetous, shirkers of Brahmanic vows, etc. We find these disqualifications are repeated in Smṛtis e.g. Manu 4.193-200, Bṛhad Yama III.34-36 and Mbh.Vana 200.5-9.

Dāna given to these persons is futile. It is due to the influence of Pkts. that we find that the gen. is used for dative case in Purāṇic Sk.

3. Devala, also Devaloka

A Brāhmaṇa who maintains himself by attending upon or worshipping an image in a temple on a salary-basis or by appropriating what others offer to the deity. Manu.III.152 says that such Brahmins should not be invited for Śrāddha. It may be noted that the qualifications (or disqualifications of a Brāhmaṇa for invitation to Śrāddha or for donating gifts are practically the same.

4-5. The meaning of Kuṇḍa and Golaka given in the translation is based on Manu III.174.

para-dāreṣu jāyete dvau sutau Kuṇḍa-Golakau / patyau jīvati Kuṇḍas syān mṛte bhartari Golakaḥ //

Yājñavalkya I. 222 and Manu III.154 hold that this irregular progeny should not be invited to Śrāddha also. There is a similarity in the eligibility for invitation for Śrāddha and acceptance of dāna.

6. Cf. BG. 17.20-22.

180. The story of Vīrabhadraka which is probably a contribution of the NP. to the legends glorifying dāna, is properly speaking the propagation of the meritorious nature of Pūrta. Pūrta includes dedication of deep wells, oblong large wells and tanks, temples, distribution of food and maintenance of public gardens :

vāpī-kūpa-taḍāgāni devatāyatanāni ca
anna-pradānam ārāmaḥ pūrtam ityabhidhīyate //

Mbh. quoted by Aparārka, p. 290.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

A Discourse on Dharma

Dharmarāja said :

1. Listen to the meritorious benefit to a person who himself builds or pursuades others to build a temple of either Śiva or Hari.[1]

2. There is no doubt that he (such a builder) will stay in lord Viṣṇu's region for three kalpas in the company of a hundred thousand and ten million members of his family on his mother's side as well as on his father's side.

3. Listen to the extent of merit, if a man builds the shrine with mud and clay. I shall now recount it.

4. Taking up a brilliant divine body and travelling by an excellent aerial car, he will stay in Viṣṇu's region for three kalpas. Entertain no doubt about this.

5. Listen to me even as I recount, the extent of merit if a person constructs the shrine (of Śiva or Viṣṇu) with earthen materials.

6. He will assume a lustrous, divine body and ride in an excellent heavenly car. After staying in Viṣṇu's region for three Kalpas, he will then proceed to the capital of god Brahmā.

7-8. After staying there for two kalpas, he will reside in the celestial world for the period of one kalpa. He will afterwards be born in the family of Yogins and be merciful (to all). Adopting the Yoga pertaining to Viṣṇu, he will attain eternal emancipation from saṁsāra. If a man builds the temple with wood, meritorious benefit twice this, will accrue to him.

9. If he builds the temple in brick, the meritorious benefit is three times that of building the temple with earthen material. If it is built with stones, the benefit is four times and if the shrine is constructed with crystal slabs, the benefit should be known to be ten time.

10-13. If the temple is built of copper (sheets and ingots), the meritorious benefit is hundred-fold and if it is built of gold, the merit that accrues to him is ten million times (that of constructing the shrine of clay).

(10b.) If a person looks after the temple, a lake or a village, O king, his meritorious benefit is hundred times that of the builder. If a person looks after the temple by scrubbing or sweeping with a broom, smearing it and sprinkling water or embellishing it with devotion, he derives infinite merit. Those who perform meritorious deeds in return for salary or without any remuneration go to Viṣṇu's eternal region perpetually. O king, the merit in digging a small artificial lake is stated to be half the merit of digging a big lake containing lotuses.[2]

14. The merit accruing from digging a well is one-fourth and that of a tank should be known as equal to that of a lotus pond. O king, the meritorious benefit in digging a canal is said to be hundred times greater than that of constructing a tank.

15. A rich person should build up a tank with stones (stone embankment) and a poor man should build it with an earthen bank. But the lotus-born god Brahmā says that the merit derived by them both is equal.

16. People who know the Vedas say that if a prosperous, affluent person gifts away a whole city and an indigent fellow donates a plot of land extending to a hand (18 inches), both of them have equal meritorious benefit.[3]

17. If a rich man constructs a big tank which may cause much benefit and an impoverished person digs a well, the merit in both the cases is declared to be equal.

18. A person causes a hermitage to be built—a hermitage that is of great use to many creatures, he goes to god Brahmā's world along with three generations of family.

19. O king, if a cow or a Brāhmaṇa or any one stands in the shed even for half a moment, the builder thereof is taken to heaven.

20. O king, those who lay out parks and gardens, those who construct temples and those who dig lakes and build up villages (human settlements) are worshipped along with Hari.

21. Listen, O king, to the rewards of merit accruing to those who lay out flower gardens for the benefit of all people or for the worship of deities.[4]

22. With ten million members of his family, he stays in the celestial region and enjoys himself as many years as there are flowers and fruits there (in the flower garden).

23. Those who construct a compound-wall round them and those who make thorny hedges around them, proceed to god Brahmā's abode and stay there for seventy one yugas or one kalpa.

24. O Lord of men, listen to me as I relate to you the blessings that await those who plant Tulasī[5] (the basil plant), O king.

25. O king, for a period of a hundred kalpas and more, he will stay at the feet i.e. in the region of Nārāyaṇa, accompanied by seventy million members of his family from his mother's side as well as from his father's side.

26. Listen to the reward of merit got by one who wears the Ūrdhva-puṇḍra (a vertical mark on the forehead) with the mud taken from the root from the Tulasī plant or the paste of Gopicandana (a species of white clay said to be brought from Dvārakā and used by Viṣṇu's worshippers for marking the forehead), or the sandal-paste or mud taken from Citrakūṭa or that from the bed of the Gaṅgā.

27. Such a person rides in an excellent aerial car and goes to Viṣṇu's abode. He enjoys himself there while his praise is being sung about, by hosts of Gandharvas and Apsaras.

28. As many of the sins grevious like that of Brāhmaṇa-slaughter are dispelled , as the leaves that fall at the root of the Tulasī plant.

29. A man who sprinkles at least a handful of water on the Tulasī plant, shall stay along with god Viṣṇu, the dweller in the milky ocean, as long as the moon and the stars shine.

30. He who gives a tender leaf of the Tulasī plant to Brāhmaṇas, goes to god Brahmā's abode (Satyaloka) accompanied by three generations of his family.

31. He who offers in worship the leaves of the Tulasī plant on the Śālagrāma[6] (stone) will stay in Viṣṇu's abode (Vaikuṇṭha), till the time of the dissolution of all living beings.

32. He who makes a thorny hedge all around or builds a wall encompassing (a garden of flowers), rejoices in Viṣṇu's abode in the company of twentyone generations of his family (usually ten predecessors plus himself plus ten successors).

33. O lord of men, he who worships the lotus feet of lord Hari by means of the tender leaves of the Tulasī plant, does not ever return from the region of Viṣṇu.[7]

34. He who performs the ablution of Hari with milk on the full moon day or on the Dvādaśi (twelfth) day (both of the dark and bright half of the month) enjoys himself in the region of Viṣṇu, accompanied by ten thousand members of his family.

35. He who bathes lord Keśava (Viṣṇu) with a prastha measure of milk, lives in god Viṣṇu's city (Vaikuṇṭha), accompanied by ten crores of the members of his family.

36. The man who bathes Viṣṇu with a prastha of ghee on the Dvādaśi (twelfth) day, O king, attains the type of liberation called Sāyujyatā (identity with the deity) along with ten million members of his family.

37. He who performs the ablution of Viṣṇu on the Ekādaśi (eleventh day in each half of the month) with Pañcāmṛta (sweet mixture of milk, sugar, curds, ghee and honey) attains Sāyujyatā (identity) with Viṣṇu, accompanied by millions of the members of his family.

38. Listen to the fruit attained by the excellent person which performs the ablution of god Viṣṇu with the water taken from the tender coconut fruit on the Ekādaśi (eleventh), Dvādaśi (twelfth) day or the full moon day, O excellent king.

39. Such a person shall be liberated from the sins accumulated during the course of ten (previous) births. He rejoices along with Viṣṇu and two hundred members of his family, O excellent king.

40. O king, he who bathes the lord of gods (i.e. Viṣṇu) with sugar-cane juice shall attain to Vaikuṇṭha (Viṣṇu's region) along with a hundred thousand ancestors.

41. By bathing lord Govinda with water mixed with flowers as well as with scented water and worshipping lord Hari with devotion, a person will attain the region of Viṣṇu.

42. He who bathes Mādhava (the consort of Lakṣmī) with water filtered and purified with a piece of cloth, becomes liberated from all sins and rejoices with Viṣṇu.

43. He who bathes Hari with milk, etc., when the sun is in transit (from one sign of zodiac to another), stays in Viṣṇu's region along with twenty one generations.

44-49. Listen to the reward for the merit accruing from bathing lord Viṣṇu with milk, ghee, curd, or honey on the ollowing occasions :

On the Aṣṭamī (eighth day) or the fourteenth day in the bright half of a month, on the full moon day, on the Ekādaśī day, on a Sunday, on the Dvādaśī (twelfth) day, and on the Pañcamī (fifth day of the two halves of the month), during the period of the lunar or the solar eclipse, on the anniversary of Manvantaras and the beginnings of Yugas, etc., when the Moon has partially risen (Ardhodaya), when the Sun accompanies the constellation Puṣya, when the planet Budha (Mercury) is with the constellation Rohiṇī, when the planet Saturn is in the constellation Rohiṇī, when the planet Mars is in the company of the constellation Aśvinī, on Saturdays, when the planet Venus is in conjunction with Mṛgaśiras (the Orion) or the Revatī constellation, when the planet Mercury is with Anurādhā, when the Sun accompanies Śravaṇa, when the Moon is in Śravaṇa, when Bṛhaspati (the planet Jupiter) is in conjunction with constellation Hasta, when there is Budhāṣṭamī day or the Mercury is in conjunction with the constellation Āṣāḍhā or on other auspicious days. Such a person must be quiescent, pure and restrained in speech.

50. He accomplishes the merit of performing all sacrifices O King. Being absolved of all sins, he will stay in Lord Viṣṇu's city (Vaikuṇṭha) with twenty-one generations of his family.

51. While staying there, he attains perfect spiritual wisdom which is rarely accessible even to Yogins. O king, he attains liberation from Saṁsāra from which it is difficult to return (to the cycle of births and deaths).

52. By bathing god Śiva with milk on the fourteenth day of the dark half of the month or on a Monday, a person shall attain liberation called Sāyujyatā (identification) with Śiva, O King.

55. By bathing god Viṣṇu or god Śiva with Sesamum oil one attains the Sārūpya (similarity of form) with the respective deity, along with seven of his ancestors.

56. He who bathes Śiva devotedly with sugarcane juice will stay in the region of god Śiva for the period of a Kalpa, along with seven generations.

57. O blessed one, listen to the meritorious benefit attained by one who bathes the Liṅga idol of god Śiva with ghee on the Dvādaśī day in the bright half of month of Kārttika when god Viṣṇu arises from his slumber of four months, as I describe it to you.

58. He will be liberated, O king, from the sins committed in ten thousand previous births. The man shall uplift the members of his family numbering to ten million and he will attain Śivahood.

59. O king, after worshipping Viṣṇu with fragrant flowers on the day sacred to Viṣṇu (i.e. eleventh or the twelfth day in the dark and bright half of the month), he will be liberated from the sins accumulated in the course of ten thousand births and proceed to his region (Vaikuṇṭha).

60. The person who worships god Viṣṇu or god Śiva with lotus flowers, goes to Viṣṇu's abode accompanied by ten million members of his family.

61. By worshipping god Hari with the Ketaki flowers and god Śiva with the Dhattūra flowers at night, one will be absolved from sins and will abide in god Viṣṇu's city (Vaikuṇṭha) for a Yuga.

62. O great king, by offering Campaka flowers to lord Hari in worship and Arka (the Sun-plant) flowers to god Śaṅkara, one will attain the Salokatā type of mukti, i.e. residence with the respective deity.

63. By offering Guggula (a fragrant gum resin) along with ghee to god Śaṅkara or Viṣṇu, with great devotion, the man is liberated from all sins.

64. By offering a lamp filled with sesamum to god Viṣṇu or Śaṅkara, a man attains all cherished desires, O best of kings.

65. He who offers a lamp filled with ghee to god Śaṅkara or Viṣṇu will be liberated from all sins. He will attain the merit of performing ablution in the Gaṅgā.

66. O king, listen to the benefit of offering a lamp with oil crushed from the oil seeds at the village or elsewhere to Lord Mahā-Viṣṇu or Śiva.

67. He becomes free from all sins. He is blessed with all prosperity and glory. He attains residence in the region with the respective deity, along with twentyone generations of his family.

68. By offering edible and sweet dishes liked most by one, to god Śiva or to Viṣṇu, one attains to the respective region of the deity (propitiated with food), along with forty members of his family.

69. A person who offers things that he likes most, to a Brāhmaṇa, goes to Vaikuṇṭha (god Viṣṇu's abode) from which it is impossible to return to the world of mortals.

70. O king, a person who kills a child in the embryo becomes pure through a charitable gift of gold. But there has never been a charitable gift like that of cooked food nor will it ever be like it.

71. A person who bestows (as a charitable gift) cooked food is said to be a bestower of life; a bestower of life is the bestower of everything. Therefore, O excellent king, a bestower of cooked food attains the merit of charitable gift of everything.[8]

72. It has been decisively stated in the scriptures that a bestower of cooked food goes to the abode of god Brahmā along with ten thousand members of his family, and that he never returns therefrom to this world.

73. It has been declared by expounders of the Vedas that as the gift of water gives immediate satisfaction, it should be regarded as superior to the gift of cooked food, O best of kings.

74. The lotus-born deity (Brahmā) states that whether a person is defiled by great sins or by subsidiary ones, a bestower of water is absolved from them all.

75. They say that the physical body is born of food. The wise people know that the vital breath is also created from food. Hence, O lord of the earth, the bestower of food should be known as the bestower of vital breath.

76. Whatever charitable gift produces satisfaction, yields the benefit of accomplishing all cherished desires. Hence, O king, there is no other gift in the world equal to that of the cooked food.

77. O jewel among kings, all the persons born in the family of a bestower of food, up to the thousandth scion or descendant do not see the hell. Hence, a bestower of food is the most excellent one.

78. The man who devotedly massages the feet of an uninvited and unexpected guest is one who takes bath in all sacred rivers with the ablution in the Gaṅgā at the outset (which is the best of them).

79. O great king, he who offers to Brāhmaṇas oil for oil bath, has to his credit the merit of taking holy ablutions in the Gaṅgā for one hundred and eighth times and more.

80. A person who lovingly protects ailing Brāhmaṇas, shall stay in the city of god Brahmā for one Yuga, accompanied by ten million members of his family.

81. O protector of the earth, if any one protects an indigent fellow or an ailing person, lord Viṣṇu becomes pleased with him and grants him his cherished desires.

82. He who looks after and saves an ailing person either by thought, word or deed, attains to all desires aspired after by him and he becomes devoid of all sins.

83. O protector of the earth, he who gives residential accommodation to a Brāhmaṇa, is blessed by the Lord of gods who becomes pleased with him and grants him heavenly world.

84. He who gives a milch cow to a Brāhmaṇa who knows (the Vedas goes to the abode of Brahmā which is extremely difficult for others to attain.[9]

85. O scholar, I am not competent to describe adequately the meritorious benefit derived by a person who gifts away a milch cow even after accepting it as a charitable gift from others

86. He who gives as a charitable gift, a tawny-coloured milch cow to a Vedic scholar is Rudra himself. He is devoid of all sins, O king.

87. It is impossible to enumerate, even in hundreds of years, the merit of a person who gives an Ubhayato-mukhi cow (i.e. when she is on the point of giving birth to a calf and thus has two mouths—hers in front and that of the calf which is being born) to a Brāhmaṇa who is a Vedic scholar.

88-90a. O king, listen to the meritorious benefit (of offering protection), I shall tell you factually. On one side of the balance are all the sacrifices with sumptuous fees and on the other side is the act of protecting a living being who is frightened.

O protector of the earth, he who protects a terrified Brāhmaṇa is like one who has taken bath in all sacred rivers and has initiated himself in all sacrifices.

90b-93a. A person who gives clothes goes to Rudra's abode. A person who gives a virgin girl in marriage[10] attains to the region of Brahmā; the person who gifts gold goes to Viṣṇu's heaven (Vaikuṇṭha) accompanied by all the members of his family. He who bedecks a virgin girl in rich ornaments and gives her in marriage to a knower of spiritual lore, goes to the region of god Brahmā, accompanied by a hundred members of his family.

93b-94a. Listen to the merit achieved by a person who lets loose a bull for the propitiation of Śiva on the full moon day either in the month of Kārttika or Āṣāḍha O king. He becomes absolved of sins accumulated in the course of seven births and assumes the form of Rudra. With seventy generations of his family, he rejoices along with Rudra.

99. He who gives water to soldiers, goes to the excellent world of Sun god. By giving away instructions in learning (free of any fees in return), a man attains to the Sāyujya type of liberation with Lord Viṣṇu.

100. The gift of learning,[11] the gift of a plot of a land and the gift of a cow are the most excellent of charitable gifts. They lift the donor from the hell through Japa (repeating the name of God), vehicles and milk.

101. Among all gifts the gift of Vidyā (lore) is of specially distinct merit. By the gift of Vidyā one attains identity with Viṣṇu, O excellent king.

102. A person giving the charitable gift of fuel is liberated from the subsidiary type of sins. The gift of Śālagrāma stone is glorified as a great gift.

103-104. By giving it (Śālagrāma), one attains salvation. The gift of Liṅga is also such as by giving which one attains that meritorious benefit which a man obtains by gifting away ten million cosmic eggs. By the gift of Śālagrāma stone, the meritorious benefit is twice this.

105a. It is wellknown that god Viṣṇu assumes the form of Śālagrāma stone.

105b-106a. O Lord of men, the man who makes charitable gifts of mansions, certainly attains the benefit of taking bath in the Gaṅgā.

106b-107. O excellent king, by the gift of gold to the accompaniment of precious stones and jewels one attains worldly pleasures and salvation, since it is mentioned as a Mahādāna. By the gift of rubies a man attains the highest Mokṣa.[12]

108. A person attains to the Dhruva loka (the region of the Pole star) by the gift of diamonds; one goes to a celestial world and Rudra's region by the gift of coral (Vidruma).

109. One goes to the region of the Moon god by the gift of a vehicle or through the gift of pearls. A giver of Vaiḍūrya (Lapis lazuli) or Puṣpa-rāga (Topaz) goes to the region of Rudra.

110. By gifting away topaz, one enjoys happiness everywhere. O ruler of the earth, a person who bestows horses attains nearness to horses (?) for a long time.

111. By means of the great gift of an elephant, one will obtain his cherished desires. Through the gift of a vehicle, one attains heaven seated in a heavenly aerial car.

112. A person who gifts a she-buffalo undoubtedly overcomes pre-mature death. By giving grass and fodder freely to cows, one attains to the region of Rudra.

113-114a. O lord of the earth, one who gives salt as charitable gift, attains to the region of god Varuṇa. Persons who are engaged in the conduct of life according to the rules of discipline of their own stage of life, those interested in the welfare of all living beings, those who are devoid of hypocrisy, and free from jealousy, go to the region of Brahmā.

114b-115a. Persons who are interested in imparting instructions to others, are devoid of passionate attachment, free from the sense of rivalry and those who are engaged in the worship of Hari's feet, go to the abode of Lord Hari.

115b-116a. Those who are engaged and take delight in associating themselves with saintly people, who always perform good and holy acts, are averse to slandering others, go to the region of Hari (Vaikuṇṭha).

116b-117a. Those who are always benevolent to Brāhmaṇas and cows, those who desist from physical contact with other men's wives, do not go to the abode of Yama.

117b-118a. Those who have conquered their sense-organs, have perfectly controlled their diet, have forbearance towards cows and those whose character is good and bear patience towards Brāhmaṇas, go to the region of Hari.

118b-119a. Those who maintain sacrificial fires, render services to their preceptors and those women who are interested in serving their husbands, do not undergo worldly sufferings.

119b-120a. Those who are always engaged in worshipping the deities, who are ever engrossed in repeating the names of Hari, and those who refrain from accepting charitable gifts, attain the highest region.

120b-121a. O best of kings, those who cremate dead bodies of Brāhmaṇas who have no claimants or heirs, always obtain the meritorious benefit of performing thousands of horse sacrifices.

121b-123a O lord of men, listen to the benefit of worshipping a neglected Liṅga which lies unworshipped, with Bilva leaves, flowers, fruits or water without elaborate adoration. Such a worshipper, seated in an aerial car and eulogised by bevies of heavenly damsels and groups of celestial singers, goes to the presence of Śiva.

123b-124a. By bathing the Liṅga with only a handful of water, O lord of earth, one undoubtedly attains to the merit of a hundred thousand horse sacrifices.

124b-125a. O lord of the people, the intelligent and learned person who worships the Liṅga of Śiva devoid of adoration for a long time, by means of flowers, will attain the benefit of ten thousand horse-sacrifices.

125b-126a. By worshipping a deserted unworshipped Liṅga, by offering foodstuffs, edibles, and fruits, one attains the Sāyujya type of liberation (identity with god Śiva) from which there is no return to this world.

126b-127a. O jewel among men, a scion of the Solar race, a person who worships the idol of Viṣṇu which lies unadored for a long time, even with water, attains residence in the region of Viṣṇu.

127b-128a. The intelligent person who sweeps a temple clean attains residence in Viṣṇu's mansion for as many yugas as the particles of dust he has swept.

128b-129a. The man who joins together a shattered crystal Liṅga[13] is freed from sins accumulated in the course of a hundred births, O jewel among the kings.

129b-130a. O king, the person who sprinkles with water, a plot of land in the temple extending at least *Go-carma[14] one hundred and fifty hastas in length and breadth attains heaven.

131b-132a. He who besmears the abode of the deity (the sanctum sanctorum) with mud or red chalk (metallic substances), uplifts ten million members of his family and attains equality with Lord Viṣṇu, the slayer of demon Madhu.

132b-133a. A man who over-spreads the abode of the Lord with powdered rock or draws the symbols of Svastika, etc. with coloured powder gains merit which is infinite.

133b-134a. O king, I am not enthusiastic in enumerating, even in the course of hundreds of years, the merit of a person who makes arrangement for lighting in the temple.

134b-135a. For a person who makes lighting arrangement (in the sanctum sanctorum) of god Viṣṇu or Śaṅkara, the merit of the performance of horse-sacrifices per every movement is not difficult to get.

135b-136a. He who bows down on seeing Śaṅkara or Viṣṇu worshipped, attains the abode of Viṣṇu (Vaikuṇṭha) and enjoys himself for ten thousand yugas.

* One of the definitions of Go-carman :

daśa-hastena vaṁśena, daśa-vaṁśān samantataḥ |
pañca cābhyadhikān dadyād etad go-carma ucyate ||

—Vasiṣṭha Saṁhitā.

136b-137. O king, after making one circumambulation of the goddess, seven circumambulations to the Sun-god, with three of god Vināyaka and four round the temple of Viṣṇu, one attains the region of the respective deity and rejoices there for one hundred thousand yugas.

138. He who, with feelings of devotion, circumambulates god Viṣṇu, a cow, a Brāhmaṇa, reaps the benefit of a horse-sacrifice at each step.

139. He who worships and bows down to the Liṅga of god Maheśvara at Kāśī,[15] has no further duty (left for performance) and he has no further existence in this world.

140. By circumambulating god Śiva in the reverse order, in accordance with injunction, a man does not fall off from heaven, thanks to the Grace of Śaṅkara.

141. By eulogising the lord of the Universe, Nārāyaṇa who is free from all ailments, one obtains the cherished desires even whatever he wishes to mentally.

142. O lord of the earth, he who dances or sings in the temple with great devotion, attains to liberation and stays in the region of Rudra.

143. Persons who play on musical instruments in the precincts of the temple, go to god Brahmā's region seated in the swan-shaped aerial car.

144. Those who clap their hands or beat the cymbals in the shrine of gods, become absolved of all sins, and for a period of ten thousand yugas, occupy a heavenly car (and move in the skies).

145. Even god Śiva himself is incompetent to describe adequately the merits of those who sound bells in the temple.

146. Listen to the meritorious benefit accrued to those who propitiate the Lord of gods by beating and playing upon different kinds of drums like bherīs (kettle-drums), Mṛdaṅgas, (tabors), Paṭahas (war drums), Murajas (a kind of tabor) and Ḍiṇḍimas (small drums).

147. In association with the bevies of celestial damsels, they are honoured with the fulfilment of all their cherished desires; having attained the heavenly world, they rejoice there for five Kalpas.

148. The man who blows a conch in the temple of a deity becomes purged of all sins and rejoices with Viṣṇu, O king.

149. A man beating the cymbals to time or sounding the bell-metal-gong in Viṣṇu's temple is given absolution from all sins and will attain the region of Viṣṇu.

150. God Viṣṇu who is the Lord, witness to all, is the embodiment of knowledge and is absolutely pure, when delighted, confers fully the entire benefit of all religious rites.

151. O lord of the earth, all the righteous duties and holy rites do become fruitful merely by remembering the discus-bearing Lord of Devas (i.e. Viṣṇu).

152. He is the Supreme Soul, Lord of the Universe, the bestower of the fruits of all holy actions. He is remembered always by the performers of holy rites. He is the destroyer of all distress and gloom. Whatever is done with him in view, is capable of being infinitely multiplied in its efficacy.

153. All righteous acts are Viṣṇu; all fruits thereof are Viṣṇu; all holy rites are Viṣṇu; Lord Viṣṇu alone is the enjoyer of fruits and rites; that which is to be done is Viṣṇu; the instruments of doing such acts are Viṣṇu. There is nothing different and separate from him.[16]

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

A Discourse on Dharma

1. devāyatanaṁ yas tu, etc.

After discussing the pūrta-dharma regarding the construction of a water-tank, god Dharma-rāja takes up in between the topic of foundation of temples (devāyatana) in verses 1-13a. According to Atri-smṛti even a Śūdra is entitled to pūrta-dharma

adhikārī bhavec chūdraḥ pūrte dharme na vaidike

—Atri Smṛ. 46

The same right has been claimed for women to claim property (or cash) to spend on pūrta acts, by Vijñāneśvara :

Yajña-śabdasya dharmopalakṣaṇa-paratve strīṇām api pūrta-dharmādhikārād dhana-grahaṇaṁ yuktam' —Mitāksarā on Yājñavalkya Smr. II.114.

The topic on dāna has been again discussed in NP. infra-I.31 and II.41-42.

In the NP. the discussion on building and conservation of temples is very brief. For details vide *AP.*38-106.

2. Though tanks and water-reservoirs are known since the Rgvedic times, the merits of dedicating such tanks is given in Dharma Sūtras (vide Viṣṇu Dhs. 91.1-2). The procedure of dedicating water-reservoirs to the public has been variously described in Āśvalāyana Gṛhya pariśiṣṭa IV.9, *MP.*ch.58 and AP. ch.64. These pūrta dharmas came to be looked upon as efficacious to confer worldly pleasures and emancipation from saṁsāra, while sacrifices bestowed only worldly pleasures.

bhukti-mukti-pradam pūrtam, iṣṭam bhogārtha-sādhanam /

—Kālikā purāṇa (quoted in Kṛtyaratnākara)

NP. mentions here different types of reservoirs : taḍāga, kāsāra, kūpa, vāpī. The relative dimensions of these reservoirs may be presumed from the amount of merit accruing from them, though NP. (in verse 17 here) proclaims equality in merit for digging a taḍāga by a rich person and a Kūpa by an indigent person. A Kūpa is a well 5 to 50 cubits in length or diameter. MP. 153.512 gives the following relative dimensions of other reservoirs as under :

A Vāpī=10 Kūpas

a hrada (a deep lake or reservoir)=10 Vāpīs (daśa-kūpa-samā vāpi, daśa-vāpī-samo hradaḥ)

According to Vasiṣṭha Saṁhitā, a Puṣkariṇī is upto 400 cubits in length and 5 Puṣkariṇīs=1 Taḍāga (quoted in Raghunandana's Dāna-Kriyā-Kaumudī).

There being no corresponding terms in English, Sk. terms (with explanations) are retained in the translation.

Kulyā—a canal.

3. Although NP. limits itself to the capacity of the donor in these verses, as a matter of fact, it is the fundamental principle of dāna-vāda that merit accruing from dānas depends upon the mental attitude, the capacity of the donor and morality observed in acquiring the thing donated. Aparârka quotes Devala : 'Even if the whole earth acquired by dishonest means be gifted without proper faith or to an unworthy person, one does not secure that much merit as is secured by gifting a handful of vegetables to a worthy person with devout faith.

anyâyâdhigataṁ datvâ sakalâṁ pṛthivîṁ api /
Śraddhâ-varjam apâtrâya na kaṁcid bhûtim âpnuyât //
Pradâya śâka-muṣṭiṁ vâ śraddhâ-bhakti-samudyatâm /
mahate pâtra-bhûtâya sarvâbhyudayam âpnuyât //

4. cf. Hemâdri-Dâna-Khaṇḍa (pp. 1029-55).

On planting trees, dedication of gardens, also vide AP. 70, MP. 59 for the procedure of dedicating trees and gardens.

5. Tulasî or the basil plant has special sacrosanctity in Viṣṇu worship. In the Tulasî Mâhâtmya, we are told that planting, maintaining, seeing or touching this plant absolves one of all sins :

ropaṇam pâlanaṁ sevâṁ darśanaṁ sparśanaṁ tu yaḥ /
Kuryât tasya praṇaśyaṁ syât sarva-pâpaṁ dvijottama

—Pd.P. IV.22.4.

The same Purâṇa (VI. uttara-khaṇḍa chapters 3-16), gives the story of demon Jâlandhara whose queen Vṛndâ became the Tulasî plant. Devi bhâgavata IX Skandha chs 15-24 gives a similar story but there Tulasî is the consort of Śaṅkhacûḍa (Kṛṣṇa's friend Sudâman cursed by Râdhâ) and Mahâviṣṇu violated her chastity which led to Śaṅkhacûḍa's death. Tulasî gave up her body which became the river Gaṇḍak and her hair the Tulasî plant. (Ibid IX.24.30-31).

It may be noted that these are later legends. Since Vedic times we have been regarding varieties of Indian fig trees like Nyagrodha (Banyan- Ficus Indica—a Kṣîravṛkṣa), Udumbara (the Indian fig tree, Ficus Glomerata), Aśvattha (the Pippal tree) and Plakṣa (Ficus Infectoria) as sacred trees. vide (*Tait. Saṁ.*III.4.84). Early Purâṇâs also are silent about the glory of Tulasî. NP. directs here that after taking one's bath, one should make a verticle mark of a line or lines on the forehead with the earth at the root of the Tulasî plant. The materials for marking Puṇḍra on the forehead as given in verse 25 here are repeated in Br.P. as quoted in Smṛti Candrikâ I.p.115.

Gopikâ Candana or Gopî-candana in v.26 is the soft white earth from Dvârakâ. It is specially recommended at the time of performing Śrâddha :

Dvârâvatyudbhavaṁ gopî-candanaṁ Veṅkaṭodbhavam /
sântarâlam prakurvîta puṇḍraṁ Haripadâkṛtim //
Śrâddha-kâle viśeṣeṇa kartâ bhoktâ ca dhârayet

—Vṛddha-Hârîta VIII.67-8.

6. Śâlagrâma—

This black piece of stone containing fossil ammonite is found in the Gandak near about its source. It is that portion of the Gandak within half a mile of Mukti Maṭha which abounds in such stones (De, p. 174 and Muktinâtha, p. 133). Vṛddha-Hârîta Smṛ. 8.183-189 states the importance of this worship which, due to its reference in the Śârîra bhâṣya I.2.7, I.2,14, must be pretty old. The varieties of Śâlagrâmas are given in AP. Ch. 46 and its procedure of worship in the next (*AP.*ch.47) chapter.

7. These verses describe the procedure of worshipping gods Viṣṇu and Śiva. Viṣṇudharmasūtra ch. 65 shows the earliest method of Viṣṇu-worship. But image-worship (both at home and in public temples) became very popular in the mediaeval times. There is a vast literature on this topic. The major sixteen upacāras outlined in these verses are elaborately dealt with (and with variations depending on the deity worshipped), in that literature. The main stages are āvāhana (invoking the deity), āsana (offering a seat to the deity), pādya, arghya (offering water to wash feet and hands), ācamanīya (water for sipping), snāna (bath), vastra (offering garments and) yajñopavīta (the sacred thread), gandha (besmearing with fragrant sandalpaste, etc.), puṣpa (offering of flowers—especially those specially liked by the deity as mentioned in the verses of NP.), dhūpa (incense-burning), dīpa (waving lights in front of the deity), naivedya (offering of edibles, food, sweet dishes, fruits, etc.), namaskāra (laying one's self prostrate before the deity), Pradakṣiṇā (circumambulating the deity with one's right side towards the deity) and visarjana (taking leave of the deity). Works like the Pūjāprakāśa (pp.97 ff) give many details and varieties in these, vide Bh.P. XI.27 for the procedure of worship called Kriyāyoga.

8. The dharma-śāstra is liberal about the free gift of food, clothes and other bare necessities of life. They waived the rules of eligibility or gift-worthiness of the donee in these cases :

annācchādana-dāneṣu pātraṁ naiva vicārayet /

—Viṣṇudharmottara quoted in Dānamayūkha, p. 5,

The merit accruing from the gift of food, water, care of ailing persons and such other humanitarian acts is extolled in most of the purāṇas, Smṛtis and the Mahābhārata.

9. Gifts of cows have been mentioned (and eulogised) since the days of the Ṛgveda e.g. RV.I.126.3 (Kakṣivat receiving 60,000 cows), RV.VIII.5.37 (Kaśu Caidyas gift of 10,000 cows). Smṛtis regard cows as one of the best gifts (uttama dāna)—Devala quoted by Aparārka, pp. 289-90, Vasiṣṭha (29.19) calls it an atidāna—a gift superior to the gifts of all other things. Purāṇas wax eloquent (as in the case of NP. here) and consequently a number of verses are found common in many Purāṇas, on go-dāna.

10. Giving of girls in marriage to Brāhmaṇas as a gift, was in vogue since Vedic times : vide RV. I.126.3, VII.18.22, VIII.68.17, etc. This custom was current in the Smṛti and Purāṇa periods.

11. The gift of education or learning has been regarded as the gift par excellence in the Smṛtis. Cf.

triṇyāhur ati-dānāni gāvaḥ pṛthvī Sarasvatī / ati-dānaṁ hi dānānāṁ vidyādānaṁ tato'dhikam //

—Vasiṣṭha XIX.19.

12. The lists of free gifts is very extensive in other Purāṇas also. Thus Mt.P. ch. 83 and 92 speaks of 10 kinds of 'Meru-gifts' i.e. of heaps of corn, salt, jaggery, gold, sesame, cotton, ghee, precious stones, etc. Smṛtis and purāṇas also speak of gifts of animals such as buffaloes, horses, elephants, useful articles like umbrellas, shoes, etc.—many times the same verses occur in different works.

13. Re-establishment of broken liṅgas and the procedure for the same, is described in the AP chs 67 and 103 and it has been elaborated later in the Dharma Sindhu III Pūrvārdha. The Kirāḍu Inscription (Epi.Ind.XX App.56 No. 381) mentions the re-instalment of an image (broken by Turuṣkas), in Saṁvat 1235 by the wife of Tejapāl, an officer of the Chāhamānas, feudatories to king Bhīmadeva of Aṇahillapāṭaka. Reconsecration of images and reconstruction of temples (damaged or polluted) has śāstric sanction and historical precedents. The reconsecration of Lord Somanātha temple after Indian Independence, needs emulation in the cases of other ancient shrines.

14. Go-carma-mātraka :

Land measuring go-carma. Go-carma is variously defined. (1) According to Bṛhaspati, it is equal to 10 nivartanas and one vartana or nivartana is 30 (square) rods (a rod=10 cubits).

daśa-hastena daṇḍena triṁśad daṇḍau ni-vartanam / daśa tānyeva vistāro go-carmaitan mahāphalam //

—*Br.Smṛ.*8 also Śātātapa I.15.

The only v.l. in Śātātapa is svarga-loke mahīyate instead of go-carmaitan mahāphalam in Bṛhaspati Smṛti.

(2) In the next verse, it is defined as a piece of land in which a thousand cows with their calves and bulls will comfortably accommodate themselves.

savṛṣaṁ -go-sahasraṁ ca yatra tiṣṭhatyatandritam / bāla-vatsa-prasūtānāṁ tad go-carma iti smṛtam //

—Ibid 9.

For other definitions of go-carma vide—Hemādri Vratakhaṇḍa caturvarga cintāmaṇi I.pp.52-53.

15. It is noteworthy though the NP. belongs to the Vaiṣṇava group, the author pays equal regard to Śiva. In fact, all the Purāṇas irrespective of their supposed groups, regard Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śiva or Śakti as the designation of Brahman.

16. This is the highest stage in Bhakti and Vedānta. This is the realization of the Upaniṣadic truth (everything is Brahman) expressed in sarvaṁ khalvidam Brahma.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Directions Regarding Dharma and Propitiatory rites[1]

Dharmarāja said :

1. I am now expounding the holy dharma proclaimed in the Vedas and the Smṛti-texts with reference to the different castes in a serial order, O best of kings. Please listen to it with great attention.

2. I shall mention the atonement to the person who, while taking food, touches an impure or a fallen person or a Cāṇḍāla, either out of anger or due to ignorance.[2]

3. Such a person shall perform bath three times a day (triṣavaṇa snāna) either for three days or for six days. A Brāhmaṇa becomes pure by sipping pañca-gavya (the five products of the cow taking collectively, viz. milk, curds, clarified butter, urine and cowdung).

4. Some times fecal matter may trickle down through the anus of a Brāhmaṇa as he takes food. I shall tell you the means of purification in that case. I shall also mention the means of purification when he is defiled by eating the remnants of food (ucchiṣṭa) or through some other cause.

5. The Brāhmaṇa shall at the outset perform the śauca (cleansing his hind part). Afterwards he shall perform the ācamana rite (sipping of water with names of Viṣṇu at each sip). He shall then observe a fast for a day and night. He then becomes pure after taking in the pañcagavya.

6. If a person passes urine while swallowing food or if one passes urine (immediately) after taking food, he shall observe fast for a day and night. He shall then perform the Homa, offering oblations of ghee into the fire.

7. If a Brāhmaṇa were to become impure at the time of taking food, he shall place that mouthful of food somewhere on the ground, and take his bath, after which he shall attain, purity.

8. If he happens to eat that mouthful, he becomes pure only by observing a fast. If he takes the entire food in his impure condition, he shall be impure for three days.

9. If while taking food, one vomits, he should repeat the Gāyatri Mantra three hundred times, if he is sick, or three thousand times if normal in health. Repetition of the Gāyatri Mantra is the greatest expiation.

10-12a. When a Brāhmaṇa is touched by Cāṇḍālas and the pariah (those who cook and eat dog's flesh) or when he answers calls of nature (of urinations and evacuations of bowels), he shall repeat the Gāyatri Mantra for three days. One who is defiled by partaking the ucchiṣṭa food, after taking food, shall repeat the Gāyatri Mantra for six days. If a person born in the lowest caste touches a woman in her menses or one who has given birth to a child (during the period while she is regarded impure), the purity of the woman touched, is regained in three days—so says Śātātapa.[3]

12b-13a. If a woman in her menses is touched by dogs, or by a man of the lowest caste or a barbarian or by a crow, she shall observe fast and remain clean. By taking her bath at the proper time, she becomes pure.

13b-14. If two women in their menses per chance touch each other, they become pure by observing Brahma-kūrca (a penance in which the woman is to fast for twenty-four hours, then sip Pañcagavya for purification). If a person is touched by a person defiled by eating ucchiṣṭa and fails to take bath immediately thereafter, he is also purified by Brahma-kūrca.[4]

15. If a person indulges in sexual intercourse during the prescribed nights after the menses and if conception is suspected, he shall take bath. If he cohabits with his wife on nights other than the prescribed ones, the purificatory rite is the same as in the case of urination or evacuation of the bowels.

16. Both husband and wife, if united in the act of sexual intercourse, become unclean. As soon as the woman gets up from the bed, she becomes pure, but the man remains unclean.

17. If, out of wickedness, a woman does not render physical service to her husband, she must be punished by abandoning her for twelve years, without giving her financial assistance.

18. Persons forsaking their kinsmen who are fallen, shall be punished with Uttama-sāhasa[5] (the highest monetary fine viz. one thousand Paṇas). Only the father may be considered as fallen but never the mother.

19. If a man attempts to commit suicide by hanging himself with a rope, etc., he shall be fined two hundred Paṇas, if he does not die. If he dies he (i.e. his body) must be besmeared with materials (like ghee) which are considered holy for sacrificial oblations.

20. His friends and sons should be fined one paṇa each. Thereafter, they shall perform expiatory rites as prescribed in the scriptures.

21-22. Those who intend to give up their bodies but turn back from water, fire, halter (by means of which they wanted to commit suicide), those, who revert from the stage of sannyāsa and those who are thus fallen from (accomplishing their death) by means of observing fast or from taking poison or from jumping down from precipice and those who desire to kill themselves with a weapon but are not killed) these Pratyavasitas[6] (fallen—reversionists) are beyond the commerce or contact of the public and they become pure by the observance of Cāndrāyaṇa[7] penance or two Tapta-Kṛcchras.[8]

23. The sinner who reverts from two such attempts (of suicide), becomes fallen. Such a fallen person becomes pure from the dark sin by observing two Cāndrāyaṇa penances and by gifting a cow or a bull thereafter.

24. On being touched by dogs, jackals, monkeys, etc., and by men or women except at the time of sexual act, one shall take bath whether it be day, twilight or night. He becomes pure immediately after the bath.

25. If anyone inadvertently eats the food of a Cāṇḍāla, he shall subsist only on food prepared from barley-flour mixed with cow's urine, for half a month, whereby he becomes pure.

26. If any twice-born person burns a cowpen or sets the abode of a Brāhmaṇa to fire and if any one cuts off the rope and cremates (without official post-mortem, etc.) the body of a person who died by hanging himself, shall perform expiatory penance called Kṛcchra.

27. If anyone knowingly eats the food of Cāṇḍālas and Pulkasas (two lowest castes) or kills a woman, he shall expiate himself by performing half a kṛcchra[9] penance. If it is done unknowingly, he shall perform two Cāndrāyaṇa penances.

28-29a. A person who takes food from the Kāpālakas[10] (the followers of a forbidden sect), one who indulges in sexual act with their women, a Brāhmaṇa who co-habits with a forbidden woman, one who takes in wine or eats cow's meat (beef), shall perform the expiatory penance called Tapta-kṛcchra and the Maurvi-homa[11] (the homa performed during the thread ceremony). He, thereby, becomes pure.

29b-30a. Those who commit great sins,[12] particularly the first four, become pure by entering fire or by staying near a great sacrifice.

30b-31a. If this is done secretly,[13] the man shall, for a period of one month, repeat the Aghamarṣaṇa[14] hymn while standing in the water. He will thereby become pure.

31b-33a. The following seven castes are regarded as the lowest born (Antyajas),[15] viz., the washerman, the leather-worker (cobbler and the shoe-maker), the dancer or actor, the worker in bamboos (Buruḍa), the sweeper (Medas), the fisher-men, and the Bhillas. He who knowingly takes the food from these or cohabits with their women or drinks their beverages or accepts monetary gift from them, shall perform a half-kṛcchra penance. If these things are done unwittingly, he shall perform two Cāndrāyaṇa penances.

33b-34a. If one has sexual intercourse with one's mother, preceptor's wife, daughter, sister or daughter-in-law, one shall enter fire.[16] No other purificatory rite is enjoined (for such sins).

34b-35a. If one cohabits with the queen, an ascetic woman or one's own nurse or a woman of a higher caste or of one's own Gotra, one shall undergo two kṛcchra penances.[17] The sin is the same whether these ladies belong to one's father's gotra or the mother's gotra.

36-37a. If one cohabits with another man's wife he shall perform the kṛcchrārdha or the Sāntapana[18] expiatory penance. Brāhmaṇas dispell the sin caused by the carnal approach to a prostitute, in a similar manner, by drinking for five nights water containing Kuśa grass which is extremely heated but once (?).

37b-38a. A Brāhmaṇa who commits the sin of defiling the preceptor's bed, shall perform the Vrata in accordance with scriptural injunctions. Some recommend (this punishment) to one who kills a cow or to a religious student who violates the vow of continence.[19]

38b-39a. He who makes a cow fall down by beating it with a stick, shall perform the expiatory penance called Go-vrata[20] twice.

39b-40a. A stick as stout as the thumb, as long as an arm, not dry and having leaves, is called a Go-daṇḍa, a stick for beating a cow).

40b-41a. If the cows are made to fall and those cows are pregnant, one shall perform the Kṛcchra penance (one per life harmed). This is the atonement for the slaughter of a cow.

41b-42a. If a cow dies when it is being bound or restrained or when its sickness is aggravated, he is smeared with the cause of that sin.

42b-44a. There is no need for any expiation, if the cow, after having fallen or having become unconscious when struck with a stick, gets up and walks six or seven, five or ten steps, or takes a mouthful of grass, or drinks water. Similarly when the cow dies of sickness, there is no expiation.

44b-46a. If cows are struck and killed with (a piece of wood,) a lump of clay or a stone, the expiatory penances are as follows according to respective implement (of striking). If they are killed with a piece of wood, the expiation called Sāntapana is to be performed. If they are killed with lumps of clay, Prājāpatya[21] expiatory rite is to be performed. If they are killed with stones, Tapta-kṛcchra penance is to be performed. If they are killed with any other weapon, the expiatory penance called Atikṛcchra is to be undergone.

46b-47a. One should give medicines, oils and ghee, and regular food to cows and Brāhmaṇas. If, while these are being given, any mishap takes place, there is no need for any atonement.

47b-48a. There is no atonement necessary (if any calamity befalls) while drinking the oil or the medicine or while eating solid medicines or during the process of (surgically) removing a thorn or a splinter or any extraneous substance lodged in a body.

48b-49a. When the calves are tied up with ropes round their neck for the purpose of administering any medicines, there is no need of any expiation. If cows and calves are restrained[22] or bound and shut up in the evening for the sake of protection, there is no blemish, or sin.

49b-50.a When the penance is prescribed, the steps in tonsure are : one-fourth of the hair is to be removed first; in the second stage mustaches are removed; in the third stage all the hair except the tuft of hair is to be cut. (In the case of full penance) all hairs are to be cut off.

50b-51a. (In the case of women) all the hair of the head should be held up and only the tresses upto two aṅgulas are to be cut off.[23] This is proclaimed as the tonsure of head in the case of women, in the Smṛtis.

51b-52a. Shaving of the head is not to be practised in the case of women nor should they sit in the Vīrāsana pose. They should not be made to reside in the cowpens nor are they to observe the vrata of following the cow.[24]

52b-53a. The king or the prince or a Brāhmaṇa who is well read in Śāstras shall order them to undergo expiatory penance without removing the hair from their head (tonsure is essential in the case of men before such expiations).

53b-54. He should enjoin twice the expiatory observance for the preservation of their hair, and if twice the number of expiatory penances are performed, dakṣiṇā for the same should be double.

55a. (In case double dakṣiṇā is not given and the hair of the head are preserved) the sin of the killer is not dispelled; and the giver of such a dakṣiṇā goes to hell.[25]

55b-56a. Those who lay down expiatory penances not enjoined in the Vedas or Smṛtis are the obstructers of dharma. The king should duly punish them.

56b-57a. But the king shall not inflict pain on them or harass them being deluded by passion. Their sin will increase hundred-fold and envelop him only.

57b-58a. After the expiatory penance has been completely performed he (the ex-sinner) shall feed Brāhmaṇas and give them twenty cows and one bull as a dakṣiṇā.

59b-60a. After performing the expiatory rites and feeding excellent Brāhmaṇas, he should give them a *Mānika[27] (a weight of gold). Then they shall gain purity.

* Mānika is a misprint for Māṣaka found in the Laghu Yama Smṛti verse 63 from which the quotation is taken here. Māṣaka = weight of 8 Guñjā seeds.

60b-61a. If one is touched by persons belonging to Cāṇḍāla and Śvapaca castes, ablution (for purification) is enjoined even at night, but he shall not stay there with those low castes, at night, he will regain purity immediately after taking bath.

61b-62a. If unknowingly a person had been careless enough to stay there (with low castes) at night, his sin is increased a hundred-fold.

62b-63a. On being touched by the rays of the stars that rise and planets that are above, he shall perform ablution in water.

64b-65a. Iṣṭa and Pūrta rites[28] shall be performed by a Brāhmaṇa assiduously. Through the Iṣṭa rite one attains heaven and through the Pūrta rites one attains Mokṣa.

65b-66a. Iṣṭa (performance of sacrifices, etc.,) is dependant on the expenditure of money.[29] Pūrta includes (works of public welfare such as) the digging of tanks, etc.

66b-67a. He who repairs and maintains parks, temples, wells, tanks, lakes and particularly procession with idols of gods attains the benefit of Pūrta dharma mentioned before.

67b-68. (In the preparation of Pañcagavya[30] the following ingredients should be taken). The urine of the white cow should be collected; similarly, the dung of the black cow; the milk of the copper-coloured cow should be taken; for curds, the milk of a white cow, and for ghee, the milk of a tawny-coloured cow should be taken. All these are destructive of great sins.

69-70a. All these articles (should be purified) separately by means of Kuśa grass and the holy water of the sacred rivers. They should be drawn up and brought while repeating Praṇava (the syllable Om), they should be stirred and drunk while repeating the syllable Om.[31]

70b-71a. Water mixed with Kuśa grass should be held in a cup of the leaves of the Palāśa tree or in an auspicious copper vessel or in a cup of the leaf of a lotus plant or in an earthen vessel[32] and then drunk.

71b-72. When one is already defiled by a Sūtaka[33] (impurity due to the birth of a child) and another case of Sūtaka befalls, there is no fault or defilement of the second Sūtaka. One is purified along with the first one. That which is born is purified along with what is born and that which is dead along with what is dead.

73. If there is any abortion even in the first month, a three day pollution is observed.

74. After observing as many days of pollution as there had been months of pregnancy, in the case of abortion, one gets purified. The chaste lady becomes purified after the monthly course when the flow of blood ceases, and she takes her bath.

75-76. A woman is separated from her family Gotra after the seventh step (in the Saptapadi) has been taken during the marriage ceremony. Water libations and piṇḍa offering to her should be made in the name of the Gotra of her husband.[34]

76. The uddeśya (object in view) in every piṇḍa at the time of offering the piṇḍas should be offering them both in the names (of the husband and the wife) to the six (ancestors, viz., father, grand-father and the great grand-father along with their wives) three piṇḍas should be offered. Thus the person who offers it, does not become deluded.

77. The mother is fed along with her husband (i.e. the father of the performer of the Śrāddha)[35] along with gods, the same way also the grand-mother and the great grand-mother are fed along with their husbands,[36] in the śrāddha.

78. One shall perform the hospitable greeting to one's father and mother every year. He shall perform a śrāddha without reference to the gods and offer one piṇḍa.

79. There are five types of Śrāddhas which should be known by wise men. They are (1) Nitya (daily and obligatory Pitṛ-yajña) (2) Naimittika (occasional, for example after the birth of a son) (3) Kāmya (for attaining desired object e.g. performance of Śrāddha with Kṛttikā or Rohiṇi as the constellation of the Moon, for attaining heaven or progeny) (4) Vṛddhi Śrāddha (Śrāddha performed when something specially noteworthy and beneficial to the family has taken place), and the last one is the (5) Pārvaṇa Śrāddha i.e. A Śrāddha performed on the new moon day or other parvas or festive occasions.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Directions regarding Dharma and Śānti

1. The present chapter is a complete, practically word to word, incorporation of the Laghu Yama Smṛti (LYS) with some parallel verses from the Yama Smṛti. The difference between NP and LYS is that in the NP., the narrator of the dharmas or to be more accurate, the expiatory penances for different sins, is Dharma-rāja, the god of Death, but in LYS, Yama is a sage, a Law-giver and the object of LYS is proclamation of different expiatory rites for different kinds of sins (nānāvidha-prāyaścitta-varṇanam).

It is beyond the scope of the present note to explain the concept of sin which has been adequately discussed in Hasting's Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics (Vol.XI. vide 'sin'). It shows that the concept of sin varies from religion to religion, region to region and age to age. The use of words like āgas, agha, drugdha, enas, aṁhas, durita, in the Ṛgveda shows that the concept of sin was already developed in those times (also vide A.B. Keith The Religion and Philosophy of the Veda and Upanishads 245-9, 264-8, 310-12, etc.)

The words prāyaścitti and prāyascitta stand for the act of expiation and are found since the Vedic period. It is, however, the latter form (prāyaścitta) which gained popularity and is widely used in the Dharma-śāstra literature (in Smṛtis, purāṇas, etc.). The word prāyaścitta is variously defined—the most popular connotation is "that whereby the citta (the mind) of the repentant is generally (prāyaḥ) free (from the oppressive sense of guilt) by the parṣad (assembly of Brāhmaṇa paṇḍitas).

Prāyaśaś ca samaṁ cittaṁ cārayitvā pradīyate |
Parṣadā kāryate yat tu prāyaścittam iti smṛtam ||

(a Smṛti quotation in Parāśara Mādhava II.1.p.3)

The idea that a sin can be wiped out by Prāyaścitta gave rise to a vast literature from the time of Dharmasūtras down to the medieval nibandha-kāras (writers on Dharma-śāstra). Gautama and Vasiṣṭha in their Dharma-sūtras, Manu Smṛ. XI.44-265, Yājñavalkya Smṛ. III 205-327, (LYS or the present chapter already mentioned), Bṛhad-Yama Smṛ. 182 verses, AP. ch.s 168-74; KP.Uttarārdha 30-34 to mention a few, deal with these expiatory penances.

2. The theory of untouchability though not satisfactorily traceable to the Vedas, came to be accepted by the time of Smṛtis and Purāṇas. And it did not depend on birth alone.

The idea is that by taking bath one washes off symbolically, the mental pollution caused by the touch of certain men connected with unclean vocations, holders of anti-Vedic views (like Bauddhas, Cārvākas, etc.), extra-Indian invaders (like Turuṣkas), uncultured hill-tribes, a women in menses or immediately after delivery, corpses, unclean animals like pigs, dogs etc. Man has practised against man unjustifiable discriminations like residential segregation, exclusion from public institutions, disenfranchisement, etc. all over the world, including advanced western societies. This is not to defend the Purāṇic statements about expiation, but to put them into proper historical perspective.

3. Śātātapa—N. of a Smṛti-writer. This quotation however could not be traced in the Śātātapa Smṛ. (Gurumandal Edt.) These verses have been quoted from LYS.
4. Brahma-kūrca

Normally this expiatory rite is enjoined to a man. Such a man is to observe a fast for the whole day and night on a day (particularly on a full moon day) and then drink Pañcagavya, the next morning ahorātroṣito bhūtvā paurṇamāsyāṁ viśeṣataḥ /

Pañcagavyaṁ pibet prātar brahmakūrcavidhiḥ smṛtaḥ //

—Jābāla quoted in Prāyaścitta Viveka, p. 515.

But in taking the separate ingredients of Pañcagavya, the man has to consecrate them with Vedic mantras and utter those mantras (such as the Gāyatrī) while taking them in (samantrakaṁ saṁyujya samantrakam eva pañcagavyaṁ pīyate tadā brahma-kūrca ityākhyāyate—Mitākṣarā on Yājñ Smṛ. III.314). Women were not eligible to utter vedic mantras. Hence, here a twentyfour hours fast broken by sips of Pañcagavya seem to be implied, as women are treated as Śūdras (being ineligible to utter Vedic mantras), and śūdras were allowed to take Pañcagavya without Vedic mantras.

Strīṇāṁ caiva tu śūdrāṇām patitānāṁ tathaiva ca /
Pañcagavyaṁ....dātavyaṁ mantra-varjitam //

—Devala Smṛ. 61

also vide Parāśara Smṛ. XI.3 & 27.

5. Uttama-sāhasa

Nārada defines sāhasa as an offence committed out of pride for one's strength (sahas-strength) sahasā kriyate karma yat kiñcid bala-darpitaiḥ / tat sāhasam iti proktaṁ saho balam ihocyate //

He divides sāhasa into three categories :
(1) Prathama (2) Madhyama and (3) Uttama.
The last includes offences like killing by poison or weapons and rapes on another persons' wives (XIV.5) and the punishment for this is death, confiscation of property, expulsion, amputation of the organ (XIV.7) and even if the offender survives, he was to be excommunicated (XIV.10). Manu and Viṣṇu lay down the highest fine. Thus for idol-breaking the king is to fine the culprit 500 Paṇas and make him re-instate it at his cost (Manu IX.285).

As the LYS. verse 19 shows the text of the NP. here should be emended as tyajantyo'patitān as the original tyajantyo patitān makes no sense. For according to Dharmaśāstra, a fallen relative (even one's own father and never the mother as stated in the next line) is to be abandoned.
6. Pratyavasita

In ancient India, the right of death, civil or physical was exercised by persons who wanted to free themselves from worldly life by adopting sannyāsa-āśrama or by giving up their life by fast, drowning in water, self-immolation, etc. But persons who declared their desire to renounce life, were to shrink back at the last stage or revert from sannyāsa to the householder's stage of life, they were called pratyavasita. The text hereof which is a quotation from LYS. 22 & 23 (and Bṛhad Yama Smṛ. verses 3 & 4) classifies the pratyavasitas in categories according to the mode or means they proclaimed to adopt to embrace death.

7. Cāndrāyaṇa

This observance is an expiatory penance as well as the means of increasing one's fund of merits. When it is for expiation of sins, it is to be preceded by tonsure. As the name indicates, any act (here taking in morsels of food) varying directly with the increase or decrease of the digits of the moon is Cāndrāyaṇa (candrasyāyanam ivāyanaṁ caraṇaṁ yasmin karmaṇi hrāsa-vṛddhibhyāṁ tac cāndrāyaṇam—Mitākṣarā on Yāj.Smṛ.III.323). This is a very ancient type of penance as it is noted by Pāṇini (V.1.72). As Baudhāyana (III.8.33) notes it, since ancient times there were two varieties of this Vrata, viz., Yava-madhya (large in the middle and tapering at both the ends like the grain of yava (barley) and pipīlikā-madhya (slender in the middle like an ant and bigger at the ends). The first (Yava-madhya) type is as follows :

On the first day of the bright half of the month, one morsel of food is to be taken and the number of morsels are to be increased one per day so that on the full moon day one is to eat fifteen morsels. And in the dark half one morsel per day is to be reduced, till he observes complete fast on the New Moon day.

In the second variety, the pipīlikā-madhya, the observer begins on the first day of the dark half of the month and eats 14 morsels till on the New Moon day he observes complete fast and then from the first day of the bright half of the month he goes on increasing his food intake as one, two, three, etc. according to the tithis so that on the full moon day, he eats fifteen morsels.

Some more varieties are added by later writers on Dharma-śāstra. The Cāndrāyaṇa is prescribed when no other specific penance is prescribed (Yājñāvalkya Smṛ. III.326).

8. tapta-kṛcchra-dvayena vā

As an alternative to Cāndrāyaṇa two tapta-kṛcchra penances are prescribed. Normally this is prescribed for Brāhmaṇas who sell things or animals which should not be sold by them, such as sesame, sesame-oil, curd, salt, cooked food, slaves, etc. There are different views about its observance. Thus according to Manu XI.214, Śaṅkha Smṛ. 18.4, Parāśara Smṛ. 18.4 and AP.171.6-7. This penance consists of a period of twelve days comprising four sub-periods of three days each. In this, the penitent has to drink hot water, hot milk, hot ghee for three days each and then for the last subperiod of three days, he is to observe complete fast inhaling hot atmosphere (Hence the adjective tapta in the name of this penance).

tryaham uṣṇam pibed āpas tryaham uṣṇam payaḥ pibet / tryaham uṣṇam ghṛtam pītvā vāyu-bhakṣī tryaham bhavet //

—AP. 171.6-7

Manu specifically insists on breathing hot air (XI.215). According to Mitākṣarā (Yājñavalkya III.317), this duration of 12 days is prescribed for great sins, while that of 4 days, viz., taking in hot milk, ghee and water for the first three days and complete fast in the fourth day is meant for minor sins.

tapta-kṣīra-ghṛtāmbūnām ekaikam pratyaham pibet / eka-rātropavāsaśca tapta-kṛcchras tu pāvanaḥ //

cf. Yājñavalkya Smṛ. III.317 —*Devala Smṛ.*84.

9. Kṛcchārdham ācaret :

Contact with women of lower castes was strongly condemned as a sin. If the sin is committed unknowingly, the expiation is of a milder nature, viz. Ardhakṛcchra, while two Cāndrāyaṇa penances are prescribed for deliberately committing this sin. Ardha-kṛcchra is a variety of Kṛcchra. It is to be observed for six days as follows : Food is to be taken only once at day time for one day, only once in the evening on the second day, taking food for two days without asking for it and complete fast on the last two days.

Sāyam-prātas tathaivekaṁ dina-dvayam ayācitam /
dina-dvayaṁ ca nāśnīyāt kṛcchrārdhaṁ tad vidhīyate //

—Āpastamba Smṛ. IX.41-42.

It is also called pāda-kṛcchra—one fourth of Kṛcchra penance (Yājñavalkya IX.318)

10. Kāpālikānna-bhoktṛṇām is a misprint for Kāpālikānna° etc. as attested in LYS 29. Kāpāla or Kāpālika is the follower of a Śaiva sect (of the left-hand order) characterised by wearing skulls of men in the form of a garland, and eating and drinking from them. Any contact with them was looked upon with abhorrence and contempt. Hence, this restriction and proposed expiation.

11. Maurvihoma v.l. mauñjī-homa in LYS.30 is the homa (sacrificial rite) performed at the ceremony of the investiture of the sacred thread (upa-nayana).

12. mahāpātaka-kartāraḥ

Those who commit great sins. 'Great sins' or Mahāpātakas are as follow : (1) Slaying a Brāhmaṇa (2) Wine-drinking (3) Theft (4) defiling one's preceptor's bed (wife) and (5) association with a person who committed any of the above four sins.

brahma-hatyā surāpānaṁ steyaṁ gurvaṅganā-gamaḥ / mahānti pātakānyāhus tat-saṁsargaśca pañcamam //

—Manu XI.55

In the next chapter (NPI.15.22b and 23a), the above is paraphrased as follows :

brahmahā ca surāpī ca steyī ca guru-talpagaḥ / mahāpātakinas tvete tat-saṁsargī ca pañcamaḥ //

Later on, what acts are equivalent to each of these great sins is expounded in the rest of that chapter.

13. rahasya-karaṇo :

Probably a misprint for rahasya-karaṇe as attested in LYS 32.

14. aghamarṣaṇa-sūktam :

RV.X.190 is regarded as an expiatory Sūkta for washing out sins.

15. rajakaś carmakāraśca saptaite'ntyajāḥ smṛtāḥ /

The term antyaja connotes lowest castes like Cāṇḍālas (vide Manu IV.61). Different lists of "low castes" are found in Smṛtis but this verse is found in Atri 199 and is attributed to Āpastamba in Mitākṣarā. The low castes enumerated above are as follows : (1) rajaka (washerman), carma-kāra (artisan in hides), naṭa (acrobats like Kolhāṭis in Maharashtra), buruḍa (worker in bamboos)

Kaivarta (fishermen), meda (sweepers) and bhilla. According to Śūdra-kamalākara medas are sweepers.

It is noteworthy that in the medieval India, guilds of some of these had risen in social status. Works like Vīra-mitrodaya (Vyavahāra, p.12) testify to the verticle social mobility in Hindu society.

16. These are ati-pātakas for which there is no expiation except self-immolation in fire.

17. Kṛcchra-dvaya :

Two Kṛcchra penances. Kṛcchra is a general term for different penances. From Sāma-vidhāna Brāhmaṇa, (I.2.1-4), Gautama (26.1-6) and Āpastamba, (I.9.27.7) it seems to be a penance of 12 days duration. In this, the penitent is to eat sacrificial food for three days by day only (fasting at night), then for the next three days he is to fast during day time and eat at night only. Then for the next three days, he should eat when (sacrificial) food is offered to him, without his asking for it, and then should observe complete fast on the last three days.

athātas trīn kṛcchrān vyākhyāsyāmaḥ / haviṣyān tryaham anaktāśyadivāśī, tatas tryaham tryaham ayācita-vratas tryaham nāśnāti kiñcaneti kṛccha-dvādaśarātrasya vidhiḥ /
—Āpastamba Dh.Sūtra I.9.27.7

18. Kṛcchrārdham tapanam but LYS 37 reads Kṛcchram Sāntapanam.

Sāntapana, Mahā-Sāntapana, Ati-Sāntapana are penances of the same category in which the duration is different but subsistence on the cow's urine, dung, milk, curds, ghee and Kuśa water interspersed with complete fasts are the common factors. Thus, according to Brhad-Yama Smṛ I.13 (Manu XI.213), Sāntapana lasts for two days. On the first day, the penitent drinks the above ingredients and on the next day observes complete fast.

go-mūtram gomayam kṣīram dadhi-sarpiḥ kuśodakam / ekarātropavāsaśca kṛcchram sāntapanam smṛtam //

For Mahā-sāntapana, the observer drinks separately for six days in succession, the above six ingredients and observes a fast on the seventh day (Devala 82, Atri 118-119). Yama proclaims Mahā-sāntapana for fifteen days, when each of the ingredients (cow's urine, dung, etc.) are taken as food for three days consecutively. AP. 171.8-10 proclaims Mahāsāntapana as lasting for 18 days and also of 21 days.

Kṛcchrā'tikṛcchrapayasā divasānām ekaviṁśatim / tryahābhyastam athaikekam atisāntapanam smṛtam //

19. Avakīrṇinaḥ—

Avakīrṇin—a religious student who has committed an act of incontinence (such as sexual intercourse) against his vow of celibacy. For his donkey-like act he was to expiate by offering an ass to Nairṛti (Yājñavalkya II. 280) Manu XI. 123-24 however calls upon such a sinner to put on a donkey-hide, and beg for food in seven houses proclaiming his violation of oath.

20. Go-vrata:

The observance to stay among cows, act like them, bathe in cow's urine and subsist on cow-dung. The observer is not to sit, eat or drink unless cows have done so. The duration of this observance is one month.

21. Prājāpatya is a Kṛcchra penance when the noun Kṛcchra is not qualified by any adjective like ati-, tapta-, mahā- etc. (Smṛti-śāstreṣu nirupa-padasya kṛcchra-śabdasya prājāpatya eva prācuryeṇa prayogāt, kṛcchram iti prājāpatyam iti Devala-smaraṇāc ca. —Parāśara Mādhava II. Part 1 p.30.

The duration of this penance is twelve days or consecutive four periods each of three days, in which there is respectively (i) eating once by day (and fast at night), (ii) eating once by night only, (iii) eating once only unsought for (sacrificial) food and (iv) complete fast for the last three days :

tryaham prātas tryahaṁ sāyaṁ tryaham adyād ayācitam / tryaham paraṁ ca nā'śnīyāt Prājāpatyaṁ caran dvijaḥ //

Manu XI.212

There are three more varieties or permutations of this penance.

22. Roṣa-bandhayoḥ a misprint for rodha-bandhayoḥ, vide LYS.52.

23. This is the practice for Veṇī-dāna (giving of tresses) of women. It seems that complete tonsure of women (whose husbands are alive) practised at Tirupati (Andhra Pradesh), is not taken into account or that custom might have come into vogue in the post-NP. period.

24. This shows that women were probably exempted from Go-vrata.

25. The line pāpaṁ na kṣīyate hantur dātā ca narakaṁ vrajet by itself is incomplete and cannot be construed with 55b which is connected with 56a. The LYS 58a supplies the missing line which runs as follows :

dviguṇaṁ cenna dattaṁ ca keśāṁśca pari-rakṣayet /

To which in natural sequence runs NP I.14.55a quoted above (=LYS 58b).

26. Krimibhis tṛṇasambhūtair—a misprint for Kṛmibhir vraṇa-sambhūtair vide LYS. 62.

27. Suvarṇa-manikam a misprint for suvarṇamāṣaka vide LYS. 63. māṣaka—a wt. of gold variously equated with the weight of 8 or 10 guñjā seeds.

28. iṣṭāpūrta—

We have previously noted the evolution of the concept iṣṭāpūrta since the Vedic period. Here two purāṇic difinitions are quoted :

Iṣṭa consists of maintenance of sacred fire, performance of penance, truthfulness, Vedic studies, honouring a guest and performance of vaiśvadeva, while Pūrta includes dedication of tanks, wells, temples, maintenance of centres of free food distribution, and of public gardens. Iṣṭa leads to the celestial region, while Pūrta, to Mokṣa.

vāpī-kūpa-taḍāgāni devatāyatanāni ca /
anna-pradānam ārāmaḥ pūrtaṁ dharmaṁ ca muktidam // agnihotraṁ tapaḥ satyaṁ Vedānāṁ cānupālanam / ātithyaṁ vaiśvadevaṁ ca prāhur iṣṭaṁ ca nākadam //

AP. 209.2-3.

Atri Smr. 43-44 are the same as the above verses. As already noted NP. implies the same by this term.

29. Vittakṣepo in NP. a misprint for vittāpekṣam vide LYS 69.

30. The colours of cows from whom urine, dung, milk, etc. are to be obtained for preparing pañca-gavya are differently given in some smṛtis. For example, Parāśara proclaims that the urine, dung, milk, curd and ghee should be of cows respectively of dark, white, copper-like, dark-red and tawny colour :

go-mūtraṁ kṛṣṇa-varṇāyāḥ śvetāyā gomayaṁ haret /
payaścā tāmra-varṇāya raktāyā dadhi co'cyate //

31. The verses in NP. do not clarify the method of preparing pañca-gavya. The following is the method in brief :

"According to Atri.299 dung, urine, ghee and milk were to be respectively 1, 2, 4 and 8 parts and curds also 8 parts. When mixing the ingredients, urine is taken with sacred Gāyatrī, cowdung with gandha-dvārām (Tai.Ar.X.1), milk with āpyāyasva (RV.I.91.16), curds with dadhikrāvṇo (RV.IV.39.6), ghee with tejosī śukram (Vājasaneyi Saṁh. 22.1) and Kuśa water with devasya tvā (Ait. Brā 37.3). The pañca-gavya thus prepared is to be placed near the fire, then it is to be stirred to the accompaniment of āpo hi ṣṭhā (RV.X.9.1-3) and then with the mantra mā nastoke (RV.I.114.8) is to be repeated over it. It may be then offered into fire with green darbhas, not less than seven, to the accompaniment of Irāvatī (RV.VII.99.3), idam Viṣṇur (RV.I.22.1) mā-nastoke (RV. I.114.8) and the saṁvati verse (RV.X.9.4) and then the remainder is to be drunk by the preparer with the verse in Parāśara XI.37"

—Kane Hist. of Dharma Śāstra II.ii.p.774.

32. This verse properly enumerates the kinds of vessels in which pañca-gavya is to be prepared (vide Parāśara Mādhava II.1 p.434, where Prajāpati is quoted). But here the vessels are to be used for drinking the Kuśodaka (water containing Kuśa grass).

It may be noted that paṇa-bhāṇḍe is a misprint for parṇa-bhāṇḍe vide LYS 74.

33. Here begins a new topic called Aśauca—impure state arising on birth (jananāśauca or sūtaka) and arising out of death (mṛtakāśauca). Verses 71b-72 give the general rule that if both aśaucas are of the same kind, and the second is of the same or of lesser duration than the first, a person gets rid of them both at the end of the first. Nirṇaya sindhu (pp.536-540) discusses 12 alternatives of such superventions of Aśauca, but NP. is not interested in these details.

34. This explains Viṣṇudharma Sūtra : 22.32-33.

strīṇāṁ vivāhaḥ saṁskāraḥ /
saṁskṛtāsu strīṣu nāśaucam bhavati pitṛ-pakṣe /

There is no aśauca for the parents on the death of a married woman.

35. Śrāddha, according to Br.P. is whatever is given with faith to Brāhmaṇas for the benefit of our dead ancestors, at the proper time, place and to deserving persons in accordance with the prescribed procedure: Śrāddhas have been variously classified. The classification accepted in the NP is : (1) Nitya, (2) Naimittika (3) Kāmya (4) Vṛddhi and (5) Pārvaṇa and the terms have been explained in translation.

36. bhartrā sahasrābdam :

A misprint for saha śrāddham, vide LYS.80. sudaivata is sadaivata in LYS 80.

37. There is a great divergence of views regarding the day of asthi-saṁcayana or collection of charred bones of the cremated persons. Thus Gd.P. Preta khaṇḍa 5.15 prescribes the 1st, 3rd, 7th or 9th and specially the 4th by twice-born persons, a view endorsed by Vāmana P.14.97-98. Here NP. echoes or rather quotes LYS. 87 and 88.

38. Since the Ṛgveda, water is regarded as 'great purifier', śucayaḥ pāvakāḥ being the favourite phrase of all Vedic seers. Hence, it was offered to the deceased after cremation by any or all sapiṇḍas.

39. Cf. Viṣṇu dharma sūtra 23.46 and Āpastamba both quoted by Aparārka, p.273.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Bhagiratha Advised to Bring the Gaṅgā

Dharmarāja said :

1. I shall mention the different types of sins as well as the tortures (in hells) in a broad manner. Take courage and listen to them since these hells are terrible.[1]

2. I shall describe those fiery hells which accord terrible results and wherein the sinner and the wicked persons are always roasted.

3. They are[2] Tapana, Vālukā, Kumbha, Mahāraurava, Raurava, Kumbhipāka, Nirucchvāsa, Kālasūtra, Pramardana.

4. The terrible Asipatravana, Lālābhakṣa, Himotkaṭa, Mūṣā-vasthā, Vasākūpa, the river Vaitaraṇī.

5. Purīṣahrada where feces are eaten, Mūtrapāna where urine is drunk, Taptaśūla, Taptaśilā, Śālmalī-druma.

6. Śoṇitakūpa, the terrible, Śoṇitabhojana, Svamāṁsa bhojana, Vahnijvālāniveśana.

7. Śilāvṛṣṭi, Śastravṛṣṭi, Vahnivṛṣṭi, Kṣārodaka, Uṣṇatoya, Taptāyaḥpiṇḍa Bhakṣaṇam.

8. Śiraḥśoṣaṇam, Marut prapatana, Pāṣāṇavarṣa, Kṛmibhojana.

9. The tortures[3] are Kṣārodapāna (drinking briny water) Bhramaṇa (whirling), Krakacadāraṇa (torn off with a saw), Purīṣalepana (smearing with fecal matter), Purīṣa Bhojana (eating the fecal matter).

10. Drinking semen virile, the highly terrible scorching in all the joints, inhaling smoke, binding with nooses, hitting with different kinds of spears;

11. Lying down on burning coal, pounding with the threshing pestles, many wooden machines with which men are crushed and pared;

12. Falling and throwing up and down, belabouring with iron clubs and batons, striking with the tusks of elephants, biting through serpents.

13. Sprinkling of chill water, drinking of terrible saltish water through the nostrils and mouth, and eating of salts;

14. Cutting off the muscles, binding of the sinews, the cutting of the bones, penetration of salt water through crevices or pores on the body, eating of flesh;

15. The obnoxious feeding of bile, (forcible) feeding of phlegm, throwing down from the top of the tree and sinking in the water;

16. Forcing one to bear weighty stones, lying on thorns, getting bitten through ants and stung through scorpions;

17. Infliction of pain through tigers, jackals and buffaloes, lying in mud, filling in with foul smelling things;

18. Half-crouching on many occasions, taking in excessively bitter things, drinking of extremely hot oil and eating the most pungent thing ;

19. Drinking of astringent water, paring with heated rock, bathing in excessively hot and extremely chill water, dashing of the teeth.

20. Lying on heated iron plates and tying of weighty iron blocks. O blessed one, the tortures in the hell are these and similar ones. There are millions and millions of tortures.

21. O Protector of the Earth, I am not competent to mention in details even in a thousand years, which sinner has to undergo which torture.

22. I shall now narrate to you all those things. Even as I narrate it listen to the same.

22b-23a. The slayer of a Brāhmaṇa, a wine-addict, a thief and a defiler of the preceptor's bed—these are great sinners (Mahāpātakins). He who associates himself with these is the fifth among them.

A Brāhmaṇa-slayer :

23b-24a. The following five are regarded as Brāhmaṇa-slayers :[4] the splitter of rows (of persons taking dinner), one who prepares food in vain, one who always slanders Brāhmaṇas, the instigator of these (or a bad astrologer) and a seller of the Vedas.

24b-24c. These five are called the slayers of Brāhmaṇas. The person who invites a Brāhmaṇa saying, "I shall give you money and other requirements" and refuses it afterward saying "there is nothing".

25. The person who acts as obstacle or intruder to a Brāhmaṇa, while he goes to take his bath and perform worship, is called a slayer of a Brāhmaṇa.

26. One who is always engaged in censuring others, who is interested in self-conceit and self-aggrandizement and who indulges in falsehood is spoken of as a murderer of a Brāhmaṇa.

27a. A person who consents to and abets these sins is spoken of as a Brāhmaṇa-slayer.

27b-28a. A person interested in alarming and frightening others, a person who always finds faults with others and the person who indulges in arrogant behaviour is called a murderer of a Brāhmaṇa.

28b-29. A person who is always interested in accepting monetary gifts and indulges in killing living beings, a person who encourages unrighteousness is spoken of as a Brāhmaṇa-murderer. O king, thus, many sins are on par with Brāhmaṇa-slaughter.

30-34. Wine drinking[5]

30a. I shall succinctly tell you the sins which are on par with drinking of wine:

30b-31a. Eating of the food of attendants, resorting to prostitutes, eating of the food of fallen persons—these are declared as sins equal to drinking of wine.

31b-32a. Abandoning of worship, taking of food from the professional worshipper of idols, and indulgence of sexual intercourse with women addicted to wine—all these are equivalent to drinking of wine.

32b-33a. The Brāhmaṇa who, on being invited by a Śūdra, partakes of his food, should be known as a wine addict. He is excluded from all holy rites.

33b-34. That mean fellow who does the work of an attendant with the permission of a Śūdra, incurs a sin equal to drinking of wine. Thus many sins are proclaimed to be equal to wine drinking.

35-40a. Theft[6]

35-36a. I shall now mention the sins which are equivalent to the theft of gold. Listen. The theft of bulbous roots, roots and fruits, of musk and of perfumed powder, and the theft of jewels—all these are always equal to the theft of gold.

36b-37a. The theft of gold, iron, tin and bell metal, of ghee and honey and stealing fragrant articles—all these are declared (in Smṛtis) to be equal to the theft of gold.

37b-38a. The taking away of areca nut, of water, of sandal and the taking away of the juice of leaves—all these are equal to the theft of gold.

38b-39a. The abandonment of the Pitṛyajñas (offering of libations of water, Śrāddha, etc.), omission of performing one's righteousness and holy rites and disrespect for the ascetic—all these are equal to the theft of gold.

39b-40a. Taking away edible things, carrying away of grains, and stealing of Rudrākṣa beads—all these are equal to the theft of gold.

40b-44. Defiling the preceptor's bed[7]

40b-41a. Cohabiting with one's sister or with one's son's wife, or a woman in a monthly course is equivalent to the sin of defiling the preceptor's bed.

41b-42a. Sexual intercourse with a woman of low caste, intimate association with women addicted to wine and sexual intercourse with another person's wife—all these are equal to the sin of defiling the preceptor's bed.

42b-43a. Cohabiting with the wife of one's own brother or of a friend or a woman who keeps entire trust in one, is equal to the sin of defiling the preceptor's bed.

43b-44. Performance of holy rites out of the prescribed time limit, cohabiting with one's own daughter, omission in performing righteous duties and speaking low of the holy scriptures—all these are proclaimed (in Smṛtis) as equivalent to the sin of defiling the preceptor's bed. These and such other acts, O king, are called great sins.

45-46. One who intimately associates himself with any of these sinners shall be equal to them. Expiatory rites for these sinful activities have been found with difficulty by great, quiescent sages through the rites of atonement, etc. O king, listen to the sins which cannot be atoned for by these expiatory rites.

47. All sins are equally leading to infernal regions. It is with very great difficulty that some way of expiating sins like Brāhmaṇa slaughter are found.

48. But there is no expiation[8] anywhere to a person who hates a Brāhmaṇa. So also, O Ruler of men, there is no atonement for those who are ungrateful persons and those who commit breach of trust.

49-50. There is no expiation anywhere to those persons who intimately associate themselves with Śūdra women, whose bodies are nourished with the food of the Śūdras and who indulge themselves in denouncing the Vedas. There is no expiation here or hereafter to those who find fault with stories of saintly people.

51. Even through hundreds of expiations, it is impossible to see the redemption of that Brāhmaṇa who enters a Buddhistic shrine, even in a great emergency.

52. The Buddhists are heretics, as they are the revilers of the Vedas. Hence, a Brāhmaṇa shall not even look at them, since they are excluded from righteous holy rites.

53. A Brāhmaṇa may enter a Buddhist shrine knowingly or unknowingly. If he enters knowingly, there is no redemption at all. This is the decision of the scriptures.

54-55. Since their sins are numerous, their stay in the hell is for a period of ten million Kalpas. O Lord, other sins for which there is no expiation are also mentioned now. Listen to it even as I recount their stay in the hell.[9]

56. Those who have committed great sins stay in each of the hells for a yuga. At the end of it they come back to the Earth. They are born as donkeys in the course of seven lives.

57. Then for ten lives, they are born as dogs, getting their bodies whipped and lashed. For the period of a hundred years, they remain as worms in the fecal matter, after which they are born as serpents for twelve lives.

58. O king, thereafter, in the course of a thousand lives, they are born as deer and other animals. Then for a hundred years they are born as immobile beings. Thereafter, they take up the bodies of alligators.

59. Then for seven lives they are born as Cāṇḍālas who commit sinful crimes. Then, for sixteen lives they are born as Śūdras and other persons of the lowest castes.

60. Then for two births they remain as impoverished persons afflicted with sickness. They are intent on always in accepting monetary gifts. Again, they go back to hell.

61. Those whose minds are defiled by jealousy fall into the hell called Raurava. Staying there for two Kalpas, they are born as Cāṇḍālas in the next hundred lives.

62. He who says 'Don't give' in regard to cows, fires and Brāhmaṇas is born as a dog in the course of a hundred lives at the end of which he is born among the Cāṇḍālas.

63. Thereafter, he is born as the worm in the fecal matter and a tiger in the course of three births. At its end, he goes to the hell and remains there for twenty-one Yugas.

64. Listen to the results of the sinful activities of those who are engaged in slandering others, those who speak roughly and harshly and those who create obstacles in regard to charitable gifts.

65. Thieves are thrashed roundly by means of mortar and pestle. They are reduced to powder. At its end, they have to hold heated stone for three years (in the Tapta-śilā hell).

66-67. Thereafter, in the hell called Kālasūtra, for seven years, they are pared with the instrument Kālasūtra ('the thread of death', like the thread on the wheel with which the potter cuts off a raw earthen pot in two). Those who have misappropriated other men's wealth bewail their sinful activities, as they are being cooked in the hellish fires continuously, as a retribution of their acts.

68. Listen to the terrible hell for the tale-bearers and traducers of other men's wealth. They have to hold in their mouths red hot iron for a period of a thousand Yugas.

69. Their tongues are pressed and crushed by means of very terrible tongs. Without being permitted to breathe they are compelled to stay in very terrible hell (called Nirucchvāsa) for a period of half of a Kalpa.

70-72a. I shall tell you the hell of those persons who are ardently desirous of other men's wives. Copper images resembling those beautiful women are made and exquisitely embellished in ornaments. They are then heated red hot. The men are then compelled to embrace those images many times. If any one is afraid of it and runs away, he is caught hold of forcibly. Attendants announcing his sinful activities take him round all the hells in order.

72b-73. O Lord of Earth, those women who abandon their husbands and resort to others, are made to lie on beds of red hot iron and are enjoyed by men of red hot iron per force for a long time.

74. Then these women are released by them. They (the women) are then compelled to embrace iron columns blazing like fire. They have to stand in that position for one thousand years.

75. They are then bathed in liquid caustic acid and are compelled to drink that liquid acid. At the end of it, they experience the tortures of all hells for a hundred centuries.

76. He who kills a Brāhmaṇa or a cow or a Kṣatriya or an excellent king, experiences all tortures for a period of five Kalpas.

77-78. Listen attentively to the resulting punishment to him who enthusiastically listens to the censure of great men. Red hot iron nails are pierced through their ears. Thereafter, hot boiling oil is copiously poured into those holes so that the ears are filled with it. He is then taken to Kumbhipāka hell.

79. I shall tell you the sufferings of the atheists who turn their faces away from Hara and Hari. They will be compelled to eat salt for ten million years.

80. Then, they are scorched and fried in red hot sand in Raurava hell. These men of sinful acts remain in that hell for the period of a Kalpa. O ruler of men, in other hells also (they are tortured) like this.

81. With a thousand red hot needles they hurt and pierce the eyes of those mean men who look with wrath at Brāhmaṇas furiously.

82. Then, O excellent king, they are sprinkled with currents of liquid acid. Then, the people of evil activities are cut and pierced by means of terrible saws.

83. Listen to the terrible hell of those who commit breach of trust, those who break the bounds of decency and those who covetously yearn for other men's food.

84. They are compelled to eat their own flesh. They are being eaten by the dogs continuously. They stay in everyone of the hells for a year.

85. Listen to the treatment of those who are interested in accepting monetary gifts from others, those who practise astrology (accepting fees for the advice) and those who regularly partake of the food of professional worshippers of idols (in temples).

86. O king, those persons who are always engaged in the enjoyment of pleasures and who are defiled by their sins are miserably cooked by means of these tortures till the end of a Kalpa.

87. Thereafter, they are filled with oil. They are afflicted through Kālasūtra (thread of Death). Thereafter, they are compulsorily bathed in liquefied acid and fed on fecal matter and urine.

88. At the end of it, they come back to Earth and are born as Mleccha tribes. Those who are engaged in injuring others go to the river Vaitaraṇi.

89. Those who have abandoned the five great sacrifices go to the hell Lālābhakṣa. One who abandons worship goes to the hell Raurava.

90. O king, listen to the fate of those who exact revenues and taxes from Brāhmaṇas and villages donated to them. They are subjected to these tortures as long as the stars and the moon shine.

91. The leading king who levies the maximum tax from the villages, experiences the tortures in the hells for five Kalpas along with a thousand members of his family.

92-93a. The sinner who encourages and permits increased taxation from villages of Brāhmaṇas, O king, (commits the sin as if) he has (actually) committed the murder of a thousand Brāhmaṇas. He stays in the terrible hell Kālasūtra for the period of two cycles of four yugas.

93b-94a. The great sinner who discharges semen in non-vagins (ayonis) as in masturbation), in those who are destitute of vulva (Viyonis), and uterus of animals (Paśu-yonis) shall fall into the hell Reto-bhojana (where one has to subsist on semen).

94b-95a. He then falls into Vasākūpa (a deep and narrow well of fat). There he stays for seven divine years. That man has semen for his diet. He becomes the most despicable man in the world when reborn.

95b-96a. The man who washes his teeth with a twig of a tree as the tooth brush, O king, on the day of fast (like Ekādaśi) falls into the terrible hell called Vyāghra-Pakṣa (and remains there) for a period of four yugas.

96b-97. The person who abandons his religious duties is called a heretic by learned men. He and a person who associates with him are great sinners. They fall into hells in a serial order, in the course of thousand and millions of kalpas.

98. Those who misappropriate the assets of the deity of a temple, those who take away the wealth of their preceptors, O king, contract sins similar to Brāhmaṇa-murder and experience similar consequences.

99. Those who take away the wealth of orphans and helpless persons, those who are hostile towards them, remain in hell for thousands and millions of kalpas.

100. I shall mention the fruits of sins accruing to those who engage themselves in the recitation and study of the Vedas in the vicinity of women and Śūdras. Listen to it attentively.

101. They are compelled to stand with their heads down and legs upwards. Thus, they are nailed to two pillars and are compelled to inhale smoke continuously in this posture. They stay thus for the period of year of god Brahmā.

102. He who discharges the impurity of his body (such as fecal matter and urine) in the water or in the premises of a temple incurs as terrible a sin as the destruction of a foetus.

103. Listen to the fruit of sins accruing to those who throw teeth, bones, hair and nails in the precincts of a divine shrine or the leavings of food into water.

104-105a. Spears are thrust into their bodies. They are crushed with plough-share. While they cry and groan piteously in their distress, they are fried and roasted in the extremely terrible (cauldron of) boiling oil. They are made highly miserable there and then they go to other hells as well.

105b-106a. He who steals the asset of a Brāhmaṇa or a scented log of sandal or aloe-wood, goes to the terrible hell and remains there as long as the moon and the stars shine.

106b-107a. O king, misappropriation of a Brāhmaṇa's assets yields sorrow and misery both here and hereafter. Here, it brings about the destruction of wealth and it leads hereafter to hell.

107b-109a. Listen to the fruit of sins accruing to a perjuror. He undergoes all these tortures as long as fourteen Indras reign. In this world his sons and grandsons perish. In the other world, he falls into Raurava and other hells as well, in a serial order.

109b-110. Leeches comparable to serpents are thrust into the mouths of those men who are excessively passionate and lecherous and those who are propounders of false or heretic views. Thus, they stay for sixty thousand years. Thereafter, they are sprinkled with liquefied acid.

111-112a. Those who are devoted to flesh eating without any reason, go to the hell Kṣāra-kardama. From there they are dragged into the hell Marut-prapātana where they are trampled over by elephants. At the end of the torture therein, they come back to the Earth where they are born with deficiency in their limbs (i.e. are physically handicapped).

112b-113a. O Lord of men, he who does not cohabit with his wife during the prescribed days after the monthly menses, falls into the terrible hell Raurava and incurs the sin of a Brāhmaṇa-slaughter also.

113b-114a. If any one, though competent to prevent, does not prevent some one seen practising the code of conduct of others (instead of his prescribed duties), he incurs the latter's sin. Both of them fall into the hell.

114b-115a. O king, (sometimes) peop e count the sins of sinners and intimate them to others. If the accusation is true, they share it equally (with the sinners), but if the accusation is false, they incur double that sin.

115b-116. He who falsely imputes sins to a sinless person and censures him for it, falls into a terrible hell and remains there as long as the moon, the sun and the stars shine. When sinners are censured, half the number of their sins is dispelled.

117. He who takes up the vow of holy observances and abandons them without observing them completely to the end, experiences distress in the hell Asipatra and is reborn with defects and deficiencies in his limbs, in the world.

118. The man who puts obstacles in the observance of the holy vows that have been undertaken by others, falls into the hell Śleṣma-bhojana which is excessively terrible and leading to misery.

119. He who shows partiality in administering justice and in the instructions of dharma, has no means of redemption, even after ten thousand expiatory rites.

120. A person who partakes of forbidden food falls into the hell Viḍ-bhojya (wherein fecal matter is served as food) and remains there for ten thousand years. Then he is born as a Cāṇḍāla, where he always subsists on beef.

121. One who insults and dishonours Brāhmaṇas through harsh words, incurs the sin on a par with Brāhmaṇa-slaughter. He undergoes all the tortures of hell and is born as a Cāṇḍāla in the course of ten lives.

122. Expiatory rites as in the case of Brahma-hatyā (committal of Brāhmaṇa-slaughter) must be performed by the person who puts obstacles, when something is being offered to a Brāhmaṇa.

123. If any one steals another man's wealth and gives it away as a gift (to another person), the merit of the gift accrues to the owner of the original wealth, but the thief who steals, falls into the hell.

124. By not giving a thing after having promised it, a man falls into the hell Lālā-bhakṣa. O king, a person engaged in censuring ascetics falls into the hell Śilāmātra.

125. Those who destroy parks and gardens fall into the hell Śva-bhojana where they stay for twentyone yugas. Thereafter, they undergo all the tortures of hells in a serial order.

126. Listen to the evil destination attained by the destroyer of shrines, of lakes as well as of flower-gardens, O king.

127-128a. They undergo all those tortures in the different hells severally. Thereafter, they are born as worms in the fecal matter for twentyone kalpas. O king, thereafter, they undertake one hundred births in the Cāṇḍāla caste.

128b-129a. Even during the course of my life, I am not competent to narrate adequately the great sin of the destroyer of villages and those who burn or plunder them.

129b-130a. The tortures that the partakers of other men's leavings of food and the persons engaged in injuring friends, undergo are very severe. They suffer these as long as the moon and the stars shine.

130b-131a. Those who have ceased to perform the rites and the yajñas for Pitṛs (manes) and Devas, those who stay outside the part of the Vedas, are notorious as heretics. They undergo all sorts of tortures.

131b-132a. O king, thus, there are various types of tortures in regard to those who commit sins. I am not competent to ennumerate either the sinners or the tortures, O Lord.

132b-133a. Who else other than Lord Viṣṇu is capable of mentioning the number of sins, tortures or righteous duties ?

133b-134. When expiatory rites are performed in accordance with the injunctions of Dharma Śāstras, the mass of sins is annihilated. Expiatory rites are to be performed in the presence of the lord of Lakṣmī (Viṣṇu).

135. In case the holy rites suffer due to superfluity or omission, the waters of the Gaṅgā, the Tulasī plant, companionship with holy persons and glorification of Lord Hari (are enough to compensate).

136. (In addition to these) non-jealousy and non-violence are dispeller of sins. All holy rites dedicated to Viṣṇu are indeed fruitful.

137a. Those rites which are not so dedicated are futile as like sacrificial oblations consigned to ashes (instead of offering into the sacrificial fire).

137b-138. The Nitya (rites to be performed daily), Naimittika (rites to be performed on certain occasions) and the Kāmya (rites performed with the desire of achieving specific objects) as well as other means of salvation, when dedicated to Viṣṇu, become Sāttvika and fruitful. Devotion to Hari is the greatest destroyer of all sins of men.

139. That bhakti (devotion) should be known to be of ten[10] types. To the forest of sins it is like a great conflagration of fire. O excellent king, it is practised by men whose natures are characterised by sattva, rajas and tamas.

140. O king, if any one worships the lord of Śrī for the destruction of another, his devotion is the meanest of all Tāmasi type of Bhaktis, since there is a wicked motivation therein.

141. If any one worships Nārāyaṇa, the lord of the universe with a deceptive mind like the unchaste woman serving her husband, that Bhakti is the middling (Madhyamā) among the Tāmasi type of Devotion.

142. O lord of Earth, if, on seeing others engaged in the worship of the deity, one begins to worship Hari with a spirit of rivalry, that Bhakti is the most excellent among the Tāmasi devotions.

143. If any one endowed with ardentmost faith worships Hari, seeking wealth, grain and other things that Bhakti is the meanest among Rājasi bhaktis.

144. If any one worships Mādhava with the greatest love and affection keeping in view the attainment of worldwide fame, that Bhakti is Madhyama (middling) among the Rājasī bhaktis.

145. O lord of the Earth, if any one worships Hari, keeping in view the position of Sālokya (state of being in the same region with the lord) that Bhakti is glorified as the most excellent among the Rājasī Bhaktis.

146. If any one worships Hari for destroying sins committed by himself and he is endowed with the greatest of faith, that Bhakti is the meanest among Sāttvikī bhaktis.

147. "This is pleasing to Hari." If with this idea a person serves Hari and is endowed with a living faith that Bhakti is the middling among Sāttvikī bhaktis.

148. O king, if any one worships Hari like a slave unto lord of Śrī, with the knowledge that it is the injunction of Śrutis, that Bhakti is the most excellent of all Sāttvikī Bhaktis.

149. If after glorifying a little the greatness of Hari, a man is pleased and happy in identifying himself with the Lord, that Bhakti is the most excellent of all.

150. If any one perceives thus : "I am the great lord Viṣṇu himself. All this universe exists in me", always know him to be the most excellent of all good men.

151. Thus the devotion of ten types is the cause for the severance of the bond of worldly existence. Even there, the Sāttvikī Bhakti is the bestower of all cherished fruits.

152. Hence, listen, O king, Bhakti to Janārdana should be pursued without any antagonism to one's duties,[11] by one who is desirous of conquering the mundane world.

153. If a man forsakes his duties and lives solely by devotion, Lord Viṣṇu is not pleased with him. Viṣṇu is pleased only with the Ācāra (performance of one's own prescribed duty).

154. In all the Āgamas (sacred literature), Ācāra (performance of one's prescribed course of duties) is considered as the foremost. Righteousness is born of Ācāra and Acyuta is the lord of Dharma.

155. Hence, Hari's devotion should be pursued consistently with abidance by one's own prescribed duty. Even the Dharmas of those devoid of good conduct cause unhappiness.

156. The Bhakti devoid of pursuance of one's own duty (prescribed by one's dharma) is glorified, if not proceeded with. What has been asked by you has been narrated by me.

157. Hence, worship Janārdana with full devotion to Dharma

(performance of the duties prescribed by Śāstras for you). Worship Nārāyaṇa who is minuter than the minutest, and you will attain perpetual happiness.

158. Śiva alone is Hari himself.[12] Hari alone is Śiva himself. One who sees the difference between the two is a rogue. He falls into ten million hells.

159. Hence, worship with the knowledge that Viṣṇu and Śiva are identical. One who creates difference, attains misery here as well as hereafter.

160. O lord of people, I shall tell you the purpose for which I have approached you. O intelligent one, listen with attention.

161. O king, your grandfathers who have committed sins of suicidal nature and have been burnt down by the wrath of Kapila, are staying in hell.

162. O highly blessed one, deliver them by means of the act of bringing the Gaṅgā (over their remains).[13] O lord of Earth, indeed the Gaṅgā destroys all sins.

163. O excellent king, if the hair, bones, nails, teeth or the ashes of a person are touched by the waters of the Gaṅgā one is taken to Lord Viṣṇu's abode.

164. O king, the man whose bones or ashes are cast into the Gaṅgā by his kinsmen is liberated from all sins. He goes to the abode of Hari.

165. O king, whatever sins have been mentioned to you by me are destroyed by means of sprinkling with the drops of the water of the Gaṅgā."

Sanaka said :

166. O leading sage, after saying this to the great king Bhagīratha of righteous soul, Dharmarāja vanished immediately.

167. That king was highly intelligent. He was a master of all topics in the sacred texts. He entrusted the care of the entire Earth to the ministers and went to the forest for performing penance.

168. After going to the Himālayas, he performed penance on a peak which was sixteen Yojanas to the West of the hermitage of Nara and Nārāyaṇa and was covered with snow.

169. By performing the penance, he brought down the Gaṅgā that sanctifies the three worlds.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

1. raudrā ye narakā

The Smṛtis, Purāṇas and medieval digests on Dharma Śāstra declare that if sinners do not undergo an expiatory penance (Prāyaścitta) or are not punished by the King for their crime, fall into hell, and are born as lower animals and even after attaining human birth they become marked by mal-formations, diseases. The idea of hell is found in all ancient communities, e.g. Egyptians, Hebrews, Iranians. In the Ṛgveda the idea about hell is vague but it became more concrete from the time of Atharva Veda onwards. The gruesome descriptions of the torture in hells are described in details in Smṛtis and more lucidly in Purāṇas, a specimen of which will be found in this chapter.

2. There is a divergence of opinion about the number of hells. VP. I.6.41 enumerates seven hells: Tāmisra (dark), Andha-tāmisra (blinding dark), Mahāraurava (abounding in paths with heated surface (Prāyaścitta Viveka P.15), Raurava, Asipatra-vana (a forest full of trees with sword-blades to cut up the sinner), Kāla-sūtra (like a thread on the wheel with which a potter cuts off a raw earthen pot into two), and Avīci (Full of waves in which the sinner is every now and then submerged). At another place (II.6.2-5) it mentions 26 hells. Manu IV.88-90, AP.371.20-22, mention 21 hells. The list in Manu IV.88-90 is as follows : Tāmisra, Andha-Tāmisra, Mahā-Raurava, Raurava, Kālasūtra, Mahānaraka, Sañjīvana (where one is killed and revived to be killed again), Mahāvīci, Tapana (burning hot as fire), Sampratāpana (Kumbhīpāka according to some. In it, the sinner is cooked as in a cooker), Saṅghāta (The sinner is compressed in a place smaller than his size), Kākola (where the sinner is pecked and preyed on by crows), Kuḍmala (The sinner is bound into a bundle appearing like a bud), Pūti-mṛttika (of putrid stenching clay), Lohaśaṅku (when the sinner is pierced with iron nails), Ṛjīṣa (Where the sinner is schorched with boiled flour), Panthāḥ (Where the sinner is made to walk without break), Śālmali (The sinner is pricked with thorns like those of Śālmali —silk-cotton-tree), Nadī (thrown in a river like the Vaitaraṇī), Asipatravana, Lohadāraka (Where the sinner's limbs are cut up with iron).

The list of hells given here is practically the same as above. Here for every kind of torture, a separate hell is assigned, and the number of hells went on increasing depending on the ingenuity or imagination of the writer of Purāṇas to conceive new kind of torture. Ultimately these numbers increased to thousands in the GP. Preta-Khaṇḍa 3.3 •

narakāṇāṁ sahasrāṇi vartante hyaruṇānuja /

3. These describe the tortures in hells enumerated above. It is a certainly, blood-curdling description.

4. These verses describe what actions come under the 'great sin' Brāhmaṇa-slaughter. It may be noted that even a slanderer of Brāhmaṇas, or one who obstructs his religious routine, or causing a Brahmin get up from the row of a dinner or a person who abets to or consents these acts is called a Brāhmaṇa-slayer.

5. Next to Brāhmaṇa-slaughter, wine-drinking is regarded as 'a great sin' but under liquor-drinking is included eating food from a low-caste and from a professional worshipper of idols, resorting to prostitutes, working as an attendant for Śūdra.

6. Theft is regarded as a heinous crime. Here in addition to stealing of precious stones and metals, abandonment of pitṛ-yajñas, non-performance of one's holy duties, are regarded as equivalent to theft.

7. With the exception of Soma's adultery with Bṛhaspati's wife, we do not have other outstanding cases recorded of 'defiling the preceptor's bed'. But the NP includes under this category all cases of adultery whether with near relatives or low-caste women or with one's dependants, as also omission of doing religious duties and speaking low of the scriptures.

8. These verses include the crimes for which there is no adequate expiation for redemption. It is interesting to note that 'sins' like ungratefulness, breach of trust, entrance into a Buddhistic shrine even in times of emergency are included under 'unredeemable sins'.

9. This is a sort of a penal code supposed to be in force in the land of Yama. The principles underlying these punishments are retribution and deterrence.

10. The tenfold classification is distinct from the nava-vidhā bhakti or the nine modes or ways of Bhakti. Here the motivation whether it is dominated by Sattva, Rajas and Tamas—is taken as the basis.

11. Not only the NP. but other Purāṇas also insist on a synthesis of Karma (performance of duties prescribed by Śāstra's for one's class or caste and stage of life) and Bhakti.

12. Identity between gods Śiva and Viṣṇu is the main thesis of all Purāṇas irrespective of their classification as Śaivite, Viṣṇuite, etc. To them these are the names attributed to the Brahman which is the only one Reality. Hence, the futility of disputes between the advocates of Śiva, Viṣṇu, or Śakti cults.

13. The efficacy of Gaṅgā in destroying sins is repeated again in NP. infra II.39.30-31, 40-64. The Vedic seers, Smṛti and Purāṇa-writers, and Nibandha-writers are unanimous in extolling the Gaṅgā in the highest terms. A reference to works like Tīrtha-Cintāmaṇi, Kalpa-taru (on Tīrtha) etc. gives us numerous verses (mostly quotations) on the greatness of the Gaṅgā—which is a special theme in the NP.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Bhagiratha Brings down The Gaṅgā

Nārada submitted :

1. It behoves you to tell me what the Lord of the Earth Bhagīratha did after reaching the snow-capped mountain Himavān, and how he brought down the Gaṅgā.

Sanaka narrated :

2. While he was going to the mountain Himavān for his penance, O sage, the great king Bhagīratha, wearing matted hair and bark garments, reached the banks of the Godāvarī.[1]

3. There in the great forest, he saw the excellent hermitage of the sage Bhṛgu. Many antelopes were frisking about here and there in that hermitage. It was frequented by herds of elephants.

4. It was resounded with the humming sound of the hovering bees and the chirping of birds. Broods of boars wandered over it and the Camari deer fanned it with their bushy tails.

5. In that forest peacocks danced about and the deer and the other animals tenanted in it. Great trees had been eagerly nurtured by young girls in the families of sages.

6. It abounded richly in trees such as Śāla, Tāla (Palms) and Tamāla. It was embellished with fresh shoots of Hintāla palms. It was decorated with (various flowering plants such as) Mālati, Yūthikā, Kunda, Campaka and with Aśvattha trees.

7. There were many full-blown flowers. The hermitage was inhabited by groups of sages. It was reverberating with the chanting of Vedic mantras and the scriptural texts. The king entered that hermitage of Bhṛgu.

8. There he saw sage Bhṛgu who was resplendent like the Sun in lustre, who was surrounded by groups of disciples and was eulogising the great Brahman.

9. He bowed down to the leader of Brāhmaṇas by touching his feet (and other acts of reverence). Bhṛgu accorded him hospitable reception with due honour.

10. When the formalities of reception were completed by the great sage Bhṛgu, the modest king spoke to that leading sage with his palms folded in reverence.

Bhagiratha said :

11. "O holy Sir, O knower of all Dharmas, O sage proficient in all scriptural topics, I am awfully frightened of worldly existence. I inquire of you what brings about men's uplift (from Saṁsāra to the final Liberation—Mokṣa).

12. O excellent sage, if I am to be blessed by you, kindly recount to me the holy acts whereby the glorious Lord becomes propitiated, O omniscient one."

Bhṛgu replied :

13. "O king, what you desire has been understood. You are the most excellent of meritorious persons. Otherwise how do you deserve to uplift the entire family of yours ?

14. If any one, whoever he may be, is desirous of uplifting his own family by means of auspicious acts, know him to be Lord Viṣṇu himself in human form, O king.

15. Listen attentively, O prominent king. I shall relate to you that holy course of conduct whereby the Lord of gods bestows on men the benefit desired by them.

16. O king, be devoted to Truth. Do not indulge in violence. Always look after the welfare of all living beings. Do not utter a lie on any account.

17. Eschew contacts with the wicked people. Entertain intimacy with the saintly persons. Be engaged day and night, in meritorious acts. Meditate upon Viṣṇu,the Eternal (Deity).

18. Perform the worship of Mahā-Viṣṇu. Attain excellent (mental) peace. Perform the Japa of the twelve-syllabled mantra (viz. Oṁ namo bhagavate Vāsudevāya) and the eight-syllabled mantra (viz. Oṁ namo Nārāyaṇāya). Welfare and fortune will come your way."

Bhagiratha submitted :

19. "O sage, what is regarded as the nature of the Truth which is conducive to the welfare of all living beings ? Of what nature is falsehood said to be ? Of what nature are the wicked people ?

20. What is said to be regarded as the nature of good men ? Of what nature is merit ? How is Viṣṇu to be remembered ? Of what procedure is his worship ?

21-22a. Of what nature is quiescence said to be ? O sage, what is the eight-syllabled mantra ? O sage, proficient in the real nature of the truth, what is the twelve-syllabled mantra ? It behoves you to explain everything to me by extending your greatest favour or grace on me."

Bhṛgu said :

22b-23. "Very nice ! Exceedingly nice ! O highly intelligent one. Your intellect is unsurpassably excellent. O king, I shall explain to you every thing that I have been asked of by you. The statement of what is factually correct, the learned men call it the Truth.

24-25. Indeed, that should be uttered which is not contradictory to Dharma, by those solely devoted to Dharma. That statement which is uttered after taking into account the place and time by good men, causing no offence to the same, is called the Truth. Indeed it is non-injurious to all creatures.

26. O king, that has been proclaimed as non-violence which bestows all desires and which is ancillary to holy acts and which is opposed to all wrong actions.

27-30a. The following is proclaimed to be benevolence to all the world by persons who are adept in Dharma. It is, following the will of a person who discriminates between Dharma and Adharma and the statement thereof. That should be known as falsehood which is antagonistic to all benevolence and welfare. O king, those hateful and foolish persons whose intellect is always engaged in the evil path should be known as wicked men. They are excluded from all righteousness and piety. Those who follow the Vedic path, discriminating between what is virtue and what is not and those who are desirous of the well-being of all the world are glorified as good men.

30b-31a. That which generates devotion to Hari, that which the good persons are enamoured of, and that which causes spiritual pleasure is glorified as Merit.

31b-32a. All this universe is Viṣṇu. Viṣṇu is the cause of everything. I too am Viṣṇu". It is this realization that is known as Viṣṇu-smaraṇa (remembrance of Viṣṇu).

32b-33a. Viṣṇu is identical with all deities. I shall worship him in accordance with the prescribed rites. It is this faith that is glorified as his Devotion.

33b-34a. Viṣṇu, the perfect and the eternal, is identical with all living beings. It is this awareness of non-difference that is glorified as Samatā (Equalitarianism).

34b-36a. O king, impartiality towards friends and enemies, self-control and satisfaction with what is gained by chance—is glorified as quiescence. All these have been proclaimed as the bestowers of success in the accomplishment of penance. They are the cause of the instantaneous destructions of all heaps of sins.

36b-37. O king of kings, I shall tell you the great eight-syllabled mantra that is destructive of all sins. It is the sole means of the achievement of Puruṣārthas (goals in life). It is pleasing to Viṣṇu and it bestows all super-human powers.

38-39. One shall perform the Japa of the mantra Namo Nārāyaṇāya (obeisance unto Nārāyaṇa) after prefixing the Praṇava (Om) to it. (i.e. Om namo Nārāyaṇāya). Firstly one shall utter Namo Bhagavate and thereafter Vāsudevāya. O great king, by prefixing the Praṇava to it, it (viz. Oṁ namo bhagavate Vāsudevāya) is called the twelve-syllabled mantra. O king, the efficacy of both the mantras—the eight-syllabled one as well as the twelve-syallbled one—is the same.[2]

40a. Their equality whether in Pravṛtti (active participation in worldly life) or in Nivṛtti (renunciation of worldly activities) has been specially taught or pointed out.

40b-43. One should meditate on Nārāyaṇa who holds, Śaṅkha and Cakra, who is quiescent and free from ailments, whose left side is occupied by Lakṣmī, who is the lord that accords fearlessness, who wears a crown and ear-rings, who shines splendidly with various ornaments and embellishments, who wears a brilliant necklace with the radiant Kaustubha jewel, whose chest is marked with the curl of golden hair known as Śrivatsa, who wears yellow robes, who is the lord bowed down to by Suras and Asuras, who has neither beginning nor end, and who is the bestower of all desired blessings. The eternal lord is perfect and immanent. He is of the form of perfect knowledge.

44. O king, thus everything that had been asked by you has been explained. Farewell to you. Attain the fruition of your penance. Proceed ahead to derive the same happily.

45. The ruler of the Earth who was advised thus by Bhṛgu, the great sage, attained the greatest pleasure. He went to the forest for the penance.

46. He reached the Himālaya mountains. He performed a severe penance in the great holy centre Nadeśvara,[3] in a charming and meritorious spot.

47. The king took his bath three times a day. He subsisted on bulbous roots, roots and fruits. Every day he greeted and honoured the guests. He was devoted to the performance of daily fire-worship.

48. He was quiescent and benevolent towards all living beings. He was absorbed in the worship of Nārāyaṇa. Thrice a day, he worshipped Hari by means of leaves, flowers and holy waters.

49. Spending a great deal of time like this, he courageously meditated on lord Nārāyaṇa. Thereafter, he began to eat only withered leaves.

50. Then the exceedingly righteous king became solely devoted to Prāṇāyāma (Control of breath). He began to perform penance without even breathing.

51. Meditating on the infinite unvanquished lord Nārāyaṇa, the king remained without breathing for sixty thousand years.

52. A terrible fire was produced from his nostrils. On seeing it, all Devas, scorched by that fire, became excessively frightened.

53. They went over to Mahāviṣṇu. On reaching the northern shore of the milky ocean, where the Lord of the worlds abides the Prominent Devas eulogised the Lord of the chiefs of Devas who protected those who respected him and sought refuge in him.

54. Devas prayed : "We bow down to Viṣṇu the sole Lord of the worlds, the Supreme Lord who removes the distress of all those who remember him; who is naturally pure and who is the embodiment of perfect wisdom and is spoken of as perfeet in nature, by those persons knowing of it.

55. The great-souled Lord should always be meditated upon by excellent Yogins. He has carried out the tasks of Devas by assuming bodies out of his own will. He is the embodiment of the Universe and its primordial Lord. We bow down to him, the Supreme Person, Puruṣottama.

56. For the purpose of achieving the Puruṣārthas (goals in life), we bow down to Viṣṇu, the ancient Puruṣa, that Ruler (of the universe), worthy of worship, by uttering whose names the sins of wicked men get dissolved.

57. It is through his brilliance that the sun and others shine; they never transgress his commandments. We bow down to that Lord of Devas who is of the nature of Kāla (Time or Death) and whose form is constituted of Puruṣārthas.

58. The lotus-born deity (Brahmā) creates the universe; Rudra annihilates it, and the Brāhmaṇas sanctify the worlds through Śrutis; we seek refuge in that primordial Lord who is the receptacle of all good qualities and who is the preceptor of all.

59. We bow down to the most excellent pre-eminent Lord, who can be realized only through perfect knowledge; who is the cause of the achievement of what is desired and by good devotees; who is the enemy of Madhu and Kaiṭabha[4] and whose footrest has been worshipped by both Suras and Asuras.

60. We bow down to the Lord who has no beginning, middle or end, the unborn great (Ruler of the universe), Śiva, the cause of destruction of the darkness called the beginningless Avidyā—the Lord whose form is the essence of existence, knowledge and bliss and who is devoid of form, etc.

61. We bow down to Nārāyaṇa, Viṣṇu, the infinite-Īśa, the yellow-robed God, worthy of being served by the lotusborn deity Brahmā and others, the beloved of sacrifices the performer of sacrificers, the purest, the most excellent, the imperishable Deity.

62. Mahā-Viṣṇu who was thus eulogised by Indra and other gods, recounted to the gods the conduct (and antecedents) of the King-sage.

63. Thereafter, O Nārada, the unsullied Lord consoled Devas after assuring fearlessness. He then went to that place where that saintly king was performing penance.

64. The Lord, the wielder of Śaṅkha and Cakra, the embodiment of existence, knowledge and bliss and the preceptor of all worlds, revealed, himself to that king.

65-67. On seeing him, the king bent down his head and prostrated himself on the ground before the Lord whose eyes resembled the lotus, who illuminated all quarters with his brilliance, whose complexion was blue like the Atasī flower, who was bedecked with shining ear-rings, with glossy tresses and charming lotus-like face, who was resplendent with a brilliant crown, who wore the jewel Kaustubha and the Śrī-vatsa mark (on his chest), who was bedecked with garland of Sylvan flowers, whose arms were long, whose limbs were elegant and whose lotus-like feet were worshipped by the lords of worlds.

68. He was overwhelmed with ecstatic delight. With hairs standing on end and voice choked with emotion, he uttered—"O Kṛṣṇa, O Kṛṣṇa, O Kṛṣṇa, O Śrīkṛṣṇa.

69. Viṣṇu, the Immanent soul, the Preceptor of the universe, the Creator of living beings, became pleased with him. Overwhelmed with Grace, the Lord spoke thus.

The glorious Lord said :

70. "O Bhagīratha, O highly blessed one, what is desired by you will be realised. Your grandfathers will come to my world.

71. O king, with hymns according to your capacity, you should eulogise Śambhu who is another Mūrti[5] (form) of mine. Indeed, he will instaṇtaneously get your desires fulfilled.

72. He accepted the moon who sought refuge in him. So propitiate god Śiva, the bestower of happiness, who is worthy of being eulogised.

73. O king, he is the deity without beginning and destruction. He is the bestower of all desired blessings. On being worshipped by you, he will immediately accomplish your welfare."

74. After saying this, the Lord of the chiefs of Devas, Acyuta, the Lord of the worlds, disappeared. And the Lord of the Earth got up, O excellent sage.

75. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, the king was surprised. He wondered, "Is this a dream or the true state of affairs. What shall I do now?"

76. Then a voice in the firmament loudly proclaimed to him as he had become perplexed—"It is clear that this is the truth. It does not behove you to worry."

77. On hearing it, the devout ruler of the Earth eulogised Iśāna, the cause of all and the king of all deities.

Bhagiratha said :

78. "I salute to Īśāna,[6] the lord of the universe, the destroyer of the distress of those who bow down to the Lord—the Lord incomprehensive through the valid means of knowledge, who is the embodiment of Praṇava (OM).

79. I bow down to Virūpākṣa, of the form of the universe, the unborn, and the eternal one, the cause of creation, sustenance and dissolution of the world, the embodiment of universe and of fierce Semen.

80. I salute that Lord who increases the nourishment, on whom the eminent Yogins meditate and who is devoid of beginning, middle and end and who is Infinite Unborn and Unchanging.

81. Obeisance to the over-lord of the worlds, who wanders, who defrauds the evil doers; obeisance be to you the blue-necked god, to the Lord of Paśus.

82. Glory to one whose form is consciousness; salute to the Lord of nourished ones; Bow to one who makes the most incompetent a competent one; obeisance to the Lord of the Bhūtas (Living Beings or goblins).

83. Obeisance to one armed with the Pināka bow. Salutations to the wielder of the trident in hand and to the holder of a skull in his hand; Bow to one who is the bearer of a noose and an iron club.

84. Obeisance to you who are immanent in all beings; Salutations to you, the bearer of a bell in hand; Obeisance to the Lord of five faces and to the Lord of fields.

85. Obeisance to the supporter of Earth, who is the primordial one amongst all living beings. Salutations to one who assumes innumerable forms and yet is the attributeless Great Ātman.

86. Obeisance to the Supreme god of Gaṇas (troops of demigods). Salutations to the leader of Gaṇas and to Hiraṇya-garbha; Salutations to the Lord of gold.

87. Bow to you the gold-semened one; to the gold-armed one; obeisance to one who is both the form and witness of meditation.

88-90. Salutations to you stabilised in meditation and to one comprehensible through meditation. You are the Lord by whom this entire visible Universe consisting of the mobile and immobile has been illuminated and created by assuming the forms of Pradhāna and Puruṣa in the same manner as the rain is created by the cloud. You are the Lord whom the knowers of Reality consider self-luminous, great Ātman, the highest eternal brilliance, the Sun unto the eyes of men.

91-92. I salute the lover of Umā, the Lord of Nandin, the blue-necked Sadāśiva, Mahādeva, the conqueror of Death, the Lord greater than the greatest; the greatest deity in the form of Śabda-brahman, the Cause of all. Obeisance to you, O god with matted hair. Obeisance to you, Sadyojāta.

93. Obeisance to the Cause of the origin of the worlds ; obeisance to the purest one ; to the eldest and to the youngest; obeisance to Manyu (anger). Obeisance to you the possessor of Strength. Salutations to the Lord of Trayi (the three Vedas), obeisance to the thread of sacrifices.

94. Obeisance to the energetic one. Salutations to the Lord of quarters; bow to Kāla of the form of Aghora; obeisance to you of fiery semen; and to the highly great-souled one.

95-96. I bow down to that formless Īśa from whom all these originated, viz., the oceans, the rivers, the mountains, the groups of Gandharvas, Yakṣas, Asuras and Siddhas, the mobile and immobile creation, the greatest and the smallest beings, the Sat and the Asat (existent and non-existent), and Jivas and Ajivas (the living and non-living). His lotus-like feet are bowed to by the Yogins. He is the inner Ātman of everything. He is the only being who is independent and is the virtue of the virtuous. To him I bow down again and again."

97. Eulogised thus, the great lord Śaṅkara, the benefactor of the worlds, appeared in front of the king who had completed his penance.

98-100. O Nārada, on seeing the Lord, the king prostrated himself at his feet on the ground, like a wooden staff. The Lord had five faces, ten arms, and the crescent moon embellishing his crest. He was three-eyed, of elegant limbs and with serpents as the sacred thread. The Lord had a wide chest and his lustre was brilliant like that of the snow-capped mountain. Elephant's hide constituted his garment. His lotus-like feet were worshipped by the Suras. After prostrating, the king suddenly got up and stood in front of Śiva with palms joined in reverence.

101-102. He bowed to Mahādeva, glorifying the name of Śaṅkara. After realising the devotion of the king, the moon-crested god Śaṅkara said to the king—"I am pleased. Choose the desired boon. I have been delighted well by you by your eulogy as well as by penance".

103. Encouraged thus by the Lord, the king was highly delighted at his heart. Reverentially folding his palms, he said to the chief lord of all the chiefs of the worlds.

Bhagiratha said :

104. "O Maheśvara, if I am to be blessed by you by granting boons, bestow the Gaṅgā for the purpose of liberating our forefathers."

Śrī Śiva said :

105. "The Gaṅgā has been given to you by me. The highest is the destination of your forefathers. Excellent salvation is granted to you." After saying this, god Śiva vanished.

106. The Gaṅgā, the sole sanctifier of the world, slipped down from the matted locks of the god Śiva with matted hair. She followed Bhagīratha sanctifying the universe on the way.

107. O sage, thereafter the goddess Gaṅgā the pure, and the remover of sins and impurities became well known in the three worlds as 'Bhāgīrathī'.

108. The Gaṅgā, the most excellent among all rivers, flowed over that land where the sons of Sagara had been burnt formerly due to their own sins.

109. As soon as the ashes of the sons of Sagara were (deluged and) swept away by the current of the Gaṅgā, they who had been submerged in the hell, with their sins washed off, were uplifted.

110. Those very same persons who were severely tortured by Yama who was reviling at them, were honoured by him later, when they were sanctified by the waters of the Gaṅgā that flowed over them.

111. After realising that the sons of Sagara had been absolved of their sins, Yama duly bowed to them and honoured them. Being much pleased in his mind, he spoke to them :

112. "O princes, you have been liberated from the exceedingly terrible hell. Be seated in the aerial car and go to the abode of Viṣṇu."

113. Thus addressed by Yama, those noble-souled sons of Sagara whose sins disappeared, assumed divine forms and attained to the region of Viṣṇu.

114. Of such powerful efficacy is the Gaṅgā that had originated from the tip of the feet of Viṣṇu. She is well known all over the worlds as the destroyer of great sins.

115. He who reads or listens to this meritorious narrative that is destructive of great sins, attains the fruit of ablutions in the Gaṅgā.

116. He who narrates this meritorious anecdote in front of Brāhmaṇas goes to Viṣṇu's abode whence there is no return to the world of mortals.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

1. Godāvarī-taṭam appears to be a misprint, for neither Mbh., VR or any other Purāṇa nor De (Gdamī) mentions such a river in the Himālayas or associates Bhagiratha's name with that river.

2. The eight-syllabled Mantra—Om namo Nārāyaṇāya—is the traditional Pāñcarātra Mantra, while the twelve-syllabled—Om namo bhagavate Vāsudevāya—is the traditional mantra of the Bhāgavata cult. The NP. tries a synthesis of both these traditional cults by declaring the same efficacy, accruing from either mantra both in Pravṛtti and Nivṛtti paths.

3. Nādeśvara is the same as Bindusaras (De, p. 134). It is a sacred pool situated on the Rudra Himālaya, two miles south of Gaṅgotri (De, p. 38).

4. There are two versions about these demon-brothers : (i) The demon—brothers Madhu and Kaiṭabha were born through two drops of water fallen, through the will of Viṣṇu, on the lotus springing from his navel. They represented the rajo-guṇa and tamo-guṇa. A glance at those drops by Viṣṇu, transformed the drops into those demons (Mbh—Śānti 347.25-26). They were killed by Viṣṇu in the Hayagriva form (ibid 347.69-70). (ii) According to DB I.6.20-21, they were born out of the ear-wax that flowed out of Viṣṇu's ears while he was asleep on Śeṣa.

5. Though the NP. is a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa, the author takes such opportunities to emphasize the identity of gods Śiva and Viṣṇu.

6. This eulogy of god Śiva has several echoes from the Rudrādhyāya (TS IV.5)—especially its Namaka part (TS. IV.5.1), as a number of phrases from that Sūkta are incorporated in this prayer.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Narration of the Vowed Observance of Dvādaśi Day[1]

The sages said :

1. Well done O Sūta, O highly blessed one, the excellent greatness of the Gaṅgā that destroys all sins, has been related by you who have great mercy in your heart.

2. O Sūta, what did Nārada of the divine vision ask Sanaka, the excellent sage, after hearing the greatness of the Gaṅgā.

Sūta said :

3. Listen, ye all sages. I shall tell you what has been asked again by Nārada, the celestial sage, and what he (Sanaka) narrated.

4. After hearing the excellent greatness of the Gaṅgā that consisted of many narratives and mythological anecdotes, the son of Brahmā asked thus with great respect.

Nārada said :

5. O sage, the meritorious greatness of the Gaṅgā has been heard by me from you, the merciful. It is greatly blessed and all the topics therein have been unravelled. It is the essence of good deeds alone. It destroys sins and bestows the desired objects.

6. Those who are saintly, worship Viṣṇu well. They strive for themselves as well as for others. With different kinds of advices, they exceedingly enlighten the man of immature mind and make him delighted.

7. Therefore, narrate (in detail) the holy observances[2] of Hari which, when performed, make Viṣṇu delighted. The merciful Lord grants devotion to those who worship him. It is known that salvation is the female slave unto it (devotion).

8. Mukunda grants salvation to those who worship and who are devoted to holy vows (pertaining to him), worship and meditation. Pondering over the great difficulty in serving the devotees, he does not grant the path of devotion to anyone.

9. O excellent sage, recount to me the holy rite that makes Hari satisfied whether it be active participation in worldly affairs or an act of renunciation. O bestower of honour, you are a devotee of Viṣṇu."

Sanaka said :

10. "Well done, O excellent sage, well done. You are really a devotee of Puruṣottama in view of the fact that you enquire about the observances or deeds of the wielder of the Śārṅga bow (Viṣṇu) again and again.

11. I shall expound unto you the holy observances of vows that render service to the worlds and through which Hari being propitiated, grants fearlessness (i.e. Liberation from rebirth).

12. If Lord Janārdana, whose symbol is sacrifice, is pleased with anyone, he becomes happy here and hereafter and his penance flourishes.

13. Great sages say that those who are devoted to the worship of Hari, by whatever means that may be, go to the greatest abode (Vaikuṇṭha).

14. A man endowed with faith, should observe fast on the Dvādaśi (Twelfth) day in the bright half of the Mārgaśīrṣa[3] month and worship Jalaśāyin (Lord Viṣṇu who lies in the Milk ocean) devoutly.

15-16. After duly washing the teeth, one should take one's bath and wear clean white cloths. O excellent sage, he should be restrained in speech. With the feeling of devotion, he should worship Hari with sweet fragrant sandal paste, smelling flowers, rice grains, incense, lamps and food offerings. He should adore Viṣṇu by saying, "Obeisance to you, O Keśava."

17. He should offer oblations of ghee and sesamum seeds into the fire one hundred and eight times. At night, he should keep awake in the vicinity of the Śālagrâma stone.

18-21a. He should perform ablution of Nārāyaṇa free from ailments, with a Prastha measure of milk. He should worship devoutly, Keśava accompanied by Mahālakṣmī three times (that day) in accompaniment of sages, musical instruments and by food offerings of various edibles and foodstuffs.

Again after getting up early in the morning and completing the accustomed daily routine, he should worship the Lord, as before controlling the sense organs and restraining the speech. He should be pure (in word and deed). Repeating the following Mantra, he should offer milk pudding mixed with ghee and accompanied by a coconut fruit to a Brāhmaṇa. He should offer the monetary gifts with devotion.

21b-24a. "May Lord Keśava, the slayer of Keśin, the bestower of all kinds of riches and prosperity, grant me what is desired, in view of this gift of excellent dish (the most exquisite cooked rice, i.e. milk pudding)." Afterwards he should feed the Brāhmaṇas according to his capacity. Absorbed in (the devotion of) Nārāyaṇa, he should also take food along with his kinsmen but with restraint in speech (i.e. in silence). He who performs the excellent worship of Keśava thus, with devotion, shall attain eight times the benefit of Puṇḍarika sacrifice.

24b-27. On the Dvādaśi day in the bright half of the month of Pauṣa,[4] the devotee shall observe fast. With the purity of body and mind and keeping his sense-organs in restraint, he should worship Hari saying "Obeisance to Nārāyaṇa". He should bathe the Lord in milk and offer milk-pudding as Naivedya (offering). He should worship thrice (on that day) and keep awake during the night. He should duly adore Hari by means of incense, lamps, Naivedya (offer of high dishes), scents, fragrant and charming flowers, grasses[5]* dances, songs and musical instruments as well as hymns. He should offer Kṛśara[6] (a sesamum preparation) and cooked rice to a Brāhmaṇa along with ghee and monetary gifts.

28. "In view of the gift of Kṛśara and the cooked rice may Nārāyaṇa be pleased—Nārāyaṇa who is the Ātman of every one, and the Lord of all worlds, who is eternal and all-pervasive."

29. With the above Mantra he should offer the excellent gift to a Brāhmaṇa. Thereafter, he should take food himself along with his kinsmen.

Tṛṇa* is probably a misprint for tūrya — a musical instrument. But the corresponding line in the Bṛhan Nāradiya (Upa-Purāṇa) xvi. 16 is Nṛtyair gītaiḥ pravādyaiś ca stotraiś cāpi yajed Harim shows that the original word is "nṛtyaiḥ."

30. If a devotee worships Lord Nārāyaṇa with devotion as per above-mentioned procedure, he shall attain the benefit of eight Agniṣṭoma[7] sacrifices in full.

31-32. On the Dvādaśi day in the bright half of the month of Māgha, he should observe fast as before, saying "Obeisance to you, Mādhava." He should offer eight oblations with ghee. With the same measure of milk as before, he should bathe Mādhava. With an attentive mind, he should worship with flowers, raw rice, grains and scents.

33. As before, endowed with great devotion, he should keep awake during the night. After finishing the morning duties, he should worship Mādhava again.

34. For the purpose of liberation from all sins, he should offer a Prastha measure of sesamum seeds to a Brāhmaṇa with due recital of the following Mantra and offer a cloth and the monetary gifts as well.

35. "May Mādhava, the Ātman of all living beings, the bestower of the benefits of all holy rites, grant all desires, in view of this great gift of sesamum seeds".

36. Repeating this Mantra he should offer it to a Brāhmaṇa. Endowed with devotion and piety, he should feed Brāhmaṇas according to his capacity, remembering Lord Mādhava.

37. O sage, he who performs the holy observance thus and offers the gift of sesamum seeds, shall attain full benefit of a hundred Vājapeya[8] sacrifices.

38. On the Dvādaśi day in the bright half of the month of Phālguna, the devotee should observe fast. The observer of this holy vow should say, "Obeisance to you, O Govinda."

39. After offering to fire one hundred and eight oblations of sesamum seeds mixed with ghee, he should bathe Govinda with the aforesaid quantity of milk. He should be pure in body and in mind.

40. He should keep awake during the night and perform worship thrice on that day. After concluding the morning routine, he should worship Govinda again.

41-43a. He should offer an Āḍhaka measure of cereals to a Brāhmaṇa along with a cloth and the usual Dakṣiṇā with (the mantra) "Obeisance, O Govinda, O Lord of all, O lover of cowherdess folk, O preceptor of the universe, be delighted with this gift of grains." After observing thus the holy vow, he shall be absolved of all sins. The man shall attain the full merit of Gomedhamakha (cow sacrifice).

43b-46. On the Dvādaśi day in the bright half of the month of Caitra, the devotee should observe fast and worship as before, saying, "Obeisance to You, O Viṣṇu." He should bathe Viṣṇu in milk of the same quantity as before, in accordance with his ability. O Brāhmaṇa, similarly, he should bathe the Lord in a Prastha of ghee with due respect. As before, the observer of the vow should keep awake during the night and perform worship. Then he should get up early in the morning and finish the daily morning duties. He should offer one hundred and eight oblations of a mixture of honey, ghee and sesamum seeds.

47-49a. Thereafter, he should offer an Āḍhaka measure of rice mixed with honey, ghee and sesamum seeds to a Brāhmaṇa, accompanied by the usual religious fee, uttering the Mantra—"May Janārdana be pleased with this gift of an Āḍhaka of rice grains,—Janārdana who is Mahāviṣṇu in the form of Prāṇa (vital breath), who is the bestower of Prāṇa and is the lover of everyone." By doing thus with devotion, the man shall be freed from all sins. He shall acquire the benefit of the sacrifice Atyagniṣṭoma[9] increased eightfold.

49b-52a. One should observe fast on the Dvādaśi day in the bright half of the month of Vaiśākha and with great devotion bathe Madhusūdana the Lord of Devas with milk measuring a Droṇa. Keeping awake during the night is obligatory, along with the worship for three times on that day. With the repetition of the mantra "Obeisance to you the slayer of Madhu", he should perform Homa with ghee according to his capacity. After duly worshipping Madhusūdana with oblations for one hundred and eight times, he shall be freed from sins. He shall attain the benefit of eight horse-sacrifices.

52b-57. The devotee should observe fast on the Dvādaśi day in the bright half of the month of Jyeṣṭha and bathe Trivikrama in an Āḍhaka measure of milk. Endowed with devotion he should worship, saying, "Obeisance to Trivikrama". He should offer one hundred and eight oblations with the milk pudding itself. After keeping awake during the night, he should again perform worship. Along with the usual Dakṣiṇā, he should offer twenty sweet fried cakes to Brāhmaṇas with the mantra, "O Lord of the Universe, O Lord of Devas, O Supreme Lord, be pleased. Accepting this present, be the bestower of what is desired by me." In accordance with his capacity, he should feed the Brāhmaṇas. He should himself take food observing restraint in speech. He who thus performs the great holy observance pertaining to Trivikrama, shall be devoid of sins and shall attain the benefit of eight Naramedhas[10] (human sacrifices).

58. On the Dvādaśī day in the bright half of the month of Āṣāḍha, one should observe fast and keep all sense organs under control. The observer of the holy vow should bathe Vāmana in milk, of the same quantity as mentioned before.

59. He should worship by saying, "Obeisance to you, to Vāmana". After offering hundred and eight oblations with ghee and the Dūrvā grass, he should keep awake during the night. He should worship Vāmana again.

60. With great piety, he should offer cooked rice with curds, to a Brāhmaṇa regularly worshipping Vāmana, along with the usual Dakṣiṇās and a coconut fruit.

61. "Vāmana is the bestower of intellect. He is the sacrificial priest. Vāmana is always present in the materials (of worship). Vāmana is the redeemer from this (worldly existence). Obeisance, obeisance, to Vāmana."

62. With this Mantra, he should offer the cooked rice with curds. In accordance with his capacity, he should feed the Brāhmaṇas. By doing thus, the devotee shall attain the benefit of a hundred Agniṣṭomas.

63. On the Dvādaśī day in the bright half of the month of Śrāvaṇa, the observer of the holy vow should observe fast and bathe god Śrīdhara in milk mixed with honey.

64. He should worship him saying, "Obeisance be to Śrīdhara", and offering scents, etc. in due order. O sage, he should offer one hundred and eight oblations of Pṛṣadājya (ghee mixed with coagulated milk).

65-67. After keeping awake at night, he should perform the worship again. Excellent milk measuring an Āḍhaka must be given to a Brāhmaṇa along with a cloth and the usual religious fee, together with two golden earrings : O leading Brāhmaṇa, in order to realize all the cherished desires, he should repeat the following Mantra : "O Lord Rāma, O Lord of Devas, reposing in the milk ocean, O Lord of the Universe, be delighted with this gift of milk. Be the bestower of all happiness."

68. In view of its being pleasure-bestowing, the performer of the holy rite should feed the Brāhmaṇas in accordance with his capacity. By performing thus, the devotee attains the benefit of a thousand horse sacrifices.

69. On the Dvādaśī day in the bright half of the month of Bhādrapada, the devotee should observe fast, duly bathe Hṛṣīkeśa, the preceptor of the universe, in milk measuring a droṇa.

70. The man should worship saying, "O Hṛṣīkeśa, obeisance to you." He should perform the Homa[11] with Caru (a preparation of boiled rice, barley and pulse) mixed with honey offering oblations one hundred and eight times.

71. After completing the rites of keeping awake, etc., he should give to a knower of the Ātman one and a half Āḍhakas of wheat with Dakṣiṇā and gold according to one's capacity.

72. With the Mantra, "O Hṛṣīkeśa, obeisance to you, the sole cause of all worlds. Grant all happiness unto me, in view of this gift of wheat."

73. According to his capacity he should feed the Brāhmaṇas, and should himself take food with restrained speech. He shall be absolved of all sins and shall attain the benefit of Brahmamedha.[12]

74. On the Dvādaśī day in the bright half of the month of Āśvina, the devotee should observe fast. With great devotion and purity, he should bathe Padmanābha with milk.

75. He should perform Homa in accordance with his capacity saying, "Obeisance to you, to Padmanābha., In accordance with the injunctions, he should perform worship with sesamum seeds, cereals, barley and ghee.

76. After keeping awake during the night, he should perform worship again. He should give a Kuḍava (measure) of honey along with the usual Dakṣiṇā to a Brāhmaṇa.

77. (The mantra shall be)—"O Padmanābha, obeisance to you, O grandfather of all worlds, be delighted with the gift of honey. Be the bestower of all happiness."

78. He who intelligently and devoutly performs the holy vow pertaining to Padmanābha certainly attains the benefit of a thousand Brahmamedhas.

79-82a. On the Dvādaśi day in the bright half of the month of Kārttika, the devotee should observe fast. He should control all his sense-organs. Saying "Obeisance to Dāmodara" with devotional feelings, he should bathe Dāmodara with milk, curds or ghee measuring an Āḍhaka. He should perform a hundred and eight Āhutis with sesamum seeds soaked in honey and ghee. He should invariably observe the vow of keeping awake (during the night), and should be devoted to the performance of worship thrice a day. In the morning he should worship the Lord with charming lotus flowers. Again, he should perform Homa with one hundred and eight oblations of sesamum seeds and ghee.

82b-85. With great devotion he should give to a Brāhmaṇa, cooked rice along with five Bhakṣyas (side dishes of edible things). (The mantra) "O Dāmodara, O Lord of the universe, O cause of all causes, save me compassionately. O Lord, O protector of those who seek refuge." With this Mantra he should give the charitable gift to a Brāhmaṇa, well-versed in the Vedas but burdened with a large family. In accordance with his capacity, he must give Dakṣiṇā and feed the Brāhmaṇas. After performing the holy rites duly, the devotee should take food along with his kinsmen. He attains twice the benefit of a thousand horse-sacrifices.

86. O excellent sage, he who performs these excellent Dvādaśi vratas for a year, attains the highest region.

87. He who devotedly performs these rites for one or two months, attains their respective benefits as well as Hari's region.

88-90. After performing the observance of the vow for one full year, the devotee should perform the Udyāpana rite (formally concluding it), O leading sage, on the Dvādaśi day in the dark half of Mārgaśīrṣa. He should take his bath early in the morning in accordance with his prescribed course of duties, after duly cleaning the teeth. He should wear white garments and garlands with white unguents and scents. He should erect an exquisite pandal, splendid in form and square in shape. It should be fitted with bells, chowries, etc. and embellished with tinkling bells.

91-92. It must be bedecked in flowers and garlands. Canopy and banners shall add to its splendour. It should be screened with a white cloth. Rows of lamps would beautify it. In its middle a Sarvatobhadra[13] (an auspicious design or 'Maṇḍala' in five colours) should be made. It should be duly beautified. The devotee should place twelve jars filled with water on that platform.

93. Five kinds of precious stones[14] must be put inside the jars and all of the jars with five kinds of precious stones deposited in them, should be covered with a well-washed white cloth.

94. O Brāhmaṇa, the performer of the holy rites should devoutly make the image of Lakṣmīnārāyaṇa in gold, silver or copper.

95. The devotee with good control over his sense-organs, should place the image on the jars. Or its price or gold according to his capacity may be placed (on the jars), O excellent Brāhmaṇa.

96. In all holy rites the sensible devotee should avoid dishonesty or perfidy in money. If he commits it, his span of life, wealth and riches will dwindle down.

97. At the outset, the devotee endowed with piety should bathe Lord Nārāyaṇa who, free from all ailments, is lying on (the serpent) Ananta, with Pañcāmṛta (the mixture of five sweet things, viz. milk, curds, ghee, honey and sugar).

98. The services rendered (prostration, etc.) should be based on Keśava and other names (of Viṣṇu). He should keep awake during the night, by listening to Purāṇas, etc.

99. He should bring under control slumber. Observing fasts, he should subdue his sense organs. In accordance with his capacity and wealth, he should worship the Lord, thrice in a day.

100. Getting up early in the morning and finishing the routine duties of the morning, he should, through Brāhmaṇas, get offered a thousand oblations of sesamum seed while repeating the Vyāhṛti mantras.

101. Thereafter, he should worship the Lord with scents, flowers, etc. in the prescribed order. In front of the Lord, he should listen to the Purāṇas.

102. He should give cooked rice mixed with curds, milk pudding, ten Apūpas (sweet pies or sweet round cakes) with ghee, to twelve Brāhmaṇas along with the usual dakṣiṇā.

103. "O Lord of gods, O Lord of the universe, O lord whose person is for the purpose of blessing the devotees, O Kṛṣṇa, accept the present. Be the bestower of all desired objects."

104. With this Mantra, he should offer gifts. With palms joined in reverence, he should pray. The performer of the Vrata should kneel on the ground humbly.

105. (Prayer)—"Obeisance, obeisance to you, O king of the kings of Devas. Obeisance be to you, O Lord, O receptacle of the worlds, render the fruit of my vow complete today. Obeisance be to you, O Supreme Person.'

106. Thus, he should pray to the Brāhmaṇas and to Lord Puruṣottama. He should offer Arghya to the Lord accompanied by Mahālakṣmī.

107. "O Lord of Lakṣmī, obeisance to you, to the resident of the milk ocean. O Lord of Devas, accompanied by Lakṣmī, accept the Arghya.

108. I salute Acyuta whose remembrance and the utterance of whose name makes whatever is deficient in penance, performance of sacrifice and other rites compensated immediately and made perfect and complete."

109. After having prayed thus to the Lord of Devas, the devotee should offer the image to the preceptor along with Dakṣiṇā.

110. Thereafter, he should feed the Brāhmaṇas according to his capacity. He should give them Dakṣiṇās also. Afterwards, restrained in speech, he should himself take food surrounded by his kinsmen.

111-113. In the company of learned men, he should listen to the story of Viṣṇu till evening. The man who thus observes the Dvādaśi vow, O Nārada, attains all desires both here and hereafter. Absolved of all sins, accompanied by twenty-one generations of his family, he goes to Viṣṇu's abode after reaching which none feels grieved.

O Brāhmaṇa, the man who listens to this excellent Dvādaśi Vrata, or reads it, attains the benefit of Vājapeya sacrifice.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

1. Although the colophon states Mārga-śīrṣa-Śukla-Dvādaśī-Vrata-Kathana as the heading of the chapter, here what is known as Dvādaśī Vrata is described. The Vrata is to start on the 12th day of the bright half of Mārgaśīrṣa and god Viṣṇu in the form of Keśava, is to be adored. The following is the list of the forms of Viṣṇu to be worshipped on the particular Dvādaśī.

Dvādaśī (Twelfth) day in the bright half of the month of :	Special Form of Viṣṇu to be worshipped.
1. Mārgaśīrṣa	Keśava
2. Pauṣa	Nārāyaṇa
3. Māgha	Mādhava
4. Phālguna	Govinda
5. Caitra	Viṣṇu
6. Vaiśākha	Madhusūdana
7. Jyeṣṭha	Trivikrama
8. Āṣāḍha	Vāmana
9. Śrāvaṇa	Śrīdhara
10. Bhādrapada	Hṛṣīkeśa
11. Āśvina	Padma-nābha
12. Kārttika	Dāmodara.

All these forms are according to the serial order of the twenty four names of Viṣṇu in the Sandhyā (twilight) prayer.

The general formula of the observance of this Vrata is as follows :

Observance of fast—wearing white garments after bath—worship of Viṣṇu in Keśava form with the usual materials and offerings—observance of silence during worship—offering of one hundred and eight oblations in fire—observance of vigil at night near the Śālagrāma stone—The next day, the deity to be bathed in milk (or a milkproduct)—worship three times a day along with Lakṣmī—Final Naivedya-of Pāyasa (Rice-pudding) with a cocoanut and Dakṣiṇā to be offered to a Brāhmaṇa—Feeding of Brāhmaṇas—Breaking of fast along with one's kinsmen but with control over speech.

There are minor variations with each Dvādaśī but the outline is the same. After observing this Vrata for full one year, there is its Udyāpana (concluding rite).

It is found that this Vrata is the same as given in Mbh. Anuśāsana Ch. 109 and is called there Viṣṇor dvādaśakam or twelve days dedicated to god Viṣṇu. AP. Ch. 188 gives a number of Dvādaśī Vratas different from that in the NP. Out of fifty such Vratas, Kṛtya Kalpataru (Vrata kāṇḍa) describes 26 Vratas, Hemādri in CC (Vratakhaṇḍa I, pp. 1162—1222) describes these various Vratas. This has been a very popular Vrata as it is described in various Dharma-Śāstra digests.

2. Vratāni—The Purāṇic concept of Vrata implies "any undertaking, religious or ascetic performance or observance, vow or religious duty and thus seems to be an amalgam of ṛta, dharman and Vrata concepts of the Vedic period. Later on, Vrata became Vrata-dharma and had a strong hold on the public.

3. These verses describe how to observe the Dvādaśī-Vrata (from the month of and) for the month of Mārgaśirṣa. As is wellknown, Lord Kṛṣṇa declares himself to be Mārgaśirṣa among the months of the year (māsānām Mārgaśīrṣo-'ham) in BG. X. 35. Hence, the propriety of beginning this Viṣṇu-Vrata from Mārgaśirṣa.

4. These verses describe the observance of Dvādaśī-Vrata in the month of Pauṣa.

5. Tṇaiḥ is most probably a misprint for Tūryaiḥ 'with trumpets.' The Veṅkaṭeśvara Press edition of this Purāṇa has a number of such misprints. But as the corresponding verse in The Bṛhan Nāradīya XVI.17 is nṛtyaiḥ and that suits better in this context, I have translated 'dances.'

6. Kṛśara according to Skd. is as Tulya-tilānnam, but Kṛśarā is what is known as Khicaṛī (खिचड़ी) in Hindi and Marathi. If Kṛśarānnam is dissolved as Kṛśarā + anna 'the spicy preparation of rice and pulse (dāl)' gives a better meaning.

7. Name of a Soma sacrifice. Sacrifices are divided into iṣṭi, paśu and Soma. There are seven forms of the Soma sacrifices, viz. Agniṣṭoma, Atyagniṣṭoma, Ukthya, Ṣoḍaśin, Vājapeya, Atirātra and Āptoryāma. The Agniṣṭoma is the model of all Soma sacrifices. The Agniṣṭoma is of one day duration (ekāha) and is an integral part of Jyotiṣṭoma and hence both are many times identified. (For details of this sacrifice vide HD. Vol.II. Ch. XXXIII pp. 1133-1203).

8. Vājapeya—Though this is a form of Jyotiṣṭoma and though it follows the procedure of the Soma sacrifice called Ṣoḍaśin, it has many special features which may claim the class of an independent sacrifice. The characteristic feature is that the number seventeen has a special significance in this sacrifice. For example : there are 17 Stotras, 17 Śastras, 17 objects as sacrificial fee, etc. It gives sovereignty or post of Indra to the sacrificer (For details HD II.ii. pp. 1206-1214).

9. Atyagniṣṭoma—a variety of Agniṣṭoma (see note above). Here only the Ṣoḍaśī Stotra and Soḍaśin cup are added (vide S.B.E. 41, p. XVII).

10. Nara-medha though literally translated as 'human sacrifice' in the bracket, actually involves no killing of human beings. This point is generally overlooked by its critics. It is only a symbolism.

11. Hunet is obviously an dṛṣa form of Pot 3 P. sg. of √hu-'to offer oblations, perform a sacrifice.'

12. Brahma-medhas is Brahma-yajña or recitation of Vedas. Its earliest description is given in Śatapatha Br. XI.5.6.3-8. It defines Svādhyāyo vai brahma-yajñaḥ—'Recitation of Veda, etc. is Brahma-yajña.

It is a daily duty, but now-a-days, it is formally recited in a nut-shell on the Śrāvaṇī day in the Deccan. The reference in the NP. shows the great importance given to the recitation of the Vedas in those days.

Note 13, p. 295 (on I.17.92, p. 291) Sarvato-Bhadra (a cross-section)

B = Black; G = Green; R = Red; W = White; Y = Yellow.

13. Sarvatobhadra literally means 'auspicious on all sides?' It is a Maṇḍala (a geometrical design) common to all worships. As the Śāradātilaka III.131 states :

maṇḍalaṁ sarvato-bhadraṁ etat-sādhāraṇaṁ smṛtam /

The same work instructs that the maṇḍala should be drawn with five coloured powders, viz. yellow with turmeric powder, white produced from husked grains of rice, red with Kusumbha powder, black with the fine powder of half-burnt inferior cereals, sprinkled with milk and greenish with powder of the leaves of bilva tree (ibid III 122-24). cf. AP. 3-19-20. There appear to be some differences about the figures to be drawn. For example the quotation of SKP in CC as quoted in the Vrata rāja p. 9 is different from that in the Jñānārṇava Tantra 26.15.16.

It is enough to note that it is a special design in five colours and was regarded auspicious in all worships.

14. There is a difference of opinion about the 'five jewels' (pañca ratnas) to be deposited in the jars. According to Āditya Purāṇa quoted in CC Vrata Khaṇḍa I.47, they are gold, silver, pearl, coral and rājāvarta (Lapis Lazuli) but, according to Kālikā Purāṇa quoted in CC on Kāla p. 413 they are : gold, diamond, sapphire, ruby and pearl. Vrata rāja p. 6 quotes these and adds one more from the Viṣṇudharmottara as follows :

It gives the list of nine precious stones :

muktāphalaṁ hiraṇyaṁ ca vaidūryam padmarāgakam / puṣpa-rāgaṁ ca gomedaṁ nīlaṁ gārutmakaṁ tathā / pravāla-yuktānyuktāni mahāratnāni vā nava //

They are pearls, gold, lapis lazuli, ruby, topaz, gomeda (a gem found in the Himālayas. It is of four different colours, viz. white, pale, yellow, red and dark blue), a sapphire, an emerald and corals.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

The Holy Observance Pertaining to Lakṣmi-Nārāyaṇa[1]

Sanaka said :

1. O excellent sage, listen. I shall tell you another holy observance that removes all sins, destroys all miseries and is very sacred and meritorious.

2. It bestows all desired objects to the Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas, Śūdras and the women folk. It yields the benefits of all other holy rites.

3. It is conducive to righteousness; it destroys bad effects of evil dreams; it wards off (the influence of) evil planets. It is the excellent Pūrṇimā Vrata (observance of the full Moon day), well-known in all worlds. If it is performed, a ten million heaps of accumulated sins perish.

4. On the full moon day, in the bright half of the month of Mārgaśīrṣa, the devotee should, after duly washing the teeth, perform the rite of ablution according to the prescribed procedure, and be self-restrained and pure.

5-6. He should return home and wear pure and white garments. With restrained speech (i.e. silence), he should wash the feet and sip water as Ācamana. Remembering Lord Nārāyaṇa, he should perform his usual daily worship of gods. He should, thereupon, worship Lord Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa devoutly with the solemn vow.

7. The performer of this Vrata (observance) should devoutly worship saying, "Obeisance to Nārāyaṇa". After invoking the deity and offering him a seat, etc., he should worship the Lord with scents, fragrant flowers, etc. with full concentrated mind.

8. The observer of the holy rite should propitiate the Lord with songs, musical instruments, dances, hymns, readings of Purāṇas, etc. also.

9. The devotee should make a raised platform of an Aratni (about 45 cms.) square, in front of the Lord and place fire thereon, in accordance with the rules laid down in Gṛhya Sūtras. Repeating the Puruṣa sūkta upto Ājya hymns he should propitiate the Lord by performing the Homa with ghee, Caru and sesamum seeds.

10. In order to dispel all sins he should assiduously perform the Homa once, twice or thrice, according to his capacity.

11. After completing the Homa duly, in accordance with the injunctions laid down in one's own Gṛhya sūtra including all expiatory rites and other rites, the intelligent person should mutter the Śānti sūkta.[2]

12. Afterwards he should approach the deity and perform the worship again. With piety, he should dedicate the observance of the fast unto the Lord.

13. Observing fast on the full moon day, he should pray "O Lotus-eyed God, I shall partake of food, the next day. Be pleased to be my refuge."

14. After submitting thus to the Lord, the devotee should take white flowers and raw rice grains in his hand, kneel on the ground and offer Arghya to the Moon.

15-16. "O lord of Rohiṇī, born in the family of Atri, and in the milk ocean (as well), (kindly) accept the Arghya offered by me, O Lord." After offering Arghya thus to the moon, he should stand facing the east. Looking at the moon with palms joined in reverence, he should pray thus.

17. "Obeisance to you, of white rays; salutations to you to the lord of the stars, and to the lord of Rohiṇī; obeisance be to you, to the brother of Lakṣmī."

18. Thereafter, he should keep awake during the night by listening to the Purāṇas and other pious activities. He should control his sense-organs and be pure. He should avoid the very sight of heretics.

19. Thereafter, he should perform the routine and conventional duties in the morning, in accordance with the prescribed injunctions. Again he should perform the worship of the Lord befitting the extent of his riches.

20. He should feed the Brāhmaṇas according to his capacity. With purity and restrained speech (silence), the man should take food along with kinsmen and servants as well as others.

21. In the same manner, he should observe fast on the full moon days of Pauṣa and other months and with due devotion should worship the infallible Lord Nārāyaṇa.

22. Performing thus for one year, he should perform the ritualistic concluding ceremony on the full moon day in the month of Kārttika. I shall tell you the procedure for the same.

23. He should construct an exquisite pavilion (Maṇḍapa) extremely auspicious in nature and square in shape, beautified with flower garlands and shining with a canopy and a row of banners.

24. Many lamps and tinkling bells should brighten its splendour. It should be decorated on all sides with mirrors, chowries and water-pots all round.

25. O Brāhmaṇa, in the middle, there should be a Sarvato-Bhadra shining with five colours. Thereon the devotee should place a jar full of water.

26. The jar should be covered with a cloth of very fine texture. O Brāhmaṇa, an image of lord Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa should be made in gold, silver or copper and placed over it.

27-28. The image should be bathed in Pañcāmṛta and worshipped in the serial order, by scents, etc., and food offerings of various kinds. With due devotion and restraint over the sense-organs, he should keep awake during the night with due faith. On the morning of the next day, he should worship Viṣṇu as per procedure prescribed for it.

29. The image should be presented to the preceptor accompanied by the usual Dakṣiṇā. He should feed the Brāhmaṇas in accordance with his capacity. If one is affluent enough one should feed the Brāhmaṇas unobstructedly without any restriction on their number.

30. With proper attention and purity of mind, he should perform the Dāna of sesamum seeds befitting his capacity. The clever devotee should perform Homa rites in the fire duly, with sesamum seeds.

31-32. If a man performs this holy vow—vrata properly, he will enjoy all pleasures here in the company of his sons and grandsons. He will be liberated from his sins. Accompanied by ten thousand members of his family, he will go to Viṣṇu's abode, difficult of access even to the Yogins.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa Vrata
(of Mārgaśirṣa Pūrṇimā)

1. Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa-Vrata :

This Vrata is different from that given in CC. Vrata.II.164 and also other about 38 Pūrṇimā vratas given therein (pp.160-245). The Vrata-rāja also is silent about this. This vrata is to be observed from the Full Moon day in the month of Mārgaśirṣa ending it on the Full moon day of Kārttika,—Thus completing one full year i.e. 12 Pūrṇimās. The Vrata can be undertaken even by women and Śūdras.

2. The Śānti sūkta—

The belief that some calamities or effects of ill omens, bad dreams, evil influences of stars, unprecedental or unnatural happenings, etc., can be prevented or mitigated by the recitation of some Vedic Sūktas is found since the later Vedic times and the Sūtra period. The following Sūktas are regarded as Śānti Sūktas, the recital of which is beneficial :

(1) Ā no bhadrāḥ (RV.I.89.1-10)
(2) Svasti na Indro (RV. I.89.6-10)
(3) Śaṁ na Indrāgnī (RV.VIII.35.1-11) This is regarded as Śāntikādhyāya (Mt.P.274.56).
(4) Yata Indra bhayāmahe (RV.VIII.61.13-18).
(5) Bhadraṁ no api vātaya manaḥ (RV.X.20.1)
(6) Āśuḥ śiśāno (RV.X.103.1-13).
(7) Muñcāmi tvā (RV.X.161.1-5).
(8) Tyam-u ṣu (RV.X.178-1-3).
(9) Mahi trīṇām (RV.X.185-1-3).
(10) Rātrī Vyakhyat (RV.X.127.1-8).

A reference to Bloomfield's Vedic Concordance shows that these verses are repeated in other Vedic texts like TS., AV. etc.

The belief in the auspicious and protective effects of recital of holy texts is found in Buddhists of Laṅkā and countries of the South East Asia. There are 30 such suttas such as Mahā maṅgala sutta, Metti sutta, Dasa-dhamma sutta and others in Pali Sutta Piṭaka and they are used for similar purpose as the Vedic Sūktas in Brahmanism. These suttas are called Parittas 'Protectors' and they are the most popular in Burma (M. Bode—The Pali Literature of Burma, pp. 3-4).

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Installation of the Banner

Sanaka said :

1. "I shall expound to you another holy Vrata which dispels all sins and causes delight to Viṣṇu. It is named Dhvajāropaṇa[1] (installation of the banner).

2. He who installs an excellent banner on the temple of Viṣṇu is honoured by Brahmā and others. What more need be spoken (in praise of it) ?.

3. The gift of a thousand Bhāras[2] of gold to a man burdened with a large family is but equal in benefit to the rite of installation of the banner.

4. The excellent ablution in the Gaṅgā or the service unto the Tulasī plant or the adoration of Śiva-Liṅga is on a par with the installation of the banner.

5. O Brāhmaṇa, unprecedented it is ! Rare and unequalled it is ! It is unprecedented ! It is a rite that dispels all sins, the rite called Dhvajāropaṇa.

6. I shall describe all those rites ancillary to the installation of the banner. Even as I recount it, listen.

7. On the Daśamī (tenth) day in the bright half of the month of Kārttika,[3] a man in complete self-restraint, should assiduously perform the rite of ablution beginning with the cleaning of his teeth.

8. The Brāhmaṇa devotee should take food only once. He should observe the vow of celibacy. Remembering the lord Nārāyaṇa, he shall sleep in front of the deity. He should be pure and be clad in white robes.

9. He should get up early in the morning and perform the rites of Ācamana and ablution duly. After finishing the daily routine of prescribed duties, he should worship Viṣṇu.

10. Causing the Svastivācana (the utterance of benediction) along with four Brāhmaṇas, the devotee should perform the Nāndi Śrāddha[4] (Śrāddha, preliminary to Saṁskāras and festive occasions) in the holy rite of the installation of the banner.

11. Repeating the Gāyatrī, he should sprinkle the banner and the flag-staff along with the cloth. Devoted to them, he should worship the sun, moon and Vainateya (Garuḍa).

12. He should worship Dhātṛ and Vidhātṛ (gods Viṣṇu and Brahmā) on the staff of the flag, with turmeric, raw rice grains, scents and other things and particularly with white flowers.

13. Thereafter, he should get a small plot measuring a Gocarman[5] (scrubbed, cleaned and smeared well. The sacrificial fire should be placed there. One should oblate ghee and other things in the prescribed order[6] in accordance with the injunctions in one's own Gṛhya Sūtra.

14-15. He should offer a hundred and eight oblations of milk pudding and ghee in the homa. At the outset, the Puruṣa Sūkta (RV.X.90) is repeated, then the Sūkta Viṣṇornu kam (RV.1.154) etc. and then The Irāvati (RV.VII.99) (should be repeated). Thereafter, he should give eight Āhutis (in the fire) saying Vainateyāya svāhā. Thereafter, O Brāhmaṇa the Sūktas Somo Dhenum (RV.I.91.20) and U du tyam (RV.I.50.1) should be repeated and oblations be offered.[7]

16. There, he should repeat the sūkta pertaining to the Sun (viz. RV.I.50) and the Śānti Sūktas in accordance with one's capacity. With purity, he should keep awake during the night in the vicinity of Hari.

17. Thereafter, he should get up early in the morning and complete the daily routine activities. As before, he should worship the Lord with scents, sweet smelling flowers and other things in due order.

18. Thereafter, the splendid auspicious flag should be taken to the shrine of Viṣṇu, to the accompaniment of auspicious musical instruments, chanting of the Sūktas, dances and singing of hymns.

19. O Brāhmaṇa, the joyous devotee should firmly plant the flagstaff (with the hoisted flag) either at the entrance to the shrine of the Lord or on the top of it.

20. Then, he should worship Lord Hari with scents, flowers, raw rice grains, charming incense and lamps and Naivedya offerings consisting of various dishes.

21. After installing the excellent and splendid banner in the temple, he should circumambulate it and chant this song of prayer.

22. "Obeisance to you, O Lotus-eyed Lord, the Conceiver and creator of the Universe; O Hṛṣikeśa, salutations to you, O earliest-born great Puruṣa.

23. I resort to Keśava by whom all this universe has been created, in whom everything is established and in whom the universe will get dissolved.

24. I salute that Lord, the embodiment of perfect knowledge, whose supreme nature even Brahmā and other gods do not know and whom even the Yogins do not perceive.

25. I salute that Lord whose form consists of the entire universe,[8] whose umbilical region is the firmament, whose head is the heaven and whose feet are the Earth.

26. I salute that Lord who is Brahmā incarnate whose ears are all the quarters, whose eyes are the sun and the moon, and by whom the mantras of Ṛk, Sāman and Yajus have been uttered.

27. I salute that Lord from whose mouth the Brāhmaṇas originated, from whose arms the kings came forth, from whose thighs the Vaiśyas were born and from whose feet were born the Śūdras.

28. I salute that unborn Lord whom they call Puruṣa only on account of the contact with Māyā, but who is naturally free from impurities, who is pure, who is free from modifications or change and is unsullied.

29. I salute that god Viṣṇu who reposes in the milk-ocean, who is the infinite and unvanquished Lord, and is favourably disposed towards good devotees and who is attainable only through devotion.

30. I salute that omnifaced Lord from whom originated the earth and other elements, the Tanmātrās, the sense-organs and both the subtle and gross substances.

31. Again and again I bow unto that attributeless, subtle supreme being which is the Brahman, the highest resort that is the supreme-most and the most excellent in all the worlds.

32. I bow down to that unborn pure Lord who is not subject to modification or change and who has arms all round and whom the leading Yogins consider the cause of the cause of all.

33. May that Viṣṇu be propitiated unto me—Lord Viṣṇu who is the immanent soul in all living beings, who is identical with the universe, and who is the attributeless great Ātman.

34. May that Viṣṇu be pleased with me—the Lord who though stationed within the heart, is yet staying far off to those whose Ātmans had been deluded by Māyā but who is omnipresent to persons endowed with spiritual knowledge.

35. May that Viṣṇu be pleased with me, Viṣṇu, the Lord whose homa is performed by set of four, set of four, with a set of two, set of five and again by a set of two.[9]

36. May that Viṣṇu be pleased with me, the lord who is the bestower of salvation to those men possessing perfect knowledge (i.e. followers of Jñāna-yoga), meritorious deeds (performers of Karmas or followers of karma-mārga) and devotional feelings (followers of the path of devotion) and who is sought by the whole universe.

37. May that Viṣṇu be gracious unto me—Lord Viṣṇu whose persons assumed sportively for the well-being of the world, are worshipped by gods.

38. May that Viṣṇu be propitious unto me—the Lord whom the saintly persons consider to be the embodiment of existence, knowledge and bliss, the attributeless support of the attributes."

39. After eulogising thus, he should bow down to Viṣṇu and worship the Brāhmaṇas richly. Afterwards, he should adore the preceptor with the offerings of religious fees, raiments, etc.

40-41. In accordance with his capacity, he should feed the Brāhmaṇas, with devotional feelings. O Brāhmaṇa, devoted to Nārāyaṇa he should perform Pāraṇā—the ritualistic break of the fast—along with his sons, friends, wives and other kinsmen. I shall mention the meritorious benefits to the person who performs this excellent rite of Dhvajāropaṇa. Listen with attention.

42. Undoubtedly, as many accumulations of his sins perish, O leading Brāhmaṇa, as there are flutters in the banner cloth due to the wind.

43. Whether one is vitiated by great sins or by all kinds of sins, one is absolved of them all by installing a banner in the shrine of Viṣṇu.

44. O Brāhmaṇa, he enjoys Sārūpya (similarity of form) with Hari for as many thousands of Yugas as the number of days that the banner stands aloft in Viṣṇu's abode.

45. If righteous men take delight and praise on seeing the banner installed, all of them are liberated from crores of great sins.

46. The banner installed in Viṣṇu's abode shakes off within half wink of eye, the sins of the man who had installed it, even as it flutters its cloth.

47. He who installs a banner in the abode of Viṣṇu and looks after it every day, goes to heaven by means of Devayāna (the divine path) like king Sumati of good intellect."

CHAPTER NINETEEN

The Vrata of Installation of the Banner

1. Although the principal Gṛhya and Dharma Sūtras are silent about the installation of an image (Devatā-Pratiṣṭhā) in a temple, the custom of installing a banner with the sign of Garuḍa on it (Garuḍa-dhvaja) in honour of Vāsudeva seems to be pretty old. In an inscription of the 2nd Cent. B.C., the Greek Bhāgavata Heliodorus is recorded to have erected a Garuḍa-dhvaja (D.C. Sircar—Select Inscriptions, pp. 90-91).

In the Gupta Age, temple-building activity and installation of images became popular and we find in an early Purāṇa like the Mt.P. (Chs. 264-66), a detailed procedure of such installation. Later on, even the installation of a flag at the entrance of or over the shrine became so important that it came to be regarded as a Vrata (religious observance). Hemādri in the Caturvarga Cintāmaṇi (CC)—Vrata Khaṇḍa (pp. 829-30 Bib. Ind. 1879) gives Dhvaja-Vrata (The observance of raising a flag on the temple of Viṣṇu) from the Viṣṇudharmottara. But that seems to be a part of Pāñcarātra cult, as the colour of the banner was to be yellow, blue, white and red. The figures on them are to be Garuḍa, the Palm-tree, the Alligator, etc. according to the Vyūha (Vāsudeva, Saṅkarṣana and others). The Vrata is to start from the month of Caitra when the flag of Vāsudeva is to be worshipped, Saṅkarṣaṇa's banner to be adored in Vaiśākha and so on.

This vow is observed for twelve years and thereby, the devotee attains the Sāyujya type of liberation.

The above outline from Hemādri's CC will show how the NP. differs from the Viṣṇudharmottara, though the flag in the NP., is to be planted at the door or above the temple of Viṣṇu. It is to be noted that no Vyūha is brought in the NP., though the influence of the Pāñcarātra cult on the NP. is undeniable.

2. hema-bhārasahasram.

Gold weighing one thousand bhāras.

1 bhāra=8000 Tolas of gold—SKD III.499.

3. This Vrata is to begin on the 11th day of the bright half of Kārttika. Contrast CC, where it is said to begin in the month of Caitra.

4. Normally Nāndī-Śrāddha is a necessary preliminary in the Upanayana (Investiture of the sacred thread) Ceremony, and other Saṁskāras (Haradatta on Āpastamba Gr. S.10.5). But its prescription before undertaking this Vrata, shows its elevation to the status of a Saṁskāra.

5. Go-carma-mātraṁ sthaṇḍilam

A Sthaṇḍila is a square with each of its sides 18, 16, etc. finger-breadths. The term go-carma seems to be flexible. Here its area is limited to the altar or the ground levelled, squared and prepared for the sacrifice.

6. ājya-bhāgādikaṁ kramāt.

Ājya-bhāgas mark the limits, as it were, of oblations. The northern limit is with Agnaye Svāhā (accompanied with oblation of ghee, etc.) and the Southern limit is with Somāya Svāhā and other oblations are in between these two limits.

7a. Pauruṣa Sūkta is the Puruṣa Sūkta RV. X.90, Viṣṇor nu kam is the Viṣṇu Sūkta in RV.I.154 and Irāvatī is the mantra Irāvatī dhenumatī, etc. in RV.VII.99.3. This mantra is found in Tai. Saṁ I.2.13.1, Vāj.Saṁ. V.16 and other Vedic works.

7b. Somo dhenum is RV. I.91.2 while udu tyam is the 1st Mantra of the famous Saura hymn RV.I.50.

8. An echo of the famous Puruṣa Sūkta (RV.X.90).

9. This famous verse containing numerals to represent the number of the syllables to be uttered is wellknown to all Agni-hotrins. The syllables are to be pronounced in the serial order as given in the verse. While uttering these syllables (mantras) one is to offer oblation to the sacrificial fire (in the Homa).

The literal meaning of the verse is as follows :

Caturbhiḥ : With the four syllables, viz. ośrāvaya (Tait. Āraṇyaka VII.8.1)

Caturbhiḥ : The next four syllables are : astu śrauṣaṭ (Tait. Saṁhitā. I.6.11, 1, 2 etc.)

After these the two syllables to be pronounced are :

yaja (Tait. Saṁhitā I.6.11, 1, 2, 3 etc.)

These two syllables are followed by the five syllables, viz. ye yajāmahe (Tait. Saṁhitā I.6.11.1, 2, 3, etc). This is to be concluded with the two syllables Vauṣaṭ (Aitareya Br. III.6.5).

The whole expression to be recited is :

Ośrāvaya, astu śrauṣaṭ, yaja, ye yajāmahe vauṣaṭ /

CHAPTER TWENTY

The Legend of King Sumati

Nārada said :

1. O holy sir, the knower of all Dharmas, the master of all scriptural topics, the most excellent ofall holy rites (or observances), the installation of the banner (on Viṣṇu shrines) has been recounted by you.

2. O sage, narrate to me in detail, the anecdote of Sumati[1] who is mentioned by you as one devoted to the installation of banners.

Sanaka said

3. Listen with single-minded attention to this ancient meritorious mythological anecdote that is destructive of all sins. It has been narrated to me by god Brahmā.

4. Formerly, there was a king named Sumati, in the Kṛta yuga. He was born of the lunar race. He was (then the sole) glorious sovereign ruler of all the seven continents.

5. A scion of the Lunar race, he was pious-souled, truthful and fond of guests. Endowed with all auspicious characteristics, he was embellished with all kinds of wealth.

6. He always resorted to (listening to) the stories of Hari, and was always absorbed in the worship of Hari. Devoid of arrogance, he was eager to render service to those who were absolutely absorbed in devotion to Hari.

7. He was devoted to the worship of those who are worthy of adoration. He was impartial in outlook. He was endowed with all good qualities. He was a benefactor of all living beings, quiescent, grateful and glorious.

8. O sage, his wife was a highly blessed lady named Satyamatī. She was richly endowed with all auspicious characteristics. She was chaste, and to her, her husband was her very vital breath.

9. That couple were always engaged in the adoration of Hari. Those highly blessed persons could remember their previous births. Knowers of the truth as they were, they were absorbed in what was Reality.

10. They were always engaged in offering charitable gift of food and cool water. They built and dug innumerable bunds, tanks and parks.

11. The pure and chaste lady Satyamatī, the charming, sweet-voiced queen used to dance delightedly in the temple of Viṣṇu.

12. On every Dvādaśi day, the highly blessed king also used to instal a wide and charming banner (on the shrine of Viṣṇu).

13. Even the Devas always eulogised the king who was perpetually devoted to Hari, and was an expert in Dharmas, and his beloved queen Satyamatī.

14. On coming to know that the couple were well-known in the three worlds as adepts in Dharmas, sage Vibhāṇḍaka[2] who was desirous of seeing them, came there along with a number of disciples.

15. On hearing that the sage was coming, the king accompanied by his wife, went out to greet the sage Vibhāṇḍaka with extensive material of honouring the guru.

16. When the rites of hospitable reception had been completed and when the sage had taken his seat, the king, seated on a lower seat, spoke to the quiescent sage with palms joined in reverence.

The King said :

17. O holy sir, I feel satisfied by your visit. Good men praise the arrival of saintly persons as pleasing.

18. Learned men say that all riches are where great men offer their affection. Brilliance, renown, wealth and progeny also do abide there.

19. O holy lord, O sage, all good fortunes and welfare flourish day by day where good men bestow their great mercy.

20. There is no doubt in this that he who wears on his head the dust and the water that has washed the feet of great men is a meritorious soul.

He has the benefit of having bathed in all sacred rivers, O Brāhmaṇa.

21. O leading Brāhmaṇa, my sons, my wife, my riches—all these are dedicated to you. Kindly command me what shall I do, by way of pleasing you?

22. On seeing the king full of modesty, the leading sage was much delighted. Lovingly he stroked him with his hand and said as follows :

The sage said :

23. O king, what has been said by you is fully befitting your family. Every one who bows down with humility, attains great wealth.

24. O excellent king, it is due to humility, that a man obtains virtue, wealth, love and liberation (i.e. all the four Puruṣārthas). What is it that is difficult to attain in the case of a noble-souled person?

25. O protector of the Earth, I am pleased with you inasmuch as you follow the path of the good. May welfare bless you perpetually. May what I ask you, be very kindly related.

26. There are various types of worship causing satisfaction to Hari. But among them, you abide always by the installation of banners. You are always attempting that alone.

27. This chaste lady, your wife, is always engaged in dancing before the deity. How has this come about? It behoves you to relate it to me precisely.

The king said :

28. Listen, O holy sir, I shall tell you everything that you ask. The conduct of life of both of us is surprising and astonishing to all worlds.

29. O excellent one, formerly I was a Śūdra named Mālinī. I was always engaged in evil ways. I was absorbed in the acts of injury to all worlds.

30. I was a slander-monger, a hater of righteousness. I used to plunder the wealth of deities (in shrines), and to kill cows and Brāhmaṇas—nay—all living beings. I was a thief (also).

31. I was always harsh in speech and a sinner devoted to the dalliance with prostitutes. Thus I continued for sometime, disregarding the words of the great.

32. Later on, I was abandoned by my kinsmen. In misery I went to a forest subsisting myself on the perpetual diet of venison and other flesh. I used to rob the way-farers.

33. Isolated and extremely miserable, I stayed there in the tenantless forest. Once I was extremely oppressed by the heat of the summer. I was utterly famished with hunger. I was thirsty.

34. In the lonely forest, I saw a ruined dilapidated temple of Viṣṇu. There was a great lake near it, teeming with swans and ducks called Kāraṇḍava.

35. O prominent sage, it was covered with clusters of flowers from the surrounding forest. I drank water therefrom. On its banks, I alleviated my tedium.

36. By eating fruits scattered here and there, my hunger was satiated. I resided in that dilapidated temple of Viṣṇu.

37. Every day, I repaired the decaying ruined place, joining together the broken parts. With leaves, grasses and assemblages of twigs and wood, an abode (a shrine of the god) was duly erected.

38-39. O leading sage, to increase my own happiness and comfort, the whole area was scrubbed and smeared well by me. Killing various kinds of animals and maintaining the practice of hunters, I maintained my livelihood, for full twenty years there. Then came this chaste lady hailing from the lands adjoining the Vindhya mountains.

40. O Brāhmaṇa, she was born of the family of Niṣādas (hunters). She was known by the name Avakokilā. She too had been abandoned by her kinsmen. She was very miserable with shattered body.

41. She was overwhelmed with fatigue. She repented for the sins committed by herself. Wandering in the lonely forest, it was only by chance that she came there.

42. Externally she had been oppressed by the summer heat. Internally she was afflicted with worries and anxieties. On seeing her affected by miseries, great sympathy surged in me.

43. Water, wild fruits and raw flesh were given to her by me. O Brāhmaṇa, when her exhaustion subsided, she was asked by me as to the real state of affairs.

44. She told me about her history. O great sage, listen to that; (She said :) "I am born of a Niṣāda family and (am known) by the name Avakokilā.

45-46. I am the daughter of Dāruka. I was a resident of the Vindhya mountains. I was forsaken by my kinsmen condemning me—"She is an unchaste woman. She always loots wealth and assets of others. She is a perpetual back-biter.". Though censured by the world, I was maintained by my husband for some time.

47. Unfortunately, he too went to the world of Yama, leaving me here. In the lonely forest, I am roaming about alone and am afflicted by misery.

48. By chance, I have come near you. I have been brought back to life by you now. Thus, she recounted to me all of her activities.

49. Thereafter, for ten years, we two stayed in that temple as husband and wife, with flesh and fruits constituting our diet.

50-51. Once, O sage, we became much intoxicated due to the drinking of wine. At night, there in the temple, we were so overjoyed by eating meat that we began to dance, utterly deluded and (blissfully) unconscious of our bodies and garments. At that time, the last stage of our experiencing the fruits of our past acts, the activities that had begun to bear fruits, befell us both at the same time.

52. Even as we were absorbed in our dance, the terrible emissaries of Yama came there, armed with their nooses in order to take us to the terrible torturesome hell of Yama.

53-54a. O bestower of honour, thereafter, the Lord who was pleased with our services, namely the scrubbing and cleaning of the lord's abode, and who was always interested in protecting his own devotees, sent his angels.

54b-56a. Each of those emissaries of the Lord of Devas wielded a conch, a discus and a mace (in their hands). All of them resembled a thousand suns in refulgence. All of them had four splendid arms. Wearing crowns, ear-rings necklaces and garlands of sylvan flowers, they made all the quarters free from darkness by means of their lustre, O Brāhmaṇa.

56b-57. The followers of Kṛṣṇa spoke to the servants of Yama who were terrible with their curved fangs, had nooses in their arms and were attempting to capture us.

Viṣṇu's Emissaries said :

58. O ruthless ones, O wicked ones devoid of discrimination, leave off the sinless couple who are beloved of Hari.

59-60. In the three worlds, it is discrimination that is the first cause of riches and prosperity. Know him to be the meanest of person, who regards a non-sinner to be sinner. Know that person to be the meanest of the mean, that person who considers a sinner to be a non-sinner.

Yama's Emissaries replied :

61. Truth has been mentioned by you all. But these two are the most notorious among sinners. Sinners must be punished by Yama. Hence, we shall take them away.

62. That which has been enjoined in the Śrutis is the Dharma. Adharma is the opposite of the same. This is the way to distinguish between Dharma and Adharma. Hence, we will take them to Yama's presence.

63. On hearing this, the exceedingly powerful emissaries of Viṣṇu became infuriated. They spoke in reply to the soldiers of Yama who were considering Adharma to be Dharma.

Viṣṇu's Emissaries said :

64. Alas ! It is pitiable that Adharma affects the assembly of the seers of Dharma. The diagnosis of those lacking in discrimination is a great calamity.

65. Why do you, who have been reduced to preside over hells, still exert to commit more sins by means of a special argument today ?

66. Even the great sinners remain in the terrible hell till their sins have been exhausted as long as the sun, the moon and the stars shine.

67. Without seeing the expiation of sins accumulated before, why do you commit sins again and again ?

68. What is enjoined in the Śrutis is the Dharma. True. Undoubtedly it is true. But we will relate precisely the virtuous acts performed by these two.

69. These two are absolved from sins because they were engaged in serving Hari. They are being protected by Hari. Hence, without any more delay leave them off.

70. At the time of death, she performed a dance (before Lord Viṣṇu) and he installed the banner in the abode of Viṣṇu. Hence, they have attained freedom from sins.

71. Either by bearing or by uttering his name even for once, at the time of death, one attains the greatest abode. What then if one is engaged in service of that Lord ?

72. Though he be vitiated with great sins or minor sins, a man who serves Kṛṣṇa, attains the greatest goal at the end.

73. O messengers, those who are engrossed in the service of ascetics or the devotees of Viṣṇu instantaneously attain the supreme goal, even though they be sinners.

74. He who stays in the temple of Hari even for a Muhūrta (48 minutes) or half that time, goes to the geatest abode (Vaikuṇṭha). What then of a person who has stayed for thirty-two years ?

75. These two had been engaged in sweeping and cleaning and smearing in the abode of Hari. They had been looking after its maintenance by repairing the decay and the ruins.

76. They had been sprinkling water and they had lighted lamps in Hari's abode. How can these blessed ones deserve the experience of tortures in the hell ?

77. After saying this and cutting off our bonds, the emissaries of Viṣṇu took us in an excellent aerial chariot and went to the greatest region of Viṣṇu.

78. O leading sage, there we attained the Sāmīpya (nearness) of the discus-bearing Lord of Devas. We enjoyed the exquisite divine pleasures throughout that period.

79. After enjoying the divine pleasures there, we came back to this earth. Here also, our wealth is incomparable due to the grace of service to Hari.

80. O sage through services rendered to Hari without entertaining any special desire for return, such a fruit has been attained which is difficult to access even to Devas, O Brāhmaṇa.

81. We shall attain the greatest elegance and welfare by propitiating Mahādeva the Lord of the Universe (by offering service for some object) willingly and with devotional feelings. For this purpose, the cause (of our prosperity etc.) is explained.

82. If any holy rite, performed by one due to helplessness, bears great fruit, O leading Brāhmaṇa, what doubt is there that a rite performed with faith becomes so ?

83. On hearing what has been thus narrated, the leading sage Vibhāṇḍaka[2] praised the couple and went back to his penance grove.

84. Hence, O celestial sage, know that the service of the discusbearing lord of Devas is remembered as something comparable to the wish-yielding cow.

85. To those who are devoted to the worship of Hari, it is eternal Hari himself who grants the highest beatitude. He is the bestower of all desired benefits.

86. He who reads or listens to this meritorious narrative, that is destructive of all sins, attains the greatest goal.

CHAPTER TWENTY

The Legend of King Sumati

1. Sumati (a person with excellent intellectual capacity) is a popular name in Purāṇas. The Puranic Encyclopaedia records Sumatis, male, female, kings, sages, demons (p. 763) but this Sumati in the NP. is a different person. As this legend is given to illustrate the efficacy of the merit in hoisting a flag on the temple of Viṣṇu and is not found elsewhere, it is presumably a new contribution of the NP.

2. Vibhāṇḍaka—A sage born in the family of Kaśyapa; a member of Indra's assembly. He was the father of the Vedic scholar Ṛṣya-Śṛṅga who married Rāma's sister Sāntā. (Mbh. Vana, ch.110-113; VR.I. Sarga 9 & 10).

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

The Pañca-rātri-Vrata

The Holy Rite of Five Nights

Sanaka said :

1. I shall tell you another Vrata which is the excellent-most in all worlds. It is well known as Hari-Pañcami.[1] Listen accurately to its essential nature.

2. O excellent sage, it is conducive to the removal of all miseries of men and women. It is the primary cause of righteousness, wealth, love and liberation.

3-4. It is the bestower of all desires and it grants the benefit of all Vratas. On the Daśami (tenth) day in the bright half of the month of Mārgaśīrṣa, the devotee, keeping under control his sense-organs, should take his bath after brushing his teeth. After performing the worship of the Lord duly, he should perform the five great Yajñas.[2]

5-6. On that day he should observe all the rules (of religious discipline) and take food only once. O leading sage, on the Ekādaśi (eleventh) day, he should get up early in the morning and take his bath. According to the prescribed manner, he should worship Hari in his abode. He should bathe the Lord the chiefs of Devas, in Pañcāmṛta duly.

7. With great devotion he should worship him, according to the prescribed order, with scents, fragrant flowers and other things, incense and lamps, food offerings, betel leaves and circumambulations.

8-9a. After worshipping the Lord of the chiefs of Devas, he should utter the following Mantra : "Obeisance to you, the embodiment of perfect knowledge. Salutations be to you, the bestower of knowledge. Bow to you, abiding in all forms, to one who bestows all Siddhis. (Super-human powers).

9b-11a. After bowing thus to Vāsudeva, Janārdana, the Lord of Devas, he should dedicate the fast to the Lord with the following Mantra, "At thy behest, O Keśava, I shall observe fast for five days beginning from today. O Lord of the universe, be the bestower of my desires."

11b-12a. After dedicating the fast thus, he should control his sense-organs. O Brāhmaṇa, on the night of the Ekādaśī day, he should remain awake.

12b-13. O sage, the worship of Viṣṇu must be conducted thus, on the Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fourteenth and on the full-moon days. He must keep awake during the nights of Ekādaśī and the full moon day.

14. The worship by means of Pañcāmṛta, etc. is common to all five days. On the full moon day, he should bathe Viṣṇu in milk according to his capacity. Homa should be performed with sesamum seeds. Gift of the sesamum seeds should also be made.

15. On the sixth day, he should perform all rites befitting his stage in life (i.e. householders'), take in Pañcagavya and duly perform the worship of Hari.

16. He should then feed the Brāhmaṇas without any restriction, if he has the means. Thereafter, restrained in speech, he should take his food along with his kinsmen.

17. O Nārada, men should thus perform the holy Vrata in accordance with the injunctions mentioned before, in the bright halves of the months from Pauṣa to Kārttika.

18. Thus the Vrata which is destructive of sins, should be performed for one full year. When the month of Mārgaśīrṣa comes again, the performer of the Vrata should perform the Udyāpana (concluding) rites.

19. On the Ekādaśī day, he should fully abstain from taking food as before. O Brāhmaṇa, with due reverence and attention, he should take in Pañcagavya on the Dvādaśī day.

20. After duly worshipping the Lord of Devas with scents, fragrant flowers and other things, the devotee who has conquered his sense organs should offer the following present to a Brāhmaṇa.

21-22. (The present is :) Milk-pudding mixed with honey and ghee. It should be accompanied with fruits, O leading sage, to a Brāhmana who is a learned scholar in spiritual topics; he should offer a jar filled with scented water along with the usual Dakṣiṇā. The water-jar should contain five precious stones within it and be covered with a cloth.

23. (Mantra) "O Ātman of everything, O Lord of all living beings, O Omnipresent and eternal deity Mādhava, be pleased with this gift of Paramānna (rice boiled in milk)."

24. Repeating this Mantra, he should present the milk pudding. Thereafter, according to his capacity, he should feed the Brāhmaṇas. Restrained in speech, he should himself take food in the company of his kinsmen.

25. He who performs this Vrata called Hari Pañcaka never returns from Brahmaloka.

26. O Brāhmaṇa, this excellent Vrata must be performed by those who wish for salvation. It is like the conflagration unto the forest of all sins.

27. From this Vrata of fasts, men obtain that benefit which one attains after giving thousands and crores of cows.

28. He who is devoted to Nārāyaṇa and listens to this narrative, is liberated from millions of extremely terrific sins."

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Hari-Pañcaka Vrata

1. Hari-pañcamī or Pañca-rātri-vrata as stated in the colophon, is not recorded in Kane's HD.V.1 in the list of Vratas (ch.XIII pp.251-462). It is called Hari-Pañcaka as it extends for five days from the Daśamī day to the Full-moon day. One should start to observe it from the month of Mārgaśīrṣa on the 10th day of the bright half. The usual procedure of fast, worship, keeping awake (on the 11th and 15th day of the bright half) are common to all such fasts. It is to be observed every month for one year. In the concluding rite (Uddyāpana), a pitcher of water with five precious stones deposited in it, is to be given to a Brāhmaṇa, expert in spiritual knowledge. Rice-pudding mixed with honey and fruits are also to be offered. As usual, Brāhmaṇas (the number to be limited according to one's financial capacity) are to be fed after which one is to break fast (in silence) in company of one's kinsmen.

2. Pañca-mahāyajñas

Five 'great sacrifices'—The term is applied to the five daily 'sacrifices' or acts of piety to be performed by a householder. They are : deva-yajña (offerings in fire), pitṛ-yajña (Tarpaṇa, etc. to ancestors), bhūta-yajña (offering of bali—a ball of food to beings). manuṣya-yajña (giving food to a Brāhmaṇa) and Brahma Yajña (study or recital of Veda or at least one mantra (Tait. Āraṇyaka II.10). They are called 'great yajñas' or 'great sacrificial sessions' eulogistically. The term yajña as applied to these five daily duties, is figurative and the term mahā is laudatory (*Āpastamba Dh.S.*I : 4.12.13-1 also Baudhāyana Dh.S. II.6.1-8).

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

The Māsopavāsa[1] Vrata (Fast for a month)

Sanaka said :

1. I shall describe another excellent Vrata which is destructive of all sins, meritorious and rendering benefitial service to all worlds. Listen to it, attentively.

2. O Brāhmaṇa, one should perform this holy observance in the month of Āṣāḍha or Śrāvaṇa or Bhādrapada or Āśvina.

3. In one of these months, during the bright half, the devotee who has subdued his sense-organs, should take in Pañcagavya and sleep in the vicinity of Viṣṇu.

4. Getting up early in the morning and finishing the daily routine tasks, he should worship Viṣṇu with due faith and full control of his sense-organs, eschewing all forms of anger.

5. In the company of learned man, he should worship Viṣṇu in the proper manner. Thereafter, after invoking the blessings by the recital of Svasti-sūkta (RV.V.51.11-15), in the specific religious rite, he should perform the rite of Saṁkalpa (revelation of intention).

6. O Keśava, from this day onwards, I shall observe fast for a month. I shall perform Pāraṇā (breaking the fast) rite at the end of the month, O Lord of Devas, at thy behast.

7. Obeisance to thee, O embodiment of penance, O bestower of the benefit of austerities. Bestow what fulfils my desires. Ward off all obstacles.

8. After dedicating thus, the splendid Māsa Vrata (i.e. Māsopavāsa) to Lord Viṣṇu, he should stay in the shrine of Hari, till the end of the month.

9. Everyday he should bathe the Lord in Pañcāmṛta in accordance with the injunctions. During that month he should continuously retain the light of the lamps in the shrine of Hari.

10. Everyday he should chew the tooth-brush twig taken from the Apāmārga plant (Āghāḍā in Marathi). Then he should take his bath as per prescribed injunctions and be devoted to Nārāyaṇa duly.

11. Thereafter, he should bathe the Viṣṇu image as before. Exerting himself as described before, he should worship the Lord. Endowed with piety, he should feed the Brāhmaṇas according to his capacity and offer the usual Dakṣiṇā.

12. With his sense-organs under proper control, he should take food along with his kinsmen. Thus, the performer of the Vrata should complete thirteen monthly fasts.

13. At the end of the year, he should make the charitable gift of a cow along with the usual Dakṣiṇā, to a Vedic scholar. Therein, he should feed twelve Brāhmaṇas in accordance with the injunctions. He should offer Dakṣiṇās according to his ability. Ornaments also should be given to the Brāhmaṇa lady.

14. He who performs three-monthly fasts with full restraint on the sense-organs attains twice the benefit of "Aptor-yāma" sacrifice (a Soma sacrifice).

15. O excellent sage, if four times the monthly fasts are performed successfully to their concluding break-fasts called a Pārāka*[2], he shall attain the great merit usually derived from eight Agniṣṭoma sacrifices.

16. If this Vrata is performed five times by any noble devotee, that man shall attain twice the merit accruing from Atyagniṣṭoma sacrifice.

17. He who performs six monthly fasts with great concentration of mind and mental purity attains eight times the benefit of Jyotiṣṭoma sacrifice.

18. Remaining without food, a person who deserves the vow of monthly fasts, seven times, attains eight times the benefit of a horse-sacrifice (Aśvamedha).

19. O leading sage, he who performs the monthly fasts eight times, shall attain five times the benefit of sacrifice called Naramedha (Human sacrifice).

20. The man who performs monthly fasts nine times, derives three times the merit accruing from Gomedha sacrifice (cow sacrifice).

21. O excellent sage, he who performs the monthly fasts

*A misprint for Paraka. Bṛhan-Nāradīya XX.19 has the following verse on this topic (the same as in NP.) catuḥ-kṛtvaḥ kṛtaṁ yena parākam muni-sattama / sa labhet Paramam puṇyam agniṣṭomāṣṭa-sambhavam //

(called) Parāka ten times, enjoys three times the benefit of sacrifice called Brahmamedha.

22. He who, with controlled sense organs, performs eleven Parākas attains Sārūpya (identity of form) with Hari, along with the enjoyment of all pleasures.

23. The self-controlled person who performs thirteen Parākas, attains the greatest bliss after reaching which no one suffers any grief or misery.

24. Those who are engaged in monthly fasts, those who are devoted to ablutions in the Gaṅgā and those who expound the paths of Dharma are undoubtedly the liberated ones.

25. The monthly fasts must be observed by women having no husbands and sons, recluses, religious students and particularly by forest-dwellers (hermits).[3]

26. Whether a woman or a man, whosoever observes this excellent Vrata, attains salvation which is difficult to attain even by the Yogins.

27. On hearing this, everyone, whether he is a householder or a forest-dweller, or an observer of a vow or a mendicant, a fool or a scholar attains salvation.

28. He who, devoted to Nārāyaṇa, listens to or reads this meritorious narrative shall be liberated from all sins.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

Māsopavāsa Vrata

1. Māsopavāsa Vrata

The observance of fast for a month is the greatest of all Vratas. The Viṣṇu-rahasya as quoted by Hemādri, in CC II, pp. 776-783 states that "The merit that accrues from observing all Vratas, from ablutions in all sacred waters, from all religious gifts and performance of all sacrifices like Agniṣṭoma and others with rich sacrificial fees, is gained by this māsopavāsa (Fast for one month). Before undertaking it, one should have performed all the Vaiṣṇava Vratas like Dvādaśī and other difficult penances like Ati-kṛcchra, Cāndrāyaṇa and others.

The NP., in its enthusiasm for extolling this Vrata commends even thirteen such fasts without taking into account the physical capacity of a human being to undergo sustained continuous fasting. The Viṣṇurahaṣya, however, wants to save the life of the observer of this Vrata first.

amṛtam pāyayet kṣīraṁ...yatheha na viyujyet prāṇaiḥ
Kṣut-pīḍito Vratī /

God Brahmā further ordains that when the observer of the Vrata faints or is very weak or in danger of life, he should be given milk, fruit juice, etc. and such in-take does not nullify or adversely affect the Vrata—

evaṁ māsopavāsastham ārūḍham prāṇa-saṁśaye avrataghna-guṇair divyaiḥ paripsed Brahmaṇājñayā /
naite vrataṁ vinighnanti /

This was such a popular Vrata that it is eulogised in AP. 204-1-18, GP.I.122. 1-7, Pd.P. VI.121.15-54. Though the main outline of the Vrata is practically the same in all Purāṇas, there are slight differences. Thus A P. prescribes its commencement on the 11th day in the bright half of Āśvina, but NP. states that it should be undertaken in Āṣāḍha, Śrāvaṇa, Bhādrapada or Āśvina (I.22.2-3). The remaining procedure : To sip Pañcagavya, sleep in the vicinity of the Viṣṇu image, svasti-vācana, Saṁkalpa (declaration of undertaking the vow) and prayer to god Viṣṇu to help the observer to complete the vow, offering worship to Viṣṇu three times with Pañcāmṛta every day, stay in Viṣṇu's shrine, to observe complete purity in word and deed, feeding thirteen Brāhmaṇas at the time of Pāraṇā, giving a bed-stead to one's preceptor, etc.—
—all is common in these texts.

This Vrata is also called parāka (see vv.15, 23 below).

This Vrata was observed even in ancient times. Inscriptions in Naneghat of the 2nd cent. B.C. records that queen Nayanika had observed it.

2. Pārāka

It is a misprint for Parāka, A kind of observance or penance—It consists of fast for twelve days (dvādaśāhopavāsena parākaḥ—GP.) or dvādaśāham abhojanaṁ Parāko nāma Kṛcchro'yam /

(Manu XI.215).

Bṛhan-Nāradīya XX also deals with Māsopavāsa-Vrata and has the same verses as in NP.XXII. Hence the correction as parāka.

3. House-holders are not eligible to undertake this fateful observance. This verse is common to other Purāṇas and the Viṣṇu-rahasya.

In verse 23 below the correct form 'Parāka' is used.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

The Greatness of Ekādaśi Vrata

Sanaka said :

1. I shall describe another Vrata well known in all the three worlds, which subdues all sins and which bestows all the desired benefits.

2. O Brāhmaṇa, to those who perform this rite with devotion to Viṣṇu, (whether they are) Brāhmaṇas, or Kṣatriyas, or Vaiśyas or Śūdras or women, it bestows salvation. It is very pleasing to Viṣṇu.

3. The holy vow called Ekādaśi Vrata[1] (holy rite on the eleventh day) verily bestows everything that is desired by men. O Brāhmaṇa, it should be performed by all means, since it is very pleasing to Viṣṇu.

4. One should not take food on the Ekādaśī (eleventh) day in either of the fortnights (of a month). He who takes food, is a sinner in this world. In the other world, he shall fall into hell.

5. One who is desirous of attaining the benefit of the fast, should not take four meals, viz. the night meals on the previous (Daśamī day) as well as following (Dvādaśī day) and both the meals on the (Ekādaśi) day in the middle. (vide V.7 below).

6. The man who desires to take food on the Ekādaśi day is one who seeks the enjoyment of all sins. There is no doubt about this.

7. If anyone desires salvation, O leading sage, let him take only one meal on the Daśami (tenth) as well as on the Dvādaśi (twelfth) day (in each fortnight). He shall fully abstain from taking food on the Ekādaśi (Eleventh) day (in both fortnights).

8. O Brāhmaṇa, whatever sins are there, such as Brāhmaṇa-slaughter, etc., they abide in the cooked food on the day of Hari (i.e. the Ekādaśi day).[2]

9. To sins of Brāhmaṇa-slaughter, etc., there may be some means of expiation (with difficulty). But there is no redemption for one who takes food on the Ekādaśi day.

10. If one is defiled by great sins or even if he is defiled by all types of sins, he attains the greatest salvation by refraining from food on the Ekādaśī day.

11. Ekādaśī is a highly meritorious day, the most pleasing to Viṣṇu. By all means, it must be resorted to by Brāhmaṇas desirous of liberation from the worldly existence.

(The Procedure of Ekādaśī Vrata)

12. On the Daśamī (tenth) day, the devotee should get up very early in the morning (and should take bath) after duly washing the teeth. With purity and control over the sense-organs, he should duly bathe Viṣṇu and worship him (according to the prescription of the Śāstras).

13. On the Ekādaśī day, one should go without food and put curbs on the sense-organs. Devoted to Nārāyaṇa, he should go to bed in the vicinity of Viṣṇu.

14. On the Ekādaśī day, the devotee should take bath and worship Janārdana duly with scents, fragrant flowers and other things. Then he should repeat as follows :

15. "O Puṇḍarīkākṣa (Lotus-eyed God) after refraining from food today, the Ekādaśī day, I shall take food the next day, O Acyuta, be my refuge."[3]

16. After uttering properly this Mantra of the Discus-bearing lord of Devas, he should be contented in the mind, with emotional feelings and devotion, dedicate fast (unto the Lord).

17. Maintaining the observances and the holy rites, the devoted one should keep awake in front of the Lord, singing songs, playing on instruments and listening to Purāṇas.

18. Then, he should get up in the morning on the Dvādaśī day. After taking the bath duly, he should worship Viṣṇu keeping sense-organs under control.

19. After bathing Janārdana in Pañcāmṛta on the Ekādaśī day and in milk on the Dvādaśī day, O Brāhmaṇa, the devotee shall attain Sārūpya (sameness of form—a kind of liberation) with Hari.

20. "O Keśava, be pleased with the observance of this holy vow. Be pleased to be gracious-looking. Please be the bestower of the vision of spiritual knowledge to me, blinded as I am by the darkness of ignorance."[4]

21. O leading Brāhmaṇa, after requesting thus to Mādhava with attention and purity, he should feed the Brāhmaṇas according to his ability. He should then give the usual Dakṣiṇā.

22. He should thereafter perform the five sacrifices and devoted to Nārāyaṇa, restrained in speech, he should take food along with his kinsmen.

23. He who thus, with purity and self restraint, performs the observance called the holy Ekādaśī goes to Viṣṇu's abode, the return from which is rare.

24. A person engaged in the holy fast and absorbed in religious activities should never even cast a glance at Cāṇḍālas and fallen persons.

25. A person engaged in the holy observance of fast should never converse with atheists, with those who break the bounds of convention, the censurers and the back-biters.[5]

26. The observer of the holy rite should never talk to one who nourishes his progeny through a Śūdra woman, to the husband of a Śūdra woman and to one who performs sacrifices on behalf of those who are not eligible for the same.

27-28. One devoted to the holy observances of this fast should never honour the following even with words, viz.—the pander and the pimp, the professional musicians, one who partakes of the food of a professional worshipper of idols, the physician, the composer of poems, the opposer of Devas and the Brāhmaṇas, one who covets after other men's food and one who is interested in other man's wives.

29. Thus remaining pure by these restrictions and other means, the devotee maintaining the Vrata of fast should control himself and be devoted to the well-being of all. He shall then attain the highest Siddhi.

30. There is no other sacred water equal to that of the Gaṅgā; there is no other preceptor equal to one's own mother; there is no other deity equal to Viṣṇu and there is no greater austerity than the observance of fast.

31. No mother is equal to forbearance; no wealth is equal to renown; no acquisition is equal to perfect knowledge and no father is equal to righteousness.

32. No kinsmen is equal to the power of discrimination; no holy observance is superior to Ekādaśī. In this connection they cite this ancient anecdote.

33a. This is in the nature of a dialogue between Bhadraśīla and his father Gālava.[6]

33b. Formerly, there lived on the banks of the Narmadā, a sage named Gālava who was absolutely devoted to Truth.

34-36. He was a quiescent, self-controlled and a storehouse of austerities. He made his residence for a long time on the bank of the Narmadā which was full of many trees and was frequented by elephants and beers, and was attended by Siddhas, Cāraṇas, Gandharvas, Yakṣas and Vidyādharas. The place was full of bulbous roots, roots and fruits and was resorted to by groups of sages. Gālava had a son named Bhadraśīla who was self-controlled.

37-38. He was highly blessed and could remember his previous births. He was so devoted to Nārāyaṇa that even at the time of playing with boys, the highly intelligent Bhadraśīla used to make an image of Viṣṇu out of clay and used to worship it. He used to urge and enlighten his playmates saying, "Viṣṇu must always be worshipped by men.

39-40. The observance of the vow of Ekādaśi should be performed even by learned men". O leading sage, even those children, thus enlightened by him, made idols of Hari out of clay. Collectively and severally, those blessed ones, absorbed in Viṣṇu's devotion, used to worship that image joyously.

41. Making obeisance to Viṣṇu the all-pervading Lord, that boy of good intellect prayed : "May there be the well being of all the worlds."

42. In the course of the play, he used to allot a Muhūrta or half of it, conceiving that it was the Ekādaśi vow and used to dedicate it to Keśava.

43. On seeing his son with such a good conduct of life, sage Gālava, the storehouse of austerities, embraced him and asked him with great surprise.

Gālava said :

44. O highly-blessed Bhadraśīla,[7] a good observer of religious vows, you are (as implied in your name) a real Bhadraśīla (of auspicious conduct) since your conduct is auspicious and un-attainable even to the Yogins.

45-46. You are always devoted to the worship of Hari and are interested in the welfare of all living beings. Devoid of all forbidden activities, you are engaged in the observance of Ekādaśī Vrata. You are free from Dvandvas (mutually opposed pairs, such as pleasure, pain). You are devoid of the sense of 'My-ness'. You are serene and absorbed in the meditation on Hari. How did such an inclination originate in you, though you are but a child ? Hari's devotion is difficult to acquire without rendering service to the great ones.

47. O dear one, naturally the mind of the people is diverted towards Avidyā (Ignorance), Kāma (Passion) and Karmans (other activities). How is it that your activity has become extra-ordinary and supra-mundane ?

48. It is, due to the superabundance of previous merits, that men become attached to the saintly people and also devoted to the Lord. Hence I am surprised.

49-50. It is out of filial affection that I am asking you. It behoves you to explain it to me. On being urged by his father with these conjectures, Bhadraśīla, the leading sage, remembered his previous births. The meritorious soul, being delighted and with his countenance beaming with a smile, narrated to his father everything as it took place and was experienced by him.

Bhadraśīla said :

51. Listen, O dear father. I know what has been experienced before by me, O excellent sage, because of the faculty of remembering the previous birth. I understand what had been mentioned by Yama.

52. On hearing this, the highly blessed Gālava who was surprised said thus with delight to the highly intelligent Bhadraśīla.

Gālava said :

53. O blessed one, it behoves you to explain everything as to who you were formerly, what was told to you by Yama and what was its reason and basis.

Bhadraśīla said :

54. O dear father, formerly I was a king born of the lunar race. I was well known by the name Dharmakīrti.[7] I have been educated by Dattātreya.

55. For nine thousand years, I ruled over the entire Earth. Many evil deeds and virtuous acts were committed by me.

56. Thereafter, becoming intoxicated with the arrogance of wealth, I committed many sins. Due to association with heretics, my conduct became heresy-oriented.

57. Formerly many meritorious activities were pursued by me, but when influenced by heretics I gave up the Vedic path.

58-59. All the sacrifices were destroyed by me who was well-versed in fraudulant arguments. On seeing me engaged in evil and impious deeds, the subjects of my land pursued in wicked deeds continuously. One sixth of those demerits clung to me. Thus I was engaged in sinful deeds and was always indulgent in inordinate addictions.

60-61. On one occasion, engaged in hunting, I entered a forest. I was accompanied by my army. I killed different types of animals. Overwhelmed by hunger and thirst, I reached the banks of the river Revā. Exhausted and oppressed by the severe heat of the sun, I took bath in the Revā.

62-64. The army was not seen anywhere. I was alone and was much afflicted by hunger. In the evening some of the residents on the banks of the Revā who came there were engaged in the Ekādaśi Vrata. They were seen by me. I was without food. Unattended by the army, I was alone but in the company of those people, I kept awake that night.

65. I was fatigued due to a long journey. I had been afflicted with hunger and thirst. O father, hence after keeping awake that night I died.

66. Then I was bound by the soldiers of Yama who looked very terrific due to their huge curved fangs. Through a path rendered tedious and painful in many ways, I reached the presence of Yama. I saw Samavartin (god of Death) whose face was terrible due to the curved fangs.

67. Then Kāla (the god of Death) called Citragupta (the Chief Accounts Officer of human merits and sins) and spoke thus, "O learned one, tell me precisely, the learning and other attainments as well as the activities of this man".

68. O excellent one, Citragupta who was thus commanded by Dharmarāja, thought for a long time and then spoke as follows :

69. It is true that this man had been engaged in sinful activities. Still, listen, O king of righteousness, one who abstains from food on the Ekādaśī day is liberated from all sins.

70. On the day of Hari (Ekādaśī), on the charming banks of the Revā, he abstained from taking food. By observance of rites of fasting and keeping awake at night (on the Ekādaśī day), he became free from sins.

71. Whatever sins had been committed by him, though numerous, all of them have been abolished by the power of the fast.

72. Dharmarāja who was informed thus by the intelligent Citragupta prostrated himself before me like a staff. He was full of sympathy.

73. With devotional feelings, Dharmarāja worshipped me. Then he called all his soldiers and commanded them thus.

Dharmarāja said :

74. Listen to my words, O my emissaries, I shall tell you what is excellent and wholesome unto you. Do not bring those men who are engaged in the path of virtue anywhere near me.

75. Let go those persons who are engaged in the worship of Viṣṇu, are self-controlled and grateful, are devoted to the observance of Ekādaśī Vrata, have conquered their sense-organs and those who serenely pray thus continuously—"O Nārāyaṇa, O Acyuta, O Hari, be my refuge". Avoid them immediately.

76. O soldiers, avoid from a long distance those persons who repeat the names of God thus—"O Nārāyaṇa, O Acyuta, O Janārdana, O Kṛṣṇa, O Viṣṇu, O Lord of goddess Lakṣmī, O father of the lotus-born deity, O Śiva, O Śaṅkara". They are the benefactors of the entire world. They are quiescent. My jurisdiction does not cover them.

77. O emissaries, avoid always those who have dedicated all their actions to Nārāyaṇa, cherish devotion to Hari; those who are strictly confined to their conventional duties; those who serve their preceptors; those who grant gifts to the good and the deserving; who protect the indigent and are attached and engaged in the repetition of names of Hari.

78. O emissaries, avoid those who have no association with heretics, who are deeply devoted to Brāhmaṇas, covet association with the saintly persons, those who render services to guests (atithis) (those who entertain the same conception of Śambhu and Hari) or those who consider Hari and Śambhu equal and those who render obligations to the people.

79. O soldiers, bring those sinners to my abode—those who have no taste for the nectar of Hari's stories, whose minds are not directed to the remembrance of Nārāyaṇa and those who are not delighted with the sprinkling with the water from the feet of leading Brāhmaṇas.

80. O emissaries, bring here those persons who are in the habit of reviling their parents, hate the people, whose activities are injurious to their own benefactors, who are greedy of temple-property and whose activities are detrimental to the public.

81. O emissaries, bring here the person who is averse to the observance of the holy vow of Ekādaśi, of fierce temperament, is engaged in slandering the world, who censures others, brings about the ruin of the village, is inimical to excellent men and is greedy of the riches of Brāhmaṇas.

82. Forcibly bring those big fools who turn their faces away from devotion to Viṣṇu, who never bow to Nārāyaṇa the protector of those who seek refuge in him and those men who never go to Viṣṇu's shrine and indulge in sins extremely."

83. When what had been recounted by Dharma thus was heard by me, I who was as if burning within myself due to remorse, remembered the despicable activities.

84. Due to my repentance for the evil actions, and listening to righteous ones, all my sins were completely wiped out there automatically.

85. Yama too bowed to me, since I was liberated even from the last traces of sins, and had attained similarity of form with Hari and was refulgent like a thousand suns.

86. On seeing this, the extremely terrible emissaries of Yama were astonished. They completely believed in what was related to them by Yama.

87. Thereafter, worshipping me duly, Kāla (god Yama) immediately despatched me to that greatest region of Viṣṇu, (teeming with hundreds of aerial cars).

88. O Brāhmaṇa sage, thanks to that holy observance,

I stayed in Viṣṇu's region along with crores of aerial chariots equipped with all objects of enjoyment.

89. After residing in Viṣṇu's region for thousands and hundreds of crores of Kalpas, I came down to Indra's region.

90. There too, I who enjoyed richly all pleasures, was bowed to by all Devas. After staying that much time (equal to that spent in Viṣṇu's region) in the heaven I came to the Earth.

91. Here too, I am born in the family of Viṣṇu's devotees, like you. O great sage, since I have the faculty of remembering previous births, I know all these events.

92. That is why I attempt to worship Viṣṇu along with the children. Formerly, I did not know that this was Ekādaśi Vrata.

93. Due to the faculty of remembering previous births, it has been understood by me now. In this world, this is the fruit of that act which has been done by me here.

94. O Lord, what doubt is there then in the case of those who perform Ekādaśi Vrata with great devotion? Hence, O leading Brāhmaṇa, I shall also observe this auspicious Ekādaśi Vrata.

95-96a. Everyday, I shall perform the worship of Viṣṇu too with a desire for attaining the greatest abode. Those men who devoutly perform Ekādaśi Vrata will find Viṣṇu's abode which bestows the greatest bliss."

96b-97a. On hearing thus the words of his son, sage Gālava was delighted. He attained the greatest satisfaction. He was extremely delighted in his heart.

97b-98a. (He said :) "My birth is fruitful. My family has been sanctified since you, one deeply interested in devotion to Viṣṇu, have been born here, in my house."

98b-99a. Thus delighted in mind, thanks to his son's activity, he enlightened him in the procedure of the worship of Hari.

99b-c. Thus, O excellent sage, everything has been precisely narrated to you by me succinctly (at some places) or in detail (at other parts). What more do you wish to hear?

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

The Greatness of Ekādaśī Vrata

1. This is one of the most important Vratas elaborately discussed in various Purāṇas and mediaeval digests on Dharma Śāstra such as CC. Kāla (pp.145-288), Mādhava's Kālanirṇaya (pp. 233-275), Vratarāja (pp. 361-475) and others. The NP. is quoted as an authority by most of them. Being one of the early texts, the procedure of this Vrata as given from verse 12 onwards is important. It is interesting to note that the rules of Ekādaśī followed by Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavas and summarised from Haribhaktivilāsa by Prof. S. K. De in Vaiṣṇava Faith and Movement (pp. 371-75) have a close resemblance to those given in the NP. here. As is wellknown the Nārada is a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa.

2. Quoted by Hemādri in CC—Kāla, p. 153, in Mādhava's Kālanirṇaya, p. 235.

3. Quoted in CC (on Vrata) I.P.1000, Kālanirṇaya quotes it from VP. (prob. Varāha P. 39.32) and instructs, "after uttering this mantra, the knower (devotee) should offer flowers from the cavity of his palms (Puṣpāñjali).

4. Quoted in CC (Vrata) I.P.1001 and Dharma Sindhu, p. 20.

5. Quoted in CC (Vrata) I.P.1008, cf. Hārīta : Patitapākhaṇḍi-nāstikādi-sambhāṣaṇānṛta-dyūtādikam upavāsadine varjanīyam /

6. Gālava—sages of this name are mentioned in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, Bṛhadāraṇyaka Up., Va.P., Br.P., Mbh., HV. but none of them record that he had a son called Bhadraśila (vide P E & Chitrava's Prācīna caritra kośa under Gālava.) This legend is probably a contribution of the NP. to illustrate the importance of the Ekādaśī Vrata. In NP. II. Chs. 3 ff, we have a long story of Rukmāṅgada about the importance of this Vrata. PE. also has no entry on 'Bhadraśīla'.

7. The episode of Bhadraśila to illustrate the great efficacy of the Ekādaśī Vrata, seems to be an original contribution of the NP., as the legend is not found in other Purāṇas (vide P.E.).

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

The Conduct of the Good and Approved usages[1]

Sūta said :

1. On hearing what was said by Sanaka regarding the merit accruing from Hari's day (i.e. Ekādaśī) which is incomprehensibly meritorious, the best of all Vratas, that subdues host of sins, the delighted son of Brahmā spoke again.

Nārada said :

2. O sage, expert in the interpretation of principles, everything concerning the narration of holy Vratas has been mentioned by you. It is highly meritorious and it bestows devotion to Hari.

3. O sage, now I wish to hear the rules of conduct prescribed for all castes and stages of life as well as the procedure for expiation.

4. O highly blessed one, adept in the interpretation of all principles, it behoves you please to explain it to me precisely and with great compassion and favour."

Sanaka replied :

5. "O prominent sage, listen how the immutable Hari who is affectionate to the devotees, is worshipped by those who are devoted to the conduct of life befitting different castes and stages in life.

6. I shall relate to you the arrangement of castes and stages of life as explained duly by Manu and others, as you are a devotee of Viṣṇu.

7. Those castes are said to be four, viz., the Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras. Among these the Brāhmaṇa is the foremost.

8. The Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas — these three are called Dvijas (the twice-born), because at first they are born of their mothers and later on, they are consecrated by means of sacred thread with due repetition of the Mantras

(which constitute the second birth). Thus twice-born-ness is attained by these three classes.

9. All holy rites and duties must be performed by these castes in accordance with the specific duties prescribed for their castes. By failing to perform the holy duties prescribed for one's own caste, one is called a heretic by learned men.

10. A twice-born, performing the holy rites and duties enjoined by his own Gṛhya Sūtra becomes blessed and contented. Otherwise, he will be fallen and excluded from all righteous activities.

11. The Yuga dharma[2] (virtuous activities specially pertaining to the particular Yuga) must be pursued by these castes according to propriety and relevancy. The customs and conventions of the different regions and lands must be followed as long as they are not repugnant to the rites and duties enjoined in the Smṛtis.[3]

12. One must strive to practise prescribed religious duties physically, mentally and verbally. One shall never do anything repugnant to the public and not securing the heaven, even if it is of a righteous nature.

13-16. There are certain activities righteous (in other Yugas) but learned men say that they are to be avoided in the Kaliyuga[4] viz. undertaking a sea voyage, carrying a (wooden or earthen) jar of water (by a householder i.e. renunciation of that stage of life), the marriage of the twice-borns with girls not belonging to their caste, begetting of sons through (dead) husband's brother, the slaughtering of animals in Madhuparka (respectful offering to a guest), offering flesh in Śrāddhas, the stage of life called Vānaprastha (forest-hermit), remarriage of a married girl when the marriage was not consummated, Naiṣṭhika Brahmacarya (life long celibacy), human sacrifice, horse-sacrifice, Mahāprasthānagamana (undertaking a long journey to end in death) Gomedha (cowsacrifice) as well as Makhas (sacrifices). These activities, though righteous in other Yugas, are declared as fit to be avoided in the Kaliyuga.

17. The peculiar conventions of the different lands must be followed by men of respective lands. Otherwise he (the dissenter) should be known as a fallen man, excluded from all religious activities (or social intercourse).

18. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, I shall mention in general the holy rites of the Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and the Śūdras. Listen to it with attention.

19. (The duties of a Brāhmaṇa are :) He should offer charitable gifts to the Brāhmaṇas; he should worship the gods by means of sacrifices; for the sake of livelihood he may beg for alms; he should teach others.

20. He should perform sacrifices on behalf of those who are eligible for the same; he should perpetually offer water libations; he should learn the Vedas and maintain sacrificial fires.

21. He should have impartial conception of the acceptable wealth and that intended for others and should do what is conducive to the welfare of the world; he should speak softly.

22. The sexual intercourse of a Brāhmaṇa with his wife is commended only on the prescribed nights after the menstruation; he should never utter anything unwholesome and injurious to anyone; he shall be devoted to the worship of Viṣṇu.

23. (The duties of a Kṣatriya are) : O excellent Brāhmaṇa, a Kṣatriya should give charitable gifts to Brāhmaṇas, he should learn the Vedas; he should worship Devas by performance of sacrifices.

24. He should maintain himself by means of weapons (i.e. military profession); he should rule over the Earth righteously and should chastise and curb the wicked; he should protect the disciplined (the good).

25. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, breeding of cattle, commerce, agriculture and study of the Vedas are glorified as the duties of the Vaiśya also.

26. He should marry duly and practise righteous activities through wealth earned by means of business transactions or industrial activities.

27. A Śūdra also should give charitable gifts, but he should not perform domestic sacrifices involving cooking. He should render service to the Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and the Vaiśyas.

28-29. The following duties are common to all castes : every one should indulge in sexual intercourse with his own wife only on the prescribed nights after the menstruation; sincere desire for the welfare of all worlds, always speaking auspicious and pleasing words, absence of fool-hardiness, joyous temperament, forbearance, absence of over-arrogance, all these have been glorified as attributes common to all castes.

30. By performing the rites befitting one's own stage of life, everyone attains the status of a sage, O Brāhmaṇa. In times of emergency[5] a Brāhmaṇa may take to the conduct of life of a Kṣatriya.

31. In times of grave emergency, a Kṣatriya also may take to the activities of a Vaiśya. Even in times of very grave emergency, a twice-born person should not take to the activities of a Śūdra.

32-34a. If a twice-born person in a confused state of mind takes to it, he shall become a Cāṇḍāla. O excellent sage, in the case of the three castes, the Brāhmaṇas, the Kṣatriyas and the Vaiśyas, four Āśramas (stages of life) have been mentioned. There is no fifth stage of life. They are : (the stages of) the religious student, the householder, the forest-hermit and the mendicant, O good one. Excellent Dharma is achieved through these four Āśramas.

34b-35. O leading Brāhmaṇa, Viṣṇu is pleased with a person who is engaged in the path of action, whose mind is quiescent, free from desire, and is absorbed in his own duties. Thereafter, he goes to the greatest abode from which he does not return to this world.

CHAPTER TWENTYFOUR

The conduct of the Good and Approved Usages

1. The term Sadācāra is used in the sense of 'customs and usages'. The customs in Brahmāvarta were looked upon with great respect in Smṛtis and Purāṇas. But here the term means 'the conduct of the good'. VP. III.11.3 defines it :

Sādhavaḥ Kṣīṇa-doṣās tu sac-chabdāḥ sādhu-vācakāḥ /
teṣām ācaraṇaṁ yat tu sadācāras sa ucyate //

This is attributed to Hārita in Parāśaramādhavīya I.i.,p.144.

This topic is treated in many Purāṇas e.g. VP.III.Chs. 11 & 12, KP.II. chs. 16 and 19, AP.Chs. 155, 165, 253, Bh.P. VII.11, XI.17 & 18 to mention a few. In the NP. it is later described again in ch. I.43; overlapping and repetition of verses is expected in such a work, but a number of verses are common to many of these Purāṇas and are found in Smṛtis as well.

2. According to Mbh. Śānti 232.28, the principal aspects of religious life were : penance (tapas) in the Kṛta age; metaphysical knowledge in the Tretā, performance of sacrifices in the Dvāpara and Dāna (religious gifts) in the Kali age.

tapaḥ paraṁ Kṛta-yuge, Tretāyāṁ jñanam ucyate /
Dvāpare yajñam evāhur, dānam ekaṁ Kalau yuge //

This verse is repeated in Manu I.86, Parāśara I.23 and Va.P. 8.65 substitutes dhyānam 'meditation' for tapas in the Kṛta age.

3. This sanction to customs is granted in the Sūtra period. For example, the Āśvalāyana sūtra gives its sanction to different customs belonging to different regions and villages in celebration of marriages :

(Uccāvacā vai jānapadadharmā grāmadharmās tān vivāhe pratīyat /

Aśv.Gr. S.

4. The general principle of Sadācāra is that if a religious practice though sanctioned by Dharma Śāstra is found abhorrent to the public taste, it should be avoided. (Verse No.12). Thus the sea-voyage involved pollution through contact with Mlecchas and hence was forbidden. The moral sense of the public abhorred the idea of niyoga, marrying a girl from a lower class, killing an animal for madhuparka (receiving a guest), offering meat or non-vegetarian diet to Brāhmanas at the time of Śrāddha, etc. and it came to be prohibited in the Kali Age. These four verses from the NP. (Nos.13-16) enumerate what acts are to be avoided in the Kali age. Kali-varjya are quoted in the Nirnayasindhu, p. 367, Aparārka, p.15, CC.III.2, p.666, Sc.I.p.12, Parāśara Mādhavīya I.i p.133. The number of such forbidden acts differ with different texts. P.V. Kane in H.D.III.pp.930-966 enumerates 55 Kali Varjya acts—one-fourth of which are against the institution of sacrifice, ten are due to the public insistence on purity of women and two, viz., the prohibition against Vānaprastha and Sannyāsa give a blow to the ancient āśrama-dharma. The wording "though righteous in other yugas" (verse 16) is just to show respect to the authorities which prescribed them. Kane's view that 'Kalivarjya lists were put together at the earliest in the 10th and 11th century A.D.' needs modification in view of its occurrence in the NP.—unless we regard these verses as later interpolations.

5. Verses 30-33 deal with the Āpad-dharma The principle is that in times of emergency one should resort to the means of livelihood prescribed for the caste (Varṇa) which is immediately below one's own, vide Manu X.81-82. Yājña-valkya III.35, Viṣṇu Dh.S.54.28, but NP. insists that one should never follow Śūdra's vocation. When the emergency is over, the person following a 'lower' avocation should undergo expiation and follow his profession (Manu XI.193-194, Yājñavalkya III.35).

CHAPTER TWENTYFIVE

Vedic Studies and other Religious Duties Defined

Sanaka said :

1. I shall tell you specifically the precepts governing the disciplined conduct of life of the different castes and stages. Listen to it with attentive mind, O excellent sage.

2. He who eschews his own prescribed course of duties (Dharma) and pursues that of others should be known as a heretic and be excluded from all Dharmas.

3. Such purificatory ceremonies as Garbhādhāna (rite of religious consummation of marriage-impregnation) should be performed with due chanting of Mantras at the proper time and in accordance with the injunctions. To women these rites do not require the chanting of Mantras.

4. The first holy rite of Simanta[1] (ritualistic parting of the hair upwards, as a part of the purificatory rite during pregnancy) should preferably be performed in the fourth month. It can be performed in the sixth or the seventh or the eighth month also.

5. When the son is born, the father should take his bath along with the cloth worn and perform the post-natal holy rite. He should perform Nāndi Śrāddha with the formal prescribed utterance of benediction

6. One should perform the Vṛddhi-Śrāddha (Śrāddha at the time when one has acquired special prosperity and glory) either with gold or with silver. He who performs it with cooked food shall be on a par with a Cāṇḍāla.

7. At the end of the Sūtaka (i.e. the period of pollution due to the birth of a child) the father should perform the Abhyudayika Śrāddha (i.e. Śrāddha due to prosperity) for the son, observing restraint in speech. He should indicate the name also.[2] (i.e. the naming ceremony is to be performed).

8. O leading Brāhmaṇa, the name given shall not be unclear, meaningless, or one with many long syllables. Nor shall it contain letters difficult to pronounce.

9. He shall perform the Caula[3], the rite of keeping locks of hair—in accordance with the injunction in the Gṛhya sūtras in the third, fifth, sixth, seventh or eighth year.

10. If due to unavoidable situations, the Garbhādhāna and other rites are not performed in due course, the expiatory rite of one fourth Kṛcchra shall be performed. In the case of the Caula rite, it should be half a Kṛcchra.

11. The investiture with sacred thread for the boy should be in the eighth year after conception or birth.[4] Any time upto the sixteenth year is permitted as a subsidiary period (for the same rite in the case of a Brāhmaṇa).

12. The investiture with sacred thread in the case of a Kṣatriya is in the eleventh year after conception. (If not done in the eleventh year due to circumstances), learned men permit any time upto the twentysecond year.

13. The Upanayana rite of a Vaiśya is to be performed in the twelfth year after conception. Learned men say that the period (though allowed) upto the twentyfourth year, is subsidiary.

14. If the twiceborn is not invested with the sacred thread within these limits of time, know him to be Sāvitrīpatita (fallen from the sacred Gāyatri or Sāvitri mantra. No one should even converse with him.

15. O Brāhmaṇa, if the chief time limit is transgressed in the Upanayana of a twice-born, Kṛcchra penance should be performed for twelve years. Afterwards he should perform the Cāndrāyaṇa and two Sāntapana Prāyaścittas (expiations) and thereafter perform the original holy rite (i.e. Upanayana).

16-21a. Otherwise know him to be a fallen person. He who does so shall be on a par with a slayer of a Brāhmaṇa. The girdle of a Brāhmaṇa should be of the Muñja grass, that of Kṣatriya should be the bowstring and that of a Vaiśya should be woollen. May the deerskin (for wearing) be stated thus:—The skin of the eṇa deer should be used by a Brāhmaṇa; that of a ruru deer should be used by a Kṣatriya. A Vaiśya should use the skin of a goat. I shall describe the staff in due order:—The Palāśa stick is prescribed for a Brāhmaṇa; the Udumbara stick for a Kṣatriya and that of Bilva for a Vaiśya.

Now listen to their size :—The staff of a Brāhmaṇa should come upto his hair on the head; that of a Kṣatriya should come upto the forehead. Learned men say that the staff of a Vaiśya should come up to the tip of his nose.

I shall now describe the clothes of Brāhmaṇa and others in due order. They are ochre-coloured, madder-coloured (red) and turmeric-coloured (yellow) (respectively).

21b-22a. O Brāhmaṇa, the Brāhmaṇa who has been invested with the sacred thread should be devoted to the service of his preceptor. He should stay in the house of his preceptor till he learns the Vedas.

22b-23a. The (Brāhmaṇa) religious student should take bath in the morning. O leading sage, for the sake of the preceptor, the student should bring sacrificial twigs, Kuśa grass, fruits and other things, everyday in the morning.

23b-24a. O excellent sage, whenever the sacred thread, the deer-skin or the staff is lost, soiled or broken, a new one should be used with due repetition of the mantras. The soiled ones should be thrown into the water.

24b-25a. They (the religious authorities) prescribe that the means of livelihood of the religious student is only through alms begged and received by them. The student with controlled sense organs should bring the alms from the houses of Brāhmaṇas well-versed in Vedas.

25b-26a. When the Brāhmaṇa begs for alms he should say, bhavati bhikṣām dehi (O madam, give me the alms); the Kṣatriya should say, bhikṣām bhavati dehi (Alms, O madam, give me). When the Vaiśya begs, he should say bhikṣāṁ dehi bhavati (Give me alms, O madam).

26b. The religious student should conquer his sense organs and perform the rites of fire-worship both in the morning and in the evening according to convention.

27. The religious student should perform the Brahmayajña and the Tarpaṇa rite every day. He who forsakes the ritualistic fire-worship is called a fallen fellow by the learned.

28. He who does not perform Brahmayajña is called a slayer of a Brāhmaṇa. After rendering service to the preceptor, he should perform the worship of the deities.

29. Every day he should partake of the food got as alms only. Never should he take food given by a single man. The student who has conquered his sense-organs should bring alms from the houses of Brāhmaṇas of irreproachable character.

30a. After offering alms first to the preceptor, he should, with his permission, partake of it, remaining restrained in speech.

30b-32a. He should avoid wine, women, meat, salt, chewing the betel-leaves, cleansing the teeth, eating the leavings of foods of others, sleep during the day, use of the umbrella, wearing of shoes, scents and unguents, garlands, sports in water, dance, vocal music, instrumental music.

32b-33a. He should abstain from slandering, distressing others, prattling (grumbling), application of collyrium, contact with heretic people, association with the Śūdras, etc.

33b. As to elders, he should habitually bow to and salute them in due order.

34-35. The elders are of three types, viz.—Elders in knowledge, elders in piety and austerity and elders in age. He who removes spiritual misery and the like is the (bonafide) guru. He does it through the instruction in the Vedas and the scriptural texts. The student should salute him at the outset. While saluting, the Brāhmaṇa should say Asau aham (I am he—so and so).

36-39a. The Kṣatriyas and others are by no means to be bowed to by a Brāhmaṇa. The following should not be saluted : An atheist, a person who breaks the bounds of decency, an ungrateful person, the common priest of the village, a thief, a rogue, a heretic, the fallen fellow, the Vrātya (one of the three castes fallen from his caste-position due to non-performance of holy rites), a professional astrologer, a sinner, who shall never be saluted, a mad man, a gambler, an unclean person, a person (who is) running, a person who has applied oil to his head and a person performing Japa.

39b-40. He should never salute a person always given to arguing, a fierce man, a person vomiting, a person standing in water, a person holding the alms and a person lying down. He should never salute a woman who had killed her husband, a woman in her menses, a woman with a paramour, a woman who has recently delivered of a child, a woman who had an abortion, an ungrateful woman, and a fierce woman.

41-42a. If individual salutation is made in an assembly, a sacrificial hall or a temple, it destroys the merit earned before.

42b-43a. He should not bow to a person who is performing a Śrāddha, Vrata, Dāna, worship of the deities, Yajña or Tarpaṇa.

43b-44a. If anyone does not salute in return when he is saluted, he is on a par with a Śūdra. He should not be considered worthy of being saluted.

44b-45a. The student should wash his feet and perform the Ācamana rite. Sitting face to face with the preceptor and touching his feet, the clever student should begin his study.

45b-50a. A Brāhmaṇa who is eager to attain the benefit of all holy rites should not pursue the study of the Vedas on the following days : during the holidays: viz. the first and eighth day (Aṣṭakas), the fourteenth day, the Pratipats (first day of a fortnight), the Parvan days, Mahābharaṇī day (when the moon is in Bharaṇī Nakṣatra in Pītṛ Pakṣa), on the twelfth day in the month of Śrāvaṇa, on the second day in the latter fortnight of the month of Bhādrapada, on the seventh day in the bright half of the month of Māgha, on the ninth day in the month of Āśvina, when the sun is encircled by a halo, when a Vedic scholar comes to the house, when a Brāhmaṇa is bound, when a quarrel increases, during the dusk, when the cloud rumbles, when there is an untimely heavy down-pour, when a comet or thunderbolt falls, when a Brāhmaṇa is insulted, O celestial sage, on the Manvādi days (i.e. on the days on which Manvantaras started) and the four Yugādi days (i.e. on the days on which the four yugas commenced)—these foregoing occasions are to be treated as holidays.

52-55. I shall mention the Manvādi days. Listen to it attentively; the ninth and the twelfth days in the bright half of Kārttika ; the third day of the Caitra month, as well as of the month of Bhādrapada; the tenth day of the bright half of Āṣāḍha, the seventh day in the bright half of Māgha, the eighth day in the dark half of Śrāvaṇa, the full moon day in the month of Āṣāḍha, the new moon day in the month of Phālguna, the eleventh day in the bright half of Pauṣa, the full moon days in the months of Kārttika, Phālguna, Caitra, and Jyeṣṭha—these are the first days of the Manvantaras; whatever is given on these days becomes everlasting in its benefit.

56-57. On the Manvādi and Yugādi days, Śrāddha should be performed by the twice-born; one should never study the Vedas during these days[5] — when one is invited to a Śrāddha, during the eclipse of the sun and the moon; on the two ayana days, when there is earthquake; on the Galagraha days (some days in the dark fortnight) and on Durdinas (when the sun is invisible due to clouds).

58-59. O Nārada, if a foolish person pursues the study of the Vedas during these holidays, Yama himself will destroy his progeny, intellect, renown, prosperity, longevity, strength and health. Know the person who studies the Vedas during the Anadhyāya days (holidays) to be Brahma-ghātaka (the slayer of a Brāhmaṇa).

60-65. O Brāhmaṇa, no one should hold conversation with him; no one shall reside with him; O Nārada, some persons say that even Kuṇḍas and Golakas (bastards) and the sluggish etc. should be invested with sacred thread; some say that their sons etc. should be invested with sacred thread. One who does not study the Vedas but puts forth effort elsewhere should be known to be on a par with a Śūdra; he is the beloved guest in hell. Even if a Brāhmaṇa who has not learned the Vedas follows the conventional conduct of life, he does not attain the benefit of the Ācāras. He is just like a Śūdra. In the case of a Brāhmaṇa who has not learned the Vedas the Nitya, Naimittika, Kāmya and all other Vedic rites are futile. Viṣṇu is identical with the Śabda Brahman (the supreme Soul in the form of Sound) ; hence Veda is Hari Himself. Hence, a Brāhmaṇa who studies the Vedas will attain his desires.

CHAPTER TWENTYFIVE

1. Sīmanta-karma, Sīmanta or Sīmantonnayana is really a rite of a social and festival nature expressing joy felt by the family and the woman concerned at the prospect of a child. Literally it means 'parting the hair of the woman, upward.' The Saṁskāra is treated in many Gṛhya sūtras like that of Āśvalāyana (I.14.1-9), Baudhāyana (I.10), Gobhila (II.7.1-12), Vaikhānasa (III.12) and others, but there is a great divergence in the details of this Saṁskāra showing the difference in the geographical region where they were composed. The garlanding of the pregnant girl and playing of lute and singing of ballads prescribed in the gṛhya sūtras, shows its festival nature. The month of pregnancy in which it is to be celebrated differs. NP. seems to follow Khādira Gr.S. in prescribing the 4th, 6th or the 8th month out of which the 4th is supported by Āśvalāyana and Āpastamba. In prescribing the 7th month, NP. follows Śāṅkhāyana Gr.S. (I-22-1) indicating NP.'s affinity if not location.

2. NP. is much removed in time from the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Up. and Gṛhya Sūtras of Gobhila, Khādira and others which prescribe that the name should be given to the boy on the day of his birth. It was to be the Nakṣatra-nāma which was to be kept a secret till the thread-ceremony of the boy and the name for common use was given on the 10th day.

3. Caula or Cūḍākaraṇa :

Most writers recommend the 3rd year for this rite but Āśvalāyana, Pāraskara, Yājñavalkya allow the family usage for the time of performance of this, though they don't disapprove of the 3rd year.

4. This is clearly an exposition of Āśvalāyana Gr.S. regarding the usual and the final limit of the age of the thread ceremony of the three varṇas :

aṣṭame varṣe Brāhmaṇam upanayet / Garbhāṣṭame vā / ekādaśe Kṣattriyam / dvādaśe Vaiśyam / ā ṣoḍaśād Brāhmaṇasyānatītaḥ Kālaḥ /
ā dvāviṁśāt Kṣattriyasya / ā caturviṁśād Vaiśyasya /

Āśva Gr.S. I.19.1-6.

5. The topic of holidays or days on which the Veda should not be taught, is discussed in the Gṛhya and Dharma Śūtras and most of the Smṛtis. A reference to SC. on Anadhyāya (I.pp.56-61) shows the difference of opinion among these authorities. Many of the verses in NP. are found in VP.III.14.13 ff, *Mt.P.*17.4-8, M. Nṛsiṁha P. ch.56. The list of holidays is stupendous. But the anadhyāya is limited to learning (new) Vedic mantras and not to their application or self study (Jaimini XII.3.18-19, Āpastamba Śrauta Sūtra 24.1.37. Hence, normal studies of other lores were not affected.

CHAPTER TWENTYSIX

The Statement of the Dharma of the Householder[1]

Sanaka said :

1. As long as the Vedas are being learned, he (the religious student) should remain with the preceptor, rendering service to him with purity invariably. After being permitted by him (to return to his house), he should take up the sacrificial fires.

2. A twice-born person should study the Vedas, the Dharma-śāstras (i.e. Smṛtis, etc.) and the Vedāṅgas (accessories to Vedic studies)[2] and give Dakṣiṇā to the preceptor and then enter the householder's life.

3. A twice-born should marry a virgin who is endowed with good features and beauty, who is born of a good family, who possesses good qualities,[3] whose conduct and habits are good and who practises righteous activities.

4. The intelligent Brāhmaṇa should marry a girl beyond the seventh remove from his father and fifth remove from his mother; otherwise he is on a par with the defiler of the preceptor's bed.[4]

5. A sensible man should not marry a girl who is sickly, whose eyes are round, who is born in a family of ailing persons (i.e. with unhealthy heredity), who has too much of hair or who has no hair at all or who is garrulous.[5]

6. A wise person should not marry a girl who is hot-tempered, too short or too tall (in stature), who is wanting in any limb, who has an extra limb (i.e. physically handicapped or abnormal), who is mad, or slanderous.

7. One should not marry a girl with heavy, big ankles or long shanks or has masculine features with traces of moustache and beard and is hunchbacked.

8. A prudent person should not marry a girl who laughs without reason, who stays in others' houses always, is habitually contentious, wayward and ruthless.

9. A sensible man should not marry a voracious girl, whose teeth and lips are too large and thick, who snorts and grumbles, who is very dark or red in complexion, or who is cunning and mischievous.

10. One should not marry a girl who is always given to weeping, is of pallid complexion, who is despicable, a chronic patient of cough and Asthma or of somnolent nature.

11. A sagacious man should not marry a girl who habitually speaks worthless and meaningless words who is interested in antagonizing the world, who is in the habit of scandalising others or is a thief.

12. A worldly-wise man should by no means marry a girl whose nose is too long, who is a liar and a cheat, whose body is covered with hair, who is arrogant or a religious hypocrite.

13. If the marriage had taken place during childhood when the real nature had not been realised and if her defect is realized after maturity, he should by all means forsake her.[6]

14. If any woman is always harsh and ruthless to the husband and children but is favourably disposed towards others, he (the husband) should by all means forsake her.

15. O excellent sage, it should be known that marriages are of eight types such as the Brāhma,[7] etc. The previous one should be understood to be better than the latter one; if the preceding form of marriage is not possible the latter one may be adopted.

16. The eight types of marriages are : the Brāhma, Daiva, Ārṣa, Prājāpatya, Āsura, Gāndharva, Rākṣasa and Paiśāca which is considered the eighth one.

17. O Brāhmaṇa, an excellent Brāhmaṇa should be united in wedlock by means of the Brāhma form of marriage or by means of Daiva type. Some recommend the Ārṣa type also.

18. O Brāhmaṇa, the five types of marriage beginning with the Prājāpatya are censurable. If the earlier types are not possible, (then only) a wise person should adopt the latter ones.

19. (After marriage) he should wear two sacred threads, the upper garment and two golden ear-rings. The two clothes (he wears) should be well washed and white.

20. He should smear his limbs with unguents. Hair and nails must be well cut. He should remain pure and clean. He shall hold a bamboo stick and a Kamaṇḍalu filled with water.

21. He should appear neat and pleasing. He should put on a clean turban, an umbrella and two neat sandals or shoes. He should wear flower garlands too and apply sweet scents.

22. He should regularly read and study the Vedas and maintain the religious and prescribed (or conventional) conduct of life. He should not subsist on others' food. He should avoid rumour-mongering.

23. He should not keep one leg mounted over another nor should he step across the leavings of food. He should not scratch his head with the combined pair of his hands.[8]

24-25. A twice-born person should not go anticlockwise round a temple worthy of worship. He should not keep his tresses untied during the worship of deities, Ācamana rites, ablutions and Śrāddha and other holy rites. Nor shall he be in a single cloth on these occasions. He should not ride in a vehicle drawn by a camel and he should avoid vain and groundless arguments.

26. He should not carnally approach another man's wife, and should avoid backbiting. O Brāhmaṇa, he should never go anticlockwise round cows, holy fig-trees, fire and mountains.

27. Nor should he go round the four-cross roads, a holy fig-tree standing on a sacred spot, a natural lake or a king, in that manner. He should avoid jealousy, rivalry and diurnal slumber.

28. He should not speak about other men's sins nor should he boast about his own merit. (He should not reveal his merit). He should keep his own name, the constellation (at the time of his birth) star and honour well-protected.

29. A twice-born should never live in the company of wicked men nor should he pay heed to anything contrary to the scriptural texts. He should never be interested in wine-drinking, gambling and low music.

30. If he touches a wet bone, leavings of food, a Śūdra, a fallen man, a serpent or a dog, he should bathe along with the clothes he is wearing.

31. After touching the funeral pyre, a piece of wood thereon, the sacrificial pole, a Cāṇḍāla and a professional worshipper of idols, he should plunge into water along with the clothes he is wearing.

32. The shadow of the lamp, cot or a body (one's own body ?), the water dripping from the hair, clothes, or a mat and the dust particles kicked up by a goat or a cat or blown off from a broom—all these remove auspicious fortune.

33. One should avoid even from a distance, the wind from the winnowing basket, the smoke from the burning corpse, eating the cooked food of a Śūdra and the contact with the paramour of a Śūdra woman.

34. He should always avoid musing over heterodox doctrines, biting the nail and hair and going to sleep in a nude state.

35. He should not apply over the body the oil that is left over after applying on the head; he should not chew unclean betel leaves; he should not wake up a sleeping person.

36. No unclean person should perform rites in (sacrificial) fire or worship the preceptor and deities. No one should drink water with the left hand only applied to the mouth.

37. O leading sage, no one should tread on the shadow of his preceptor, nor should one transgress the command of his preceptor or censure the Yogins, the Brāhmaṇas, the ascetics and those who observe sacred vows.

38. Brāhmaṇas should not expose or speak of mutual defects and weaknesses. He should duly perform the sacrifice on the new moon and full moon days.

39. The worship and Homa should be performed by the twice-born both in the morning and evening. He who eschews Upāsanā (worship) is called a wine-addict by the learned.

40. A twice born house-holder should perform Śrāddha[9] during the tropical[10] and equinotical transit[11] of the sun, the four Yugādi[12] days, the new moon day and the Pretapakṣa (the fortnight of the dead i.e. the dark half of Bhādrapada).

41. O Nārada, a householder should perform Śrāddha on the Manvādi[13] days, on the day of death, during the Aṣṭakā days* (of the parents, etc.) and after the newly harvested grain had been brought home.

42. A householder should perform Śrāddha, when a person

---

*7th, 8th, 9th beginning from the seventh day after the full moon day or the 8th day of the dark half of Mārgaśīrṣa, Pauṣa and Māgha on which Manes are to be propitiated). (HD, IV, p. 354).

well-versed in the Vedas visits the house, during the lunar and the solar eclipses and in holy centres and at pools of sacred waters.

43. If performed without the Ūrddhva puṇḍra (the vertical castemark on the forehead) the Yajñas, Dānas, (charitable gifts), austerities, Homa, study of the Vedas and the Tarpaṇa rite to the manes become futile.

44. Some people do not like to have Ūrddhva puṇḍra and Tulasi at the time of Śrāddha.[14] It is a futile convention and hence, it should be avoided by the Brāhmaṇas who seek welfare.

45. All these and similar holy rites enjoined in the path of Smṛtis shall be performed by the twice-born duly. They bestow the benefits of all holy rites.

46. Viṣṇu is pleased with those who are devoted to the conduct of good people. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, what is it that cannot be achieved if Viṣṇu is pleased.

CHAPTER TWENTYSIX

Dharmas of the Householder

1. Since the days of ancient Sūtra and Smṛti periods, the stage of householder (Gṛhasthāśrama) has been considered as the best Āśrama, as it is the support or source of all other Āśramas (Gautama III.3); also vide Manu (III. 77-78). Mbh. Śānti. (270.6-7) observes that like a mother, it helps other Āśramas to subsist; elsewhere (*ibid.*12.12) it states that it is equal in weight to all other Āśramas put together. Hence, Smṛtis, Purāṇas, digests on Dharma Śāstra deal in details with the duties of the house-holder. For example, Manu IV, Yājñavalkya I. 96-127, KP. II. Chs. 15 and 16, Mbh. Anuśāsana 97, SC. I. pp. 88-232.

2. This shows that the course of studies of the twice-born emphasized 'Humanities', viz. the study of the Veda (of his particular Śākhā) and its six accessories like phonetics, grammar, etymology (or Nirukta), Prosody and Astronomy (-cum-Astrology) and the Smṛtis or Dharma-Śāstra. Vocations and professions being hereditary, trades, commerce, technology or manual skills were learnt at their own homes, farms, work-shops or guilds.

3. Cf. Buddhi-rūpa-śīla-lakṣaṇa-sampannām arogāṇīm upayaccheta /

—Āśvalāyana Gṛ. S. I.5.3.

Echoed in Āpastamba Gr. S. III. 20.

Vātsyāyana quotes Ghoṭakamukha, "One should marry a girl who would give him a feeling of blessedness and compliments from his friends—Kāma-sūtra III. 1-3.

4. This restriction on Sapiṇḍa marriage is an echo of Nārada Smṛti (xii. 7 Gurumandal edt.) :

ā saptamāt pañcamāc ca bandhubhyaḥ pitṛ-mātṛtaḥ /
a-vivāhyāḥ sagotrāḥ syuḥ samāna-pravarās tathā //

The restriction indicates that the NP. was not written by a Southerner among whom cross-cousin marriages have been in vogue (even among the Śiṣṭas) as noted by Baudhāyana Gr. S. I. 1.19-26. Southern writers on Dharma-Śāstra like Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa (SC.I. pp. 70-74) and Mādhava (Parāśara Mādhavīya (I.2. pp. 63-68) stoutly defend and support marriage with maternal uncle's daughter.

5. VV.5-14 enumerate the defects of girls and advises against marrying them. A reference to Manu (III.8 and 10), Viṣṇu Dh. S. (24. 12-16), VP. III. 10.18-22 etc. shows that there was a consensus about the doṣas (defects) to be avoided in selecting a girl. Strangely enough, NP. does not quote from the Nārada Smṛti where the defects of girls are described (Strī-puṁ-saṃyoga 36) but echoes VP.III.10.16-22 quoting lines and phrases.

6. VV. 13 and 14 allow a husband to forsake his wife under certain circumstances.

But that is not a divorce—a vinculo matrimonii was not known to Hindu society in ancient and medieval times, though some low-castes had this custom.

7. VV. 15-18 describe the eight forms of marriage. They are : Brāhma, Daiva, Ārṣa, Prājāpatya, Āsura, Gāndharva, Rākṣasa and Paiśāca. These are mentioned in Gṛhya Sūtras, Dharma Sūtras, Smṛtis and Purāṇas (e.g. Āśvalāyana Gr. S. I. 6, Baudhāyana Dh. S. I. 11, Manu III. 21, Nārada Smṛti Strī-Pum-38-39, *VP.*III.10-24).

It is significant to note that NP. differs from the Nārada Smṛti in the arrangement of the list of these forms and follows the VP.

The Nārada Smṛti gives the following order of the forms of marriage : Brāhma, Prājāpatya, Ārṣa, Daiva, Gāndharva, Āsura, Rākṣasa and Paiśāca. NP. quotes VP.III.10.24. This further brings out the difference that the Smṛti approves of the first four forms as dharmya (sanctioned by or acceptable to Dharma) but NP. calls Prājāpatya as censurable (vide verse 18). It indicates that Nārada, the writer of the Smṛti is not the author of the NP. who differs from him in many important respects.

The description of the forms of marriage is given in Manu III. 27-34 and there is a general consensus on the characteristics of these forms of marriage which may be briefly indicated here.

(1) Brāhma : A daughter decked with ornaments is gifted to a Vedic scholar of good conduct after respectfully inviting him.

(2) Daiva : A daughter duly ornamented is given to a priest who officiates the performance of one's sacrifice (Baudhāyana I. 11.5 and Aparārka regards the girl as a part of dakṣiṇā.

(3) Ārṣa : Gift of a daughter in formal exchange of one or two pairs of cattle. (This is not a sale or barter but a legal formality).

(4) Prājāpatya : The gift of a daughter after duly honouring the boy (bride-groom) and addressing the couple, "May both of you practice religion".

(5) Āsura : Gift of a daughter in return for payment of maximum wealth to her and to her relatives.

(6) Gāndharva : Love-marriage. Marriage by the mutual consent of the girl and the bride-groom.

(7) Rākṣasa : Forcible abduction of a girl from her house while she weeps and cries and her kinsmen are defeated.

(8) Paiśāca : Intercourse with a girl while she is asleep, intoxicated, unconscious or mentally deranged.

8. The prescriptive and prohibitive rules of conduct in these verses (VV.23ff) reflect the then social tastes and etiquettes and as such are interesting from the sociological point of view. Some of these etiquettes and beliefs have survived till our times for over a millenium or so.

9. Verses 40-42 state the days and the times when Śrāddha should be performed. Here what were treated auspicious for dāna in ch. 25 above are recommended for Śrāddha :

10. Ayana days :

Days marking the beginning of the summer and winter solstice.

Viṣuva days :

11. Viṣuva days

The first point of Aries or Libra into which the sun enters at the vernal or autumnal equinox. Days marking these entries of the sun are called Viṣuva days.

12. Yugādi days—vide supra I.25.50-51.

13. Manvādi days—vide Supra I. 25.52-55.

Aṣṭakā days—vide footnote to the verse.

14. The Smṛtyarthasāra prescribes that Tulasī should be avoided at the time of Śrāddha. Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa notes it in SC. Śrāddha, p. 485, but he remarks that this dictum of prohibiting Tulasī in Śrāddha has no basis in Smṛtis (prasiddha-Smṛti-samuccayeṣu Tulasī-niṣedhasyādarśanāt /

CHAPTER TWENTYSEVEN

The Religious Duties of the Householders, Forest-Hermits and Sannyāsins

Sanaka said :

1. "O excellent sage, I shall describe to you the good conduct of life of the householder on observing which all his sins definitely perish.

Āhnika (Daily routine of duties)

2. O Brāhmaṇa, the householder should get up in the Brāhma Muhūrta[1] (i.e. within an hour and a half before the dawn). He should then arrange his tresses properly. He should then think about the means of livelihood that is not contrary to the aims of life.

3. He should pass urine or evacuate the bowels with the sacred thread placed on the ear. If it is during day or the two junctions of dawn and dusk, he should face the north and if it is in the night time, he should face the south (for answering calls of nature).

4. (While answering calls of nature)[2] the man should keep his head covered with a cloth, he should spread grass on the ground where he is going to answer calls of nature; he should hold a stick or a wooden piece in his hand and be silent during the whole period.

5-7. Neither urine nor fecal matter should be discharged in the following places : on the high way, in a cow pen, on the banks of a river, near lakes and houses, in the shade of a tree, in a dense forest, near fire, in a temple, in a garden, in a ploughed field, at the place where four roads meet, in the presence of Brāhmaṇas, cows and women, over husks, burning coal or broken mudpots and in water. No one should answer calls of nature in these and similar places.

8. Effort should always be made for the sake of purity; a Brāhmaṇa is remembered as one whose root is in cleanliness; every holy rite of one devoid of cleanliness and prescribed conventional conduct of life is in vain.[3]

9. Cleanliness is said to be of two kinds—the external and the internal. The external cleanliness is through clay and water and the internal cleanliness is the purity of thoughts and emotions.[4]

10-11. After answering the call of nature he should hold the penis and get up. For the purificatory process he should bring good mud.[5] It should not be from holes dug up by rats and other rodents, nor from the ploughed field. No one shall take the mud from wells, tanks and lakes. One should carry out the purificatory process after bringing with effort good earth.

12. Learned men say that the cleaning process after passing urine is as follows : One part of the mud is applied to the penis and three parts over each of the testicles.

13. The mud is divided into many parts. One part is smeared over the penis, five parts at the anus and seven over the left leg and three over the right leg. Thus ten parts should be applied over the legs separately.

14. This is the purificatory process on discharging fecal matter so that the bad odour and the sliminess can be removed. Moreover this rite of cleansing is for the householder. In the case of religious students twice this is to be applied.

15. In the case of forest-hermits thrice this is to be applied and four times in the case of recluses (Sannyāsins). In one's own abode the full purificatory process is applicable. O excellent sage, while on a travel, half of this will do.

16. There is no hard and fast rule in regard to an ailing man; so also in times of grave emergency. A wise man should perform the śauca rite that dispels bad odour and sliminess.

17. To women without initiation, the purificatory rite is as long as the odour and sliminess are removed; but to every one who is observing a religious vow, the purificatory rite is like that of an ascetic.

The Ācamana rite

18-19. O leading Brāhmaṇa, in the case of widows too the same is prescribed. After finishing the purificatory rite with great attention, he should sit facing the east or the north and perform the Ācamana rite,[6] maintaining the purity of the sense organs, three times or four times he should drink water that has no odour, foam, etc.

20. O excellent one, he should wipe off the checks twice with the palm and also the two lips. He should touch the two nostrils with the index finger combined with the thumb.

21. He should touch the eyes and the ears in order, with the thumb and the ring finger. The Brāhmaṇa should touch the umbilical region with the little finger in combination with the thumb.

22. The wise man should touch the chest with the palm and the head with the tips of the fingers. He should touch the shoulders with the palm or the tips of the fingers.

Brushing the Teeth

23. O leading Brāhmaṇa, after performing the Ācamana rite thus, he attains excellent purity. Thereafter, he should chew the tooth brush twig of some good tree.[7] It must have the bark in tact.

24-25. It may be taken from any of these trees : Bilva, Asana, Apāmārga, Nimba (Margosa), mango, or the sun plant. First he should wash the twig with water and then chant the following mantra : "O Vanaspati (tree), you instil in us longevity, strength, renown, splendour, progeny, animals, wealth, Vedic knowledge, intellect and sharp-wittedness."[8]

26-27a. The twig chewed by a Brāhmaṇa should have the thickness of the little finger and the length of ten aṅgulas, that of the Kṣatriya's tooth-brush should be nine Aṅgulas in length and in the case of a Vaiśya it should measure eight aṅgulas. O leading sage, the Śūdra should chew a tooth brush twig four aṅgulas in length, and so much in the case of a woman also.

27b-29a. If the tooth-brush twigs are not available, the purification of the mouth is effected through the process of gargling twelve times. Grasses and leaves also can be used. He should hold the twig with the left hand and chew at the outset with the teeth on the left side. He should scrub the teeth as long as the time taken to milk a cow. He should then wash it and split it into two pieces.

29b-30. The householder with the control of sense organs should scrape the tongue with those pieces. He should wash them and cast them off. Again he should perform the Ācamana rite as before and take his bath in clear water in a river, etc.

The rite of taking bath

31-32. He should wash the bank and place the Darbha grasses there before entering the water. He should bow down and invoke the holy waters from the solar sphere. O son of god Brahmā, he should make a mystic diagram with scents (sandal-paste), etc. and meditate upon Lord Janārdana. Remembering the holy Mantras and the sacred rivers, he should take this bath.[9]

The Mantra :

33-34. "O Gaṅgā, Yamunā, O Godāvarī, O Sarasvatī, O Narmadā, O Sindhu, O Kāverī, be present in this water. Always, at the time of my ablution, may the blessed sacred waters of Puṣkara, etc. and the rivers Gaṅgā, etc. come here.

35. The following seven cities should be known as the bestowers of salvation: viz. Ayodhyā, Mathurā, Māyā, Kāśī, Kāñcī, Avantikā and Dvārāvatī."

36. He should then perform the Japa of the Mantra, Aghamarṣaṇa (RV.X.190). After performing the Prāṇāyāma rite, he should plunge into the water. He should perform the Tarpaṇa rite as ancillary to ablution and then sip water in the Ācamana rite. Thereafter, he should offer Arghya to the Sun.

Sandhyā-Vandana (The Twilight Prayer)

37-38. O Nārada, meditating on the sun, he should come out of the water. He should wear a cloth that is fresh from the loom[10] (literally—unwashed) and cover himself with a second one that is washed. Sitting on a seat or mattress of Darbha grass, he should begin his Sandhyā rite.[11] He should face the north-east. O Brāhmaṇa, after the Ācamana rite, he should repeat the Gāyatrī.

39. The learned person should repeat the Mantra beginning with Ṛtam etc. (RV.X.190.1) and then perform the Ācamana rite. Thereafter, he should take some water in his hand, and encircle himself with it and sprinkle it up.

40-41. He should then perform the Saṅkalpa rite (viz. I perform morning/noon/evening Sandhyā for absolution of sins and grace of God). At the end of the Praṇava, he should remember the Vedic seers and (Vedic) metres and the deities. He should sprinkle water over his head while uttering the seven vyāhṛtis (mystic words) beginning with bhūḥ (and bhuvaḥ, svaḥ, etc. each to be preceded by Om (such as Om bhūḥ, Oṁ bhuvaḥ). He should perform Nyāsa (or mental invocation of a deity and of the holy text to occupy a certain part of the body and to render it pure for worship and meditation). It should be performed separately for hands and the limbs. (of his body). He should fix the Tāra (syllable Om) in the heart and the vyāhṛti Bhūḥ on the head.

42. He should place (the vyāhṛti) Bhuvaḥ on the tuft of his hair, (the vyāhṛti) svaḥ on the Kavaca and Bhūr and Bhuvaḥ on both of the eyes. Similarly, he should utter the vyāhṛtis Bhūr, Bhuvaḥ and Svaḥ and making thrice a clapping sound (of hands) in (all directions, say Astrāya Phaṭ.)

43-46a. (Invocation of the Gāyatri)

43-44a. Then he should invoke the Sandhyā of the morning as seated on a white lotus—"O Gāyatrī of three syllables ! O Goddess granting boons ! O expounder of the Brahman (or the Vedas), do you come. O mother of metres ! O the source of the Brahman ! Obeisance to you."

44b-45a. At mid-day, he should invoke Sāvitrī seated on a bull and clad in white garments. She is the goddess, the source of the origin of Rudra and expounder of Rudra.

45b-46a. In the evening, she is seated on Garuḍa and is clad in yellow garments. She is goddess Sarasvatī and the origin or the source of Viṣṇu and the expounder of Viṣṇu. The householder should invoke her thus (as propounded above).

46b-47. Prāṇāyāma (Breath-control)

While uttering the syllable Om and the seven vyāhṛtis (i.e. uttering Oṁ bhūḥ, Oṁ bhuvaḥ, Oṁ Svaḥ, Oṁ mahaḥ, Oṁ Janaḥ, Oṁ tapaḥ and Oṁ satyam) and the three-footed Gāyatrī mantra (viz. Om tat savitur varenyam, bhargo devasya dhīmahi, dhiyo yo naḥ pracodayāt) and the Śiras (head) of the Gāyatrī (viz. Om āpo jyoti rasó mṛtam, etc.), he should inhale (take in the breath) and retaining it (for the same duration as inhaling), he should exhale it (while muttering the same mystic syllables as at the time of inhaling it). In this (exercise of) breath-control, the air is to be breathed through the left nostril and breathed out of the other (i.e. the right nostril. This is the rite of breath-control.

48. Thereafter, he should perform the Ācamana rite twice and recite the mantras as follows : In the morning the mantra is :

Śūryaś ca mā etc. (TA X.25.1). In the mid-day : Āpaḥ punantu pṛthivīm, etc. (TA.X.23.1). In the evening the mantra is Agniś ca mā, etc. (TA X.24.1)

49-50. He should perform the rite of Mārjana (sprinkling one's body with water by means of hand or a blade of Kuśa grass) reciting the three mantras from Āpo hi ṣṭhā etc. (RV. X.9.13 VS.11.50). He should ritualistically dismiss (destroy) the host of enemies with the water touching the nose after repeating the mantra Sumitriyā naḥ, etc. (VS.6.22).

He should then sprinkle water over the head with the mantra Drupadād iva, etc. (VS.20.20; AV.6.115.3)

With the mantra Ṛtaṁ ca satyam etc. (RV.X.190.1-3 he should perform the *Agha-marṣaṇa rite ("Driving out sin).

51. Repeating the mantra Antaś carasi etc. (TA.10.31.1), he should drink the water once. Then he should duly offer scents, flowers and handful of water to the Sun.

52-53. O celestial sage ! He should thus worship the Sun. During the morning and the evening he should raise his hand and perform Svastikāñjali (joining palms together in prayer). At mid-day, he should keep the hands lowered down. (At this time of sūryopasthāna—worship of the Sun), the three mantras viz. Udu tyam etc (RV.I.50.1), Citraṁ devānām etc. (RV.I.115.1) Tac cakṣuḥ etc. (RV.VII.66.16) should be repeated. O Nārada, he shohld repeat other mantras also pertaining to the Sun, Viṣṇu or Śiva.

54. He should pray to the splendour of the Sun with the mantra Tejo si† etc. (VS. 22.1) "You are the brilliance", Gāyatryasi‡ (Śat. Br. 14.8.15.10) (also Bṛhad. Up. 5.14.7). "You are Gāyatrī". He should then turn round himself thrice and meditate on the Śaktis (potencies) pertaining to him.

---

* This consists in taking water in the right palm formed in the shape of cow's ear, holding it near one's nose, breathing out (one's sins as it were) from the nostril on the water while one is repeating the three verses under reference (RV.X.190 1-3) and then casting the water to one's left on the ground — Kane : *HD.*II.i. P.317.

†. The mantra used in the Mādhyandina Sandhyā is Tejo'si Śukram amṛtam, etc.

‡. This mantra in the Mādhyandina Sandhyā is given as Gāyatryasyekapadī dvipadī ...

55. Gāyatrī is the wife of Brahmā, surrounded by the circle of eyes of the four-faced Lord. She is holding a jar, Sruk and Sruva (sacrificial ladles) in her own hands. Her face has the brilliant lustre of the moon. She is of the form of Ṛgveda. She is a young girl. She sportively rides on the swan. She is worshipped by the lustrous jewel of the firmament (the Sun). She is bedecked by means of his orb. May Gāyatrī, conceived thus be for our ever-flourishing prosperity.

56. Sāvitrī of the form of Yajus must be meditated upon like this : She is the consort of god Rudra; she is in the fresh prime of youth. She has three eyes. She is clad in the tiger's hide. She holds the Khaṭvāṅga (the club with a skull at the top), the trident, the Akṣa-sūtra (rosary) and the girdle. She is embellished with the crescent moon on her crest which resembles a forked lightning streek in the midst of her matted hair. Sāvitrī has the bull for her vehicle and is fair (white) in complexion. May she be conducive to our fearlessness and prosperity.

57. She is to be meditated upon as the divine goddess Sarasvatī, decorated in yellow robes. Dark in complexion, she is known as Śyāmā. She is beautiful in the radiating old Vaiṣṇava (belonging to Viṣṇu) form. She is seated on Tārkṣya (Garuḍa). She is brilliant with ornaments such as anklets set with gems and jewels, bracelets and the shining necklace. Her hands are embellished with a conch, a discus, a mace (gadā) and a lotus. May she be for our prosperity.[12]

58. Meditating thus he should perform the Japa, standing in the morning and at midday, and seated in the evening. With great devotion his mind he must be concentrated on the deity.

59. The Tripadā (three-footed) (i.e. the Gāyatrī Mantra) must be repeated a minimum number of ten times and a maximum number of a thousand times. The average should never go below a hundred. The Mantra is to be accompanied by the Praṇava (the syllable OM) and inaugurated with Bhūrbhuvaḥ svaḥ.[13]

60. The Japa (repetition of the Gayatrī mantra) of an observer of a religious vows (vratin) or of a recluse (yati) should be accompanied with six repetitions of OM followed by three Vyāhṛtis and the same (OM) repetition at the end (ṣaṭ-tāra) or commencing with OM followed by Vyāhṛtis (bhūr bhuvas svaḥ) and ending with the same repetition (sampuṭa).[14] The Japa of a householder should be accompanied with OM and Vyāhṛtis (Sa-tāra).

61. He should thus perform the Japa according to his ability and dedicate the same to the Sun-god. He should then offer two water-oblations with cavity formed by joining together both the palms of hands (añjali), to Gāyatrī and the Sun-god.

62. With the Mantra Uttame Śikhare (TA.10.30.1) etc. he should ritualistically bid good bye to her (Gāyatrī). (He should say) "Do go respectfully on being permitted by Brahmā, Iśa and Hari."

63. With palms joined in reverence, he should bow down to the quarters and the guardian deities of the quarters.[15] Thereafter, he should perform the other rites prescribed for the morning in accordance with the injunctions.

64. A householder should take bath both in the morning and at midday. O celestial sage, the forest dwelling hermit and the ascetic should take ablutions at three times (in the morning, the noon and the evening).

65. Those who are ailing due to chronic illness, etc. and the wayfarer need take bath once only. O leading sage, with Darbhas in the hand, he should then perform the rite of Brahma Yajña.

66. If the rites enjoined for the day are left unperformed due to oversight or negligence, he should perform them in due order in the first Yāma (three-hour-period) of the night.

67. The twice-born person of knavish disposition who does not perform Sandhyā worship even when there is no emergency, should be known as a heretic. He is excluded from all Dharmas.[16]

68. If a person, an expert in fraudulent arguments neglects and ceases to perform the Sandhyā-worship and other rites, know him to be the foremost among the great sinners.

69. Those twice-born ones who hold tete-a-tete with the neglectors of Sandhyā-worship and other rites fall into terrible hells and stay there as long as the sun, the moon and the stars shine.

70. Thereafter, he should worship the deities and perform the rite of Vaiśvadeva (offerings in the fire to all devas collectively) in accordance with the injunction. He should duly honour the guest thereat, by means of food, etc.[17]

71. Sweet words must be spoken to them and to the other guests. He should worship them and propitiate them with water, food, bulbous roots and roots. He should honour him with the charitable gift of a house as well.

72. If any guest returns disappointed from the house of anyone, he gives the latter all his sins and goes away taking his (host's) merits.

73. Learned men say that Atithi (guest) is that person who has come from another village and whose name and lineage are not known. The householder shall worship him like Viṣṇu.

74. O Brāhmaṇa, everyday he should propitiate with cooked food, etc. a resident of his own village who is well-versed in the Vedas and is devoted to Viṣṇu. He should propitiate him with the Manes in view (i.e. with a view to propitiate the pitṛs).

Five Great Sacrifices

75. A person who neglects to perform the five Yajñas[18] is called a Brāhmaṇa (the slayer of a Brāhmaṇa) by learned men. Hence, one should assiduously perform the five Yajñas everyday.

76. They call the following as the five yajñas : Devayajña, Bhūtayajña, Pitṛyajña, Nṛyajña (yajna for men)and Brahmayajña.

77. Remaining restrained in speech, he should himself take food accompanied by servants, friends and others. He should take only such food as Brāhmaṇas take, he should never miss the opportunity of serving a deserving person.[19]

78. While taking food if one places one's feet in the seat or if one wears half the clothes (i.e. only one cloth) or if one swallows again what is vomited out of the mouth, learned men call him the wine-addict.

79. If anyone eats sweets, fruits, etc, some part of which is already eaten before, or if one takes salt directly, he is called the eater of raw beef.

80. While drinking water (at the conclusion of meals) or while performing the Ācamana rite or while eating solid food-stuffs, a Brāhmaṇa should not make sounds. The Brāhmaṇa who makes such noise, shall fall into hell.

81. He should take in wholesome cooked food with restrained speech. He should not speak contemptuously of the food. Before taking food, water is ritualistically sipped, repeating the mantra Amṛtopastaraṇam asi [TA.10.32.1] (Thou art nectar spread out).

82. He should then perform the rite of Prāṇādi āhuti (i.e. he should take in six bits of food one by one repeating Prāṇāya Svāhā, Apānāya Svāhā, etc.) : and after the Ācamana rite he should begin the meal. At the end of the meal, he should sip water once again saying Amṛtāpidhānam asi [TA 10.35.1] (Thou art the covering lid with nectar).

83. O leading Brāhmaṇa, he should then perform the Ācamana rite and thereafter be engaged in pondering over the scriptural topics. At night too, he should go to bed, sit and take food in accordance with his ability.

84. O sage, thus the householder should practise the conventional conduct of the good every day. Whenever he commits any breach in the conventional conduct of life, he should immediately perform expiatory rites.

Rules for Forest Hermits

85. O excellent one, on seeing the body defiled by greying of hairs, etc., he should entrust the care of his wife to his sons and go to the forest. Or he should go there along with her.[20]

88. He should avoid flowers and fruits produced in the village. He should eat only eight morsels of food, and should not take food during the night.

89. A person who follows the Āśrama of the forest-hermits should completely avoid oil. He should abstain from sexual intercourse. He should not be lethargic nor should he sleep too long.

90. A forest dweller should always remember Nārāyaṇa who wields in his hands a conch, a discus and a mace and perform Cāndrāyaṇa[24] and other austerities.

91-92a. He should endure chillness and scorching heat. He should always maintain the holy fire. When utter detachment develops in his mind in regard to all objects of senses, he should immediately renounce.[25] O Brāhmaṇa, otherwise he will be a fallen fellow.

The Duties of a Sannyāsin.

92b-93. The ascetic should be engaged in the study of Vedantic principles.[26] He should be quiescent and self-controlled. He should subdue the sense organs. He should be free from the Dvandvas (natural opposed pairs, e.g. pleasure and pain) and devoid of arrogance. Never should he entertain the sense of "my-ness". He should possess all attributes such as quiescence, etc. He should be absolutely free from desires, passion and anger.

94. The Brāhmaṇa ascetic may remain naked or wear only a ragged loin cloth. He should keep his head completely shaven.[27] He should be impartial to an enemy or a friend and view honour and dishonour with equanimity.

95. The ascetic should stay in a village only for a night and in a town, for three nights. He should maintain himself through alms, but should not take food from one person.

96. The ascetic should beg for alms only in an uncensured Brāhmaṇa household where there is no burning coal and where the people have finished taking food and where there is no quarrel.

97. He should take bath thrice a day and be devoted to Nārāyaṇa. He should always repeat the Praṇava. (The syllable OM). He should subdue the sense-organs and keep his mind under control.

98. If at any time the ascetic becomes greedy or dissolute and becomes the regular partaker of the cooked food of a single individual, no prospect of redemption for him is in view, even after ten thousand expiatory rites.

99. O Brāhmaṇa, if out of greediness an ascetic becomes interested in developing his body, he should be known as some one equal to a Cāṇḍāla. He is the most despicable among the people of all castes and stages of life.

100-102 He should meditate on Lord Nārāyaṇa, who is the Ātman, free from ailments, above mutually opposed pairs; and the sense of 'myness', who is quiescent, beyond the pale of Māyā, and absolutely free from jealousy; who is perfect and immutable, the very embodiment of eternal bliss and existence; whose form is that of perfect knowledge; who is devoid of impurities and is the eternal light; who has no aberrations; who is beginningless and endless, the cause of the sentience of the universe; who is free from attributes, and is greater than the greatest.

103. He should regularly read the passages of the Upaniṣads, ponder over the Vedāntic topics. Conquering the sense organs, he should always meditate on the thousand-headed Lord.

104. The ascetic who is habituated to meditating thus, and is devoid of rivalry or jealousy, attains the greatest bliss, the eternal and supreme light.

105. The twice-born one who practises the conventional code of conduct in the different stages of life, goes to the greatest abode after reaching which no one regrets (i.e. there is no sorrow).

106. Those who strictly abide by the discipline of the castes and stages of life, those who are devoted to Nārāyaṇa, those who are devoid of all sins, go to that highest region of Viṣṇu."

CHAPTER TWENTYSEVEN

Religious Duties of the Householders, forest-hermits and samnyāsin

1. Cf. Manu IV.92, Yājñavalkya I.115 who enjoins a Brāhmaṇa to get up from bed at the Brāhma muhūrta i.e. 4 ghaṭikas before the sunrise (Br. Vaivarta P.) SC. (I.p. 88) quotes Pitāmaha who says that the last watch of the night is the Brāhma muhūrta./

2. VV.4-7 contain rules regarding answering calls of nature. Detailed rules regarding this act are laid down in ancient Dh.S., Smṛtis etc. For example, Manu IV.45-52, Vāyu P. 78. 59-64, Vāmana P. 14.30-32. The detailed instructions regarding the direction in which to go to answer the call of nature, keeping the sacred thread on the ear, covering the ground with grass, etc. quoted in SC.I., pp. 88-90 tally with those in the NP.

3. VV. 8-19 give the details of cleaning those parts (the penis, anus, etc.) with lumps of earth and water. As SC.I., pp. 91-94 shows there have been some differences in details but as Devala rightly states, it is not the number of times (of cleaning with mud and water) that matters but cleansing should be carried on till one feels it is all right.

yāvat sādhviti manyeta tāvac chaucam vidhīyate /

(quoted in SC. I. 93) vide V.16b also.

The present verse (No. 8 in NP.) is a quotation form *Dakṣa Sm. V.*3.

4. Quoted from Dakṣa Sm. V. 3.

5. Cf. Vasiṣṭha Dh. S. VI. 17.

6. Very elaborate rules for Ācamana (sipping of water) are prescribed in digests like SC (I. P.95-103) NP. seems to follow VP.

7. VV.23-30 deal with brushing the teeth (Danta-dhāvana) which is regarded as an integral yet independent part of Āhnika (daily routine of duties) and not a subordinate part (aṅga) of bath or Sandhyā—morning Prayer (Āhnika prakāśa, p. 121). The practice is mentioned in old Vedic works like the Tait. S.II.5.1.7. Digests like SC.I., p. 104-107 give quotations from different Smṛtis and Purāṇas (including NP.) which show minor differences about the choice of trees for twigs to be used as a brush and the length and thickness of the twigs to be so used. It shows the insistence of ancient law-givers on the importance of brushing the teeth. NP., however, does not give the quotation of Nārada Smṛti :

sarve kaṇṭakinaḥ puṇyāḥ kṣīriṇaś ca yaśasvinaḥ /

As Dakṣa observes brushing the teeth should precede the morning bath.

8. This mantra i.e. prayer to the tree, the twig of which is used for brushing the teeth, is found in the Gobhila-Smṛti and is quoted in the SC. and other digests on Dharma Śāstra.

9. VV.31-36 describe a usual (nitya) brief procedure of bathing, consisting of invocation of water (VV.33-34) mārjana, bath and citing Aghamarṣaṇa and offering Arghya to the sun (V.36)—a procedure recommended in Brahmokta-Yājñavalkya Saṁhitā II. 16-22 (Gurumandal Edt). which probably is quoted as yogi-yājñavalkya by Aparārka, p. 134.

10. Though the usual meaning of a-hata is given in the translation, it also means a cloth or a garment which is practically new—unwashed for many days (vide Pulastya quoted in SC.I.P.113).

11. The Sandhyā means a 'Twilight prayer' and is to be performed at dawn and dusk, though prayer at mid-day came to be known as madhyāhna sandhyā. Originally sandhyā consisted of arghya (offering of water as worship to the Sun God) and japa of Gāyatrī (Tait. Ar. II.2. also Āśvalāyana Gr.S.III. 7.3-6). We find elaborate sandhyopāsanā consisting of ācamana, prāṇāyāma, mārjana (sprinkling oneself with water thrice), aghamarṣaṇa, arghya (offering water to the sun), japa of Gāyatrī, upasthāna (recitation of mantras with reference to the sun in the morning and Varuṇa in the evening). We perform ācamana with three names of Viṣṇu, viz. Keśava, Nārāyaṇa and Mādhava thus Oṁ Keśavāya namaḥ and repeat the remaining 21 names (uttering in all 24 names) of Viṣṇu, each preceded by Oṁ and followed by namaḥ.

A comparison of the procedure of Sandhyā as given in the N P. with the Sandhyā of the Mādhyandinas of Kātyāyana Sūtra in Maharashtra shows a substantial agreement in the mantras, etc. But the sequence of constituents or procedure of Sandhyā in the NP. differs to some extent from the present day Sandhyopāsanā of Madhyandinas (vide the Nitya-Brahma-Karma Samuccaya edt. by Shridhar Shastri Pathak, Poona, Śaka 1851 (1929 A.D.) The difference may be due to the age and region of the NP.

Instead of giving literal translation of these verses it is necessary to explain technical terms in the Sandhyā, the details of procedure regarding acts to be performed as Arghya, Aghamarṣaṇa, etc. and the exact reference of the mantras to be recited during the Sandhyā prayer along with the translation itself. Hence, the explanation of these terms, etc. is not repeated here.

12. Verses 55-57 give the description of the Gāyatrī to be invoked at the morning, at the mid-day and in the evening. These verses are the elaboration of the similar couplets in the Sandhyā of Mādhyandina Brāhmaṇas. (vide Pathak's NBK Samuccaya, p. 8).

13. In plain words the mantra to be muttered is :

Oṁ bhūr-bhuvaḥ svaḥ—Oṁ tatsavitur vareṇyam, bhargo devasya dhīmahi, dhiyo yo naḥ pracodayāt /

14. Sampuṭa—enclosed in two praṇavas, viz. oṁ bhūrbhuvaḥ svaḥ / oṁ tatsavitur etc. pracodayāt oṁ / Yogi-Yājñavalkya as quoted in SC I P.149.

The quarters and their guardian deities to whom respects are to be paid are as follows :

15. The East—Indra; the South-East—Agni, The South—Yama; the South-West—Nir-ṛti; the West—Varuṇa; the North-West—the Wind god; the North—Kubera; the North-East—Īśvara (God Śiva); the upper (Skywards)—god Brahmā; the lower direction—god Viṣṇu; the remaining direction—Ananta.

16. Verses 67-69, censure a shirker of Sandhyā-prayers. SC.I.139 quotes KP., Gobhila and Dakṣa, advising his (the shirker's) ex-communication. Gobhila states that such a person is Śūdra while alive and after death he becomes a dog (jīvamāno bhavec chūdro mṛtaḥ śvā cābhijāyate).

17. Out of 'Five great sacrifices (Pañca-mahā-yajñas) manuṣya-yajña (feeding an unknown guest) is described in VV.70-74. The atithi is defined in verse 73.

18. From early Vedic times great importance was attached to the following daily observances, viz., Devayajña (sacrifice of gods), pitṛyajña (sacrifice—offering of water to ancestors by way of Tarpaṇa), bhūta-yajña (offering at least a ball of food to living beings), manuṣya-yajña (receiving and feeding at least one guest) and Brahma-yajña (svādhyāya or recitation of at least one mantra from the Veda). They are emphasized in Śat.Br. (XI.5-6.1), Tait.Ār. (II.10). Gṛhya sūtras and Smṛtis (vide SC.I., pp. 208-211) and pp. 217-220 for the importance of receiving an atithi (unexpected guest).

19. VV.77-82 lay down rules (and indirectly confirm the social etiquettes) at the time of taking meals. SC.I., pp. 221-225 show that there was a sort of standardization about the rules or conventions to be observed at the time of taking meals.

20. VV.85-91, give an epitome of the life and rules of the forest-hermit.

21. Vide Manu VI. 22 & 24; Yājñavalkya III. 48.

22. Five yajñas—The five Mahā-yajñas mentioned above : vide Manu VI. 5 & 7; Yājñavalkya III.46.

23. Vide Āpastamba Dh.S. 11.9 and Manu VI.8.

24. Vide Manu VI.2—. But this is a part of penance in general and not expiation for a particular sin.

25. VV.91-104 describe the stage of life known as sannyāsa.

26. Although Manu recommends the recitation of Vedic texts referring to gods or Yajñas along with these metaphysical texts called the Vedānta (VI.83), NP. insists on the recitation of Vedāntic or Upaniṣadic texts only, vide verse 103 below.

27. Though NP. gives nudity as an option to Sannyāsins—an option according to 'some' in Āpastamba Dh.S.II. 9.21.11-12, Smṛtis are lukeworm about it. Manu VI.52 prescribes the paring of nails and complete shaving of the head and beard.

CHAPTER TWENTYEIGHT

The Description of the Rite of Śrāddha

Sanaka said :

1. O leading sage, listen to the excellent procedure in the performance of Śrāddha,[1] on hearing which one is undoubtedly liberated from sins.

2. On the day previous to the Kṣayāha (day of the Death-anniversary) the householder should take his bath. He should take only a single meal on that day. He should duly invite the Brāhmaṇas (for the next day). In the night he should observe celibacy and lie on the ground.

3. The performer of Śrāddha should avoid cleaning of the teeth, chewing the betel leaves, anointing the body with oil, and foodstuffs of an aphrodisiac nature.

4. The performer of Śrāddha and the partaker of food therein should avoid long journey, quarrel, fury, sexual intercourse, bearing of burdens and sleep during the day.[2]

5. If he, who is invited for a Śrāddha indulges in sexual intercourse, incurs the sin of Brāhmaṇa-slaughter and falls into hell.

Qualifications of the Brāhmaṇa Invitee for Śrāddha:

6. The Brāhmaṇa who has the following characteristics can be invited for a Śrāddha[3] : He should be well-versed in the Vedas and devoted to Viṣṇu. He should be an abider by his own conventional conduct of life. He should be born of a good family and be of quiet nature.

7. He should be devoid of passionate attachment and hatred. He should be an expert in the interpretation of the Purāṇas. He must be conversant with the madhu verses (viz. RV.I.90.6-8, Vāj. S.13.27-29 in which the word madhu occurs) and must have studied the Tri-suparṇa, (viz. the three anuvākas beginning with Brahmametu mām etc. (Tait. Āraṇyaka X.48-50).

8. He should be engaged in the worship of the deities and be an adept in the principles of Smṛtis. He must be a past-master in the knowledge of the principles of the Upaniṣads. He must be interested in the welfare of all worlds.

9-10. He should be grateful and richly endowed with all good qualities. He must be engaged in serving his preceptor. He must be engaged in advising others by recounting the good scriptural texts. These are the Brāhmaṇas, O leading sage, who can be employed in a Śrāddha. I shall mention those who should be excluded from the Śrāddhas. Listen with great attention.

Disqualifications of an Invitee[6]

11-18. One who is physically a deformed being wanting in a limb or by having a superfluous limb, a miser, a sickly person, a leper, one with deformed nails, a person with long suspended ears, one who has broken his religious vows, a person whose livelihood is the reading of the stars (i.e. astrology), he who (professionally) burns corpses, a person indulgent in heretical arguments, the younger brother who marries when the elder brother is yet a bachelor; a professional worshipper of idols, a rogue, a person who speaks ill of others; a hot-tempered person, a knave, the village priest, one who is interested in unholy scriptures, one who is devoted to (and dependent on) other men's food, one who supports the son of a Śūdra woman, the paramour of a Śūdra woman, Kuṇḍas and Golakas (i.e. bastards born of adultery when the husband is alive or when the husband is dead), one who performs the Yajña of those who are not eligible to perform it, a man of fradulent conduct, a man who shaves off his head without purpose, one who is enamoured of another man's wife or wealth, one who is devoid of devotion to Viṣṇu; one who turns his face away from devotion to Śiva, those who sell the Vedas (i.e. accept fee for recitation and teaching of the Vedas), the sellers of Vratas, those who sell Smṛtis, and Mantras (who charge fees for these), professional musicians, composers of poems, those who maintain themselves by means of practising medicine (for money), one who is engaged in decrying the Vedas, arsonists of villages and forests, one who is over-passionate, one who sells intoxicating beverages and one who indulges in deceitful arguments. All these should be excluded scrupulously from the Śrāddha.

19. He should invite the Brāhmaṇa the previous day or on the same day. The Brāhmaṇa who is invited should maintain celibacy and conquer his sense organs.[5]

20. With his sense-organs duly subdued, a householder should take darbha-grass in his hands and invite an intelligent Brāhmaṇa with the following words : "O excellent Sir, you should do me a favour and accept my invitation for Śrāddha".[6]

21. He should get up early in the morning and perform the daily morning routine. The learned man should perform the Śrāddha at the hour called Kutapa[7] (i.e. the eighth muhūrta or five hours and thirty six minutes after the sunrise).

22. That hour in the eighth Kāla (Muhūrta) of the day when the sun begins to be less fierce is called the Kutapa. That which is given to the Pitṛs at that time is of everlasting benefit.

23. The afternoon is the time granted to the Pitṛs by the self-born deity (god Brahmā). Hence, the Kavya (oblations to Pitṛs) should be given by excellent Brāhmaṇas only at that time.

24. O excellent sage, if the Kavya is offered along with the monetary gifts at the wrong hour it should be known as belonging to the Rākṣasas. It never reaches the Pitṛs.

25. The Kavya offered in the evening too becomes something pertaining to the Rākṣasas. The giver as well as the partaker of food falls into the hell.

Decisions about Śrāddha-Tithis[8]

26. If the duration of the Tithi of the annual Śrāddha be of only one ghaṭikā (daṇḍa = 24 minutes) on the previous day, O Brāhmaṇa the Śrāddha must be performed on the Tithi the afternoon of which is affected (touched) by another Tithi, by a person knowing (the required religious rite).[9]

27. If the Tithi (lunar-day) of the death anniversary spreads over the afternoons of two (consecutive) days, the Śrāddha should be performed on the previous day if there be the Kṣaya (less duration, loss) of the (particular) Tithi and on the next day if that Tithi has extended duration (Vṛddhi).

28. If the Tithi of the death-anniversary is for two Muhūrtas (i.e. one hour and thirtysix minutes) in the previous day and spreads till evening on the next day, the latter is recommended for Śrāddha.

29. Some opine that when the Tithi (of the death-anniversary is of the duration of two muhūrtas, the Śrāddha should be performed on the previous day, but O chief of sages, this is not a universally held view about the performance of Śrāddha.

30. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, when the invited Brāhmaṇas have all assembled together, the householder with his sons purified through expiation, should formally solicit their permission.

31. On being formally permitted to perform the Śrāddha, he should invite the Brāhmaṇas again in accordance with the injunctions—two for the purpose of Viśve-devas and three for the Pitṛs.

32. Or he should invite one for each, i.e. for Devas and the Pitṛs respectively; when he has been permitted to perform Śrāddha, he should make two mystic diagrams called Maṇḍala[10] (on the ground).

33. The diagram of a Brāhmaṇa (performer of Śrāddha) should be square or four-cornered; that of the Kṣatriya triangular; that of a Vaiśya should be known as circular. As for a Śūdra the consecration by sprinkling is enough.

34. If Brāhmaṇas are not available, one should engage even one's own brother or son or the Ātman himself but he should never engage a Brāhmaṇa devoid of the Vedas.

35. He should wash the feet of the Brāhmaṇas. After they had performed the Ācamana rite, they must be seated. Remembering Lord Nārāyaṇa, they should be suitably worshipped.

36. Repeating the ṚK mantra Apahatāḥ (RV. X.76.4, V.S. II.29) etc., the householder should strew gingelly seeds in between the Brāhmaṇas and at the threshold.

37. He should offer the seat to the devas by means of barley grains and Darbha grass, saying "This is the seat unto the Viśve-Devas". After giving this he should offer Kṣaṇa-pratikṣaṇa (a formality of invitation).

38. For the expression of imperishability and the offering of seat, Ṣaṣṭhī (the genitive case) is used; in invoking Dvitīyā (the accusative case) is used; in offering food Caturthī (the Dative case) is used; all the rest are addressed as Sambuddhis (the Vocative case).[11]

39. He should take up two vessels joined together by means of the Darbha grass. Repeating the ṛk Śanno Devi (Vaj.S. 36.12, (RV.X.9.4)—(May the divine waters be for our happiness, etc.), he should sprinkle water on it.

40. Restrained in speech he should offer scents and flowers after putting barley grains repeating the Mantra Yavosi (V.S.5.26) etc. Thereafter, he should invoke Devas by means of the ṛk Viśve devāsaḥ (RV.I.3.7,V.S.7.34)—"Come, Ye all gods, listen to this my call and sit on this darbha grass."

41. With great attention he should offer Arghya repeating the Mantra Yā Divyā (TB.II.7.15.4a), etc. Thereafter, he should worship by means of scents, leaves, flowers, incense and lamps.

42. After being permitted by the Brāhmaṇas representing Devas, he should worship the groups of the Pitṛs. He should offer them good seats by means of Darbhas mixed with sesamum seeds.

43. He should take up three vessels. The Brāhmaṇa should place them as before for the purpose of Arghya. Reciting the Mantra Śanno Devi (RV.X.9.4) etc. he should pour water and then put gingelly seeds repeating Tilosi (*Āśvalāyana Gr.S.*4.7.11), etc.

44. With great attention the Brāhmaṇa should invoke the Pitṛs by means of the ṛk Uśantaḥ (RV.X.16.12) etc. He should offer Arghya as before by means of the Mantra Yā Divyā, etc. (TB.II.7.4a).

45. O excellent one, he should honour and worship them in accordance with his capacity, by means of scents, leaves, flowers, incense and lamps as well as garments and ornaments.

Agnau-Karaṇa[12]

46. The intelligent householder should take up a portion of the cooked rice soaked in ghee and say, "I shall consign it to the fire", and solicit their formal permission.

47. O sage, on being asked by him saying, "May I do ?", "Let me do", those Brāhmaṇas should say, "Please do", "It may be done", "You may do".

48. After kindling the fire for worship in accordance with the injunctions mentioned in his own Gṛhyasūtras, he should utter thus—"Svadhā and obeisance to Soma accompanied by the Pitṛs.

49. Or he should utter—"Svadhā and obeisance to Agni the conveyor of the Kavya". Or as in the Pitṛ Yajña, the intelligent householder can perform Homa by means of Svāhā endings as well.

50. The satisfaction of the Pitṛs shall be everlasting even, thanks to these two Āhutis. If the fire is not available, Homa can be performed in the hands of the Brāhmaṇa.

51. O Brāhmaṇa, he should perform it in the hand or in the fire according to the conventional practice. When the Pārvaṇa rites are to be performed, fire cannot be kept far off.

52. O Brāhmaṇa, if the Agni is far off, when the Pārvaṇa rites are in vogue, he should kindle the fire (ordinary fire, not the hereditarily kept one) perform the rite and be contented after ritualistically dismissing it.

53-55. When the day of death-anniversary arrives but the hereditary fire is not available, he should make his brothers duly perform the Śrāddha, those brothers who are Brāhmaṇas with the sacrificial fire (duly maintained). When the Upāsanā fire (traditionally kept fire or gṛhyāgni) is far off, but the brother is nearby and the brothers are maintaining only ordinary fire, if the Homa is performed in the worldly fire or in the hand (of the Brāhmaṇas) he would be a sinner; when the Upāsanā fire is far off, some Brāhmaṇas wish for this (i.e. they recommend it).

56. The balance of that he should strew into the dishes of the Brāhmaṇas duly remembering Hari. He should propitiate the Brāhmaṇas with various kinds of edibles, tasty dishes and lambatives.

57-58. With due attention on either side, he should perform the rite of Annatyāga—"Eschewal of the food". He should then pray to Devas—"O Viśve Devas, O powerful ones, O blessed ones, come ye all. Be alert in your respective places wherever you have been enjoined and he should repeat the ṛk Ye Devāsaḥ (RV.I.139.11, etc.)

59-61. By means of the ṛk Ye ca ha (RV.X.15.13) he should request the Brāhmaṇas, "Among them embodied and the unembodied Pitṛs of illuminating splendour, I bow down always to them who meditate and those who have the Yogic vision." After bowing to the Pitṛs thus, he should be devoted to Nārāyaṇa and offer the rite, and havis that had been offered to Viṣṇu. Thereafter, all the Brāhmaṇas should be restrained in speech and partake of the food.

62. If any one speaks out or laughs, the Havis offering shall become one pertaining to the Rākṣasas. According to convention wine and meat can be served.

63-65a. Those persons of restrained speech and occupying the (place near) the plates (dishes), should praise the cooking, etc. If any Brāhmaṇa engaged in the Śrāddha, sets aside his dish, he should be known as the destroyer of Śrâddha. He is fit only for the hell. If the Brāhmaṇas taking food touch one another, they should continue their meal, but after completing it, they should perform one hundred and eight Japa of the Gāyatri mantra.

65b-67. While Brāhmaṇas partake of their food, he should remember Lord Nārâyaṇa with great faith. He should remember the infinite Lord, the unvanquished deity. He should repeat the hymns pertaining to Viṣṇu, the Rakṣoghnī hymns (viz. RV.IV. 4. 1-15, RV.X.87, VII.104,X.118 and 162). He should specially recite the hymns pertaining to Pitṛs (viz. RV.X.15. 1-13). He should perform the japa of (or recite) the Puruṣa Sūkta (RV.X.90), the three Naciketa hymns[13], the Tri-madhu[14] (RV.I. 90-6-8),Trisuparṇa[15] (RV. V. 57.2), Pavamāna Sūkta and hymns from the Yajur-Veda.

68. He should repeat the Uktha and other Sāman Mantras that bestow merit. He should also recite verses from Itihāsas, Purāṇas and Dharma śāstras.

69. As long as the Brāhmaṇas continue their meal, he should repeat these mantras, etc. O Brāhmaṇa, when the Brāhmaṇas have completed their meal, he should strew (two lumps of rice called) Vikira.

70-71. He should enquire "What should be done about the remaining food?" He should repeat Madhu Sūkta O Nārada, then he should wash his own feet and perform the Ācamana rite. When the Brāhmaṇas have finished their meals and performed the Ācamana rite, he should offer the Piṇḍas. He should then perform the rites of Svasti Vācanaka (utterance of benediction) and Akṣayyodaka (getting the blessing that food and water be inexhaustible).

72-74. After offering the same, with great concentration he should offer salutations to the Brāhmaṇas. If the Brāhmaṇas utter benediction without stirring the vessel, their Pitṛs will be the partakers of Ucchiṣṭa (leavings of food) for a full year. With these utterances of the Smṛti, viz. "May our donors flourish..." (Yājñavalkya I.245-46), etc. he should receive the blessings from them and then prostrate himself before them. According to his ability, he should offer Dakṣiṇā and the betel-leaves mixed with sweet scents.

75. He should then bring the vessel that had been placed with face downwards and repeat the Svadhā-kāra (the word Svadhā). With the ṛk Vāje vāje (RV.VII.38.8) etc. he should ritualistically dismiss the Pitṛs and Devas.

76. The performer of the Śrāddha and the partaker of the food thereat should avoid sexual intercourse that night. He should assiduously refrain from the study of the Vedas and undertaking a long journey on foot.

77. A wayfarer, a sick man and a person devoid of funds should perform Amāśrāddha (Śrāddha with uncooked rice). One whose wife cannot be touched (i.e. is in her monthly courses) shall perform Śrāddha through the offer of gold.

78. If funds are not available, or if the Brāhmaṇas are not available he should prepare the food alone. The wise man should then perform the Homa repeating the Sūkta belonging to the Pitṛs.

79. If one cannot afford the Havya offerings at all, he may offer grass unto the cows according to his ability. O Brāhamaṇa, as an alternative, let him take his bath and duly perform the Tarpaṇa rite with gingelly seeds.

80. Or he may go to a lonely forest and lament very loudly. The wise man should proclaim "I am indigent. I am a great sinner".

81. If a performer of Śrāddha does not perform the rite of Tarpaṇa for the Pitṛs, the next day that family will perish. He will incur the sin of Brāhmaṇa-slaughter.

82. O leading sage, those faithful persons who perform Śrāddha do become rich. Their line is never extinct.

83. Virtually, Viṣṇu has been worshipped by those who worship the pitṛs. If the Lord of the Universe is pleased, the deities are also pleased.

84. It is eternal Hari himself who manifests as the Pitṛs, deities, Gandharvas, Apsaras, Yakṣas, Siddhas, and human beings.

85. Hence, the person who performs the Śrāddha and he who partakes of it—everyone is Viṣṇu, the eternal Lord, from whom the entire universe including the mobile and immobile beings, has originated.

86. O Brāhmaṇa, whatever exists, what does not exist, the visible and the invisible—everything should be known as identical with Viṣṇu. There is nothing else other than that.

87. He is the being that supports the universe; He is the Ātman of all living beings. He comprises all beings in himself; He is unchanging and of incomparable nature. He is the Lord who partakes of Havya and Kavya.

88. Janārdana is the only Lord who can be called Parabrahman (the Supreme Brahman). The eternal Viṣṇu does everything himself and makes everyone do so.

89. Thus, O excellent sage, the excellent procedure of the Śrāddha rite has been narrated to you. The sins of those who perform it, perish instantaneously.

90. If any excellent Brāhmaṇa reads this with piety and devotional feelings at the time of Śrāddha, the Piṭṛs are delighted, his progeny flourishes.

CHAPTER TWENTYEIGHT

The Rite of Śrāddha

1. Śrāddha

This is an important topic as it forms an integral part of Hindu Dharma Śāstra. The belief in the after-death survival of deceased ancestors and their separate world (Pitṛ-loka) belongs to the Indo-Iranian period and as such is pre-Vedic (vide S.B.E. Vol.IV, p. 262 for the Iranian Fravarshis of Yima-Yama). Ancestor-worship for one's prosperity, continuation of one's race is as old as the Ṛg-Veda. It is not only NP. but several other Purāṇas deal with the ritual of śrāddha, e.g. AP.163.2-42, GP.I.210, KP.II.22.20-62, Pd.P. (Sṛṣṭi-Khaṇḍa) 9.140-186, VP.III.15.13-49, MP.17.12-60. Most of them prescribe practically the same procedure as given in the Gṛhya Sūtras and Smṛtis of Manu and Yājñavalkya. If the author of a Purāṇa follows a particular Sūtra, he prescribes the procedure of his Sūtra. For example, in the present case, the procedure of Śrāddha given in the NP. shows much resemblance to the details given in the Śrāddha Sūtra of Kātyāyana (which by the way has so much similarity with the procedure of Śrāddha given in the Yājñavalkya Smṛti).

We find that NP. and Kātyāyana use the same full mantras, tilo'si, yā divyā prescription of the repetition of the word madhu thrice (in addition to the Gāyatrī and Madhumatī verses) and recital of the following texts while the Brāhmaṇas are being fed :

The Gāyatrī (once or thrice), the five Rakṣoghnī verses (RV.IV.4.1-5); the Puruṣa Sūkta (RV. X.90), the Apratiratha hymns (RV.X.103.1-13), the Svadhā-vācana relates both to paternal and maternal ancestors (cf. *Yājñ. Smṛ.*I.244).

In addition to the blessing recorded in Yājñavalkya I.246-47, Kātyāyana requires the performer to pray for and receive from Brāhmaṇas the following blessings :

(i) "May the Pitṛs be not terrible to us and
(ii) May our family prosper.

The Mādhyandina Brāhmaṇas of Bengal follow Raghunandana's Yajurvedī-Śrāddha-tattva which is based on the Śrāddha-sūtra of Kātyāyana. Possibly the author of the NP. who prescribes the rules of Kātyāyana's Śrāddhasūtra might be an East Indian.

2. These restrictions are both on the invitee and the inviter. Kātyāyana prescribes that from the time of giving invitation by the performer of Śrāddha to the time of completion of the Śrāddha ritual marked by the final ācamana, Brāhmaṇas should remain pure, free from anger, hurry, negligence, should speak the truth, avoid journey, sexual intercourse, hard work, study the Veda and control speech and the Brâhmaṇas invited should observe the same rules (Śrāddha sūtra I) akrodhano'tvaro'mattaḥ satyavādī samāhitaḥ / bhāram maithunam adhvānaṁ śrāddhā-kṛd varjayed japam // compare also Mt.P.16-27-28. —KP.II.22.6.

3. The qualities and qualifications required of a Brāhmaṇa invitee for Śrāddha. Cf. Smṛ.C. (Smṛti Caṁdrikā) III (Śrāddha-Kāṇḍa) pp. 389-394. Mt.P. 16:8-10 state the same qualities as in NP. The ancient Smṛtis insist on the pure character and not so much on the scholarship of the invitee. As Manu says (II.118) "A Brāhmaṇa who knows only the Gāyatrī but is self-controlled, is preferable to a Brāhmaṇa who knows three Vedas but lacks in self-control, eats every thing and sells anything (prohibited by Dharma)". He insists on the close enquiry of the antecedents of such an invitee. Later Purāṇas slackened these restrictions.

4. Disqualifications of a Brāhmaṇa rendering him ineligible for invitation to Śrāddha: This is an echo of Manu III. 150-169. Manu's list of disqualified Brâhmaṇas is very comprehensive as it includes Ninety-three disqualifications. It includes physically defective or handicapped persons e.g. a person with deformed nails, black teeth or a squint-eye or a scabby person, an epileptic, a leper, a person with scrofulous swelling of gland, a blind man, a lunatic, an impotent or a consumptive person.

It excludes Brāhmaṇas of the following professions : a physician, a temple-priest, a vendor of meat, a shop-keeper, a paid servant (of a village or the king), a usurer, a tender of cattles, an actor or singer, a seller of Vedas and Smṛtis, a teacher of Śūdras, a navigator, an oilman a manufacturer of weapons, a trainer of animals, a bird fancier, an architect, a messenger, a falconer, a carrier of dead bodies. Brāhmaṇas with immoral character (such as a thief, gambler, a debauchee, etc.) Brāhmaṇas with good heredity were eligible but not socially unacceptable ones such as marrying before elder brothers or bastards like Kuṇḍas or Golakas. A reference to SC.III., pp. 394-403 will show how writers on Dharma Sūtras, Smṛtis and Purāṇas gave importance to the selection of Brāhmaṇas for a Śrāddha. As Manu puts it one may not put Brāhmaṇas to test for work pertaining to gods but in the case of Pitṛs (Śrāddha) one must be scrupulously careful (III. 149)—an opinion endorsed by most other writers on Dharma Śāstra.

5. brahmacārī, etc. 'The invited Brāhmaṇa should abstain from sexual intercourse, etc. Some Purāṇas (e.g. Mt.P. 16-20) and some Smṛtis (Prajâpati 63) state that the invited Brāhmaṇa should be requested with the traditional verse akrodhanaiḥ śaucaparaiḥ satatam brahmacāribhiḥ / bhavitavyam bhavadbhiś ca mayā ca Śrāddha-kāriṇā //

6. The procedure of invitation to Śrāddha as detailed in Mt. P. 16-17-20 is as follows :

The inviter should respectfully invite the Brâhmaṇas on the previous day or in the morning of the day of Śrāddha. He should (with darbha=grass in his hand) touch the right knee of the invitee and extend the invitation. SC—Śrāddha (p. 406) quotes Pd.P.Sṛṣṭi 9.85-88 which are the same as Mt.P.

7. Kāle Kutapa Saṁjñite : 'In the period of the day called Kutapa', Although

SC. (Śrāddha), p. 433 gives eight meanings of Kutapa, here 'The 8th muhūrta from the sunrise' is applicable. Its derivation is from Ku (bad, a sin)+tapa (that which burns). The muhūrta begins from five hours and thirty six minutes after the sun-rise. Prajāpati states that out of the fifteen muhūrtas comprising a day, Kutapa is the 8th and a Śrāddha should begin from the 8th muhūrta and should not extend beyond the Rauhiṇeya (12th) muhūra.

ārambhaṁ kutape kuryād rauhiṇaṁ na tu laṅghayet / etat pañca muhūrtā'ntaḥ śrāddha-kāla udāhṛtaḥ //

Prajāpati Smr. 158.

8. VV. 26-29 give decisions regarding the Tithi (lunar-day) acceptable for Śrāddha. When the particular Tithi is not full (covering the civil day) but spreads over two days, etc. (for discussion of Tithis vide the next chapter).

9. Verses repeated in Saura P. 19.13-14.

P.V. Kane states that two maṇḍalas are to be drawn in front of the performer's residence to receive the Brâhmaṇas. Of the two Maṇḍalas one should be on the northern side sloping towards the north for Brâhmaṇas representing devas and the second on the southern side sloping towards the south for Brâhmaṇas representing Pitṛs.

(H.D.IV. pp. 456-57).

10. There is nothing mystical here but application of the rules of SK. grammar : The use of genitive case : asmat-pitṛ-pitāmahaprapitāmahānām—idam āsanam / (This seat is for my father, grand-father, great-grand-father).

The use of the accusative case : pitṛ-pitāmahān āvāhayāmi (I invoke my father...great grand sire). RV.X.16.12 uses the same case wherein Agni is requested to invite the ancestors.

11. The use of the Dative case : pitre idaṁ arghyaṁ dattaṁ na mama / 'The Arghya is given to my father'...saying this the performer is to offer water mixed with sesamum seed on the palm of the invited Brâhmaṇa.

12. VV 46-51 describe what is technically known as agnau-karaṇa. When domestic sacrificial fires are not maintained (as is the case of majority of homes now-a-days), the right hand of the Brâhmaṇa is regarded as fire and the oblations are offered in his hand as if it is the sacrificial fire, with the mantras mentioned in these verses.

13. Though the translation follows the text tri-nāciketaṁ... (Japet), the term tri-nāciketa is variously explained : Tri-ṇāciketa is a person who knows the Nāciketa fire or a person who has thrice kindled the Nāciketa fire or a person who has studied the Anuvāka called virajas. Tait. Br. (III. 11.7-8) describes the Nāciketa fire and the story of Naciketas.

14. Tri-madhu—The three Vedic verses (RV.I.90.6-8; VS. 13-27-29, TS.IV. 2.9.3) in which the word madhu occurs three times.

15. Tri-Suparṇa—Haradatta applies the name to the three Anuvākas beginning with Brahmametu mām (*Tait. Ar.*X.48-50). Paitṛika hymns are RV. X.15.1-13.

There has been some difference of opinion about the texts to be recited : vide Pd. P. Sṛṣṭi 9.165-69 also Mt.P. 17.37-39.

CHAPTER TWENTYNINE

Determination of Tithis (Lunar days)

Sanaka said :

1. I shall recount how the Tithis[1] (lunar days) can be decisively fixed. I shall relate also the mode of expiation, O excellent sage, listen to that from which the holy rites, bear fruit.

2. O Brāhmaṇa, the Vratas, charitable gifts, etc. enjoined in the Śrutis or Smṛtis, nay all the other Vedic rites, do not bear fruits if performed on Tithis other than what have been fixed.

(Decision about tithis for observance of fasts)

3-4a. For the observance of a fast or undertaking a Vrata (religious vow), if the tithis (lunar days), viz. the eleventh, eighth, sixth, the Full Moon day, the fourteenth, the New Moon day and the third tithi are pierced (contacted) by the next tithi (lunar day) [that is the eleventh tithi spreads into the twelfth....the third lunar day into the fourth. etc.] they become commendable, but not so when they are combined with their (immediately) previous tithi[2] [as when Ekādaśī, the eleventh tithi is combined with the Daśami, the tenth tithi....the tṛtiyā, the third tithi with the second, etc.]

4b-5a. If the sixth tithi is 'pierced' by i.e. combined with the fifth tithi (nāga-viddhā)[3] or the seventh tithi is combined with the eighth and the tenth tithi is contacted by the eleventh, these days are never to be observed as fasts.

(Decisions about Śrāddha-tithis)

5b-6a. A person performing Śrāddha on the new Moon day, the Full Moon day, the seventh tithi when these are combined with their respective immediately preceding tithi, goes to hell.

6b-7a. Some, however, have stated that if in the dark half of the month, the seventh and the fourteenth tithis are contacted by their (respective) previous tithis, those (tithis) are commendable; the same is the case with the third and the ninth tithi (in the dark half) [for the performance of śrāddha.]

7b-8a. For all Vratas and similar undertakings, the bright half of the month is specially preferable and the first half of the day is superior to the second half of the day.

8b-9. If the particular tithi for the sake of vratas, etc. is not possible (available) in the first (full) half of the day (but is available for the first two muhūrtas immediately after the sunrise) that pair of muhūrtas should be accepted (for undertaking the Vrata). In the cases of Vratas special to night-time (e.g. (Śiva-rātri), the tithi which spreads the pradoṣa periods (i.e. 3 muhūrtas or two hours and twentyfour minutes after the sunset) should always be accepted.

10-11a. In the case of a Vrata (holy observance) where the combination of a particular tithi and a constellation is enjoined, the constellation is acceptable if the sun sets while the period of the constellation continues. And the tithi is acceptable if it spreads for a period of three muhūrtas (two hours and twentyfour minutes) after the sunset. Otherwise it won't yield the fruit (of the Vrata).

11b-12a. In the case of a Vrata based on (i.e. for which it is enjoined) a particular constellation, it is acceptable if the particular constellation and Tithi coexist upto the midnight.

12b-13a. If the (period of the) same constellation covers two midnights in the course of two (consecutive) days, the constellation whose combination with a particular tithi is enjoined (as in the case of Rohiṇī constellation and Aṣṭamī in Kṛṣṇa-Janmāṣṭamī) is meritorious (and hence suitable for the Vrata).

13b-14a. If both the (period of the) constellation and the tithi spread from midnight to midnight (and are available on both the midnights), the former is recommended if its duration is shorter and the latter if its duration is longer (the preference thus depends on the length of duration available of a particular tithi)

14b-15a. If the tithi in combination with the constellation extends over two midnights and there is neither increase or decrease (i.e. they are of equal duration on both the tithis), then both former as well as the latter is acceptable.

15b-16a. The combinations of the constellation Jyeṣṭhā with Mūla, of Rohiṇī with the constellation Kṛttikā and that of Anurādhā with Jyeṣṭhā are destructive of progeny.

16b-17a. If the Vratas are to be performed during the day-time, the tithis should be auspicious. In case of all rites to be performed at night (e.g. Śiva-rātri) the combination for that period of night is of special importance.

17b-18a. That Vrata (religious observance) should be performed on that Tithi which is glorified as meritorious (for that Vrata) due to the combination of the particular tithi and constellation. That particular Vrata must be performed on that very tithi by clever persons.

18b. In the case of the Vrata called Śravaṇa Dvādaśi (also called Vāmana dvādaśi) in the bright half of Bhādrapada) it must have the combination at the time of the sun-rise.

Puṇyakāla (Auspicious period) re : eclipses and Saṅkrama (Transit of the Sun).

19-20a. The whole duration of the eclipse of the sun and the moon should be taken as Puṇyakāla (Auspicious period) for Japa, etc. The Puṇyakāla in all the Saṅkrāntis (transit of the sun) is being recounted. The benefit is inexhaustable in the case of those who perform ablutions, charitable gifts, Japas, etc. during this period.

20b-21a. The Karkaṭaka Saṅkrama (the transit to the zodiac of Cancer) is called the Saṅkrama (transit) of Dakṣiṇāyana [The winter solstice when the sun appears to move from the north to the south.] Learned men know that the Puṇyakāla starts thirty Ghaṭikās (i.e. 12 hours) before (the actual transit).

21b-22a. In the case of the Saṅkramas (transits) to the zodiacal signs of Vṛṣabha (Taurus), Vṛścika (Scorpio), Siṁha (Leo) and Kumbha (Aquarius), eight Muhūrtas previous (to the actual transit) are acceptable for ablution, Japa, etc.

22b-23a. In the case of the transit to Tulā (Libra) and Meṣa (Aries), ten Ghaṭikās both before and after should be known as conducive to the imperishability of what is given as gift.

23b-24a. O Brāhmaṇa, in the case of the transits to Kanyā (Virgo) Mithuna (Gemini), Mīna (Pisces) and Dhanus (Sagittarius) sixteen Ghaṭikās after (the transit) should be known as bestowing merit.

24b-25a. They say that the transit to Makara (Capricornus) is Uttarāyaṇa (the summer solstice marking northward movement of the sun). Here, forty ghaṭikās before and thirty ghaṭikās after (the transit) are auspicious.

25b-26a. If the sun and the moon set during their respective eclipses, O leading Brāhmaṇa, he must see the clear sphere the next day, take his bath and only then can he take food.

26b-27a. Amāvāsyā (New Moon) is said to be of two kinds by scholars desirous of acquiring piety. (1) Sinīvālī when the moon is slightly visible (i.e. amāvāsyā is mixed up with its previous—14th-tithi) and (2) Kuhū when the moon is entirely invisible (i.e. when Amāvāsyā is mixed with the first tithi of the next first night).

27b-28a. Sinīvālī should be accepted by the Brāhmaṇas who maintain their sacrificial fires, for the purpose of the Śrāddha rite, while Kuhū is to be accepted by women, Śūdras and the Brāhmaṇas who do not maintain sacrificial fires.

28b.-29a. If the tithi of Amāvāsyā (the New Moon day) spreads over two afternoons, the former is accepted if its duration is short and the latter, if its duration is longer on that day.

29b-30a. If the New Moon day (Amāvāsyā) is found to begin from the mid-day only, it is known as Bhūta-viddhā (pierced or contacted by the fourteenth-caturdaśi-tithi.)

30b-31a. If there is absolute loss of the tithi (i.e. when it is not available for the purpose Śrāddha as it is not available either in the afternoon on the first day nor does it reach the post-midday period the next day), the 'sinīvālī' which spreads over the evening upto sunset (i.e. sāyāhna) should be accepted.

31b-32a. If the tithi is available for a short duration but extends upto the sunset (and as such is sāyāhna-vyāpinī) the sinīvālī on the next day is always acceptable for performance of Śrāddha.

32b-33a. If the tithi is extremely extended (i.e. it is available for the after-noon period for both consecutive days), the amāvāsyā which is 'pierced' or contacted by Caturdaśī should be avoided.

In rites connected with manes (pitṛs), Kuhū type of Amāvāsyā if available in the after-noon should be accepted.

33b-34a. Just as in the case of Amāvāsyā which is slightly extending, the Amāvāsyā connected with the Caturdaśī is to be rejected and the Kuhū extending over the after-noon of the next day is to be accepted (for Śrāddha) by eminent scholars (or wise men).

34b-35a. If the new moon day spreads over two mid-days, either the former or the latter day be accepted for Śrāddha, according to one's wish.

(Decisions about the tithi for performance of Iṣṭis)

35b-36a. Now I shall explain (the decision of tithis) regarding Anvādhāna (depositing fuel of sacred sticks on the sacrificial fire. This precedes the day on which Iṣṭi is to be performed) when the Parvan (the day of the new or full moon, the days of opposition or conjunction) are fully available. The Yāga (Iṣṭi-fortnightly sacrifice) be performed on the prati-pad (the first tithi), O excellent sage.

36b-37a. If one (last) quarter of the parvan day and the first three parts of the Pratipad are available, the morning time is said to be proper for performing the sacrifice according to the learned ones.

37b-38. If the New Moon day or the Full Moon day spread over the two (consecutive) mid-days, the second day is regarded as the day for performing anvādhāna and iṣṭi (such combination of anvādhāna and iṣṭi on the same day is called sadyaḥ kāla).

39. If the previous two continue after the saṅgava[4] part of the day (from six to twelve ghaṭis after the sunrise) on the next day, the sadyaḥ kāla shall be on the next day. The same holds good when there is 'loss' (kṣaya) of the tithi (i.e. unavailability of the proper time of the Tithi, for performance of the rite).

(Decisions about the observance of Ekādaśi vrata)

40. All should accept the Ekādaśi[5] (the eleventh) tithi (for observance of fast) if it is not connected with Daśamī. If it is combined with the Daśami, (tenth) tithi (the observance of fast on such contaminated Ekādaśi) destroys the merit accumulated during the last three births.[6]

41. If Ekādaśi is known to be present for the duration of a Kalā on the Dvādaśī day and if Dvādaśi is present in Trayodaśi, the latter one (i.e. Dvādaśī) is remembered (as acceptable) for fasting.

42. In case pure[7] and perfect Ekādaśī is known (to be present) in Dvādaśī also and Trayodaśī is only at the end of the night, I shall tell you my decision in the matter.

43. The earlier Ekādaśī is to be accepted by householders and the latter one by ascetics, since, householders wish for Siddhi (or prosperity) and the prominent ascetics wish for salvation.

44. If the tithi called Ekādaśī is pierced by (i.e. touched by) the Daśamī (tenth) day, fast should be observed on that (viddha) Ekādaśī, if a duration of one Kalā is available for Pāraṇā on the Dvādaśī day.

45. Whether in the bright half or in the dark half, if the Ekādaśī tithi falls on two days, the householders should follow the earlier one and the ascetics the latter one.

46. If the Ekādaśī day is slightly mixed with by Daśamī but extends to (or is spread over) in Dvādaśī, (and thus there is dina-kṣaya), the second Ekādaśī only is prescribed for all (i.e. householders and ascetics).

47. If there is no subsequent Dvādaśī, the Ekādaśī is acceptable even if it is mixed (with Daśamī). If there is subsequent Dvādaśī even the unmixed Ekādaśī is forbidden.

48. If it happens like this, viz.—Ekādaśī is overlapped by Dvādaśī and at the close of the night there is Trayodaśī, the merit acquired is that of twelve Dvādaśīs, should the fast be broken on the Trayodaśī day.

49-50. In the following case, viz.—There is Ekādaśī on the day of Dvādaśī for the duration of a Kalā and it is doubtful whether there is Dvādaśī on the Trayodaśī day—the earlier Ekādaśī even if it is mixed should be acceptable to householders. The latter one is to be accepted by ascetics and Avirās (i.e. women without sons and husbands).

51. The whole of the Ekādaśī is pure, (i.e. extending from sunrise to sunset). It does not overlap on Dvādaśī. But Dvādaśī overlaps Trayodaśī what should be done then?

52. The earlier one should be utilized by householders for the observance and the latter tithi by the ascetics. Some opine that the second day should also be used for fasting devoutly.

53-54. When the Viddhā (pierced) Ekādaśī is not known (to be present) on the Dvādaśī day; but Dvādaśī spreads into Trayodaśī—in these circumstances. Others say that the pure Dvādaśī is to be undoubtedly used for observance of fast by all. Some say that the previous one must be used for fast. Their opinion is not logically tenable.

55. A householder who has sons should not observe fast or break one during Saṅkrānti that falls on a Sunday or during the solar and lunar eclipses due to Rāhu (or is gaṇita-gamya i.e. astronomically present).

56. If one takes food on a Sunday at day and parvan days at night, on the eighth and the fourteenth days during the day time, or either during the day or during the night on the Ekādaśi day he should perform the expiatory penance called Cāndrāyaṇa.

57. On the day of the solar eclipse one shall not take food for three yāmas (1 yāma = 3 hours) before the eclipse. If he takes food, he will be on a par with the liquor-addict.

58. O excellent sage, if there is an eclipse of the Sun or the Moon in between Anvādhāna and Iṣṭi (which is on the subsequent day), expiation should be performed by the performers of Yajñas.

59. During the lunar eclipse they should perform Homa repeating the ṚK Daśame soma etc. or Āpyāyasva (RV.I.19.16, IX.31.4, VS.12.11.2, TS. 3.2.5.3 (RV.I.21.3) etc. or Somapāste, etc. O Brāhmaṇa.

60. Three mantras are cited for the performance of Homa during the solar eclipse—Viz. Udu tyam Jātavedasam (RV. I.50.1. AV.XIII.2.16, VS.VII.41) etc. or Āsatyena TS.III. 4-11-2 (RV.I.35.2) etc. or Udvayaṁ tamasaḥ (RV.I.50,.10, VS XX.21), etc.

61. The benefit shall be inexhaustible to that scholarly person who performs Vratas, etc. after deciding the Tithi as laid down in the path of Smṛtis.

62. Dharma is that which is enjoined in the Vedas. Keśava is delighted through Dharmas (holy rites). Hence, those who are devoted to the Dharmas attain that greatest region of Viṣṇu.

63. Those who wish to perform holy rites are indeed ones whose form is identical with that of Kṛṣṇa. Hence, the sickness of worldly existence never harasses them."

CHAPTER TWENTYNINE

Determination of Tithis

1. Tithi is the time or period required by the moon to gain twelve degrees on the sun to the east. As the motion of the moon is irregular, it takes some times 60 ghaṭikās, some-times more upto 65 ghaṭikās and some times less upto about 54 ghaṭikās. Since Kane wrote this in HD. IV. p. 68, there has been some change in opinion which holds Saptavṛddhir daśa Kṣayaḥ i. e. the maximum ghaṭikās of a tithi are 60+7=67 and the minimum 60−10=50 ghaṭikās. It is obvious that a tithi is not co-terminus with a "civil day". Hence the need to determine tithis exactly, as every Vedic or Smārta rite or Vrata must be begun and observed on the exact Time or Tithi. Otherwise, it becomes fruitless (vide the next verse).

Tithis are either Pūrṇā (complete or of 60 full ghaṭikās) or Sakhaṇḍā (mutilated or broken) Sakhaṇḍa tithis are either Śuddhā (extending from sunrise to sunset or in the case of Śivarātri extending to midnight) or Viddhā (pierced i.e. intermixed or contacted by another tithi). This intermixture or Vedha is of two kinds : morning—Vedha when six ghaṭikās after the Sun rise a tithi becomes merged with the next Tithi, while evening-Vedha generally occurs when a Tithi contacts another Tithi six ghaṭikās (or more) before the Sunset.

The knowledge of these technical terms is taken for granted by the author of the NP.

The discussion is essential, as Kāla or time prescribed for an act is a point or occasion (nimitta) and must be seized for gaining the fruit of the act.

2. This is technically known as yugma-vākya. AP.175.36-37, GPI.12 B.16-17. and CC on Kāla p. 67 give the approved and disapproved pairs of such contacted tithis in technical terms. NP. is more plain. According to the principle of yugma-vākya, the following combinations of tithis are favourable, viz. of the 2nd and 3rd tithi, of the 4th and 5th, of the 6th and 7th, of the 8th and 9th, of the 11th and 12th, of the 14th and the Paurṇimā (the Full Moon day), of the Amāvāsyā (The New moon day), with the next 1st tithi. The reverse i.e. the combination of other tithis e.g. when the Ekādaśī is combined with the Daśamī or the examples given in the next verse(s), these are not recommended for fast or Vrata.

Here two terms are used : When a tithi is combined with the previous tithi or 'pierced' by the previous tithi it is purva-viddhā (e.g. the 6th with the 5th) and when contacted or 'pierced' by the next tithi (e.g. (the 6th tithi combined with the 7th tithi), it is para-viddhā.

3. These works on Astronomy-cum-Astrology use the following terms to symbolize the following numbers e.g. yugma=two, Agni=three, Yuga=four, Nāga=five, muni=seven, Rudra=eleven, etc.

4. In the Vedic period a day was divided into five parts : Prātaḥ, Saṅgava, madhyāhna or madhyandina, aparāhṇa and sāyāhna or astamaya (*Śat.Br.*II.3.2.9; RV.V.76.3 for the 1st three parts). Roughly each part gets six ghaṭikas (starting from the Sun-rise). Hence saṅgava is a period from six to twelve ghaṭikas after the Sun-rise.

5. This is one of the most important Vratas and in addition to the discussion of this Vrata in Purāṇas, we have extensive discussion of this Vrata in medieval digests like CC Kāla (pp. 145-288), Mādhava's Kāla-nirṇaya (pp. 233-75), Vratarāja (pp. 361-475) and independent works like Raghunandana's Ekādaśī-tattva. NP. has devoted a number of chapters on this Vrata vide the story of Rukmāṅgada from Ch. 2 ff in the II part. Here the Tithi-nirṇaya or decisions on the day on which the fast should be observed are given. These have special importance as the NP., being a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa, decides for Vaiṣṇavas, the day on which the Ekādaśi should be observed (as under certain conditions they are advised to observe fast on the Dvādaśi day in the name of Ekādaśī), Moreover, these decisions are found to be observed in the Vaiṣṇavas of Bengal indicating the probable region of the author of the NP.

6. GP.I.125.2 states that the combination of Daśamī with Ekādaśī should be avoided for fasting as Gāndhārī lost all her hundred sons by observing such a fast :

Daśamyekādaśī-viddhā Gāndhāryā sumupoṣitā /
tasyāḥ putraśataṁ naṣṭam tasmāt tāṁ parivarjayet //

I think it is due to yugma-vākya (as explained previously)that this combination of Daśamī and Ekādaśī is not approved. Vaiṣṇavas would prefer fasting on the Dvādaśī day even if one Kalā of Ekādaśī is available at Sun-rise and the rest is a Dvādaśī day.

7. Śuddhā—from Sunrise to Sunset.

CHAPTER THIRTY

The Mode of Expiation

Sanaka said :

1. O Nārada, I shall now explain the rules regarding the expiatory rites.[1] Listen. One who has purified his soul by means of expiatory rites shall attain the benefit of all holy observances.

2. O sage, all the rites performed by those who are devoid of (i.e. do not perform) expiatory rites are said to be futile. They are resorted to by Rākṣasas.

3. Brāhmaṇas must be consulted about Dharma by those who are desirous of the benefits of all dharmas, are devoid of lust and fury and are experts in the scriptures on Dharma.

4. O leading Brāhmaṇa, the expiatory rites performed by those who are averse to Nārāyaṇa do not sanctify the people even as the rivers cannot purify the pot of wine.

Prāyaścittas for Mahā-Pātakas

5. These are the five great sinners[2] — the slayer of a Brāhmaṇa, the wine addict, the thief, the defiler of the preceptor's bed and those who associate with any or all of these sinners.

6. If any one associates oneself with them by sharing their beds, seats or foodstuffs for a year, he shall be known as Patita (a fallen man) in regard to all holy rites.

7. If anyone slays a Brāhmaṇa unknowingly,[3] he should wear bark garments and matted hair. He should also hold the skull of the Brāhmaṇa killed by him.

8. If that skull, or any other article belonging to this man is not available, he should roam the forest holding up that material on a staff like a banner displaying his crime.

9. He should take to things available in the forest for his diet. He should stay there on limited diet for one time per day. He should take bath thrice a day and perform Sandhyā rite duly.

10. He should give up study and teaching of the Vedas, but should all the time remember Hari. He should observe the vow of continuous celibacy and avoid wearing scented garlands, etc.

11. He should visit and stay at holy places and sacred hermitages. If he cannot maintain himself by means of the articles available in forests, he should beg for alms in the villages.

12. He should perform the expiatory rite thus for twelve years and be devoted to Hari. The slayer of a Brāhmaṇa then attains purity and becomes worthy of and eligible to perform holy rites.

13-14. The slayer of a Brāhmaṇa should perform any of the following rites and attain purity : viz. should he be killed by animals or die due to ailments while observing the expiatory penance, he attains purity. Or he should sacrifice his life to save a cow or a Brāhmaṇa or make a gift of ten thousand excellent cows to leading Brāhmaṇas.

15. On killing a kṣatriya who has been consecrated (for the performance of sacrifices, etc.[4]), the sinner should perform the expiatory rite of a Brāhmaṇa-slayer, or enter the funeral pyre or jump off a lofty cliff.

16. On killing a Brāhmaṇa who has been so consecreted, the sinner should perform twice the expiatory rites. In the event of killing a preceptor and others, the expiatory rites cited are four times the former.

17. On killing an ordinary Brāhmaṇa (by birth only who has not studied the Vedas, etc.), he should perform the expiatory rite for one year. O Brāhmaṇa, thus the mode of expiation for killing a Brāhmaṇa has been stated.

18. The expiation for a Kṣatriya is twice this and that for a Vaiśya is thrice : Learned men know that the Śūdra who kills a Brāhmaṇa is to be pounded to death with a club.

19. The decision in the scriptural texts is this that this punishment is to be meted out by the king himself. If Brāhmaṇa women are killed, half the expiation is to be performed and one-fourth in the case of the slaying of a girl.

20-23a. By killing a Brāhmaṇa boy not invested with the sacred thread, one should perform one-fourth of the expiatory rite. A Brāhmaṇa who kills a Kṣatriya should perform the Kṛcchra[5] penance for six years, for three years if it is a Vaiśya who is killed and for one year if a Śūdra is killed. On killing the wife of a consecrated one, a Brāhmaṇa woman, he should perform the expiatory rite for Brāhmaṇa-slaughter for eight years. He should certainly become pure. O excellent sage, the expiatory penance enjoined on old men, sick men, women and children in all cases is said to be half as related by learned men.

Expiatory rites for wine-drinking[6]

23b-24a. Wine (spirituous liquor) is of three kinds, Gauḍī (that which is prepared from molasses), Paiṣṭī (that which is prepared from grain meal) and Mādhvī (that which is prepared from honey). O Nārada, this should not be drunk by any of the four castes as well as by women, O Nārada.

24b-26. O sage, he should take bath and remain pure wearing the wet clothes. Remembering Nārāyaṇa, he should make one of these, viz., milk, ghee or cow's urine resemble red-hot iron and drink the liquid then. Then he should pour it into any metallic vessel, iron or copper, and drink it like water and meet death.

27a. It is by this that a wine-addict gets purified. There is no other way of purification.

27b-28a. A Brāhmaṇa who drinks wine due to inadvertence or deliberately (due to the belief that it is for his own good) should perform penance enjoined for Brāhmaṇa-murder with the difference that the exhibition of a skull on a staff and such symbols of Brahmahatyā should be absent.

28b-29a. If a Brāhmaṇa drinks liquor as an antidote for some ailment, he should undergo the rite of investiture with the sacred thread[7] once again. Moreover, he should perform two cāndrāyaṇa penances.

29b-30a. They say that any vessel which comes into contact with the spirituous liquor (is also defiled). Even if water is taken from the liquor pot it is on a par with drinking of liquor. So is the eating of camphor.

30b-31. Spirituous liquor is of eleven varieties, viz. Tāla, (extracted from palmyra), Pānasa (taken from the jack fruit), (Drākṣa (prepared from grapes), Khārjūra-sambhava (prepared from date fruits), Āriṣṭa (fermented liquor), Mādhuka (prepared from honey), Maireya (specially concocted from Ariṣṭa and Surā), Nālikeraja (prepared from coconut palm), Gauḍī prepared from molasses), Mādhvī (prepared from honey) and Surā (prepared from grain meal).

32-33a. No Brāhmaṇa should at any time drink any of these spirituous liquors. If any Brāhmaṇa drinks any of these due to ignorance, he is to be invested with the sacred thread once again. He should perform the expiatory penance called Tapta-Kṛcchra.[8]

(Theft) :

33b-34a. Whether directly or indirectly whether forcibly or clandestinely, the (illegal) taking of other people's wealth is called Steya (theft) by learned men.

34b-35a The magnitude or (the scale of the weight) of gold has been specified by Manu and others. O leading Brāhmaṇa listen. I shall detail it which is the means of relating it to the mode of expiation.

35b-36. The dust particle that is seen in the middle of the beam of the sun coming through the window is called the magnitude of Trasareṇu by learned men.[9] Eight Trasareṇus make one Niṣka. Three such Niṣkas make one Rājasarṣapa.

37-38a. Three Rājasarṣapas make one Gaurasarṣapa. Six Gaurasarṣapas make what is called Yava. Three Yavas make one Kṛṣṇala and five Kṛṣṇalas make one Māṣa. O Nārada, sixteen Māṣas shall make the mass of one Suvarṇa.

38b-39a. If out of ignorance one steals the wealth of a Brāhmaṇa, one should perform Brahma-hatyā expiatory penance without the skull on the staff as the banner (symbol of Brahmahatyā).

39b-40a. On stealing the gold of preceptors, performers of Yajñas and pious Brāhmaṇas well-versed in the Vedas, the expiatory rite is as follows:

40b-41a. He should repent and apply ghee all over his body. He should then cover himself with dried cowdung (and get himself scorched by fire). If he is thus burned he is liberated from the sin of theft.

41b-42a. If a Kṣatriya steals the wealth of a Brāhmaṇa, he should repent for it and return it to the owner. Listen to its procedure from me.

42b-43a. He should perform the expiatory penance called Sāntapana and observe fast for twelve days. O celestial sage, he shall then attain purity, otherwise he will become fallen.

43b-44a. Half the expiation is enjoined in the case of thefts of articles resembling gold, viz : jewels, seats, men (servants), womenfolk, cows, plots of lands, etc.

44b-45. A man who steals gold equal to a Trasareṇu should perform two Prāṇāyāmas duly.[10] He thereby becomes pure. On stealing gold of the size of a Niṣka he should perform three Prāṇāyāmas.

46-47a. For stealing gold of the size of a Rājasarṣapa, he should perform four Prāṇāyāmas. On stealing gold of the size of Gaurasarṣapa the shrewd man should take bath and duly perform the Japa of a thousand and eight Gāyatris.

47b-48a. On stealing gold of the size of a Yava, the sinner should begin to perform the Japa of Vedic mother (i.e. Gāyatrī) in the morning and continue it till the evening. The Brāhmaṇa sinner should then be purified.

48b. On stealing gold of the size of Kṛṣnala, he should perform the expiatory rite of Sāntapana.

49. The expiation for the theft of gold of the size of a Māṣa is now enjoined. He should regularly eat barley cooked in cow's urine. He will be purified of his sin in a year.

50. O leading sage, on stealing gold of the complete size of Suvarṇa, he should perform the Brahma-hatyā expiatory rite with great attention for twelve years.

51. If the act of stealing silver is of a quantity less than a Suvarṇa magnitude,[11] the sinner should duly perform the expiatory penance called Sāntapana. Otherwise, he shall be fallen.

52. O sage, a person who knowingly steals between four and ten Niṣkas of silver should perform the Cāndrāyaṇa penance.

53. If any one steals silver of the size ranging from ten to hundred Niṣkas, two Cāndrāyaṇas constitute the expiation for his sin.

54. Between a hundred and a thousand Niṣkas, he should perform three Cāndrāyaṇas. If the stolen quantity exceeds a thousand Niṣkas he should perform Brahmahatyā expiatory penance.

55. If the stolen quantity is upto a thousand Niṣkas and the material is mainly bell-metal, iron or load stones, the expiatory rite is stated to be Parāka.[12]

56. In the case of theft of jewels, the expiation is the same as that of silver. Now the expiatory penance of persons who defile the preceptors' bed is being stated.

Adultery

57. If due to inadvertence one cohabits with one's mother or her co-wife one should cut off one's own testicles proclaiming one's own sin[13].

58. He should hold the testicle in his hand and proceed towards the South west. While going, he should never consider what is pleasant or what is miserable.

59. He should go ahead without seeing the other persons who go about here and there. He who walks thus till death becomes purified. Or he should fall from a promontory proclaiming his own sin.

60. On cohabiting with a woman of a higher caste unthinkingly the sinner should with great attention perform Brahma-hatyā expiatory rite for twelve years.

61. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, either unthinkingly or as a regular practice if one cohabits with a woman of his own caste or a higher caste one attains purity on being burned in the fire of dried cow dung balls.

62. If after the sexual intercourse with his mother, the sinner withdraws before the discharge of the semen virile, he should perform the Brahmahatyā expiatory rite. If he discharges the semen virile, he should burn himself in the fire.

63. If any one withdraws before the discharge of semen virile in a woman of his own caste or of a higher caste he should perform Brahmahatyā expiatory rite for nine years and be devoted to Viṣṇu.

64. If one cohabits with the Vaiśya wife of one's own father, one should perform the expiatory rite for six years. On cohabiting with the Śūdra wife of the preceptor, one should perform the expiatory rite for three years.

65-66. If due to infatuation one is deluded and cohabits with mother's sister, father's sister, preceptor's wife, wife of the father-in-law, paternal uncle's wife, maternal uncle's wife or one's own daughter, he should duly perform the Brahmahatyā expiatory rite if the sin continues for two days; if the sin is committed for many times on a single day, the expiatory rite should be performed for three years.

67. If the sin is committed only for once, he becomes purified after performing the rite of expiation for a year; if the sin is committed for three days, he should become pure only if he is burnt in fire and not otherwise.

68-69. He who passionately cohabits with a Cāṇḍāla or Puṣkasa woman, daughter-in-law, sister, friends' wife, or disciple's wife, should perform Brahma-hatyā expiatory rite for six years, O leading sage. He who cohabits without passion should perform Kṛcchra rite for a year.

Expiation for Associates of great sinners

70. The expiatory rite for associating with great sinners is being mentioned.[14] A person whose soul is sanctified, thanks to the expiatory rite, should attain the benefit of all religious rites.

71. Persons who associate with the great sinners have to perform the respective expiatory rites of those sinners, to be undoubtedly free from those impurities.

72. He who associates with these unknowingly for five days, should perform physical Kṛcchra rite. Otherwise, he becomes fallen.

73. If the association lasts for twelve days, the expiatory penance called Mahā-sāntapana must be performed. If the association continues for half a month he should observe fast for twelve days.

74. If the association lasts for a month the expiatory rite is Parāka and if the association is for three months the rite of Cāndrāyaṇa has to be performed. If the association is for six months, two Cāndrāyaṇa penances are to be performed.

75. If the association lasts for a period slightly less than a year he should perform the expiatory rite for six months. All these expiatory rites are to be performed three times if the association is knowingly pursued.

Expiation for Miscellaneous sins

76-77. If a Brāhmaṇa kills a frog, a mongoose, a crow, a boar, a rat, a cat, a goat, a sheep, a dog or a fowl, he should perform the rite of half a Kṛcchra.[15] The slayer of a horse should perform Atikṛcchra rite. In the event of killing an elephant he should perform Taptakṛcchra expiation and Parāka if he kills a cow.

78a. No mode of purification is enjoined by learned men in the event of wanton killing of a cow.

Minor sins

78b-82. If any beverage, quilt, seat, flowers, fruits, roots or foodstuffs and edibles are stolen the atonement is through Pañcagavya. If dried wood, grass, trees, jaggery, hides, garments and meat are stolen, he should fast for three nights. On killing any of these, viz.—the sparrow, the ruddy goose, the swan, the Kāraṇḍava bird, owl, crane, dove, webfoot, parrot, blue jay, white crane, the Gangetic porpoise or the tortoise, the sinner should abstain from food for twelve days. If semen virile, feces or urine is taken in, Prājāpatya rite is to be performed.

83-84. Three Cāndrāyaṇas are enjoined (as expiatory rites) in the event of taking in the leavings of the Śūdra's food. On touching a woman in her menses, a Cāṇḍāla, a great sinner, a woman recently delivered of a child, a fallen fellow, a man defiled by Ucchiṣṭa (left-over of eaten food) or a washerman and others one should take bath along with the clothes one is clad in. He should take in ghee also.

85-86a. O Brāhmaṇa, the man of purified soul should perform the Japa of Gāyatri Mantra one hundred and eight times. On touching any of the above-mentioned persons unwittingly at the time of taking food, one should observe fast for three nights and take in Pañcagavya. He should then be purified, O Nārada.

86b-87. If at the time of ablution, charitable gifts, Japas, Bhojana (meal), etc., if anyone hears the voice of anyone of these or talks to any of them, he should vomit the food taken in. He should take bath again and observe fast.

88-89a. O Nārada, he should take in ghee on the next day after which he shall attain purity. If in the midst of holy rites, even the sound of these is heard, he should perform the Japa of the Gāyatri Mantra, a thousand and eight times.

89b-90a. Censuring Brāhmaṇas and the deities is the vilest of all sins. O Nārada, no expiation for this is found in any scripture.

90b-91a. In the case of those sins mentioned by the learned ones to be on a par with great sins, one should duly perform expiatory rites.

91b-92a. If anyone performs the expiatory rites with devotional feelings to Nārāyaṇa, all his sins perish. Otherwise, he shall be a fallen fellow.

92b-94a. A person who is free from passions, etc. and is endowed with (i.e. fully feels) repentance and is possessed of mercy and kindness to all beings and is alertly devoted to the remembrance of Viṣṇu, he is absolved of all sins whether he is defiled by great sins or by all sins, as he is devoted to Viṣṇu.

94b-95a. He who remembers Nārāyaṇa devoid of beginning and end, the man who remembers the embodiment of the universe and free from ailments, is liberated from crores of sins.

95b-96a. On being remembered, worshipped, meditated upon or bowed to, Viṣṇu who is stationed in the hearts of the good, does destroy all sins.

98-101a. O Brāhmaṇa, his attainment of heavenly pleasures and the like can be inferred. O leading sage, rarely indeed is human birth obtained. There too, the devotion to Hari is said to be rarer still. Hence, after attaining the rare human birth, as fleeting and transitory as the streak of lightening, one must devoutly worship Hari who liberates the Paśus (individual Souls) from bondage. All the obstacles perish; purity of the mind is generated and salvation is achieved when Janārdana is worshipped.

101b-102a. The eternal Puruṣārthas (aims of life), viz., virtue, wealth, love and liberation are realized by those who are devoted to Hari's worship. There is no doubt about this.

102b-103a. O ye men ! Do not be arrogant after attaining the human existence consisting of fickle entities namely, sons, wives, houses, fields, wealth and grain.

103b-104. Eschew your lust and fury, greed and delusion, inebriety and slandering and censure. Cherish the pious feelings towards Hari. Leave off all your activities and worship Janārdana.

105-106. The trees in the city of Kṛtānta (god of Death) are seen close at hand. As long as death does not overtake one, so long as old age has not come, even before the sense organs become incapacitated, one should worship Hari. No sane man should put any faith in the body that is of a perishing nature.

107. Death is ever near; riches are too unsteady and fickle and the death of the body is imminent. Hence, leave off pride and arrogance.

108. All unions end in separation; everything is transitory and transient. Knowing this, O blessed one, worship Janârdana.

109-110a. One only increases one's miseries by hopes. Liberation is too rare and inaccessible. Even the great sinner who worships Viṣṇu with devotion attains the greatest abode on reaching which none is subjected to affliction.

110b-111a. O excellent one, all holy centres, all sacrifices (Yajñas), and the Vedas with their ancillary subjects are not worth even a sixteenth part of the worship of Nārâyaṇa.

111b-112. If people are devoid of devotion to Viṣṇu, of what use are the Vedas, scriptures, sacrifices and pilgrimages to holy centres. Of what avail are austerities and holy rites?

113. Those men who worship Viṣṇu of infinite forms, comprehensible through Vedântas, attain the region of Acyuta. Those who see the excellent deity as pervasive as the firmament, who is the plysician that cures the illness of worldly existence, attain the region of Acyuta.

114. On remembering the primordial Ātman who possesses infinite power, who is the support of Universe, who is worthy of being worshipped by Devas, whose form is brilliant and who is called Acyuta, a man attains to his true friend.

CHAPTER THIRTY

Mode of Expiation

1. The term prāyaścitta is variously derived but most digest-writers and commentators of Dharma-Śāstra regard it a combination of prāyas (Penance)+ citta (Resolve). Plainly it means "A resolve to undergo penance" (in the belief that it will absolve one of sins). Hemādri thinks that the term cannotes a special act in atonement of sin (prāyaścittaśabdaḥ pāpakṣayārthe naimittike karmaviśeṣe vartate | CC—Prāyaścitta, p. 989). Bālambhaṭṭī on Yājñ. Smṛ. III. 206 regards Prāyaḥ (a sin)+citta (purification) and quotes an authority to support the view that prāyaścitta is purification from sins :

prāyaḥ pāpaṁ vinirdiṣṭaṁ cittaṁ tasya viśodhanam |

The NP. regards faith in Nārāyaṇa as the condition precedent, without which all expiatory acts will be futile (see V. 4).

2. Sins are classified in three categories (1) Mahā-pātakas (Great sins), (2) Ati-pātakas (Super-sins) and (3) Upa-pātakas (minor sins). This verse enumerates the mahā-pātakas. It is worth noting that wine drinking is a 'great sin' and association with the sinners is also a great sin.

The general expiation for these mahā-pātakas requires the following penance : (1) Three baths per day; (2) stay in a thatched cottage alone in a forest; (3) sleep on bare ground; (4) subsistence on roots, fruits and leaves (5) eating only once a day; (6) if the sinner enters a village for begging, he should proclaim his sin.

This penance is to be practised for twelve years.

—Śaṅkha Smṛ. 17-1-3; cf. NP. vv 7-12 below.

3. VV. 7-17 deal mainly with the homicide of a Brāhmaṇa. The act can be expiated if done unknowingly. VV 7-12 refer to slaying a Brāhmaṇa whose death affects the continuity of the Vedic lore. For killing an ordinary Brāhmaṇa, the expiation is for one year only, i.e. 1/12 of the expiation of killing a knower of a Veda. This is the precaution taken by the society, to preserve our literary and cultural tradition by prescribing a deterrent punishment. Dharma Sūtras of Gautama, Āpastamba, Viṣṇu and Smṛtis of Manu (XI.72-82), Yājñavalkya (III.243-50) and AP. 169.1.4, 173. 7-8 prescribe practically the same type of penances for slaying a Brāhmaṇa and cover the penances given in the NP., though he (Manu) gives some other penances as well.

4. It is noteworthy that a Kṣattriya who has been consecrated for performance of a sacrifice is equated with a Brāhmaṇa.

5. Kṛcchra—

A kind of penance, for details vide Yājñavalkya Smṛti, Prāyaścitta Adhyāya.

6. VV. 23b—33a deal with the expiations for the second Mahāpāpa—wine-drinking. The varieties of wines are detailed in Verses 23b-24a and 30b-31. It appears that wine-drinking was regarded worse than Brāhmaṇa-slaughter, and death-penalty in a painful way is prescribed for it. For drinking spirituous liquor inadvertently, the penance of a Brāhmaṇa-slaughter is laid down in VV. 24-28.

Here NP. is repeating this way of death penalty for wine-drinking which has been already prescribed in Dh.Ss of Āpastamba (I.9.25.3), Gautama (23,1) Baudhāyana (II.1.21) and the Smṛtis of Manu (XI.90-91) and Yājñavalkya (III.253).

7. The second upanayana (investiture of sacred thread) seems to be symbolic. Āśvalāyana Gr. S. (I.22.22-26) prescribes cutting of hair and medhājanana as optional; there is no mention of rules regarding time of this upanayana and the verse to be recited as Sāvitrī is RV.V.82.1 and not the regular Gāyatrī Mantra (RV.III.62.10.)

8. Vide Supra fn.

9. VV 35b-38a give the weights used for weighing gold. It is the same as in Manu VIII. 132-135.

Trasareṇu	=A particle of dust seen in the Sun-beam coming through a window
8 Trasareṇus	=1 niṣka (called likṣa by Manu)
3 Niṣkas	=1 Rāja sarṣapa
3 Rāja sarṣapas	=1 Gaura sarṣapa (A white mustard-seed)
6 Gaura sarṣapas	=1 Yava
3 Yavas	=1 Kṛṣṇala
5 Kṛṣṇalas	=1 Māṣa
16 Māṣas	=1 Suvarṇa

Some of these terms are found in some other Smṛtis and the Kauṭalīya Artha-Śāstra, the difference in terms and their equation (if any) is due to difference of Time and region.

10. The NP. (VV. 44b-50) has decided the punishment or Prāyaścitta for stealing gold according to its weight.

weight of the stolen gold	Prāyaścitta
1 Trasareṇu	1 Prāṇāyāma
1 niṣka	3 Prāṇāyāmas.
1 Rājasarṣapa	4 Prāṇāyāmas
1 Gaurasarṣapa	Bath and Japa of Gāyatrī 1008 times.
1 yava	Japa of Gāyatrī from morning (Sun-rise) to evening (Sun-set).
1 Kṛṣṇala	A Sāntapana
1 Māṣa	Subsistence on barley cooked in a cow's urine, for one year
1 Suvarṇa	Expiation meant for Brahmahatyā (for 12 years).

11. VV. 51-54 declare the Prāyaścitta to be performed by a thief of silver depending on the weight of the metal as follows:

Weight of the stolen silver	Prāyaścitta prescribed
Less than 1 suvarṇa in weight	One Sāntapana.
Between 4 to 10 niṣkas	One Cāndrāyaṇa.
From 10 to 100 Niṣkas	Two Cāndrāyaṇas.
from 100 to 1000 Niṣkas	Three Cāndrāyaṇas.
More than 1000 Niṣkas	Expiation meant for Brahmahatyā.

12. Parāka :

A penance requiring continuous fast for twelve days and observance of self-control (vide Manu XI.215, Yājñavalkya III. 320 A.P.171-10).

13. Incest with one's preceptor's wife or one's mother or step-mother is to be expiated with the incision of the organ and to go on walking with his testicles in one's hand and proclaiming the sins till one falls dead. This has been prescribed since the days of Dharma Sūtras. For example :

Gautama states :

liṅgaṁ vā saṁṛṣaṇaṁ utkṛtyā' ñjalāvādhāya dakṣiṇāpraticīṁ vrajed ajihmam ā-śarīra-pātāt /

Manu XI.105 repeats the same. But the NP. does not lay down the other punishment, viz. lying on a red-hot iron bed or embracing a red hot iron image of a woman, though the Dharma Sūtras and Manu prescribe that alternatively. But the NP. prescribes leap from a precipice, which is its special view.

The prāyaścittas for other cases of incest vary in various Smṛtis. NP.'s views are stated in vv. 60-69.

14. As stated above, association with the four types of grave sinners mentioned above, is regarded as a serious sin and Manu XI. 181, Yājñavalkya III. 261 provided that a person associating with a person guilty of serious sins (Mahāpātakas) should undergo the same Prāyaścitta as is prescribed for the Mahāpāpa. NP. voices the same view but he takes a lenient view and prescribes milder prāyaścittas of shorter duration as compared with those for the original sinners. Kullūka, Vijñāneśvara and other commentators state that the Prāyaścitta in such cases is a Vrata and as such should not be extended to or involve death of the performer of the Vrata.

—Mitākṣarā on Yājña. Smṛ. III. 261.

15. VV 76-92a deal with miscellaneous sins. Smṛti-writers (e.g. Manu XI. 133-37, Yājñ III. 269-74) have prescribed various expiatory rites for them. The NP. agrees with some. The NP. emphasizes that slandering gods and Brāhmaṇas is a great sin from which there is no absolution (89b-90). The main point is that if one is devoted to Lord Nārāyaṇa and undergoes expiatory rites, he becomes free from sins. In extolling devotion to Viṣṇu, NP. asserts that all sins are destroyed by remembering (or worshipping or meditating on) Hari. He concludes : All heaps of miseries instantly disappear if Lord Viṣṇu is remembered but once (V. 97).

CHAPTER THIRTYONE

The Duties of the Emissaries of Yama

Nārada said :

1. O sage, the rules governing the discipline and conduct of life of the different castes and stages of life have been duly narrated by you. Now I wish to hear the extremely impassable path of Yama.

Sanaka said :

2. Listen O Brāhmaṇa, I shall recount to you the impassable path of Yama that bestows happiness to men of meritorious deeds and that is awe-inspiring unto the sinners.[1]

3. It has been mentioned by the earlier sages (i.e. philosophers) that the extent of the path of Yama is, O leading sage, eightysix thousand Yojanas.

4. O Brāhmaṇa, men who habitually give charitable gifts go through it with great pleasure and happiness. Men devoid of righteous activities go through it miserably as they are pounded and thrashed roundly on the way.

5. Extremely terrified, devoid of garments and with their throats, lips and palates parched up, the sinners traverse that way crying bitterly and pitiably.

6. Yama's soldiers strike them with whips, goads and other weapons.

7. They run about here and there along that path with great pain and misery. In some places there is deep mud; in some places there is fire; in some places there is red-hot sand; at some places there is forest-fire; while there are sharp-edged rocks elsewhere.

8. In some places there are thorny trees and rocky mountains very difficult to climb; there are many caves with pitch darkness, there are great covering hedges of thorny bushes.

9. In many places, people have to climb to the top of steep bunds and mounds and enter long caves. The path is strewn with gravels, pebbles and clods, as well as thorns pointed like needles.

10. Some places on the way are made slippery with mosses; in some places there are rows of bamboos; tigers roar in some places; in some places paroxysms of fever (overwhelm the people).

11. O Nārada, the sinners undergo much distress and move ahead slowly. Crying loudly and weeping they fade and languish.

12. Some of the sinners are bound with nooses; some are dragged with goads and hooks; some are beaten and hit with diverse weapons on their backs—in this way the sinners wend their way.

13. Some are dragged with nooses at the tip of their noses, some are bound with entrails. Some go ahead bearing weighty iron mass with the tip of their penis.

14. Some sinners bear two weighty iron balls by means of the tips of their noses; some sinners bear the same with their ears and go ahead.

15. Some falter at every step and plod on. Others, on being struck, slip down. Some leave deep sighs and some keep their eyes closed.

16. Along the path that contains no shady place to rest nor water to drink, they miserably plod on lamenting their sins committed knowingly or unknowingly.[8]

17. O Nārada, those who are pious and righteous, those who are habitual givers of gifts, those who are of good intention, go to the palace of Dharma (god of death) with great pleasure and happiness.

18-19. Those who had given the gifts of cooked food (on the Earth), O excellent sage, go along that path eating tasty things; the bestowers of water go happily, drinking excellent milk; the givers of buttermilk and curds obtain similar kinds of pleasures (correspondingly). O excellent Brāhmaṇa, those who give ghee, honey or milk (on the earth), go to the mansion of Dharma (god of Death) imbibing nectar on the way. He who has given green vegetables, goes ahead tasting milk pudding and he who has gifted lamps, goes there illuminating the quarters.

20. O leading sage, the giver of robes and cloth goes clad in divine garments. He who has given a mine previously goes along the path eulogised by the immortal ones.

21-22a. Thanks to the gift of a cow, a man goes there endowed with all means of happiness on the way; a giver of plots or houses goes riding in an aerial chariot filled with all riches and luxuries. He sports about in the aerial chariot filled with groups of celestial damsels and goes to the abode of Dharma (god of Death).

22b-23. O excellent sage, the giver of horses, vehicles, or elephants goes to the abode of Dharma by means of an aerial chariot equipped with all means of enjoyment. O excellent sage, the giver of bullocks goes riding on a vehicle.

24. The giver of fruits and flowers goes with great contentedness. The man who gives betel-leaves to chew goes to the abode of Dharma with great delight.

25. The excellent man who had rendered service to his father and mother (while on the Earth), walks ahead with a delighted soul honoured and worshipped by the heaven-dwellers.

26. He who renders great service to ascetics who perform great holy rites, and to leading Brāhmaṇas, goes (to Dharma's palace) with great pleasure.

27. A Brāhmaṇa who is endowed with compassion to all living beings is worshipped along the path by the immortal ones and he goes riding in an aerial chariot endowed with all means of pleasures.

28-29a. A person engaged in the gift of learning goes ahead while he is being worshipped by lotus-born deities. The regular reader of the Purāṇas goes ahead as he is being eulogised by leading sages. Thus, those who are engaged in righteousness go to the abode of Dharma with great pleasure.

29b-30a. Yama assumes a form with four faces and holds a conch, a discus, an iron club and a sword. He honours the person engaged in meritorious rites duly with great love and affection like a friend.

30b-31a. He says — "O, ye excellent ones among the intellectuals, ye who are afraid of distress in hells, the merit that yields happiness both on Earth and in heaven, has been earned by you all.

31b-32a. He alone who, after attaining a human life, does not perform meritorious deeds, is the vilest of sinners. He is the slayer of his own Ātman.

32b-33a. He, who, after obtaining the transient human life does not achieve the permanent one, goes to the terrible hell. Who can be a more senseless person than he ?

33b-34. The body is torture itself; it is defiled by impurities (like feces) and the like. Know that the person who places his reliance on it, is one who slays his Ātman. Among all things, the living beings are the most excellent and among them the intellectual beings.

35. Men are most excellent among the intellectual beings; among men the Brāhmaṇas are most excellent; the scholars are most excellent among the Brāhmaṇas; really wise ones are most excellent among scholars.

36. Among the wise ones the performers of holy rites are most excellent, the expounders of the Brāhmaṇa (or the Veda) are most excellent among them. The person who has no feeling of myness is said to be most excellent among the expounders of Brahman.

37. He who is perpetually interested in meditation should be known as greater than all these. Hence, by all means, piety and righteousness must be accumulated.

38. There is no doubt that a righteous creature is worshipped everywhere. Go, you, to my abode endowed with all means of enjoyment and pleasure. Go there, thanks to your own merits.

39. If at all, there is any sin, you shall experience the fruit thereof here itself afterwards". Thus Yama greets and honours the meritorious one and enables him to attain the goal of the good.

40. Having summoned the sinners, he would threaten them with his Kāladaṇḍa (rod of punishment or the Black baton). (Now he assumes a terrible form). He roars loudly like the cloud at the time of dissolution. His lustre is like that of the mountain of collyrium.

41. He appears terrific due to his weapons glittering like lightning. He has thirtytwo arms and his girth is three Yojanas. His nose is long and his eyes are red.

42. His face is terrific due to the curved fangs. His fierce eyes resemble (two deep) wells. Citragupta (the accountant of deeds of all men) accompanied by Mṛtyu (Death), Jvara (Fever), etc. is also terrible.

43-44a. All the emissaries roar. They too are as terrible as Yama. Thereafter, Citragupta addresses at the behest of Yama all sinners who quake with fear and who bewail their own sinful fate.

44b-45a. "O ye sinners, O wicked ones defiled by arrogance, why was so much of sin accumulated by you, the thoughtless ones devoid of discrimination?

45b-47a. With a lofty mind defiled by lust and fury you have committed every conceivable form of sin. O people why have you done so? Formerly, at the time of committing sins you were extremely delighted. So the tortures too must be borne by you. Why are you unnecessarily worried too much?

47b-48. As sins had been committed for the sake of servants, friends and wives, so, you have come here drawn by your own sinful acts weighed down with extreme distress and dejection. But those sons and others nourished by you have gone elsewhere.

49-50. The sin has befallen you alone. Is that the cause of your misery? Since too many sins have been committed by you, the miseries too have befallen you. Why do you feel sorry for it? Ponder over what has been committed by you before.

51-52a. Why did you not consider before that Yama would mete out punishment? Yama is equal and impartial to the rich and the poor, the fool and the learned, the daring one and the dastard."

52b-53a. On hearing this statement of Citragupta, those sinners bewail their actions and their lot. Utterly frightened, they keep quiet.

53b-54a. The ruthless and terrific emissaries such as Cāṇḍālas and others, the executors of the behests of Yama, throw them forcibly into hells.

54b-55a. They experience the fruits of their sinful actions. In the end, as a result of the residue of their sins they come down to the Earth and become immobile and other beings."[8]

Nārada said:

55b-56a. 'O holy Lord, O storehouse of mercy, a doubt has occurred in my mind, which you are competent to eradicate, since you are our eldest brother.

56b-57a. Many kinds of holy rites and duties have been narrated by you. Many sins too have been related by you. You, the knower of many things stated that the fruits (of the sins, etc.) have to be enjoyed by them for a long time (till eternity).

57b. The destruction too of the three worlds at the end of a day of Brahmā has been mentioned by you.

58-59a. At the end of two Parārdhas, the annihilation of the whole Cosmic egg (is going to take place as mentioned by you). O son of Brahmā, it has been mentioned by you yourself that the enjoyment of the pleasures of the merits, thanks to the charitable gifts of villages, etc., is great and lasts for thousands and crores of Kalpas.

59b-60a. In the Prākṛta-laya (the dissolution into the Prakṛti) the destruction of all worlds (has been mentioned by you). It has been said by you that the only one who survives is Janārdana.

60b-61a. The doubt that there cannot be any end to the enjoyment of the fruits of merits and sins before the dissolution of the universe, has arisen in my mind. It behoves your honour to dispel it.

Sanaka said :

61b-62a. Well done, O highly intelligent, one, well done. What you have now asked is the greatest of all secrets, I shall recount it to you. Listen with great attention.

62b-63. Nārāyaṇa is infinite and imperishable. He is eternal and the supreme splendour. He is the purest one and devoid of attributes. He is perpetually devoid of delusions due to Māyā. Although, in reality, he is devoid of Guṇas, he is the greatest bliss and appears like one endowed with Guṇas.

64. He appears to be differentiated through the forms of Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śiva, etc. The eternal lord appears to be differently conditioned by these three different Guṇas.

65-66a. By employing the entire Māyā-power, He performs the function of the universe. He creates (the universe) in the form of Brahmā and protects it in the form of Viṣṇu. It is certain that in the end he swallows everything in the form of Rudra.

66b-67a. At the end of the Pralaya (Dissolution), Janārdana gets up in the form of Brahmā, and creates everything in the whole universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings as before.

67b-68a. O leading Brāhmaṇa, Brahmā makes even the immobile beings positioned in the same manner and place as they were before.

68b-69. Hence, O excellent one, the fruit of the actions meritorious or sinful must, compulsorily be experienced. The fruit of an action is inexhaustible or inevitable and must be enjoyed. Even in the course of hundreds of crores of Kalpas, no action perishes without being borne and experienced.

70. The action performed, whether auspicious or inauspicious must, of necessity, be enjoyed. He who is the lord of all worlds is the immanent soul of all and is identical with the universe. He is perfect and eternal and he enjoys through all the fruits of all actions.[4]

71. The God who pervades all universe and who is endowed with different Guṇas, creates, protects and swallows up everything. The immutable Lord is the enjoyer of everything.

CHAPTER THIRTYONE

The Duties of the Emissaries of Yama

1. This horrible description of the journey of the departed soul to the capital of Yama has little basis in the Vedic literature. The medieval authors of the Purāṇas used this deterrence against immoral tendencies to maintain a certain standard of morality in the public and their success can be gauged from the fact that the illiterate Hindu masses are still under the Purāṇic influence of Yama and his emissaries.

2. VV 5-16 graphically depict the crude tortures of those times. But this Purāṇic author seems to be unaware that the departed soul has no physical body of gross elements as the two gross elements, viz. the earth and water are left behind and the body that goes ahead consists of fire, wind and ether and as such many of the tortures are not applicable to such a body.

3. Cf. Manu XII.54 ff and Yājñavalkya. III.206 ff which state that sinners after serving their term in hells are born as lower animals, insects, trees, shrubs, etc.

4. The doctrine of Karmavipāka is common to all Indian religions—Brāhmaṇism, Jainism and Buddhism (despite their doctrine of 'No Soul'—Anattā). The Buddhist Avadāna Śatakas and the Jain Vipāka Sūtra (Vivāga Suya) testify to their belief in sufferings due to evil deeds. The Mitākṣarā on Yājñavalkya III.216 regards this as an arthavāda, i.e. it should not be taken literally but is an attempt to persuade people to undergo expiations for their sins. The relieving feature of the Indian (Jain, Buddhist and Brahmanical) doctrine of Karma-vipāka is the hope it offers to fallen persons of their redemption from sin and the possibility (nay their birthright) to secure liberation from Saṁsāra).

CHAPTER THIRTYTWO

The Forest of Worldly Existence

Sanaka said :

1. Thus all the creatures curbed and controlled by their respective Karmas (Actions, the fruit whereof they have to reap) enjoy the pleasures of their Puṇyas (merits) in heaven and other places of merits and undergo extremely painful sufferings, as the result of their sins, in hells. With the residue of their dwindled Karmas, they come to this world. They are born as immobiles and other beings infested with all fearsome things and subject to the harassment of death. Trees, bushes, creepers twining plants, grass and the mountains are well known as Sthāvaras (Immobile beings). They are enveloped by great delusions.[1]

2. In the course of their state of being immobile (the development is as follows) : The seeds sown in the ground become well cooked (as it were) through the reproductive faculty (that had been dormant) immediately after being watered. They become swollen and assume the form of the main shoot and its root. It germinates into a sprout from which the leaves, stem and tubular vessels develop. Buds come out from the stalk and blossom into flowers.

3. Among the flowers some do not yield fruits. Some of the flowers produce fruits. When the flowers mature the chaffs develop at their bottoms. Thanks to the residual impressions of the Karmans of the living beings destined to enjoy, the cool snowy beams of the moon and the lymphatic juice of herb plants penetrate the husks and the chaffs. They assume milklike form and in course of time become grains. Thanks to the dormant impressions of destiny for enjoyment belonging to the living beings, they fructify in the course of a year (the crop is ready for reaping the harvest).

4. In the course of their state of life as immobile beings that continues for a long time, they experience misery in many ways. For example, they are munched and crunched by monkeys and other animals; they are cut off by men; they are destroyed by forest fire; they endure chilliness, scorching heat of the sun and similar miseries. Finally, they perish. Thereafter, they become worms experiencing many miseries continuously. Their span of life is but half a moment. Some live, some die. They are unable to ward off the attack of other powerful creatures. They undergo a great deal of sufferings due to chill, wind, etc. which (miseries) are also severe and prolonged. They endure perpetual hunger. They move about in urine and fecal matter. They thus experience misery.

5. Then they take to Paśuyoni (birth as animals). They are agitated and tormented forcibly. They suffer immense agony in vain. They are overwhelmed with hunger. They perpetually move about in the forests. They are afflicted with passionate sensual attachment even to their mothers. They undergo many sufferings due to gusts of wind, etc. During some births they are herbivorous. During other births they are carnivorous, some swallowing even fecel matter; some live subsisting on bulbous roots, fruits and roots. They are bent upon inflicting pain on weaker animals. They too suffer miseries.

6. In their state of oviparous living beings (i.e. birds), they take in gaseous, flesh, fecal and other matter, they are prone to injure others and they themselves suffer. After being born as domestic beasts (such as cattle) and other animals, they endure all sorts of miseries such as separation from their own kindred, bearing heavy loads, bondage in nooses and tethers, hitting with whips, etc., dragging the ploughs and similar agonies.

7. After wandering thus through various births, they gradually attain human life. Some of them enter human life as a result of special merit.[2]

8. As human beings too, they suffer no less when they are born as cobblers, Cāṇḍālas, hunters, barbers, washermen, potters, blacksmiths, goldsmiths, weavers, tailors, Siddhas with matted hair, launderers and dyers, scribes and painters, servants, errand boys, menial servants, slaves, indigent fellows etc.[3] Some have surplus limbs while others are wanting in some limbs (and physically handicapped). Their distresses are numerous. They suffer from fever, phlegmatic attack, enlargement of the spleen, pain in the legs, eyes, head, sides and womb and other distress as well.[4]

9. In the birth as human beings (there are other sufferings as well). After the sexual intercourse between a man and a woman the semen virile enters the womb.[5] At the same time, as a result of his own Karmas the creature (i.e. the soul) too enters the womb along with the semen virile. The semen virile mixes with the blood and develops into the foetus.

10. The semen virile becomes a foetus within five days of the entry of the soul. Within half a month it becomes a fleshy man. Within a month it attains the size of a Pradeśa (the span measured with the forefinger and the thumb).

11. From that time onwards it begins to move within the belly of the mother, thanks to the action of the wind. Although it has no consciousness, it is unable to stay in one single place within the belly of the mother, due to the unbearable heat and pain.

12. When the second month is complete it takes human shape; when three months are over, the hands, legs and other limbs are formed; when four months elapse, the knots and joints of all limbs are clearly developed; when five months pass away, the nails appear; when six months pass off, the nail-joints become distinct. The body of the newborn is nourished through the umbilical cord; it is defiled by feces and urine (present within the mother's body); it is tied up with the embryo; it is vitiated by the blood, bone, germs, suet, marrow, sinews, hair, etc.; it is scorched amidst the intake of the food of the mother whether pungent or sour or saline but hot (to the touch). The soul observes that its body is in such a defiled place. At that time it has the faculty of remembering its previous birth. It remembers the miseries in hells it has experienced before; it burns within itself due to excessive agony on being scorched by the stringent urine (and other secretions) within the mother's body. It begins to lament as follows :

13. "Alas I am extremely sinful. In my previous birth I was too fond of servants, children, friends, womenfolk, houses, fields, wealth, grains, etc. In order to maintain my wives (and others) I used to rob others of their wealth, fields, etc. in their very sight. Since I was blind due to lust, I had abducted other men's wives. Thus, I have committed many sins. As a result of it I underwent sufferings in hells. I was then born as immobile being and experienced great miseries. Now, enveloped in this embryo, I burn within myself as well as without.[6]

14. The wives and others maintained by me have gone elsewhere according to their own Karmas.

15. O How miserable is the lot of embodied beings!

16. The body is born of sin. Hence, one must not commit sins. For the sake of my servants, friends and wives wealth belonging to others had been taken away by me.

17. Due to that sin, I burn within myself enveloped by this (outer skin of the) embryo. Formerly, I had been distressed by jealousy on seeing another man's wealth and glory.

18. Even now, the sinner that I am, I am being burned by the fire (heat) of this womb. I had inflicted pain on others physically, mentally and verbally. I am being burnt by that sin. I am lonely and extremely distressed."

19-20. The creature in the womb laments thus, in diverse ways. He consoles himself and mentally decides as follows : "After my birth I will become one of the pure mind, thanks to the association with saintly people and to the listening to the stories of Viṣṇu. I shall perform holy rites. With great devotion, I will worship the pair of feet of Nārāyaṇa who is the immanent soul of the universe, identical with truth, knowledge and bliss; who has created all worlds through the power of his Śakti, who is the lord of Lakṣmī, and whose lotus-like feet are duly worshipped by all Devas, Asuras, Yakṣas, Gandharvas, Rākṣasas, serpents, sages, Kinnaras and other groups of people. I shall meditate within my heart upon the lord who is the cause of destruction of the unbearable worldly existence, who is engaged in the protection of the universe and who becomes clearly visible through the secret Upaniṣads. I shall then go beyond this prison of worldly existence that is excessively miserable."

21. O sage Nārada, at the time of the confinement of his mother, the soul within the womb is afflicted by the wind. Urged by his Karmas he is forced out through the vaginal passage. Inflicting pain on his mother also, he simultaneously experiences all tortures.

22. Due to this excess of pain he is afflicted in the vaginal passage as though within a mechanical device. As soon as he comes out of the womb, he becomes unconscious.

23. The external wind enlivens him. Immediately after the contact with the external wind, he loses all his memory.

Since he has lost all wisdom, he does not realise the miseries experienced before as well as what are the current ones. He thus experiences the excess of misery.

24. The creature that is now born as a baby experiences many sufferings during the infancy. He is smeared with his own fecal matter and urine. He is unable to utter even when he suffers from bodily pain. If he is oppressed by hunger and thirst, he cries, when others think that the boy must be breast-fed and do accordingly.

25. He experiences bodily pains, etc. of various types and he does so only through subservience to others. It is impossible for him to ward off even the flies.

26. After becoming a slightly bigger boy he experiences all these things :—He is beaten by his mother, father and preceptor. He gets the habit of listless wandering here and there. He plays about in dust, ashes and mud. He is always quarrelsome. He is dirty. He engages himself in many futile tasks. When those do not fructify he feels sorry. Thus, he undergoes sufferings.

27. Then in his youth (he experiences various other sufferings:) there is misery in earning wealth; there is misery in preserving what is earned. He is very miserable when the earned wealth is lost or spent. The young men are deluded by Māyā; their minds are defiled by lust and fury and similar emotions; they are always engrossed in jealousy, and in devising means of knocking off other men's wealth and abducting other men's wives; they are always worried over the ways of sustenance for their sons, friends and wives; they are puffed with vain arrogance. When their sons or other kinsmen are bedridden due to ailments, they cancel all their engagements and sit beside the patients. They are too remorseful and begin to muse as follows :

28. No action regarding the house, fields, etc. has been contemplated by me. How is the increasing family to be maintained ?

29. I have no capital with me. We do not get timely showers of rain. Where has the horse run away ? How is it that my kine have not yet returned ?

30. My wife is burdened with an infant son. I am sick and indigent. Due to lack of thought and care, the farm has perished. All the sons are now crying.

31. My house is in bad rpairs. It is in ruins. All my kinsmen are far off. I am not able to get any job. The tyranny of the king is unbearable.

32. My enemies rush at me. How can I conquer them ? I am incompetent to pursue any vocation. These guests have come now !

33. Thus, he is much agitated and worried. Unable to ward off his miseries, he blames the destiny saying—"Fie upon Fate. Why has it rendered me unfortunate ?"

34-36. When he attains old age (his miseries are equally terrible). His strength decreases. Greying hairs, old age, etc. have asserted themselves all over his body; he is oppressed by sickness; all his limbs begin to quiver; he is afflicted by sneezing and asthmatic trouble; his eyes are tremulous and clouded; lumps of phlegmatic secretion choke his throat; he is being cursed and rebuked by his sons, wife and others. He then begins to worry over every thing.... "O when shall I die ? After my death how can my sons and others preserve the house, fields and other property that I have earthed ? To whom shall they belong? When my wealth is taken away by others, how can my sons and others maintain themselves ?" Thus, the old man is afflicted with the misery of my-ness. He heaves deep sighs. He begins to recollect various things committed by him at different periods of his life. Within a moment he forgets every thing. His death is now imminent. Afflicted by sickness as well as by mental agony, sometimes he moves on the bare cot, sometimes on the bed. Oppressed by hunger and thirst, he pleads, "Please give me some water to drink !" Even when he implores pitiably they say, "Water is not congenial to the health of those who are afflicted by fever". The old man chafes extremely in the mind and lapses into unconsciousness.

37. Thereafter, he becomes incapable of even making any movement of (drawing back) his hands and feet. He is surrounded by weeping kinsmen. He is unable to speak. His worry now is, "to whom will the wealth earned by him go ?". Tears begin to well up in his eyes and cloud them. There is a snorting-like sound in his throat. The vital breaths leave off his body. He is then rebuked by the emissaries of Yama. Bound and fettered by them, he falls into the hells as before.

38. Just as metals are cast into fire and blown with the bellows till the impurities are removed, so also the living beings are tortured in the hells till their Karmans are completely destroyed (by suffering the fruits of acts.)

39. Hence, O excellent Brāhmaṇa, one who is distressed by the scorching heat of the forest-fire of worldly existence shall practise the perfect (spiritual) knowledge. Through knowledge one should attain liberation (from Saṁsāra).

40. Those men who are devoid of knowledge are said to be brutes. Hence, for the liberation from worldly existence, one shall practise perfect knowledge.

41. Who is more senseless than that person who does not serve Hari even after attaining human birth that enables one to accomplish all rites (and holy acts).

41A* Surprising, very strange, O leading sages, this is indeed extremely astonishing that men undergo torture even when Viṣṇu, the bestower of desires, stands by.

42. Alas ! even when Nārāyaṇa, the lord of the universe, the bestower of all desired benefits, stands by, men devoid of perfect knowledge are cooked in the hells !

43. Ignorant persons enveloped by great delusions, consider this transient body permanent—the body that exudes fecal matter and urine.

44. After attaining the body that is rendered despicable due to (its contents of) flesh, blood, etc., the man who does not worship Viṣṇu who puts an end to the cycle of worldly existence is a great sinner.

45. Alas it is a pity ! Alas it is a pity ! It is sheer foolishness. O Brāhmaṇa, even a Cāṇḍāla who is engaged in the meditation on Hari, is extremely happy.

46. How is it that the foolish sinful men do not get nauseated (lit: alarmed and excited) on seeing the bane of fecal matter, urine, etc. issuing out of their own body ?

47. Rare and inaccessible human birth is sought for even by Devas. A clever man on getting the same, must indeed strive for attaining the greatest of the worlds.

48. Those who are richly endowed with spiritual knowledge, those who are engaged in the worship of Hari attain the greatest abode, a return from which is difficult to get.

*Verse No 41A is really No. 42, but No 41 is wrongly repeated in the Printed text.

49. He is the liberator from the worldly existence, he from whom the universe is born; from whom it attains consciousness and in whom it is dissolved.

50. A person is liberated from the worldly existence on worshipping that Lord of Devas who appears to be one endowed with attributes, though he is really devoid of them, who is the supreme and the infinite deity.

CHAPTER THIRTYTWO

The Forest of Worldly Existence

1. An echo of Manu XII.54 ff & Yājñavalkya III.206 ff. Curiously enough here, both Manu and Yājñavalkya are textually very similar to each other pointing thereby to an earlier common source.
2. The ancient theory of evolution. Before a Jīva reaches the stage of human beings they undergo the following stages of evolution : immobile beings, trees, grass → animal-world (wild beasts) → oviparous beings and domestic animals → human beings.
3. The idea that people are born in lower castes as a result of their sins in previous birth is traceable to the Dharma Sūtra period. Thus Āpastamba (Dh. S. II.1.2.6-7) states that after undergoing the torments of the hell, the sinner is born as a Cāṇḍāla, Paulkasa and Vaina and outcaste. Cf. Manu's explanation for birth as a goldsmith (Manu XII.61).
4. Since ancient times diseases are believed to be the consequences of sins. Thus Viṣṇu Dh. S. Ch. 45, Manu XI.49-52, Śātātapa I. 3-11, Gautama (versified Smṛti) Ch. 20 (to mention a few) state the diseases and bodily defects from which sinners suffer after they are born as men. Not that all of these authors agree in their pronouncements of such defects and diseases as the result of a particular sin. Thus Brāhmaṇa-slaughter causes leprosy according to Vasiṣṭha 20.44 but Phthisis according to Manu XI.49, Yājñavalkya III. 209 Vijñāneśvara in Mitākṣarā on Yājñavalkya III. 216 gives a list of births in lower species and diseases and deformities suffered for various sins.
5. This chapter is in prose. Paragraphs 9-12 give the ancient ideas of embryology—the development of the foetus since its inception from sexual intercourse. For want of space it is not possible to quote the relevant portions from Suśruta or Vāgbhaṭa but the quotations on garbha in SKD.II-pp 312-313 show how the NP depends on the old works on Āyurveda. Other Purāṇas also do the same. Thus the Garuḍa Purāṇa I.146-167 corresponds to Vāgbhaṭa's Aṣṭāṅga-hṛdaya (Ramshankar Bhattacharya—Intrd. to Garuḍa Purāṇa pp. 29-30.).

Modern medical Science however differs in its findings about the development of the foetus. Thus in C. S. Dawn's Text book of Obstetrics (Calcutta, 1967) we are told that it is the union of spermatozoon which is united with the ovum and for the first eight weeks is in 'embryo stage' after which it is called foetus. The Sk. dictionaries make a confusion between 'embryo' and 'foetus by using them as synonyms (vide Apte's Sk-Eng. Dict. p. 183 at 2). NP.'s description of the development of foetus and the process of delivery reflects the state of knowledge in the medieval India.
6. The soliloquy in paragraphs 13-20 is of course imaginary. But these very words have been repeated (as the prayer of the foetus) by saint poets of Maharashtra.

CHAPTER THIRTYTHREE

A Discourse on Yoga

Nārada said :

1-2. Whatever has been asked by me has been recounted by you of scholarly attainments. A great many miseries of those who are bound by the noose of Saṁsāra (worldly existence) also have been described by you). Who is remembered as the person who severs the noose of worldly existence? O sage, rich in penance, kindly enlighten me in the means whereby liberation from Saṁsāra is achieved.[1]

3. O excellent sage, series of actions are being performed by living beings every day and are enjoyed also. How can they (Karmas) be destroyed?

4. The embodied soul takes up the body as a result of his Karman; he is bound by lust. As a result of lust he is overwhelmed by avarice and avarice makes him prone to anger.

5. Due to anger, Dharma perishes and the destruction of Dharma leads to misapprehension. A man of confused intellect commits sin again.

6. Hence, the body has its root in sins. It is always engaged in sinful activities. Narrate to me how one attains liberation after eschewing the misconception about the body.

Sanaka said :

7. Well done, O highly intelligent one, well done. Your mind is noble and free of impurities, since you desire to know from us the means of liberation from the misery of worldly existence.

8. O strict observer of religious vows, indeed, it is only that Deity who is the bestower of salvation—the deity at whose behest Brahmā creates the entire universe; Hari protects it and Rudra annihilates it.

9. Know Viṣṇu[2] to be the bestower of salvation. He is Nārāyaṇa free from ailments. Thanks to his prowess, are born the principles beginning with Ahaṁkāra (the Ego) and ending with Viśeṣa (particularities).

10. All this (visible universe) consisting of the mobile and immobile, is not different from him. One is liberated from misery of saṁsāra by meditating on the mighty Lord, devoid of old age.

11. Verily they call him the Liberator (lit. the means of liberation from Saṁsāra), one above modifications and aberrations, who is unborn, the purest, the self-luminous, the unsullied embodiment of perfect knowledge and of eternal bliss.

12. The groups of deities the first of whom is Brahmā, worship the incarnations and manifestations of that lord. Know him to be Hari the bestower of the eternal abode.

13. Those who have conquered their Prāṇas (vital breaths), those who have controlled their diet, those who are always absorbed in meditation, see him in their hearts. Know him to be the Reality that accords happiness.

14. Though he is devoid of attributes, he is the receptacle of good qualities; he assumes the forms that bless the worlds. He is perfect and is stationed in the middle of the firmament. They call him the bestower of salvation unto men.

15. He is the presiding deity and the observer of all activities; he is enthroned in the heart of the embodied soul; he is simply incomparable; he is the support of all. With such a Lord, one should seek refuge.

16. At the end of the Kalpa, he withdraws everything and lies down on the cosmic water. Sages, the perceivers of the truth, call Viṣṇu, the bestower of salvation.

17. The Karmajñas (the knowers of the path of Karmans), who know the meanings of the Vedic passages, worship him through various kinds of sacrifices. He alone is the bestower of the fruits of holy rites to them and salvation to those who perform holy rites without desire of their fruits.

18. They call him the lord, the bestower of salvation—the lord who is unmanifest and who partakes of oblations (offered in sacrificial fire) by assuming the forms of deities and the oblation of food and other offerings to the manes by assuming the forms of Pitṛs (ancestors).[3]

19. One should worship that merciful Lord who on being meditated upon, or bowed to or worshipped with devotion, bestows the permanent abode (Mokṣa).

20. That immutable Hari, the Supreme Person, the only support of all beings, one free from old age and death, is the bestower of liberation from Saṁsāra.

21. O leading sage, after worshipping his lotus-like feet, the embodied souls immediately attain to immortality (i.e. Mokṣa). They know him to be the Supreme Person.

22. The Brahman is bliss.[4] He is the greatest splendour, devoid of old age. He is eternal, greater than the greatest. That is the highest region of Viṣṇu.

23. They know him to be one without a second, devoid of attributes, non-dual and matchless, eternal, incomparable and perfect embodiment of knowledge. He is the deity who enables one to achieve salvation.

24. The Yogin who always worships this Supreme entity of such a nature, through the rites of the Yogic path, attains the greatest region.

25. The Yogin who has eschewed all contacts and associations, who is endowed with Śama (self-control) and other good qualities and who is devoid of lust and similar bad qualities attains the highest region.

Nārada said :

26. By what holy rite is the achievement of the Yoga attained by the Yogins? O sage the most excellent among the eloquent ones, tell me precisely the means for the same.

Sanaka said :

27. Those who ponder over the meanings of principles (or the Reality) say that the greatest salvation is attainable through perfect knowledge. This perfect knowledge has its root in devotion. Similarly this devotion is engendered in those persons who perform holy rites.

28. Devotion to Hari is generated in that person by whom, in the course of thousands of births, charitable gifts, different kinds of sacrifices and pilgrimages, etc. have been performed.

29. The highest and inexhaustible Dharma is produced even through the slightest of devotion and piety. All sins perish through the deepest faith.

30. When all the sins are quelled, the intellect becomes free from impurities. That same intellect is declared by wise sages by the word Jñāna (knowledge).

31. They say that knowledge bestows salvation. It is the Yogins who acquire that knowledge. Yoga is said to be of two kinds, differentiated by holy rites and by perfect knowledge.

32. The Jñāna Yoga (path of knowledge) cannot be accomplished without the Kriyā Yoga (path of holy rites). Hence, one who is engaged in the Kriyā Yoga should worship Hari with deep faith.

33. With devotion the following idols of Keśava are to be worshipped; the idols termed as Dvija (Brāhmaṇa), Bhūmi (Earth), Agni (fire), Sūrya (Sun), Ambu (Water) Dhātu (metals or the essential ingredients of body), Hṛt (the heart) and Citra (Picture).

34. Hence, becoming completely averse to (i.e. abstaining absolutely from) inflicting pain on others in thought, word and deed, one, endowed with devotion, should worship Lord Viṣṇu who pervades everything.

35. The following good qualities are common to both types of Yogas—viz. nonviolence, truthfulness, absence of anger, celibacy, non-acceptance of gifts (and non-possession of property), absence of jealousy and mercifulness.

36. Firmly determining mentally that "the eternal Viṣṇu is identical with the universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings", one shall practise the two types of Yogas.

37. The learned men who consider all living beings their own Ātman realise the supreme nature of the discus-bearing lord of Devas (viz. Viṣṇu).

38. If a person whose soul is defiled by fury, etc. becomes devoted to worship and meditation, Viṣṇu is not pleased with him, since he is the lord of Dharma.

39. If a person whose soul is defiled by lust, etc. becomes devoted to worship, he should be known as a hypocrite. He is on a par with all sinners.

40. If a person full of envy and jealousy becomes absorbed in austerities, worship and meditation, his austerities, worship and meditation—everything is futile.

41. Hence, a man, eagerly engaged in practising the good qualities of Śama (self-control), etc. and who is absorbed in Kriyā-Yoga[5] should duly worship Viṣṇu who is the Soul of all (and is one with them), for the purpose of liberation (from Saṁsāra).

42. If a person interested in the welfare of all worlds, mentally, verbally and physically, devoutly worships the lord of Devas, it is called Kriyā Yoga.

43. The person who eulogises through hymns, etc. Lord Nārāyaṇa, the source of the origin of the universe, Viṣṇu, Hari, the immanent soul of everyone, through hymns, etc., he is called, a Karma Yogin.

44. The worship of Viṣṇu through flowers, etc., by means of observance of fasts, etc. as well as listening to Purāṇas (and other forms of devotion), etc., is declared as Kriyā Yoga.

45. All the sins accumulated in the course of previous births of those who are devotionally attached to Viṣṇu and whose minds are absorbed in Kriyā Yoga, perish completely.

46. One whose intellect is purified through the destruction of sins, desires the excellent knowledge. Perfect knowledge should be known as the bestower of salvation. I shall narrate to you the means thereof.

47. In the company of saintly persons who are adepts in the interpretation of scriptural texts, the intelligent man shall deeply ponder over what is permanent and what is non-permanent in the world consisting of the mobile and immobile beings.

48. All the sense objects are evanescent. Only Hari is eternal. One should eschew the non-eternal objects and resort only to the eternal one (viz. Hari).

49. He should also be unattached to the pleasures of this as well as of the other world. He who is not detached becomes involved in the cycle of worldy existence.

50. Never can he be severed from the bond of worldly existence,—the man who is passionately attached to non-eternal objects.

51. Only he who is richly endowed with self-control and other good qualities and who is desirous of liberation can practise knowledge. One who is wanting in self-control never realizes the spiritual knowledge.

52. He who is devoid of lust and hatred, is richly endowed with self-control and is perpetually absorbed in the meditation on Hari, is called a Mumukṣu (one who is desirous of liberation).

53. One who possesses these four means is called a man of pure intellect. One who is absorbed in the feelings of compassion towards all living beings should ponder over Viṣṇu who is omnipresent.

54. O Brāhmaṇas if any one realises this that Nārāyaṇa abides pervading the universe consisting of the perishable and the imperishable, they say, it is the knowledge arising from Yoga.

55. Henceforth, I shall recount the means for the acquisition of Yoga, the means that makes this metempsychosis recede. The knowledge that is pure is Yoga. The wise know that this knowledge is the bestower of salvation.

56. They say that the Ātman is two-fold as differentiated as the Para (Higher) and the Apara (lower). The Atharva Veda says—" Two Brahmans are to be known"[6]

57. That which is devoid of attributes (Nirguṇa) is spoken of as Para. The Apara is that which is combined with the Ahaṁkāra (Ego). The realization of their non-difference is called Yoga.

58. That which is stationed in the heart as Sākṣin (the witness) in the body constituted by the five elements, is called Apara while the Supreme Ātman is remembered as Para by the saintly people.

59. The body is called Kṣetra (field) that which is stationed therein is called Kṣetrjña) (The individual soul). He is said to be unmanifest, Supreme, pure and perfect.

60. O excellent sage, when the non-difference between the individual soul and the Supreme Soul is realised, the bonds of the Apara Ātman (the lower i.e. the individual soul) are snapped.

61. The Paramātman (the Supreme Soul) who is pure, imperishable, eternal and identical with the universe appears like one differentiated, in view of the difference of perception among men.

62. That which is the greatest and eternal Brahman is the only one without a second (Chāndogya Up. 6.2.1) O Brāhmaṇa, it is thus sung about by the Vedāntic passages. There is nothing greater than that.

63. That attributeless great Ātman has no function or rite to perform. It has neither form nor colour. It is neither an agent nor an enjoyer.

64. That which is the cause of all causes, that splendour which is greater than every other brilliance, that without which nothing exists, should be known for the sake of salvation.

65. O Brāhmaṇa, that which is Śabda Brahman (Brahman in the form of sound) is the Mahā Vākya[7] etc. (the great statements such as Tat Tvam Asi 'That Thou art'. The perfect knowledge arising out of meditating over the same great statement is the greatest means of salvation.

66. O Brāhmaṇa, the universe appears to be of diverse kinds to those who are devoid of perfect knowledge. To those endowed with the supreme (spiritual) knowledge, it is one with the greatest Brahman.

67. The only greatest bliss, the attributeless one, the greater than the greatest, the unchanging one, appears to be assuming many forms due to difference in perception.

68. O excellent one among the Brāhmaṇas, people perceive difference in the Parama Ātman due to the Māyā of the wielder of the Māyā. Hence a Mumukṣu (one desirous of liberation) should eschew the Māyā through the Yogic power.

69. The Māyā is neither of the form of the non-existence nor of that of the existence nor is it of the form of both. Hence it should be understood as being unspecifiable. It gives (creates) the idea of difference.

70. O excellent sage, it is the Māyā alone that is understood by the word Ajñāna[8] (ignorance). Hence, only those who have conquered Māyā can have the riddance from Ajñāna. (Only they can get rid of it).

71. The greatest eternal Brahman is denoted by the word Jñāna (the spiritual knowledge). Indeed the greatest Ātman shines continuously in the hearts of those endowed with Jñāna.

72. O excellent sage, the Yogin must destroy ignorance through Yoga. The Yoga is achieved through eight ancillaries. I shall mention them factually.

73-74. O leading sage, O excellent sage, the ancillaries (aids) of Yoga are these : viz. : Yamas (Restraints), Niyamas (observances), Āsanas (physical postures), Prāṇāyāma (control of breath), Pratyāhāra (withdrawal) of senses, Dhāraṇā (fixed attention—Retention), Dhyāna (meditation and Samādhi (Trance).[9] I shall succinctly relate the characteristics of these in order, O excellent sage.

75. The Yamas (Restraints) are in brief the following : Ahiṁsā (non-violence), Satya (truthfulness), Asteya (non-stealing), Brahmacarya (celibacy), Aparigraha (non-acceptance of monetary gifts), Akrodha (absence of fury) and Anasūyā (absence of jealousy).[10]

76. Abstention from inflicting pain on all living beings is called Ahiṁsā (Non-Violence) by good men. It is the bestower of Yogic achievements.

77. O excellent sage, statement of the actual fact after discriminating between Dharma (righteousness) and Adharma (unrighteousness), they call Satya (truth). Now listen to Asteya (non-stealing).

78. Taking away the wealth of others through force or stealth is called Steya (stealth) by good men. The opposite of the same is non-stealing (Asteya).

79. Eschewal of sexual intercourse in regard to everyone is glorified as Brahmacarya (celibacy). Due to the abandonment of celibacy, even a person endowed with knowledge, becomes a sinner.

80. He who professes to be one refraining from intimate contact with all, but continues to indulge in sexual intercourse, should be known as one on a par with a Cāṇḍāla. He is excommunicated from all castes.

81. O Brāhmaṇa, if anyone engaged in the practice of Yoga harbours a craving for sensuous objects, other men are affected by the sin of Brahmahatyā (Brāhmaṇa-slaughter) even by talking to him.

82. If a person who eschews all intimate contacts resumes the contacts once again, one attains the defect of a great sin (Mahāpāpa) even by means of contact with those who touch them.

83. O leading sage, non-acceptance of moneys even in emergencies, is called Aparigraha. It leads to the achievement of Yogic power.

84. If as a result of one's own superior position one indulges in harsh speech, knowers of Dharma call it Krodha (fury). Akrodha is its opposite.

85. Severe heart-burn and mental agony that one suffers, on seeing others superior to him in wealth, etc. is called Asūyā (jealousy) by good men. Its abandonment is Anasūyatā (absence of jealousy).

86. O Nārada, the most excellent among enlightened ones, the Yamas (Restraints) have thus been succinctly recounted. I shall narrate, Niyamas (observances) also to you. Listen.

87. Austerities, self-study (of Vedas), contentment, purity (cleanliness), worship of Hari and the offering of Sandhyā prayers—these are mentioned as main observances (Niyamas).[11]

88. Where the body is desicated through Cāndrāyaṇa and other (expiatory rites), it is called Tapas (Austerity) by good men. It is an excellent means of Yoga.

89-90. The Japa (prayerful repetitions) of Praṇava, the Upaniṣad passages, the twelve-syllabled or eight-syllabled Mantras (viz. Oṁ namo bhagavate Vāsudevāya / Oṁ Namo Nārāyaṇāya and the Japa (repeated recitation) of the collections of great statements (Mahāvākyas such as Tat tvam asi, etc.) is called Svādhyāya (self-study). It is an excellent means of Yoga. The foolish one who abandons Svādhyāya does not achieve Yogic power.

91. Even without the (other ancillaries of) Yoga, men's sins are quelled through Svādhyāya. On being propitiated through Svādhyāyas, the deities become delighted.

92. Japa (Prayerful repetition) is said to be of three types : Vācika (verbal and voluble), Upāṁśu (indistinct or mumbling) and Mānasa (mental). O leading Brāhmaṇa, the later ones in these three types are better than the earlier ones.

93. If the Mantra is uttered well making the syllables and words clearly articulated, the Japa is called Vācika (Verbal). It bestows the benefits of all Yajñas.

94. When the Mantra is uttered, if the words are only slightly distinct from one another, that Japa is said to be Upāṁśu. It is twice more beneficial than the previous one.

95. If the respective meanings of the series of syllables (in the Mantra) are pondered over, that Japa is said to be Mānasa (mental). It bestows all Yogic achievements.

96. The deity becomes delighted with one who eulogises continuously through Japa. Hence, one who is richly endowed with the practice of Svādhyāya realises all his desires.

97. Satisfaction with obtaining what comes spontaneously is called Santoṣa (contentment). A disgruntled man does not get pleasure anywhere.

98. Never does lust subside by the enjoyment of the pleasures of lust.[12] The lustful desire "When will I get more than this ?" ever goes on increasing.

99. Hence, one should leave off lust that causes the desiccation and dissipation of the body. One should be contented with the effortless spontaneous acquisitions and be absorbed in Dharma.

100. Cleanliness is of two types as differentiated by its external and internal applications. The external cleanliness is through clay and water. The internal cleanliness is emotional purity.

101. O leading sage, the different kinds of sacrifices performed by those who are devoid of internal purity, do not bear fruit like the sacrificial oblation poured on ashes.

102. All the rites of those who are devoid of emotional purity are futile. Hence, one should eschew passionate attachment and similar emotions and be happy.

103. A man whose soul is defiled is one similar to a Cāṇḍāla, though be might have externally washed himself with ten million potful of water and thousands of Bhāras (1 Bhāra = 20 Tulas or 2000 Palas) of clay.

104. If a person devoid of internal purity becomes engaged in the worship of a deity, he vitiates that deity and falls into a hell.

105. He who is devoid of internal purity but strives for external cleanliness does not attain calmness like an embellished liquor pot (which remains impure internally).

106. Holy centres do not sanctify those who perform pilgrimages without mental purity, just as the river cannot purify the liquor pot.

107. If a person mentally yearns for a sinful thing even as he expatiates on righteousness, O excellent sage, know him to be the most villainous among the great sinners.

108. If those persons whose minds are pure perform only their excellent duties, know that the benefit thereof is imperishable and pleasure-bestowing.

109. If devotion to Hari is stabilised by means of worships, eulogies and listening (to Purāṇas, etc.) mentally, verbally and physically, it is called the real Haripūjā (worship of Hari).

110. The Yamas and the Niyamas have been taught succinctly. They (the knowers) know that salvation is within the reach of those whose minds are purified by means of those (observances).

111. One who has conquered his sense-organs and stabilised his intellect through the observance of Yamas and Niyamas should begin the practice of Āsanas (postures) duly. It is an excellent means of achieving Yoga.

112-115. The Āsanas (postures) mentioned by leading sages are thirty in number.[13] They are—Padmaka, Svastika, Pīṭha, Saiṁha, Kaukkuṭa, Kauñjara, Kaurma, Vajrāsana, Vārāha, Mṛga, Cailika, Krauñca, Nālika, Sarvatobhadra, Vārṣabha, Nāga, Mātsya, Vaiyāghra, Ardhacandraka, Daṇḍavāta, Śaila, Śvabhra, Maudgara, Mākara, Traipatha, Kāṣṭha, Sthāṇu, Vaikarṇika, Bhauma and Vīrāsana. These are instrumental to the achievement for Yoga.

116. The follower of Yoga with full faith and devotion to his spiritual preceptor should bind (fully stabilise himself) in one of these postures and transcending the dvandvas[14] (opposite pairs like pleasure and pain) and eschewing jealousy (from his mind) should attain control over his vital breaths.

117. He should sit facing the east, north or the west. He should control the vital breaths by means of practice in a quiet place unfrequented by people.

118. Prāṇa is the wind stationed within the body. Its Āyāma means restraint. Thus Prāṇāyāma means breath control. It is of two types.

119. Out of the Agarbha and the Sagarbha types of breath-control the latter is the better of the two. The Agarbha is the curbing of the breath without Japa and meditation while in the Sagarbha control of breath, we have them (i.e. Japa and Dhyāna) both.

120. The restraint of breath has been mentioned by learned men to be of four kinds : Recaka (exhalation of air), Pūraka (inhalation of air), Kumbhaka (retention of the inhaled air), and Śūnyaka (a breathless stage) (see below 124-126).

121. The tubular organ or artery (the channel of the vital air) on the right hand side of the creatures is mentioned as Piṅgalā. The sun is its deity. It is well known as the source of the origin of the Pitṛs.

122. The artery or the channel of the vital air well known as the source of the origin of Devas is on (flows through) the left (nostril). It is the vein called Iḍā. O excellent sage, know that the moon is its presiding deity.

123. In the middle of these two is the vein Suṣumnā. It is very subtle and the most mysterious one. It should be known as having Brahman for its deity.

124. The breath should be expelled through the left nostril. Recana means exhaling and hence this is called Recaka. The intake of breath must be through the right nostril. Pūraṇa means filling up. Hence .this is called Pūraka.

125. One restrains the wind that fills the body and does not exhale it. He stands like a pitcher filled with water. Hence, it is well known as Kumbhaka.

126. If there is neither inhalation nor exhalation of the external or the internal wind, know that to be the Prāṇāyāma of the name of Śūnyaka. There is a perfect standstill.

127. The vital breaths are to be conquered slowly, like lordly elephants in their rut that have to be tamed slowly. Otherwise, terribly great ailments are bound to effect.

128. The Yogin devoid of sins shall make use of the wind gradually. He should be liberated from all sins. He shall attain the region of the Brahman.

129. O leading sage, if one withdraws the sense-organs involved in the sensuous objects and restrain them, it is called Pratyāhāra[15] (withdrawal of senses).

130. O Brāhmaṇa, noble-souled men though devoid of meditation, but who have conquered their sense organs attain the greatest Brahman from which it is difficult to return.

131. If anyone tries to get absorbed in meditation before completely conquering the sense-organs, know him to be stupefied in mind. Even his meditation cannot be successfully accomplished.

132. Whatever he sees he sees to be like his self within his Ātman. The retention of the withdrawn sense-organs is Dhāraṇā.

133. One who has conquered the groups of sense-organs by means of Yoga shall completely withdraw them from the field of operation. He should then deeply meditate in the heart on the Supreme Ātman, Acyuta, the creator and supporter of all.[16]

134-137. In the lotus of the heart that extends to twelve Aṅgulas and that has eight petals, he should meditate on lord Viṣṇu, the embodiment of entire universe, the sole cause of all worlds, His eyes resembling the petals of the blooming lotus;—Lord Viṣṇu who is bedecked with charming earrings, whose arms are long, limbs elegant; who is embellished with all ornaments; who wears yellow robes, and a golden sacred thread, Tulasī garlands; who shines with the Kaustubha jewel; who bears the Śrīvatsa mark on his chest; who is bowed to by Devas and Asuras; who is the unmanifest Ātman and the lord greater than the greatest.

138. It has been stated by saintly men that Dhyāna (meditation) is perception with attention[17] and concentration. By performing meditation even for a Muhūrta, a man attains the highest salvation.

139. Sins perish, thanks to meditation, one attains liberation (from Saṁsāra) due to meditation; Hari becomes pleased through meditation; all objects are realised through meditation.

140. With great concentration one should meditate on every form of Mahāviṣṇu. Delighted with that meditation, Hari shall indeed bestow salvation.

141. O excellent one, one should make the mind steady in the object of meditation so that the state of being the meditator, the object of meditation, and the act of meditation every thing ceases to be completely.

142. Then immortality is achieved by resorting to the nectar of knowledge. The nondifference is realised by continuous meditation.

143. If the devotee (who meditates) feels the greatest bliss as in sleep, if all his sense organs become subdued, if he stands steady like the flame of the lamp in a place devoid of wind in motion, it is called Samādhi (trance).

144. O excellent one, in the state of Samādhi (trance) the Yogin neither hears nor sees, neither smells nor touches nor does he utter anything.

145. The Ātman is free of impurities, it is pure; it is Existence, Knowledge and Bliss incarnate. It is devoid of all conditioning factors; it appears steady to Yogins.

146. The Supreme Lord, though devoid of attributes, appears, due to ignorance, to be endowed with attributes. He appears steady and attributeless as before, when ignorance disappears.

147. The immeasurable Ātman, that supreme brilliance appears to be deflected by Māyā to those affected by Māyā.

O scholar, when the Māyā (illusion) is destroyed, the Brahman free from impurities shines resplendent.

148. It is one without a second; is the Supreme unsullied light. It is abiding in all living beings as the immanent soul.

149. He is minuter than the minutest atom;[18] he is greater than the greatest being; he is the eternal Ātman; he is the cause of the entire universe; those who are the most excellent among the possessors of perfect knowledge observe him who is greater than the greatest and very pure.

150. That primordial beginningless ancient Puruṣa is sung about as the Śabdabrahman comprised within the letters of the alphabet beginning with 'A' and ending with 'Kṣa'.

151. It is sung about as the greatest Brahman that is extremely pure, imperishable, eternal, perfect, situated in the middle of the firmament, and as the bliss devoid of impurities and quiescent.

152. The Yogins perceive the eternal Supreme Ātman in their hearts. It is changless, unborn, pure and is sung about as the greatest Brahman.

153. O excellent sage, listen. I shall narrate in details another type of meditation. It is as though like a shower of nectar to the men scorched by the distress of worldly existence.

154. One should contemplate upon Nārāyaṇa, the greatest Bliss stationed in the Praṇava Oṁ in the form of Nāda (the spiritual sound) incomparable and as situated over half the Mātrā.

155. The syllable 'A' is the form of Brahmā; the letter 'U' is the form of Viṣṇu; the letter 'M' is the form of Rudra and half the Mātrā is of the greatest Ātman.[19]

156. O Brāhmaṇa, three Mātrās (of Oṁ) are mentioned as having Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva as their deities. Their collective form indicates the greatest Brahman.

157. The Supreme Brahman is the Vācya (that which is to be expressed), the Praṇava is called the Vācaka (the expression). O Brāhmaṇa, their relation as Vācya and Vācaka is a formality.

158. Those who continuously perform the Japa of Praṇava are liberated from all sins. Those who have its constant practice, attain the greatest salvation.

159. Performing the Japa of the Praṇava Mantra of the form of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva, one shall meditate on a pure brilliance like that of ten million suns in the Ātman.

160. Or one should ponder over any holy object that quells sins—such as the Śālagrāma stone or an idol.

161. O leading sage, what has been mentioned to you is the perfect knowledge pertaining to Viṣṇu. On knowing this, the prominent Yogin attains excellent salvation.

162. He who listens to this or reads it with concentration shall be freed from all sins. He shall attain the Sālokya (having the same world) with Hari.

CHAPTER THIRTYTHREE

A Discourse on Yoga

1. After the terrible description of Saṁsāra, Nārada naturally asks Sanaka the way out of this terrific cycle of births and deaths. It is on the background of the last chapter that this Vaiṣṇava-Jñāna is explained by Sanaka. Though the heading of the chapter is 'A discourse on Yoga', the Yoga path of Patañjali finds a secondary place here. It is a synthesis of spiritual knowledge, Bhakti & Karma. Yoga is the means of realization of the identity between the individual soul and the Supreme soul. It is this realization which relieves a person from Saṁsāra.

2. Here Viṣṇu is identified with the Brahman and Hari the protector of the Universe only as one of the dieties in the Trinity alongwith gods Brahmā and Śiva, and is thus regarded on a lower level (vide V.8 above). All the epithets in VV. 8-23 describe Viṣṇu as being the Para Brahman and as such a bestower of Mokṣa.

3. Havya is the oblation or offering (generally poured in the sacrificial fire) to gods while Kavya is the oblation of food to the deceased ancestors. But it is Lord Viṣṇu who is the real recipient of both these offerings.

4. VV.22.23 echo the Upaniṣadic epithets of the Brahman, vide Tait.Up. 3.6.1, Bṛhadāraṇyaka 4.4,25, etc.

5. VV 41-44 emphasize that devotion to and worship of Viṣṇu is the Kriyā-Yoga and it absolves one of all accumulated sins.

6. This refers to the Maitrāyaṇī Up. and not to the Maitrī Up. as given in Jacob's Concordance. But the Maitrāyaṇī 6.22 states that Śabda and Para are two Brahmans and one who is expert in Śabda brahman attains to Para Brahman :

> dve brahmaṇī Veditavye Śabda-brahma paraṁ ca yat |
> Śabda-brahmaṇi niṣṇātaḥ paraṁ brahmādhigacchati ||
>
> VI-22.

But the NP. (VV 57-60) states that apara brahma is that which is combined with ahaṁkāra (ego) i.e. it is the individual soul or Kṣetrajña and NOT Śabda-brahman as stated in the Maitrāyaṇī above.

7. Mahāvākya literally means 'a sentence conveying great import' (mahad= mahadartha—prakāśakaṁ vākyam). And the term is used according to the main interest of the user. Thus to Viśvanātha (in the Sāhitya darpaṇa) it connotes 'any long continuous composition or literary work.' The NP., however, implies the 12 sacred utterances of the Upaniṣads, e.g.

tat-tvamasi (Chāndogya Up. VI.8.7 and aham brahmāsmi (Br.Up. I.4.10)

Satyaṁ jñānam anantam brahma (Tai-Up. II-1, 1) and others.

8. In translating this term I emended the text of the NP. as māyaivajñā- nalabdena by māyaivājñāna-sabdena, etc. The Venkat press text of the NP. is obviously wrong and a probable misprint as can be seen from its context. NP. ch.33 and Brn.ch. 31 are textually identical. And Brn. 31.71 reads:

māyaivājñāna-śabdena śabdyate muni-sattama /

Hence the validity of my emendation. The textual identity between NP. Part I and Brn. is too well known to need elaboration here.

9. vide YS.II.29.

10. YS.II.30 gives only five Yamas to which the NP. adds two more, viz, akrodha (absence of anger) and anasūyā (non-jealousy).

11. Cf. Śauca-santoṣa-tapaḥ-svādhyāyeśvara-praṇidhānāni niyamāḥ, YS.II.32. The NP. adds here 'performance of Sandhyā prayers' as a niyama.

12. An echo of king Yayāti's famous words of repentance :

Na jātu kāmaḥ kāmānām upabhogena śāmyati /
Haviṣā kṛṣṇa-vartmeva bhūya evābhivardhate //

*Mbh-Ādi.*85.12

13. The bodily postures mentioned here are described (sometimes under different names) in hand books on yogic practice like the Yoga-pradīpikā and others and as such their description here is superfluous. It is interesting to note that Vyāsa in his com. on YS.II.46 recommends most of these.

14. Cf.YS.II.48 which states that as a result of mastering the postures, he is unassailed by extremes (like heat and cold).

15. Cf. YS.II.54 : "The withdrawal of the senses is, as it were, the imitation of the mind-stuff itself on the part of the organs, by disjoining themselves from their objects."

As the Commentator Vyāsa explains : "When there is no conjunction with their own objects, the organs in imitation of the mind-stuff, as it is in itself, become as it were restricted."

16. VV 133-137 describe what form of god Viṣṇu should be the object of meditation.

17. Cf. YS.III.2. tatra pratyayaikatānatā dhyānam /

18. Cf. Kaṭha Up.2.20, *Śvet.*3.20, *Mahānārāyaṇa Up.*8.9.

19. The identity of the trinity of gods (Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Śiva) with the three mātrās of Om has been a popular concept in later Upaniṣads like the Nṛsiṁha Uttara-Tāpanīya and in Purāṇas.

CHAPTER THIRTYFOUR

The Characteristics of Devotion to Hari

Nārada said :

1. O great sage, all the ancillaries of the Yoga have been recounted by you. Now once again, O ominiscient one, what I ask may be narrated to me.

2-3. It has been mentioned by you that Yoga is realised only by the devotees. That person with whom the lord of all is pleased has perpetual devotional feelings. O omniscient sage, O ocean of mercy, kindly recount to me how Janārdana, the lord of Devas, the lord of all, is satisfied (and becomes gracious).

Sanaka said :

4. O Brāhmaṇa, if you desire to attain liberation from saṁsāra worship (with your heart and soul) the great lord Nārāyaṇa whose body is constituted of existence (sat), consciousness (cit) and Bliss (ānanda).

5. The enemies do not molest him; the planets do not affect him adversely; the Rākṣasas do not look at the man devoted to Viṣṇu.

6. He whose devotion to Janārdana, the lord of Devas, is firm and unswerving, realises all welfare and happiness. Hence, those who are devotees are superior to all.

7. Those two legs which proceed towards the abode (temple) of Viṣṇu are fruitful. Those two hands which are engaged in the worship of Viṣṇu should be known as the most fruitful.

8. Those two eyes of men which perceive Janārdana are the most fruitful; that tongue which is engaged in (repeating the) names of Hari is mentioned by good people (as the real tongue).

9. With upraised arm it is emphatically proclaimed that it is the truth, (and nothing but) the truth again, that there is no entity equal to the spiritual preceptor and there is no other God who is geater than Keśava.

10. I am speaking the truth. I am telling you the most wholesome thing. I am repeating the essence again and again. In this world which is vain and worthless, the only true thing is Hari's worship.

11. Be supremely happy by cutting off with the axe of devotion to Hari, the extremely strong entangled noose of worldly existence which causes great delusion.

12. That mind which is attached to Viṣṇu, that speech which is absorbed in him (i.e. Viṣṇu) and those ears which are filled with the essence of his stories—all these are honoured in the world.

13. O Nārada, worship continuously the imperishable Bliss that is devoid of the three forms of Avasthās (states),* the lord who is stationed in the middle of Ākāśa (the firmament).

14. O leading sage, it is not at all possible to see or point out his abode or form to persons who are not self-possessed.

15-18. When he remains endowed with the (external) Karaṇas (sense-organs and organs of activity), the eternal immanent soul is called Jāgrat (in the waking state). When he moves about, out of his own will and is endowed with all the internal Karaṇas (senses) the Ātman is called Dreaming, when he is not in deep slumber. When he has neither the external Karaṇas nor the internal Karaṇas, when the Ātman is devoid of form, when he is freed from both merits and sins, when he has the form of Bliss, when the lord is devoid of all conditioning factors, when he is without attributes, the lord identical with the great Brahman, is sung about as Suṣupta (sunk in slumber).

19. O leading Brāhmaṇa this universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings is merely the product of imagination. It is as unsteady as the lightning. Hence worship Janārdana.

20. The lord of the worlds is pleased with only that person who practises non-violence, truthfulness, celibacy and Aparigraha (Abstention from accepting monetary gifts or non-possession of property).

21. If a person is endowed with the quality of mercy towards all living beings, is engaged in the worship of Brāhmaṇas, the lord of the universe, the suppressor of demons Madhu and Kaiṭabha, is pleased with him.

22. If a person takes delight in the stories of the good, if

* The three states are waking, dreaming, and sound sleep. These states are described in VV 15-18 below.

he narrates the stories of the good, if he associates with saintly persons and if he is devoid of egotism, the lord of goddess Lakṣmī (i.e. Viṣṇu) is pleased with him.

23. On the occasions of hunger, thirst and commission of blunders, if anyone always repeats the names of Viṣṇu incessantly, Viṣṇu becomes pleased with him.

24. If a woman loves her husband like her own Prāṇas (vital breath), if she is engaged in the worship of her husband, O sage, the lord of the universe becomes pleased with her and bestows his own region on her.

25. Keśava is satisfied and delighted with those who are devoid of jealousy and egotism and those who are engaged in the worship of Devas.

26. Hence, O celestial sage, listen. Always worship Hari. Do not be egotistic and arrogant in vain, due to the prosperity and glory that are as unsteady as the lightning.

27. The body is in contact with death; the life is very fickle; wealth is always liable to be affected (confiscated) by kings and others; riches are transitory.

28. Don't you see, O celestial sage, half the span of life is wasted in sleep? How much of life is lost in such activities as taking food, etc. !

29. How much of life is wasted in vain in infancy and old age ! How much (is spent) by way of enjoyment of pleasures of the sensuous objects. When will he then perform holy rites?

30. The worship of Acyuta may not be possible in childhood or in the old age. Hence, you perform the holy rites during the period of youth itself, refraining from egotistic feelings.

31. O sage, do not suffer destruction by being submerged in the deep cavity of worldly existence. The body is the abode of ruination (and death), the greatest receptacle of adversities.

32. The body (which is supposed to be the seat of enjoyment) is much defiled by feces and other impurities. Why should a man commit sins in vain by mistaking it to be permanent?

33. No faith or belief should be placed in this worldly existence that is worthless, that is accompanied by various kinds of miseries, and that is definitely rendered more disorderly through death.

34-35. Hence O leading Brāhmaṇa, listen. What I am telling you is the truth. In order to prevent the recurrence of the advent of body in the next birth, eschew false prestige and covetousness, be devoid of lust and fury and continuously worship Viṣṇu. For the birth as a human being is extremely difficult to get.

36. O excellent one, human birth is somehow achieved with great difficulty by one who has wandered through thousands and crores of births as an immobile being, etc.

37. Even there, O excellent one, the inclination of the intellect towards the (worship, etc. of) deities, charitable gifts and enjoyment of pleasures is the fruit of austerities performed by men in the course of previous births.

38. Who can be more stupid than he who after attaining the rare human life (i.e. birth as a human being) does not worship Hari even once? He is insentient and of sluggish intellect.

39. Where is the sense of discrimination in those bloody fools who do not worship Hari even after attaining the human birth?

40. The lord of the universe, if propitiated, grants the desired benefits. O Brāhmaṇa which person who is being scorched by the fire of worldly existence, shall not worship him?

41. O excellent sage, even a Cāṇḍāla who is a devotee of Viṣṇu, is superior to a Brāhmaṇa. Even a Brāhmaṇa devoid of devotion to Viṣṇu is the worst king of Cāṇḍāla (who cooks dog's flesh for food).

42. Hence, one should eschew lust and other (base emotions) and worship the unchanging Hari. If he is pleased everything is pleased, since Hari is omnipresent.

43. Just as all other foot-prints get merged in the big foot-print of an elephant so also the universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings gets merged in Viṣṇu alone.

44. Just as the universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings is pervaded by the firmament, so also it is pervaded by Hari.

45. Death of men is due to birth, and death is the cause of the subsequent birth. Know, that both of them are near at hand and their destruction is brought only by service to Hari.

46. If meditated upon, remembered, worshipped or bowed-to, Janārdana severs the bondage of worldly existence who then would not worship him ?

47. O Brāhmanical sage, by the mere utterance of his names, great sins are destroyed; on worshipping him a man attains salvation.

48. Still, O Brāhmaṇa, it is surprising; it is astonishing ! It is simply astounding that all people undergo the sufferings of recurring worldly existence even when the name of Hari is present.

49. O ascetic, I shall aver you the truth again and again. As one is being led by the soldiers of Yama, one is incapable of achieving Dharma.

50. If one wishes for salvation, one should worship Viṣṇu as long as there is no defect in the sense organs and as long as no sickness harasses one.

51. Mṛtyu (the God of Death) is present near the creature from the very moment of its coming out of its mother's womb. Hence, one should be engaged in Dharma.

52. Alas ! It is a pity. Ah ! How pitiful it is ! It is a pity that even after realising that the body is perishable, he (the worldly-minded man) does not perform holy rites.

53. Raising up the arm it is proclaimed: ..."It is truth. It is the truth, that after eschewing religious hypocrisy and arrogance, one should worship Vāsudeva".

54. O Nārada, I raise my arm and repeatedly proclaim what is beneficial. Eschewing completely envy and false-hood, Viṣṇu should be worshipped with heart and Soul.

55. The root of mental distress is anger. It is wrath which binds one to the worldly existence. Fury causes destruction of Dharma. Hence, one should avoid it.

56. The birth has its root in lust; lust is the cause of sin; lust causes the destruction of fame. Hence, one shall shun it.

57. It is remembered that malicious spite is the cause of all sorts of miseries; it is the way (lit. cause) of attainment of hell. Hence, one should eschew that also.

58. The cause of bondage and liberation of men is their mind itself. Hence, one should be happy after dedicating it to the Supreme Ātman.

59. O the dare-devilry of men ! O the fool-hardiness of men ! O the mindless arrogance of the people. Even when Viṣṇu, the lord of the universe, is present, those haughty fellows do not worship him.

60. Without propitiating Acyuta, the lord of all worlds, the creator of everything, how do they who are submerged in the ocean of worldly existence, cross the same ?

61. I solemnly assert the truth repeatedly that all ailments perish, thanks to the medicine in the form of uttering the Names of the Lord like Acyuta, Ananta, Govinda.

62. "O Nārāyaṇa, O Jagannātha, O Vāsudeva, O Janārdana." Those who continuously utter these names of God are honoured everywhere.

63. O leading sage, seek refuge in that deity whose prowess, Brahmā and other deities have not understood even till to-day.

64. Alas, the foolishness of the wicked-minded ones ! Alaṣ, the stupidity ! O the idioticness (of people), O Nārada, they do not know that Viṣṇu is stationed in the lotus of the heart (and nowhere else).

65. O leading sage, listen to what I repeatedly say. Hari is delighted with those who possess faith. He is not pleased with or enamoured of riches or kinsmen.

66. O excellent one, in every birth, men endowed with devotion to Viṣṇu, shall possess the good fortune of having plenty of kinsmen, riches and sons.

67. This body is the root of sins. It is engaged in sinful activities. On realising this, Janārdana should always be worshipped.

68. There is no doubt at all in this, that those who are engaged in the worship of Hari, shall be blessed with many sons, friends, womenfolk, etc. as well as all riches.

69. He who is desirous of attaining happiness here and hereafter, shall worship Hari continuously. He who is desirous of unhappiness here and hereafter may engage himself in censuring others.

70. Fie upon the life of those who are devoid of devotion to Janārdana, the lord of Devas. Again and again fie upon that wealth (which is not donated in the charitable gift to the deserving persons).

71. O excellent sage, that body should be known as the mine of sins, the body that does not bow down to Viṣṇu, the destroyer of Karmans.

72. If anyone hoards and preserves wealth that has not been distributed among deserving persons, know that it is certainly like that wealth which is preserved by a thief in the world.

73. Those who are proud and arrogant due to the wealth that is as unsteady as lightning, and that is momentary do not propitiate the lord of the universe, the deity who separates the Jīva from its bonds of Saṁsāra.

74. The creation is said to be of two kinds as differentiated by the Divine and Demoniac. That creation which is endowed with devotion to Hari is the Divine one. That which is devoid of it is considered to be demoniac.

75. Hence, O leading Brāhmaṇa, listen. Those who are absorbed in devotion to Hari are the excellent ones and are well known everywhere since Bhakti is extremely rare.

76. Keśava is delighted with those persons who are devoid of envy, are engaged in the protection of the Brāhmaṇas and are devoid of lust and other base emotions.

77. Those who are engaged in serving Viṣṇu by sweeping (the premises of the temple) and other activities and those who are eager to bestow charitable gifts on the deserving persons attain the greatest region.

CHAPTER THIRTYFIVE

A Disquisition on Spiritual Knowledge[1]
(The Anecdote of Vedamāli.)

Sanaka said :

1. Again I shall recount the greatness of the discus-bearing Lord of Devas. Heaps of sins of those who read and listen shall perish thereby.

2. Those who are quiescent, have conquered the group of six enemies, viz. lust, fury, covetousness, delusion, arrogance and malice and have not become arrogant even due to their Yogic power, and worship the unchanging deity of the form of Jñāna (spiritual knowledge) through Jñāna Yoga (the path of knowledge).

3. Those who are purified by means of ablution in holy waters, observances of holy vows, charitable gifts, austerities and sacrifices, worship Acyuta, the creator of all, by means of Karma Yoga, the path of holy rites.[2]

4. Greedy persons, ignorant ones, those who indulge in vices—do not worship the lord of the universe. Those men of confused intellect think they are devoid of old age and death. They are worms of men who continue to remain so.

5. Those who are proud due to their prosperity and glory that is as evanescent as the streak of lightning, those who are vainglorious and defiled by arrogance, do not worship the lord of universe who creates and lays down all sorts of welfare.

6. In this world, fortunately, a few are born who are engaged in Hari's Dharma, are quiescent, serve the lotuslike feet of Hari and who take interest in blessing all worlds.

7. He who worships Hari with devotion mentally, physically, and verbally, attains the greatest abode which is the most excellent of all excellent things in the universe.

8. In this context, they cite this ancient mythological anecdote which destroys the sins of those who read and listen.

9. I shall (now) recount that narrative of Yajñamāli and Sumāli, by merely listening to which one may attain the benefit of a horse-sacrifice.

10. O Brāhmaṇa, formerly in the Raivata Manvantara[3] there was a Brāhmaṇa well-known as Vedamāli. He was a master of the Vedas and the Vedāṅgas (the six ancillaries like Śikṣā, Chandas, etc.).

11. He was kind-hearted and merciful towards all living beings. He was absorbed in the worship of Hari. He became interested in amassing wealth for his sons, friends and wife.

12. He regularly sold those things which are forbidden; he regularly conversed with Cāṇḍālas and others. He accepted monetary gifts from them.

13. He sold his austerities; he sold his Vratas (holy rites) (i.e. performed them in return for monetary consideration), he went on pilgrimage on behalf of others. He did (all those) for the sake of his wife.

14. O Brāhmaṇa, as time passed on, two sons were born to him. They were Yajñamāli and Sumāli. They were twins of great splendour.

15. Then, out of affection, the father who was full of too much of affection, nourished them by means of many articles.

16. After strenuously amassing wealth by many means, Vedamāli began to count it in order to understand how much it amounted to.

17. After counting his treasure which amounted to many billions, he was much delighted. He wondered at the thought of so much of wealth.

18. (He thought :—) "This wealth has been earned and accumulated by me through the acceptance of monetary gifts from bad people, through selling prohibited goods and through such other means such as selling of austerities.

19. My unbearable thirst (for gold) has not been pacified till now. It covets to possess innumerable gold pieces as huge as the mount Meru.

20. Alas, I consider it as one (involving) great pain and the source of all strenuous means. One attains all desires, but again one covets still other things.[4]

21. As one grows old his hairs (turn grey); the teeth become old (and feeble); the eyes (sight) and ears (power of listening) become feeble but his longing and yearning for more grow young.

22. All my sense-organs have become feeble and weak; my strength has been subdued (and dwindled) by old age but my longing has attained its prime of youth.

23. Only he is a real scholar and a learned man, the man whose Āśā (yearning, hope) has been quelled. (If it is not quelled) the quietest man will be the most furious and the most intelligent one will have extremely confused mind.

24. Āśā (longing) causes frustration and disappointment among men. It is like an invincible enemy. If an intelligent man desires permanent happiness he must eschew Āśā.

25. With great force, Āśā destroys strength, brilliance, fame, learning, honour, prosperous state and nobility of birth.

26. This is being mentioned to the dismay of men overwhelmed with Āśā (yearning, hope) that even a Cāṇḍāla who gives away something is superior to them.

27. Those who are in the vicious grip of Āśā (yearning) are men of great delusion and of too much arrogance. Alas ! they are never conscious of the pangs of being miserably) disrespected, etc.

28. This enormous wealth has been hoarded by me after undergoing many hardships. The body has been rendered old and emaciated. Old age has taken away the energy.

29. Henceforth, I shall endeavour eagerly (and earnestly) for the sake of the other world". After deciding thus, O leading Brāhmaṇa, he became absorbed in the path of righteousness.

30. At the very same time, he divided his assets into four parts. He kept two parts of his accumulated wealth for himself.

31-32. The two remaining parts he gave his two sons. Thereafter, with the intention of destroying the sins accumulated by him, he built water sheds and parks, got lakes dug up, and built many temples.[5] He distributed cooked food and other charitable gifts on the banks of the Gaṅgā.

33. After having distributed his entire possessions thus, he became imbued with devotion to Hari. He went to the forest-abode of Nara and Nārāyaṇa for performing penance.[6]

34. There he saw a very beautiful hermitage frequented by sages and embellished with groups of trees bearing fruits and flowers.

35. Its splendidness had been heightened by old sages who eulogised the great Brahman, who were engaged in pondering over the topics in the scriptural texts and who were absorbed in service to the lord.

36. There he saw a sage named Jānanti[7] who was surrounded by his disciples, who was eulogising the great Brahman, and who appeared like a mass of splendour.

37. On seeing the sage who was devoid of passionate attachment and other similar base feelings, who was endowed with the good qualities of Śama (self-control), etc. and who subsisted only on dry decaying leaves, Vedamāli bowed to him.

38. O sage, with bulbous roots, roots, fruits and other things, sage Jānanti greeted the guest taking him to be Nārāyaṇa himself.

39. On being hospitably received and honoured by him, Vedamāli bowed down with humility, kept his palms joined in reverence and spoke to the sage who was the most excellent among fluent speakers.

40. "O holy Sir, O learned one, I am contented. My sin is removed. O blessed one, uplift me by imparting me (the gift of) perfect knowledge."

41. Thus requested by him, the excellent sage Jānanti the eloquent speaker laughingly spoke to Vedamāli endowed with good qualities.

Jānanti said :—

42. O leading Brāhmaṇa, listen : I shall succinctly enunciate the way of severance from worldly existence. It is very difficult to get (bring into practice) indeed for those who are not self-possessed.

43. Perpetually worship Viṣṇu, the greatest deity; continuously remember lord Nārāyaṇa. Never indulge in slandering others or backbiting.

44. O highly intelligent one, be always engaged in helping others and in worshipping Hari. Avoid close contact with the fools.

45. By avoiding lust and fury, covetousness and delusion, haughtiness and malicious spite and by viewing (considering) the whole world like your own Ātman, you will attain peace and quietude.

46. Never be envious. Never blame others. Avoid hypocritical conduct of life, egotism and ruthlessness.

47. Show kindness to all living beings. Render service to the good. Even to those who enquire, do not reveal the righteous actions performed by you.

48. Do not overlook if you see people engaged in evil ways of life. Worship guests every day in accordance with your capacity and without detriment to your family.

49. Without any (specific) desire, worship Nārāyaṇa, the lord of the universe, by means of flowers and leaves, Dūrvā grass, sprouts or fruits.[8]

50. In accordance with the injunctions, propitiate Devas, pitṛs and sages. O Brāhmaṇa, be interested in the due maintenance of holy fire.

51. Every day, with great concentration be engaged in the sweeping and scrubbing of the temple (of Viṣṇu) with due care. Smear it also duly.[9]

52. Join the broken parts and always repair the decaying sections in a temple. Beautify the path of and illuminate the temple of Viṣṇu.

53. Always worship Mādhava at least with bulbous roots, fruits and roots. Worship him by means of circumambulations, obeisances and recitals of prayers.

54. Every day, according to your capacity listen to or read the Purāṇas as well as the Vedāntic texts.

55. If this is strictly followed, you will have the most excellent knowledge. Certainly one is absolved of all sins, through perfect knowledge.

56. Thus enlightened by him, Vedamāli, of great intellect, became absorbed in the (path of) knowledge continuously and attained a small quantum of perfect knowledge.

57. On one occasion, urged by the quantum of perfect knowledge, Vedamāli began to think to himself like this. "Who am I? What is my duty?

58. How was I born? Of what nature is my form?" Thus, he began to think and muse by day and night alertly.

59. Unable to come to any decision, Vedamāli, the excellent Brāhmaṇa, came again to Jānanti, bowed to him and said thus :—

Vedamāli said :

60. O preceptor, O foremost one among the knowers of Brahman, my mind is much confused. Who am I ? What is my rite ? How am I born ? Tell me.

Jānanti said :—

61. O highly blessed one, true. It is certainly true that your mind is confused. The mind is the abode of Avidyā (ignorance). How will it attain good nature ?

62. When you say the word 'My' it is certainly a misconception. O learned one, the egotism is a quality of the mind and not of the Ātman.

63. Moreover, O Vedamāli, it has been mentioned by you thus : "who am I ?" How can I ascribe a name to one who is devoid of name and nativity ?

64. How can I mention the name of the deity devoid of form, of the deity who is incomprehensible ? His nature is incomparable. He is the supreme Ātman, devoid of attributes.

65. How can the activity of the Ātman who is the embodiment of Supreme Splendour, perfect, immutable and of indiscernible nature be described.

66. O Brāhmaṇa, the Ātman is the self-luminous, eternal, infinite, Supreme Soul. How can the action and the birth of that Ātman be spoken of ?

67. The great eternal Brahman is devoid of age, is comprehensible only through perfect knowledge. O Brāhmaṇa, there is nothing else that is fuller and more blissful than that.

68. The knowledge through the statements such as 'That thou art' etc. is the means of achievement of salvation. When the unobstructed knowledge is achieved, everything becomes identical with Brahman.

69. O excellent sage, thus enlightened by him, Vedamāli realised the Ātman, Lord Acyuta, in his own soul and rejoiced.

70. He came to the conclusion...."I alone am the self-luminous Brahman, unsullied and unlimited by the conditioning factors", and he attained the deepest calmness and peace.

71. Thereafter, Vedamāli bowed down to his preceptor Jānanti, the leading sage, for the sake of formality and became absorbed in the meditation for ever.

72. After a lapse of time, O leading sage, Vedamāli reached the city of Vārāṇasī and attained salvation.

73. He who reads or listens to this chapter with great attention shall be severed from all bonds of Karman and attain happiness.

CHAPTER THIRTYFIVE

1. Although the chapter is called "Disquisition on Spiritual knowledge (Jñāna-Nirūpaṇa) in its colophon, it is the story of a Brāhmaṇa called Vedamāli who after earning wealth by unscrupulous means repented in after-life and after giving half of it to his sons, spent his share in public welfare-works and under the spiritual guidance of sage Jānanti, performed austere penance, was enlightened about the nature of the Ātman and ultimately reached Mokṣa at Vārāṇasī.

This Vedamāli does not appear in any other Purāṇa (vide V. Mani's P.E.-Purāṇic Encyclopaedia). Obviously this narrative is the special contribution of the NP. to illustrate how charity, spiritual knowledge and penance lead to Liberation from Saṁsāra.

This chapter and the subsequent ones give the story of two generations of the Vedamāli family.

2. The NP. prescribes both Jñāna-yoga and Karma-yoga for attaining Mokṣa but as emphasised in V.7 below, the path of devotion is the best one to illustrate which the narrative of Yajñamāli and Sumāli is told (in the next chapter and this chapter is limited to the story of their father Vedamāli.)

3. This is the fifth Manvantara of the present era. According to the Bh.P., Vikuṇṭha is Viṣṇu's incarnation, Vibhu is the Indra and Hiraṇyaroman, etc. are the seven sages in this Manvantara.

4. Such wise sayings (Subhāṣitas) as recorded in VV. 20ff are common to many Purāṇas and other works like Vairāgya-Śataka (vide Index to Subhāṣita-ratna-bhāṇḍāra). Their counter-parts in Pāli (e.g. in the Dhamma Pada, Thera and Therī gāthās) and in Prakrits show that this fund of wisdom was the common legacy of ancient Indians.

5. Such acts come under Pūrta-dharma and include works of public utility. In the Upaniṣads the compound Iṣṭāpūrta is used to include sacrificial performances as well (vide Praśna I-9, Muṇḍaka I.2.10, but there these are denigrated as not leading to Mokṣa but to Svarga after which the person falls to lower worlds). But Varāha Purāṇa declares that the Pūrta-dharma leads to Mokṣa

iṣṭena labhate svargaṃ pūrte mokṣaṁ ca vindati |

—Varāha P. 172.33

Cf. Yama-Smṛti 68, Atri Saṁhitā 145.

6. i.e. Badari-Vana in the Garhwal, U.P.

7. The Sage Jānanti is untraced in other Purāṇas (vide Purāṇic Ency. under J). Like Vedamāli this is a creation of the NP. The Prakrit √Jāṇa—'to know' (<Sh.√Jñā) seems to have influenced the author in coining this name :

8. An echo of Patraṁ puṣpaṁ phalaṁ toyaṁ yo me bhaktyā prayacchati, etc. in the BG. IX.26.

9. The NP. lays great stress on the repairs, maintenance, etc., of old (Viṣṇu) temples; vide the story of Yajñamāli in the next chapter.

CHAPTER THIRTYSIX

The Efficacy of Service Unto Viṣṇu. The Story of Yajñamāli and Sumāli

Sanaka said :

1. O excellent sage, the story of the two sons of Vedamāli who had been mentioned before, viz. Yajñamāli and Sumāli, is being narrated now.

2. The elder of the two, viz. Yajñamāli divided the assets accumulated by his father, into two parts and gave one of the parts to his younger brother.

3-4. O Brāhmaṇa, Sumāli always indulged in all vices. He was absorbed in singing and playing on musical instruments. He was addicted to liquor. He was enamoured of the coquetry of prostitutes. He was interested in other men's wives. Removing (i.e. spending away) the wealth thus, Sumāli squandered all the wealth.

5. When all the gold hoarded by his father had been squandered, he continued to be interested in harlots by stealing other men's wealth.

6. On seeing the (evil) conduct of Sumāli, Yajñamāli of great intellect became distressed much and spoke to his brother thus :—

7. "O younger brother, enough of this wrong and evil conduct. In our family, you alone are interested in this great sin. You are the only wicked-minded fellow born in our family.

8. When the elder brother thus tried to wean him (from evil ways) by diverse methods on many occasions, Sumāli took a sword in his hand and caught hold of his elder brother by his tuft of hair on his head deciding to himself, "I will kill him".

9. Thereafter, a terrific uproar took place in the city. The infuriated citizens bound Sumāli.

10. But Yajñamāli, (the depth of feelings in) whose heart could not be measured, became distressed. He was deluded by fraternal affection. He implored the citizens and got his brother liberated from the bondage.

11. Again Yajñamāli split his (remaining) wealth into two parts. He took half of his assets and gave the other half to his younger brother.

12. But Sumāli who was haughty and whose soul was excessively confounded, O Nārada, squandered that wealth too by enjoying it along with fools, heretics and Cāṇḍālas.

13. The riches of wicked men are for the enjoyment of men of evil ways. The Neem (Margosa) tree laden with plenty of fruits is enjoyed only by crows.

14. O sage, Sumāli wasted that wealth also given by his brother. He became inebriated by drinking liquor. He (unhesitatingly) ate beef and other forbidden foodstuffs.

15. He was excommunicated by his kinsmen along with his Cāṇḍāla women. O Brāhmaṇa, he was arrested (and punished) by the king.

16. O Brāhmaṇa, Yajñamāli of good intellect was always absorbed in righteous activities. All his sins were wiped off, thanks to his association with the good. He distributed cooked food without restriction.

17. O excellent one, he strenuously maintained all the lakes and other things erected by his father. He was always engrossed in pious rites.

18. All the wealth of Yajñamāli of great Ātman was distributed among good men. He was a follower of the righteous path and he abided by his principle of giving charitable gifts to the deserving.

19. O ! The riches of good men are for the enjoyment of the good. All the fruits of the wish-yielding tree are enjoyed only by the immortal Devas.

20. After distributing his wealth in pious and charitable acts (for the sake of piety), Yajñamāli of great intellect engaged himself in the continuous service in the abode of Viṣṇu.

21. As time passed on, Yajñamāli and Sumāli who attained old age died simultaneously.

22. Hari despatched his aerial chariot filled by his attendants to the noble-souled Yajñamāli who was engaged in the regular worship of Hari.

23-25. Yajñamāli of great intellect got into the divine chariot. He was being worshipped by the groups of Devas; he was being eulogised by leading sages. Gandharvas sang about him. Groups of Apsaras served him. He was being nourished by the divine wish-yielding cow Kāmadhenu. He was bedecked in various kinds of ornaments. He adorned himself with tender garlands of Tulasī leaves. He shone as the storehouse of brilliance. As he was going to the divine region of Viṣṇu, he saw his younger brother on the way.

26-27. He was being beaten by the soldiers of Yama. He was afflicted with hunger and thirst. He had become a ghost. He was naked, miserable and bound by nooses. He ran about here and there. He was crying helplessly. He was weeping and lamenting. On seeing him, he (Yajñamāli) was excessively distressed in his mind.

28. Overwhelmed by sympathy, Yajñamāli asked the emissaries of Viṣṇu who were near him, with his palms joined in reverence. He asked :—"Who is this man harassed by the soldiers of Yama ?"

29. Then those emissaries of Hari spoke thus to Yajñamāli of great power. "This is Sumāli, the sinful soul, your brother".

30. O Nārada, on hearing what was explained by the servants of Viṣṇu, Yajñamāli was mentally depressed. He asked them again :

31. "Please tell the remedy by means of which his liberation from the hoarded heaps of sins may become possible. Indeed you are my kinsmen.

32-33. Those who are adepts in Dharma say that friendship originates in seven words spoken or seven steps walked together. The friendship of good men is based on (exchanging) seven words (or accompanying seven steps). But that of very good men (the friendship) is contracted in three words (or steps). Those who are very very good men have friendship at every step (word).

34. Hence, you are my kinsmen. You have come to take me (to heaven). How is my brother to be liberated ? May this be kindly explained".

35. On hearing the words of Yajñamāli, the sympathetic emissaries of Viṣṇu spoke to Yajñamāli who was a favourite of Hari. They spoke with their faces beaming with smiles. Viṣṇu's emissaries said :

36. "O highly blessed Yajñamāli, absorbed (in the devotion) to Nārāyaṇa, we shall mention to you the means that will accord living liberation to Sumāli.

37. We shall succinctly recount to you the great work that had been performed by you in your previous birth.[1] Listen to it with great attention.

38. Formerly, you were born of a Vaiśya family. You were remembered by the name Viśvambhara. Countless and great sins were committed by you.

39-40. You were devoid of even traces of good deeds. You opposed even your parents. Once, when you were forsaken by your kinsmen, you were afflicted by grief and distress. You were oppressed by the fire of hunger. Thus you reached a temple of Hari. There had been a downpour and the whole place became marshy.

41. The mud was removed by you, since you desired to stay there. This became the service of smearing in the temple of Viṣṇu.

42. O Brāhmaṇa, you stayed in that temple during that night. You were bitten by a serpent and you died.

Thanks to the power of your meritorious deed of smearing and scrubbing, the birth as a Brāhmaṇa was attained by you. Your devotion to Hari was steady.

43. You will reach the presence of Hari and stay there for a hundred crores of Kalpas. Afterwards you will acquire spiritual knowledge and attain the great salvation.

44. You desire to uplift your younger brother who is the greatest sinner. We shall tell you the means thereof. O highly intelligent one, understand it.

45. You donate to your brother the benefit of smearing an area extending to a Gocarma. O highly blessed one, thus kindly uplift your brother."

46. Thus urged by the emissaries of Viṣṇu, the highly intelligent Yajñamāli gave that much merit to his brother for the sake of liberation from sins.

47. Through the merit bestowed by his brother, Sumāli became free from sins. The emissaries of Yama left him off and fled.

48. An aerial chariot that contained all means of enjoyment of pleasures came there immediately. O sage, Sumāli then stepped into the heavenly vehicle and rejoiced.

49. O Brāhmaṇa, both the brothers were bowed to by groups of Devas. By embracing each other they attained great pleasure.

50. Being eulogised by great sages and sung about by Gandharvas, Yajñamāli and Sumāli went to Viṣṇu's world.

51. Attaining Sālokya (stay in the same region) with Hari, O excellent sage, Sumāli and Yajñamāli lived there joyously for the period of a Kalpa.

52. After enjoying many pleasures there, Yajñamāli of great intellect, became richly endowed with perfect knowledge and attained the great salvation (Mokṣa).

53. The highly blessed Sumāli rejoiced in the Viṣṇuloka (region of Lord Viṣṇu). (Afterwards) he came to the Earth again and was born as a Brāhmaṇa.

54. He was born in a very pure family. He had all good qualities. He was a master of the Vedas. He was endowed with all riches. He was devoted to Hari.

55-56. Repeating the names of Hari, he reached the banks of the Gaṅgā. He took his bath in the Gaṅgā. After seeing lord Viśveśvara he attained the greatest abode, difficult of access even to the Yogins. O leading sage, the great merit accruing from smearing Viṣṇu's temple, has been recounted to you.

57-59a. Hence, the lord of the worlds should be, with best possible efforts, worshipped. Those who worship Viṣṇu even for once, without any specific desire, never get entangled in the worldly existence. Those who worship people engaged in the devotion of Hari thinking them to be Hari himself, are delightedly blessed by Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara.

59b-61. Even a great sinner is liberated from all sins by the mere contact with those who came into contact with those devoted to Hari.

Those who are engaged in the service of those who are devoted to Hari and of those who are engaged in the repetitions of the names of Hari, attain the greatest goal, even if they happen to be sinners.

CHAPTER THIRTYSIX

1. As mentioned above, all names in this story of Vedamāli family are fictitious. Thus Sumāli a demon mentioned in the Brahmāṇḍa P.3.7.99 and in the Yuddha Kāṇḍa of the Kamba Rāmāyaṇa have no connection with this son of Vedamāli.

2. This chapter is intended to describe the efficacy of even menial service rendered to a shrine of Viṣṇu without intending any service to the deity. Thus the wicked Vaiśya Viśvambhara who had committed countless sins and who after ex-communication was driven to the temple of Viṣṇu for refuge due to the downpour of rain, became a holy Brāhmaṇa called Yajñamāli, the son of Vedamāli simply because he, in that birth, removed the mud in the temple of Viṣṇu for his night-stay there but he was bitten by a serpent and he died.

CHAPTER THIRTYSEVEN

The Greatness of Viṣṇu : The Story of Gulika,[1] The Hunter

Sanaka said :

1. O leading Brâhmaṇa, listen once again to the greatness of the lord of Lakṣmī. What person is not delighted to hear the nectarine stories of Hari ?

2. To men blinded by sensual objects, to those whose minds are agitated by the feelings of 'mine-ness', the only thing that destroys all sins is the name of Hari.

3. If anyone, even for once, does not bow to Viṣṇu the destroyer of the sins of men, know him to be a Cāṇḍāla (one who cooks dog's flesh for food). Never shall anyone converse with him.

4. O excellent Brâhmaṇa, if no worship of Hari is performed in any house, know that to be on a par with the cremation ground. Never shall one enter it.

5. Those who are devoid of the worship of Hari, those who hate the Vedas, and those who are engaged in the hatred of cows and Brâhmaṇas are said to be Rākṣasas

6. O leading Brâhmaṇa, if anyone is engaged in the hatred of the Brāhmaṇas—no matter who he is—and he worships Govinda, that worship is futile.

7. O highly blessed one, if any one were to worship Janārdana for the destruction of another man's welfare, the very same act of worship immediately kills the worshippers.

8. If a worshipper of Hari commits a sin, he alone is the hater of Viṣṇu, so say the persons who are experts in the interpretations of principles.

9. Those who are engaged in the worship of Viṣṇu and are interested in blessing (and obliging) the world, and those who are always engaged in the righteous activities are considered to be persons in the eternal form of Viṣṇu.

10. Devotion to Viṣṇu is the result of the merits accumulated in the course of ten million births. How can they who have steady devotion to Viṣṇu be sinfully inclined ?

11. Within a moment the sins accumulated in the course of crores of births, perish, if people are engaged in the worship of Viṣṇu. How can they have sinful intentions?

12. Those who are devoid of devotion to Viṣṇu are said to be Cāṇḍālas. If the Cāṇḍālas are devotionally engaged in the worship of Hari, they are verily excellent persons.

13. Service to Hari is reputed to be the destroyer of all miseries of men blinded by sensuous objects. It yields both worldly pleasures and salvation.

14. If a man worships Viṣṇu as a result of his association, or due to real love, or due to fear, or out of covetousness or due to ignorance, he enjoys inexhaustible happiness.

15. He who drinks even a drop of the water that has washed the feet of Hari, becomes a great favourite of Viṣṇu. He is equal to one who has taken his ablutions in all the sacred waters.

16. The water that has washed the feet of Hari is remembered as something that subdues premature death, that destroys all ailments and that removes all miseries.

17. Nārāyaṇa is the greatest splendour (or the Supreme abode), the most excellent of all luminaries. Salvation is perpetual to those noble-souled ones who seek refuge in Nārāyaṇa.

18. In this context, they cite the following ancient mythological anecdote. It is destructive of all sins of those who read and listen to this.

19. Formerly, in the Kṛta Yuga, there was a hunter named Gulika. He always attempted to abduct other men's wives or to take away other men's wealth.

20. He was always engaged in censuring others. He regularly tortured all creatures. He killed Brāhmaṇas and cows in hundreds and thousands.

21. O Brāhmaṇa, this lord of demonic fellows was always eager to rob godly assets and other men's wealth.

22. So many great sins were committed by him, that it is impossible to enumerate them even in the course of crores of years.

23-24. Once this great sinner who could be compared to the god of death in regard to his dealings with creatures, went to the capital city of the King of Sauvīra. It was filled with all kinds of riches. It was richly decorated with well-adorned women and lakes of translucent water as well as trading centres. It was comparable to the city of gods.

25. There was a beautiful temple of Keśava situated in the middle of a park therein. On seeing that it was covered with golden domes resembling pots, the hunter was very much pleased.

26. The hunter who resembled god of Death and who was ardently longing for stealing, made up his mind thus "I shall take away much of the gold from here" and he went into the temple.

27. There he saw Uttaṅka, the storehouse of austerities, the quiescent excellent Brâhmaṇa, an adept in the interpretation of the principles, and engaged in rendering service to Viṣṇu.

28-29. The Brâhmaṇa who was devoid of desire, was alone. He was eager to meditate. O sage, yet, the hunter regarded him as one who would put obstacles in his act of stealing. Desirous of taking away the collected treasures of the lord, the dare-devil who was very haughty, took out his sword and began to kill Uttaṅka.

30. The hunter pressed down his chest under his foot and caught hold of his matted hair with his hand. On seeing that the hunter had decided to kill him, Uttaṅka spoke thus:—

Uttaṅka said :—

31. O my good man, in vain do you try to kill me, utterly sinless. O intelligent man, tell me in what way I have offended you.

32. My gentle friend, powerful persons in the world chastise the offenders and teach them a lesson. But good men do not kill even the sinners in vain.

33. Good men of calm minds perceive the good qualities present even in the offending fools. And they do not offend them in return.

34. They call him the excellent man, the person who continues to be forbearing even when he is being harassed.* He is the favourite of Viṣṇu for ever.

35. Even at the time of death, a good man thinks of the welfare of others, but he does not become inimical (to his offender). Even when cut, the sandal tree renders the face (i.e. edge) of the hatchet fragrant.

Bodhyamāna* in the text is obviously a misprint for bādhyamāna.

36. Alas! fate is very powerful. It afflicts people in many ways, for even a man who has eschewed all intimate contacts (with worldly affairs) is being harassed by the wicked-minded.

37. Alas! (many) in the world oppress the people in many ways without reason. Even a man who has eschewed all intimate contact (with worldly affairs) is harassed by back-biters and calumniators. There too they harass the good men and never their equals.

38. In this universe, the hunter, the fisherman and the calumniator are the causeless (unreasonable) enemies of the deer, the fish and the good people who maintain themselves with grass, water and contentment.

39. Alas ! the Māyā is very powerful. It deludes the entire universe and makes all people miserable for the sake of sons, friends and women.

40. By looting other people's wealth you have maintained your wife and women dependents. In the end, you have to leave everyone and go alone.

41. "My mother", "My father", "My wife," "My sons" "This is mine". Thus the feelings of 'My-ness' of all creatures harass them in vain.

42. One has (the benefits of having) the kinsmen only as long as one earns wealth. It is the Dharma and Adharma (merits and sins) that remain with one both here and hereafter and not anything else.

43. (Defective) Men who are nourished by means of wealth earned through Dharma as well as Adharma by a person, consign him (that very person) to flames and enjoy rich food soaked in ghee.

44. Only the Dharma and the Adharma follow the man who goes to the other world, not his wealth, nor his sons, nor any of his kinsmen.

45. Lust of men indulging in sinful activities increases (day by day). Lust of men of meritorious deeds becomes reduced and quelled.

46. All people are always unnecessarily worried and agitated over the problem of earning wealth, etc.

47. "What is destined to happen does definitely happen. What is not to occur shall never occur".[8] If people come to this decision, no anxiety worries them at all.

48. The whole of this universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings is under the control of fate. Only fate and none else can know the happening of birth and death.

49. Wherever one may stay, whatever is destined to happen certainly happens. Being ignorant and unaware of it, the whole world exerts itself in vain.

50. Alas ! the misery of men who are worried due to the feelings of 'My-ness' ! Even by committing great sins (those people) assiduously go on feeding others.

51. It is the kinsmen who enjoy all wealth earned by one. Alone and perplexed, one experiences the adverse effects of all one's sins."

52. As the sage said this, Gulika, the hunter became frightened. He let off the sage and with palms joined in reverence repeatedly begged of the sage to forgive him.

53. By the mere presence of Hari and thanks to the power of the association of the good, the hunter became free from sins. Repenting for his misdeeds he said thus :—

54. "O leading Brāhmaṇa, many great sins have been committed by me. All of them have perished at your very sight.

55. Alas ! I have been sinfully inclined. I have continuously committed great sins. O holy lord, how is my redemption possible ? To whom shall I approach for refuge ?

56. I have been born as a hunter due to the sins accumulated in the previous births. By committing sins here too (I do not know) what state I shall attain ?

57. Alas ! My span of life gets reduced quickly. Many sins have been accumulated. I have not atoned for them. What will be my state after death ? What will be my next birth ?

58. Alas ! Why did the creator make me one defiled by hundreds of sins ? I am perpetually becoming more and more sinful. How shall I reap the adverse effects of those sins ? For how many births am I to be one committing terribly fierce deeds ?"

59. Thus censuring his own self, the hunter became scorched by means of the fire of his own mental agony. He died instantaneously.

60. On seeing the fallen hunter, the kind-hearted highly intelligent (sage) Uttaṅka sprinkled him with the water that had washed the feet of Viṣṇu.

61. Thanks to the contact with the water from the feet of Viṣṇu the hunter became free from his sins. Seated in a divine aerial car, he spoke to the sage thus :—

Gulika said :

62. O leading sage Uttaṅka of holy rites, you are my preceptor. I have been freed from the slough of great sins. Thanks to your favour.

63. O leading sage, thanks to your instructions, my distress has gone. Similarly, all sins have been quelled quickly.

64. O sage, since the water from the feet of Viṣṇu has been sprinkled on me by you, I have been enabled to attain the greatest region of Viṣṇu.

65. O Brāhmaṇa, I have been redeemed from this sinful body by you. Hence, O learned one, I bow down unto you. Forgive the misdeed committed by me (or the maltreatment given by me to you)".

66. After saying this he showered the leading sage with divine flowers. After circumambulating him thrice, he prostrated himself before him.

67. Thereafter, he got into the aerial chariot equipped with all desirable things and occupied by the groups of celestial damsels. He then went to the abode of Hari.

68. On seeing this, Uttaṅka, the storehouse of austerities, became surprised. Keeping the palms joined over his head in reverence, he eulogised the lord of Kamalā (Goddess Lakṣmī).

69. Eulogised by him, Mahāviṣṇu granted him an excellent boon. Thanks to that boon Uttaṅka attained the highest region (Mokṣa).

CHAPTER THIRTYSEVEN

1. The story of Gulika, the wicked hunter is given to illustrate how even the worst sinners attain to Mokṣa by seeking refuge in Lord Nārāyaṇa. The story resembles the Vālmiki episode in which Nārada reminds Vālmiki that he alone and none of his relatives should have to answer for his sin. The hunter Gulika repented so deeply due to this admonition that he fell down dead at the shock of the consequences of his sins. The Brāhmaṇa Uttaṅka immediately sprinkled him with water touching Viṣṇu's feet and the wicked hunter, being absolved of all sins paid homage to his Guru Uttaṅka and attained Mokṣa.

In the NP. Gulika is a fictitious figure and Uttaṅka is in no way related to the sage of the same name in *Mbh.Ādi.ch.*3 or of the Uttaṅkopākhyāna in Mbh. Āśva. chs. 53.58 or the sage who urged King Kuvalayāśva to kill demon Dhundhu (Mbh. Vana. chs. 201-204).

2. Cf. the famous Subhāṣita in the Hitopadeśa :

Yadabhāvi na tad bhāvi bhāvi cenna tadanyathā /
iti cintā-viṣaghnoyam agadaḥ kim na pīyate //

CHAPTER THIRTYEIGHT

Uttaṅka's Eulogy of Viṣṇu : Uttaṅka Liberated

Nārada said :

1. O blessed one, what is that hymn? How was Janārdana propitiated? What sort of a boon did Uttaṅka, the meritorious person, attain?

Sanaka said :

2. Uttaṅka, the Brāhmaṇa engrossed in the meditation on Hari, saw the great efficacy (greatness) of the water from the feet of Lord Viṣṇu and eulogised him devoutly.

Uttaṅka prayed :[1]

3. I bow down unto Nārāyaṇa, the primordial deity, the supporting abode of the universe, the sole kinsman unto the whole universe. I seek refuge in the great deity holding the discus, the lotus, the Śārṅga bow and the sword and who destroys the distress of anyone immediately after being remembered.

4. I bow down to Viṣṇu, that primordial deity, from whose umbilical lotus was born god Brahmā who creates the aggregation of worlds and from whose fury was born Rudra who annihilates the universe.

5. Suppliantly, I betake myself to Viṣṇu who is the lord of Padmā (goddess Lakṣmī), whose eyes are as large as the petals of a lotus, whose prowess is of mysterious and miraculous nature, who is the sole cause of all, who is the ancient Puruṣa comprehensible through the Vedānta texts and who is the store-house of brilliance.

6. He is the imperishable Ātman, the omnipresent deity named Acyuta who is of the nature of perfect knowledge and is worthy of being the refuge of those who possess perfect knowledge. May the primordial lord, comprehensible only through perfect knowledge, be propitious unto me—The Lord who is of the form of Vyaṣṭi (Distributive pervasion)and Samaṣṭi (aggregate collective)—as well be pleased.

7. He is of infinite prowess, devoid of attributes and births, of the nature of Guṇas, the most excellent among the possessors of perfect knowledge. He is eternal and he removes the distress of those who seek shelter in him. May that great Ātman, the ocean of mercy, be the bestower of boons unto me.

8. You have precisely pervaded the universe created by you, entering it through the special qualities of subtlety and grossness. O great Ātman, you alone are identical with all those, as there is no other infinite essence excepting you.

9. Your pure form is invisible; it is devoid of Māyā, and of attributes and births; it is unsullied; free from impurities and unmeasurable. Good men observe that pure form which is termed the true and the great entity.

10. All ornaments are identical inasmuch as the same gold is present in all of them. They assume different forms due to the conditioning factors. Similarly, the same lord of all, the Ātman of everyone, though single appears as different due to conditioning factors.

11. Those whose minds are deluded by his Māyā do not perceive even the well-known Ātman. Those very persons when freed from Māyā, perceive the same as their ownself being the self of all.

12. I bow down to the lord named Viṣṇu, the incomparable brilliance, from whom all this visible world has originated and in whom that has been established.

13. Obeisance to that lord whose form is consciousness; and from whom sentience has originated. Obeisance to that lord who is incomprehensible, who has nothing to support and who is of the form of both the supporter and the supported.

14. I bow down to Vāsudeva who is the embodiment of pure bliss and knowledge. I bow down to that Lord whose abode is the cavity of the heart and who is served by Yogins.

15. I bow down to that deity who has become the first among the Yogins and who abides in the Praṇava (Oṁ). I bow down to that unchanging deity of the nature of Nāda (mystic sound) who is the Bīja (seed) of the Nāda and who is of the nature of Praṇava.

16. I bow down to that deity who has the nature of Being

(or Existence) and who is Existence, knowledge and Bliss, the possessor of that fiery sharpedged discus; who is the unageing cosmic witness and who is beyond the ken of speech and mind.

17-19. I bow down to the form of Viṣṇu that is called Ananta (Infinite) and is unsullied. They say that the sense organs, the mind, the intellect, the inherent power, the brilliance, the strength, fortitude, the Kṣetra (the body) and the Kṣetrajña-(the Soul)—all these are of the nature of Vāsudeva. They call him one who is of the form of both Vidyā and Avidyā (knowledge and Nescience). They call him greater than the greatest. Perpetual is the salvation of those great noble souls who seek refuge in the quiescent Acyuta who has neither beginning nor destruction and who is the creator of every thing.

20. Repeatedly, I bow unto him who is the most excellent, a bestower of boons who is the ancient and eternal deity identifying with everything and pervading all.

21. I worship that incomprehensible Puruṣa, the water from whose feet is an antidote for the ailment of worldly existence (Saṁsāra), the dust of whose feet is conducive to the achievement of purity and whose name is efficacious to ward off evil rites.

22. I worship him who is of the form of Sat (Existent) and who is of the form of Asat (non-Existent) and who is of the form of both Sat and Asat; who is unchanging, and different from all these. He is the excellent one, more excellent than the most excellent.

23. He is unsullied, formless, perfect and stationed in the midst of firmament. He is beyond both Vidyā and Avidyā; and is abiding in the lotus of the heart.

24. He is self-luminous, unspecifiable, greater than the greatest, and minuter than the minutest. He is devoid of all conditioning factors.

25. I sought refuge in that supporting abode of the universe termed Viṣṇu, which is eternal, the greatest bliss and which is the greatest eternal Brahman.

26. I sought asylum in that quiescent Lord whom, those who strictly adhere to holy rites, worship, whom the Yogins perceive and who is more worthy of being worshipped than anyone else.

27. I bow down to the unchanging Lord who is eternal and superior to all, whom even learned men do not perceive and who stands pervading this entire universe.

28. It is he who is called Jiva (the individual Soul) due to the contact with internal sense-organ (i.e. the Mind). It is he who is sung about as the greatest Ātman when he is devoid of Avidyā and the physical body.

29. I bow down to that deity who is identical with every thing, is the cause of all; who is the bestower of the benefits of all holy rites and is the most excellent of all; who is unborn and greater than the greatest.

30. I worship Hari who is omniscient, omnipresent and quiescent; who is the immanent soul of all and is identical with perfect knowledge; who is the storehouse of perfect knowledge and the Lord stationed in perfect knowledge.

31. I bow down to the receptacle of the Vedas, the slayer of demon Mura (Viṣṇu) whose import is well decided by the sound knowledge of the Vedānta (contained in upaniṣads) who is the Lord with the shining eyes in the form of the Sun and the Moon, and who has the form of the bird, viz., that of Vipati (lord of the birds).

32. I worship that Puruṣa who is the great lord of all, omni-present; who is identical with the Vedas and is the most excellent of all knowers of the Vedas; who is beyond the ken of speech and the mind; is incomprehensible, of infinite power and knowable only through perfect spiritual knowledge.

33. I seek refuge in that incomprehensible and unmeasurable Lord, who possesses the perfect nature and who protects the worlds through Indra, Agni, Kāla (i.e. Yama), Asura (i.e. Nirṛti), Pāśin (Varuṇa), Vâyu, Soma (the Moon) Īśa, Mārtaṇḍa (the Sun), Purandara and others.

34. I bow down to that deity who has thousand hands, thousand feet, thousand arms and thousand eyes, who is served by means of Yajñas, and who is the primordial deity of fierce valour, the bestower of contentment and pleasure.

35-36. I worship the deity who is identical with Kāla (Time, Death); who is the cause of the division of Time, who is beyond the three Guṇas, but is the knower of attributes; who is the appreciator of good qualities, the bestower of desired objects, contactless and unknowable through the sense-organs; who is the enjoyer of the universe yet is devoid of thirst (i.e. desire for worldly things); who is devoid of desire, the foremost (one), who cannot be approached even mentally; who is inherent in the vestures (Kośas) constituted of the mind and food (mental) and physical vestures, who is discerned through spiritual wisdom and attained through Kalpas (sacred precepts ?) and who is not identical with either speech or Prāṇas (vital breaths).

37. How can I eulogise that deity of the form of Ātman about whom the lotus-born deity and other Devas (deities) do not know anything ? They do not know his form, or strength or prowess, or activities or valid means of knowing him (or his magnitude).

38. O ocean of mercy, protect me! I am fallen into the ocean of worldly existence; I am miserly and deluded; I am bound by hundreds of lustful entanglements, I am infamous slanderous, ungrateful. I am always impure, engaged in sinful activities and extremely furious. I am frightened as well. I seek refuge in you again and again. Save me".

39. Thus propitiated by him, the sympathetic lord of Kamalā (Lakṣmī), the lordly receptacle of all brilliance became visible to him directly.

40-43. He resembled the Atasī (blue) flower (in complexion). His eyes were like full-blown lotuses. He was bedecked in coronet, ear-rings, necklaces and bracelets. He was wearing the Kaustubha jewel and the golden line of hair on the chest called Śrivatsa. He had golden sacred thread. The beauty of his body was hightened by the lustre of the pearl placed at the tip of his nose. He was clad in yellow robes. The lord was adorned with garlands of sylvan flowers. His feet were worshipped with the tender leaves of Tulasī plant. He had a great lustre. He was adorned with tinkling ornaments and anklets, etc. On seeing the Garuḍa-emblemed deity, the leading Brāhmaṇa bowed down and prostrated himself like a staff, on the ground.

44. With tears of delight, Uttaṅka sprinkled the feet of Hari. Without his mind turning to anyone else he said, "O Murāri, save me, save me".

45-46. Raising him up, Mahā-Viṣṇu, the merciful deity, embraced the leading sage and said, "O dear child, choose your boon. O excellent one, when I am delighted, there is nothing which cannot be achieved by you".

On hearing this uttered by the discus-bearing deity, Uttaṅka again bowed to Janārdana, the lord of Devas and said :

47. "O Lord, why do you delude me ? O Lord, of what use are other boons unto me ? May my devotion to you be firm and stable in everyone of my births.

48. Among the worms, birds, animals, reptiles, Rākṣasas, Piśācas or human beings—wherever I may be born, O Keśava ! may my devotion to you alone be steady and unswerving through your grace".

49. Saying "May it be so", the Lord of the worlds touched him with the tip of his conch. He granted him the divine knowledge difficult to be attained even by Yogins.

50. As the leading Brāhmaṇa began to eulogise again, Janārdana, the lord of Devas, said thus with a beam of smile flickering on his face and placed his hand on his head.

Śrī Bhagavān said :

51. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, propitiate me always by means of holy and Yogic rites. Go to the abode of Nara and Nārāyaṇa. You will attain salvation.

52. The man who always reads the song of prayer composed by you, attains all desires and in the end he shall attain salvation".

53. O sage, after saying this to the Brāhmaṇa, Mādhava (Viṣṇu) vanished there itself. Thereafter, Uttaṅka went to the abode of Nara and Nārāyaṇa.

54. Hence, devotion to the discus-bearing lord of Devas should always be practised. Bhakti (devotion) towards Hari is said to be the greatest means that yields all desired benefits.

55-56. O sage, engaged in the Yogic and holy rites with great devotional feelings, Uttaṅka worshipped Mādhava continuously in the hermitage of Nara and Nārāyaṇa. He was richly endowed with wisdom and perfect knowledge. All his dualistic doubts were quelled.[2] He attained the greatest region of Viṣṇu difficult to be attained by all.

57. Worshipped, bowed to or well-remembered, Nārāyaṇa, the lord of the universe, bestows salvation. He increases the honour of devotees.

58. Hence, one who desires to attain happiness here and hereafter should worship with great devotion, Lord Nârâyaṇa who is infinite and unvanquished.

59. He who listens to or reads this narrative with great attention becomes liberated from all sins. He goes to the abode of Hari.

CHAPTER THIRTYEIGHT

1. NP. being a Vaiṣṇava Purāṇa takes every opportunity to eulogize Viṣṇu who is the Supreme Brahman. The Viṣṇu in the trinity of gods entrusted with the protection of the Universe, is on a lower plane. This glorification of Viṣṇu the Para-brahman is full of Vedāntic ideas contained in the Puruṣa Sūkta and reminds one of Upaniṣads and Śaṅkara's Vedānta stotras like Parā Pūjā.

This eulogy shows little textual influence of Uttaṅka's praise of Viṣṇu in the Mbh. Vana. 201, 14-23, though the commonness of Vedāntic ideas is inevitable.

2. This again confirms the mission of the NP.—to propagate Bhakti based on Advaita.

CHAPTER THIRTYNINE

The Greatness of Viṣṇu : The Story of Raivata

Sanaka said :

1. O leading Brāhmaṇa, listen, once again, to the greatness of Parameṣṭhin. It is meritorious and destructive of all sins. It yields worldly pleasures and salvation to men.

2. Lo! The story of Hari is destructive of sins in the world. It bestows merits upon those who listen to the same or narrate it particularly so to his devotees.

3. I bow down to those excellent men who rejoice after tasting the exquisite juice of devotion to Hari. Thanks to association with them, a man attains salvation.

4. Obeisance, obeisance for ever to those men who are absorbed in repeating the names of Hari, irrespective of whether they are of good conduct or evil-minded.

5. O leading sage, he who wishes to cross the ocean of worldly existence should worship the devotees of the devotees of Hari.

6. Seen, remembered, worshipped, meditated upon or bowed to, Govinda uplifts people from the ocean of worldly existence which is very difficult to cross.

7. Salutations for ever to that man who thinks of Hari's name even while he is sleeping or eating or walking, or standing or sitting or talking.

8. O how wonderful ! Wonderful is the good fortune of those who are engrossed in devotion to Viṣṇu since salvation which is inaccessible even to the Yogins is as if in their hand (within their reach).

9. In this context they cite the following mythological anecdote which is destructive of all sins of those who speak about and listen to this.

10. Formerly, there was a king born of the lunar race. He was known as Jayadhvaja.[1] He was devoted to Nārāyaṇa.

11. He was regularly absorbed in the activities of scrubbing and cleaning in the temple of Viṣṇu. He used to be engaged in offering lights as well. He sympathised with all living beings.

12. Once, that king built a temple of Viṣṇu on the beautiful banks of the river Revā. It consisted of wonderful flowers of various colours.

13. The leading king was always engaged in sweeping and cleaning in the temple. He was particularly fond of Hari and regularly lighted lamps there.

14. He was deeply interested in repeating the names of Hari. His mind was always drawn towards Hari. He was engaged in worshipping and bowing to Hari. He was fond of persons devoted to Hari.

15. His priest was famous by the name of Vītihotra.[2] On observing the conduct of Jayadhvaja, he was surprised.

16. Once Vītihotra who was a master of the Vedas and the ancillaries to Vedas, asked the king who was devoted to Viṣṇu while he was leisurely seated (somewhere).

Vītihotra said :

17. O king, the knower of the great Dharma, engaged in devotion to Hari, O leading member of the family of Bharata, you are the most excellent among men endowed with devotion to Viṣṇu.

18. You are constantly engaged in sweeping and cleaning as well as in lighting the lamps (in the shrine of Viṣṇu). Hence, O blessed one, tell me what benefit by this has been known by you.

19. O gentle Sir, you are always engaged in collecting wicks and oil as well as in cleaning the abode of Viṣṇu.

20. There are other activities pleasing to Viṣṇu. Still, O blessed one, why are you engaged only in these two activities continuously ?

21. O lord of men, if you have any love towards me, tell me the secret of the same which is highly meritorious in every respect and known to you.

22. On being requested thus by his priest, Jayadhvaja laughingly spoke these words. He bowed down with humility and kept his palms joined in reverence.

Jayadhvaja said :

23. O leading Brāhmaṇa, listen. Thanks to my faculty of remembering previous births, I know what had been performed by me formerly. It is conducive to the surprise of those who listen.

24. Formerly, in the Svārociṣa Manvantara of the Kṛtayuga, O Brāhmaṇa, there was a prominent Brāhmaṇa named Raivata. He was a master of the Vedas and the Vedāṅgas.

25. He used to perform Yajñas on behalf of those who were not eligible for the same. He was a common priest for the whole village. He was a ruthless backbiter. He even sold forbidden goods.

26. He was abandoned by his kinsmen because he used to perform forbidden rites. Hence, he became indigent and miserable. He became sickly with shattered limbs.

27. For the purpose of wealth, he was wandering over the Earth. Once the Brāhmaṇa was afflicted by Asthma and hiccough. He died on the banks of the Narmadā.

28. O sage, when he died, his wife named Bandhumatī became a wayward wanton woman. Hence, she was forsaken by her kinsmen.

29. I was born of her as a Cāṇḍāla, popularly known as Daṇḍaketu. I was always engaged in great sins and was a habitual hater of Brāhmaṇas.

30. I was covetous of other men's wealth and enamoured of other men's wives. I killed many creatures. Many cows, Brāhmaṇas, birds and animals were killed by me.

31. Many huge pieces of gold like the Meru mountain were stolen by me. I was always engaged in drinking liquor. Many times I had been a highway robber too.

32-33. I was comparable to the god of death for animals, birds, deer and other creatures. Once I was overwhelmed by lust and was desirous of having sexual intercourse with my wife. On seeing a lonely abode of Viṣṇu I entered it in the company of my wife. In order to enjoy my wife during that night, I lay there lustfully.

34-36. O Brāhmaṇa, by my clothes some space in the temple was swept by me. The sins committed by me in the course of so many births as the number of dust particles swept, were quelled immediately. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, a lamp had been kept there by me for the sexual intercourse. On account of this also my evil actions were entirely wiped off.

When such was the situation, the city guards came there to the temple of Viṣṇu.

37. They caught hold of her and me saying "Here is an adulterer" and killed us. After killing us both, the city guards returned.

38. Immediately the emissaries of Viṣṇu came there. All of them had four arms. They were wearing crowns and earrings. They were bedecked in garlands of sylvan flowers.

39. Directed by those sinless emissaries of Viṣṇu, we both entered a divine aerial car, equipped with all means of enjoyment.

40. We ourselves assumed divine forms and went to Viṣṇuloka. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, we stayed there for a period of a hundred Kalpas of Brahmā and more.

41. For a similar period, we stayed in the heaven too, equipped with all divine pleasures. Then by turns we lived on the Earth as well as in the Deva regions.

42. As a result of that meritorious activity I was born as a scion of the family of Yadus. For the same reason my riches never dwindle and my kingdom is devoid of thorns (i.e. enemies and other turbulence).

43. O Brāhmaṇa, after doing something for my own enjoyment, such welfare has been attained by me. I do not know the extent of the benefit and merit of those good men who perform these things with devotion.

44. Hence, O excellent one, with great devotion I endeavour to fulfil my duties of sweeping the floor and lighting the lamps, since I have the faculty of remembering the previous birth.

45. He who worships the lord of the universe with single-minded attention and absence of desire (for any fruit therefrom) becomes free from all sins and goes to the greatest region.

46. I have attained this much of prosperity after performing the holy rites helplessly. What then will not be attained by quiescent and devout persons by worshipping perfectly ?".

47. On hearing the words of the king, the excellent Brāhmaṇa Vītihotra was infinitely contented. He became absorbed in the worship of Hari.

48. Hence, listen, O Chief of Brāhmaṇas! The unchanging lord Nārāyaṇa is the bestower of salvation to those who worship him with or without perfect knowledge.

49. All the kinsmen are casual and unsteady, wealth is never permanent. God of death is continuously near at hand. Hence, Dharma (religious and pious acts) must be accumulated.

50. It is the ignorant people who in their extreme arrogance, are vainglorious. Even the body is near (in the very shadow of) dangers. What needs be spoken about riches, etc.

51. Pure devotion unto Janārdana, the God of gods, will be generated only in those people who have accumulated merit during the course of thousands of crores of previous births.

52. The ablution in the Gaṅgā is easily accessible; so also is the worship of guests; all the Yajñas too can be easily performed but devotion towards Viṣṇu is very difficult to obtain.

53-54. The service to the Tulasī plant is difficult to get; intimate contact with the saintly people is also inaccessible; but the merciful nature towards all living beings may be easy to some. But contact with the good, service to the Tulasī plant and devotion towards Hari—every thing is difficult to get.

55. A sensible man should not waste it in vain, after attaining the rare birth as a human being. He should worship the Lord of the universe. This is essential, O excellent Brāhmaṇa.

56. If any man wishes to cross the impassable ocean of worldly existence, let him be devoted to Hari. This is the only panacea.

57. O brother, seek the support of Govinda. O beloved one, do not delay. The city of Kṛtānta (God of death) is seen nearby.

58. O leading Brāhmaṇa, if you wish to attain liberation, worship Nārāyaṇa, the source of the origin of the universe, the cause of the cause of all.

59. Undoubtedly only those noble-souled ones who have resorted to the Lord, the support of all, the source of origin of all, the immanent soul of all, have attained their goal in life.

60. Those who worship Mahā-Viṣṇu, the destroyer of the distress of those who bow down to him, are worthy of being saluted, worshipped and especially bowed to.

61. Those devotees of Viṣṇu who worship the Supreme Lord without any specific desire, go to the abode of Hari along with twenty-one generations of his family.

62. Only he becomes the beloved favourite of the Lord—he who gives water or fruit to a noble-souled devotee of Viṣṇu, who is devoid of any desire.

63. Those who render service to the devotees of Viṣṇu go to Viṣṇu's world and stay there till the final dissolution of all living beings takes places.[4]

64. Only those can purify the universe with the dust of their feet who worship Hari and Hari's devotees, without any specific desire (in return).

65. If anyone devoted to the worship of the Lord stays in a house, Devas as well as Śrī Hari also stay there.

66. O Brāhmaṇa, welfare and happiness increase day by day in that house where Tulasī is planted and worshipped.

67. Evil planets, goblins, Vetālas, etc., do not harass anyone in that place where Keśava stays in the form of Śālagrāma stone.

68. That spot is a holy centre, that place is a penance grove, where the Śālagrāma stone stands, since lord Madhusūdana is present there.

69. O celestial sage, know that house to be devoid of auspiciousness and on a par with the cremation ground, if there is no worship of the Śālagrāma stone.

70. The Purāṇas, Nyāya (texts), Mīmāṁsā (texts), Dharmaśāstras, Vedas along with their Aṅgas—all these are glorified as the form of Viṣṇu.

71. The persons who circumambulates Viṣṇu four times with devotion, goes to the highest abode that quells all Karmans.

CHAPTER THIRTYNINE

1. This Jayadhvaja is a different person from the fifth son (of the same name) of Kārttavīrya Arjuna and the father of Tālajaṅgha and who became the ruler of Avanti, although both of them belonged to the Lunar race (AIHT. p.146). This Vijayadhvaja belonged to the Bhārata clan (see. v.17).
2. P.E. (Purāṇic Encyclopaedia) p.878 records four Vītihotras but all of them are Kṣattriya kings and not Brāhmaṇas.
3. Obviously the story of Jayadhvaja or rather that of a sinful bastard Cāṇḍāla called Daṇḍaketu who swept a part of a temple of Viṣṇu and lit up a lamp for sexual intercourse, was absolved of all sins by that unintended meritorious service to god Viṣṇu and after enjoying heavenly life was born as King Jayadhvaja with the woman of his previous birth as a legitimate queen, is a creation of the author of the NP., as it has no basis in any Vedic or Purāṇic work. The NP. wants to emphasize the covetable fruit of the slightest unintentional service of Lord Viṣṇu (vide vv. 48, 55, 56-61).
4. VV 63 ff. describe the importance of services rendered to the devotees of Viṣṇu and the sanctity of the Tulasī plant and of Śālagrāma stone.

CHAPTER FORTY

The Greatness of Viṣṇu

(The Story of Sudharmā)[1]

Sanaka said :

1. O sage, henceforth I shall tell you the Vibhūti (greatness and Super-human powers) pertaining to Viṣṇu. If people listen to it or narrate it, their sins are reduced immediately.

2. Formerly, in the Vaivasvata Manvantara, a lengthy dialogue between Indra and Bṛhaspati took place. I shall narrate it; listen to it attentively.

3. Once Indra who was richly endowed with the enjoyment of all pleasures and was surrounded by all Devas and the celestial damsels, spoke to Bṛhaspati.

Indra said :

4. O lord, O highly blessed Bṛhaspati, O expert in the interpretation of all principles, of what nature was the creation in the Kalpa of Brahmā which had gone by.

5. How was Indra as narrated by them ? How were Devas as remembered by them ? Of what nature was their holy rite ? It behoves you to recount this precisely.

Bṛhaspati said :

6. O Indra, the conduct of Brahmā on his previous day is not known to me. Even that of his present day appears to be very difficult to comprehend.

7. Many Manus have gone by. Even to recount them I am not competent. I shall tell you who knows it to day, listen.

8. There is some one in your city well-known as Sudharmā. He has come here from Brahmā's world and is now enjoying the divine pleasures.

9-10. I shall tell you. Listen. Indeed he knows this. When he was informed thus by his preceptor, Indra went to the abode of Sudharmā accompanied by the preceptor (Bṛhaspati) and surrounded by groups of Devas.

11. O celestial sage, on seeing the lord of Devas arrived in the company of Bṛhaspati, he (Sudharmā) received him and worshipped him respectfully.

12. When he was greeted and honoured by Sudharmā, Indra observed his excellent glory. He was surprised in his mind. Then he respectfully addressed him thus :

Indra said :

13. "O learned one, if you know the conduct of life and other details in the Kalpa of Brahmā which had gone by, narrate it. I have come here accompanied by my preceptor in order to enquire about this.

14. O sage of holy observances, since you know Devas too who have no sleep, tell us who is the greater ? How are they greater than we, the residents of heaven ?

15. O lord, O tormentor of enemies, how were they in brilliance, fame, renown, perfect knowledge, charitable gifts or penances ?"

16. On being requested thus by the king of Devas, Sudharmā who was endowed with humility, laughingly recounted what happened before, duly.

Sudharmā said :[a]

17. "O Indra, a thousand cycles of four Yugas are said to constitute a day of Brahmā. In one day, O Indra, there are fourteen Manus.

18-19. (During that period) Indras are also said to be fourteen; Devas are separate and of different kinds. O Vāsava (Indra), all the Indras, Manus and others, are equal in brilliance, glory, prowess and strength. I shall mention their names. Listen with great attention.

20-21. The Svāyambhuva Manu was the first (one), then Svārociṣa. Thereafter, Uttama, Tāmasa, Raivata, Cākṣuṣa and Vaivasvata (the son of the Sun) and Sūrya Sāvarṇi was the eighth. The ninth Manu was Dakṣa Sāvarṇi who was engaged in the welfare of all Devas.

22-23a. The tenth was Brahmasāvarṇi and Dharmasāvarṇi was the next. Thereafter, Rudrasāvarṇi, and Rocamāna is remembered as the next. Bhautya is said to be the fourteenth (Manu). These are the Manus.

23b. O leading Deva, listen, I shall recount Devas and Indras.

24. In the Svāyambhuva Manvantara those who were well known as Yāmas were Devas. Their Indra was the highly intelligent Śacīpati.

25. In the Svārociṣa Manvantara, Devas were Pārāvatas and Tuṣitas. The lord of Devas was one named Vipaścit who was endowed with all riches.

26. In the third Manvantara, the set of Devas were the Sudhāmans, Satyas, Śivas and Pratardanas. Their Indra was glorified as Suśānti.

27-28. In the Tāmasa Manvantara Devas were Sutas, Pārāharas, Sutyas and Asudhis.* O Indra, their Indra is said to be Śiva. One named Vibhu is glorified as the fifth Devapati (Indra) and Devas are Amitābha and others.

Listen to them in the sixth (Manvantara). Āryas and others are said to be Devas and their Indra is Manojava.

29. In the Vaivasvata Manvantara, Devas are the Ādityas, Vasus, Rudras and others. Purandara is said to be Indra. He is equipped with all desirable things.

30. The Aprameyas, beginning with Sutapa are glorified as Devas in the eighth Manvantara. Thanks to the power of the Pūjā of Viṣṇu, Bali is remembered as their Indra.

31. In the ninth (Manvantara) Pāra and others are Devas. Adbhuta is said to be Indra.

In the tenth (Manvantara), Suvāsana and others are glorified as Devas.

32-33. Their Indra was named Śānti. He was equipped with all means of enjoyment.

In the eleventh (Manvantara), Devas were Vihaṅgama and others. Vṛṣa is remembered as their Indra. Understand the details in the twelfth Manvantara. I shall narrate the Indra is one named Ṛbhu and Devas are Hari-Nābhas.

34. In the thirteenth Manvantara, Sutrāmās and others are Devas, Divaspati of great prowess is glorified as their Indra.

Sutyāścāsudhiyaḥ* is probably a misprint for sutyāśca sudhiyaḥ.

35. In the fourteenth Manvantara, the Cākṣuṣas and others are Devas. Śuci is remembered as Indra. Thus the Manus, Indras and Devas have been recounted to you precisely.

36. In the course of one day of Brahmā, all these enjoy their rights.

37. In all worlds, in the course of all creations, the manner of creation is remembered to be of one type.[3] The makers are many. Only an expert knows their number.

38. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, while I was staying in the Brahmaloka many Brahmās came and went away. I am unable to enumerate them.

39. Listen, how much time I had spent after reaching the heaven. Four Manus have come and gone and my glory is still very extensive.

40. O lord, for the period of a hundred crores of Yugas, I have to stay here; thereafter, I will go to the Karmabhūmi. Listen to me.

41. O observer of holy rites, I shall describe the holy rites performed by me formerly. It is destructive of all sins of those who talk and listen.

42. O Indra, formerly, I was a vulture who was particularly sinful. I was stationed on the surface of the Earth with fecal matter and raw flesh as my diet.

43. On one occasion, I was perching on the rampart of a Viṣṇu temple. O lord, I was hit by the weapon of a hunter in the evening. I died and fell in the courtyard of a temple of Viṣṇu (from its rampart).

44. Even as I was having the vital breath reaching my throat (i.e. when my death was imminent), a dog covetous of my flesh caught hold of me by means of its jaw. It was hotly chased by the other dogs.

45. O lord, carrying me in his jaw, the dog, frightened of the other dogs, went round that temple of Viṣṇu.

46. The Lord who is identical with the universe and who is the immanent soul, became delighted with that act. He gave me and the dog the greatest of his region.

47. O leading Deva, such was the benefit for one who went in the form of a circumambulation. What then would not be attained by worshipping him properly?"

48. Thus addressed by Sudharmā, the noble-souled one, the king of Devas was mentally delighted. He became engaged in the worship of Hari.

49. Still all Devas are desirous of taking birth in the Bhārata land. They worship Nārāyaṇa, the lord of Devas, devoid of ailments. Brahmā and other groups of Devas worship them* (Probably : him) for ever.

50. How can there be the bondage of the terrible worldly existence for those noble souls, who endeavour to remember Nārāyaṇa and who have eschewed acceptance of monetary gifts even when those coveting their association attain salvation ?

51. Those men who have eschewed contact with worldly affairs and worship the Garuḍa-vehicled Nārāyaṇa every day, are liberated from all sins and delightfully attain the auspicious region of Viṣṇu.

52. Those men who are devoid of passionate attachment, those who know the greater and the smaller entities, and those who always remember Nārāyaṇa, the preceptor of the gods, get their sins quelled through meditation. Having died once, they do not imbibe again the tasty juice from the breasts of their mothers, i.e. they are not born again.

53. Those men whose blemishes have been dispelled through listening to the stories of Hari, those whose minds are engaged in worshipping the lotus-like feet of Kṛṣṇa, sanctify the worlds through the contact of their bodies or through their talks. Hence, it is Hari alone who is to be worshipped.

54. O Brāhmaṇa, even as it is true that water flows down and remains at a lower level, so also all welfare and happiness stay gathered together only where there are great men who are devoted to the worship of Hari and who possess pure intellects.

55. Hari alone is the greatest and the closest kinsman. Hari alone is the highest goal. Therefore, Hari alone should be worshipped since he is the cause of sentience.

56. O leading sage, worship the deity of perpetual bliss, the bestower of heavenly benefits and salvation, the deity free from ailments. Great happiness and welfare will befall you.

57. Lord Viṣṇu becomes delighted with those people who becoming devoid of lust and desires worship him with purity of mind and he grants them all their desires (desired objects).

tān arcayante* is probably a misprint for tam arcayanti as god Viṣṇu alone is meant.

58. O the best one among prominent sages, he who listens to this or reads this with great attention, attains the benefit of a horse-sacrifice.

59. O Brāhmaṇa, thus the benefit of the worship of Hari has been recounted to you partly in detail and partly in brief. What else shall I recount to you ?"

CHAPTER FORTY

1. This dialogue between Indra and Bṛhaspati is intended to bring out the importance of circumabulation around the shrine of Viṣṇu.
2. VV. 17-37 describe the fourteen Manvantaras which form one day of god Brahmā. Sudharmā enumerates the office-bearers—Manus, Indras, gods, etc. —in each of the Manvantaras, cf. Bh.P.VIII chs. 13 & 14, VP III 1 & 2. The only difference is that Rocamāna and Bhautya are the last two Manus given here for Devasāvaṛni and Indrasāvarṇi in the Bh.P. But of these V.P. gives Ruci for NP.'s Rocamāna and Bhautya of the NP. is supported by Mk. Chs. 94, 97.
3. This is the real reply to Indra's query and is based on dhātā yathāpūrvam akalpayat /

CHAPTER FORTYONE

The Glory of the Lord's Name

Nārada said :

1. O sage, expert in the interpretation of principles, everything has been narrated by you. Now, I wish to hear the situation and the characteristics of different Yugas.[1]

Sanaka said :

2. Well done, O sage, well done, O highly intelligent one who render service to the worlds, I shall explain the Yuga-Dharmas (the specific righteous activities in different Yugas) helping all worlds.

3. O excellent one, on certain occasions, Dharma flourishingly) increases and on other occasions Dharma undergoes destruction on the surface of the Earth.

4. There are four Yugas, viz. Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali. O excellent one, it should be known that all together they consist of twelve thousand divine years.

5. All these Yugas, fully consisting of Sandhyās (intermediary period) and Sandhyāṁśas (such subsidiary periods) are equal in every cycle. They must be known as extending to the same period. So it has been mentioned by the seers of the true principles.

6. They call the first, the Kṛtayuga, then comes the Tretā Yuga. Then they say is the Dvāpara and the last one they know to be the Kali Age.

7. O Brāhmaṇa, there were no separate Devas, Dānavas, Gandharvas, Yakṣas, Rākṣasas and the serpents in Kṛtayuga.[2] All were remembered as equal to Devas.

8. All were always full of delight and righteousness. There was neither buying nor selling. There was no classification of the Vedas in the Kṛtayuga.

9. The Brāhmaṇas, the Kṣatriyas, the Vaiśyas and the Śūdras were interested in their respective duties and conduct of life. They were always engrossed in penance and meditation and were devoted to Nārāyaṇa.

10. They were free from lust and other defects. They were endowed with good qualities, such as Śama, (selfcontrol). etc. Their minds were engaged in seeking the means of Dharma; they were devoid of envy and jealousy; they were not arrogant or hypocrites.

11. All were engaged in speaking truthful words; all practised the respective holy rites of their stage in life; they were richly endowed with Vedic study and were clever in all scriptural texts.

12. Those who are not in communion with lustful benefits, attain the greatest goal by means of holy rites pertaining to the four Āśramas (stages in life) and originating at the proper time.

13. In the Kṛta Yuga, Nārāyaṇa is of white complexion and is perfectly free from impurities. I shall declare the peculiar features of Tretā. Listen with great attention.

14. O excellent sage in the Tretā Yuga, Dharma assumes pale white colour. Hari attains red colour. People undergo slight sufferings.

15. All are absorbed in the path of holy rites; they abide by the holy performance of Yajña; they hold steadfastly to truthfulness; they are devoted to meditation, they are always engaged in meditation.

16. O leading sage, in the Dvāpara, Dharma stands on two legs, Hari assumes yellow colour; the Vedas are classified.

17. At that time even some excellent Brāhmaṇas are absorbed in untruths. Among the Brāhmaṇas and the people of other castes, some possess the evils of passionate attachment to worldly objects.

18. O Brāhmaṇa, some of them perform Yajñas for the attainment of heaven and salvation; some are desirous of wealth etc., and some have their minds affected by sin.

19. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, in Dvāpara, Dharma and Adharma are equal mutually and balanced. Due to the power of Adharma the subjects dwindle in power and glory.

20. O leading sage, some are short-lived. O Brāhmaṇa, on seeing some engaged in meritorious rites, some men begin to envy them.

21. I shall describe the situation in the Kali Yuga. Listen to it with attention. At the advent of Kali Yuga, Dharma stands on one leg.[3]

22-23. Entering the Tāmasic Yuga (i.e. Kali Yuga) Hari assumes blackness of complexion. Some righteous soul performs Yajñas and conventional religious routines. Some meritorious soul may be engaged in the path of holy rites. On seeing a man absorbed in Dharma, all people are afflicted with jealousy.

24. Holy rites and good conduct perish. Similarly do perfect knowledge, Yajña, etc., owing to the prevalence of Adharma calamities shall befall.

25. In the Kali Yuga, all people are engrossed in envy and jealousy; they are devoted to arrogant conduct of life; the subjects will be short-lived.

Nārada said :

26. O sage, the characteristic features of the different Yugas have been succinctly mentioned by you. Kindly recount Kali in detail as you are the most excellent among the knowers of Dharma.

27. O excellent sage, what will be the diet and conduct of life of the Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras in the Kali Yuga ?

Sanaka said :

28. O leading sage rendering service to all worlds, I shall recount the characteristics of the Kali Yuga precisely and in detail.[4]

29. When Kṛṣṇa assumes black complexion all Dharmas perish. Hence, Kali is extremely terrible; it is the mixture of all sins.

30. The Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras are averse to righteousness. At the advent of the terrible Kali Yuga, the Brāhmaṇas turn their faces away from the Vedas.

31. All people are engaged in the pretence of righteousness; they are engrossed in jealousy and envy. Learned men are vainglorious and wicked as well as devoid of truthfulness.

32. Everyone begins to argue. "I am superior to all"; all people ardently love to perform sins; all men are captious and disputatious.

33. Hence, in the Kali Yuga all will be short-lived. O Brāhmaṇa, as the span of life is short, men do not grasp enough learning.

34. As the understanding of different lores diminishes, sin increases. All subjects die to the reverse order (young men die and are survived by the elders). People are engaged in sins.

35-36. The Brāhmaṇas and other castes get mixed with other castes mutually; all castes will be more or less like the Śūdras, overwhelmed by lust and fury, confounded and afflicted by unnecessary distress. In the Kali Yuga the excellent men become mean and the base men rise to excellence.

37. The kings are greedily absorbed in wealth; they are tyrannous; imposing heavy taxes they inflict pain on their subjects.

38. Brāhmaṇas become the pall-bearers of the Śūdras; husbands approach their legally wedded wives in the manner of paramours.

39. Sons hate fathers; women begin to hate their husbands; men are enamoured of other men's wives; people misappropriate other men's wealth.

40. O Brāhmaṇa, in the terrible Kali Yuga, the people are engaged in sins; they maintain themselves by means of fish and flesh; they milk even goats and sheep* (Reading Ajāvikam not Ajīvikām).

41. Those wh< are jealous begin to ridicule good men; on the banks of rivers they dig with hoes and spades and grow medicinal herbs. (?)

42. The Earth loses its fertileness (lit. fruitfulness). The seed and the flower perish; women desire to imitate the make-up and the coquetry of prostitutes.

43. Brāhmaṇas sell their Dharmas, women resort to prostitution; others sell the Vedas; Brāhmaṇas are absorbed in the conduct of life of the Śūdras.

44. Brāhmaṇas (priests), greedy for money, take away the wealth of good men and pious widows, but do not perform the holy observances.

45. Brāhmaṇas abandon righteous conduct; they are well-equipped with modes of unnecessary arguments; it is mostly out of religious hypocrisy that they perform such rites as the Śrāddha, etc., for the Pitṛs.

*ajīvikām in the text is probably a misprint for Ajāvikām.

46. Base men give charitable gifts to the undeserving persons; covetous of the milk, they (pretend) to love cows.

47-48. Brāhmaṇas do not perform ablutions and other purificatory rites properly. The vilest Brāhmaṇas become absorbed in holy rites at the improper time. They are engaged in blaming good men and the Brāhmaṇas. O Brāhmaṇa, the mind of none becomes devoted to Viṣṇu.

49. When Kṛṣṇa assumes the dark colour, the wicked servants of the king begin to beat Brāhmaṇas who perform Yajñas. They do so for extorting money out of them.

50. O sage, in the terrible Kali Yuga, men are devoid of (i.e. abstain from giving) charitable gifts. Brāhmaṇas accept monetary gifts even from fallen men.

51. Even in the first quarter of Kali Yuga, men begin to censure Hari; towards the end of the Yuga none will repeat the name of Hari.

52. In the Kali Yuga, Brāhmaṇas will be indulging in sexual intercourse with Śūdra women. They will be craving for union with widows; they will be engaged in the enjoyment of the cooked food of the Śūdras.

53. Giving up the good Vedic path, they will be pursuing evil ways and manners. They will become heretics and censure the system of the four Āśramas (stages in life).

54. The Śūdras will not serve the twice-born. Assuming the airs of heretics, the base-born assume and practice holy rites of the Brāhmaṇas.

55. The Śūdras will clothe themselves in ochre-robes; they will have matted hair; they will smear ashes all over their bodies. Thus equipped and employing deceptive arguments, they will begin to expatiate on Dharma.

56. The Brāhmaṇas will give up their conventional activities and duties and will partake of other's cooked food; wicked-minded Śūdras will renounce and become wandering recluses.

57. O sage, people will take up bribes as their means of livelihood in the Kali Yuga; heretics without piety, the mendicant Kāpālikas and base men will be in plenty in the Kali Yuga.

58. Occupying excellent seats, Śūdras will expatiate on Dharma—religious duties—to Brāhmaṇas who habitually destroy Dharma.

59. These and many other heretics such as nude asceties

(Digambaras), red-roled mendicants, will roam about; most of whom will be decrying the Vedas.

60. In the Kali Yuga, the men who generally destroy Dharma will be adept in singing and playing on musical instruments; they will resort to petty and insignificant holy rites.

61. People will be extremely vile. They themselves not possessing much wealth but defiled by vain-gloriousness will be exhibiting for nothing a false show of symbols of piety.

62. They are always dependent on monetary gifts; they practise treading the wrong path in the world; all of them are fond of boasting about themselves and decrying others.

63. O Brāhmaṇa, in the Kali Yuga, men will be cruel, treacherous, merciless and devoid of piety; they will be the kinsmen of the sinning ones.

64. Then the maximum expectation of life will be sixteen years. O Brāhmaṇa, in the terrible Kali Yuga, a girl of five years will give birth to children.

65. Men of seven or eight years will be the so-called youths and beyond that age is old age. All will abandon their holy duties. They will be ungrateful and breakers of codes of discipline in the society.

66. In the Kali Yuga, the Brāhmaṇas will always be beggars. They will not mind being disrespected by others. They will be delighted to stay in other men's houses.

67. There itself, they will entertain vain faith and will be engaged in censuring. They will be censuring in the presence of their fathers, mothers and sons.

68. They will be expatiating verbally on Dharmas but in their heart of heart, they will be indulging in sins. They will be proud due to their wealth, learning or age; they will be experiencing all miseries.

69. They will be afflicted by sickness, famine and robbers. Without minding the sinful nature of the act, they will be employing deceptive means and nourishing (their dependents) for nothing.

70. Sinners slight and dishonour the person who points out the righteous path. Those who are vainly self-complacent disrespect one who is engaged in holy rites.

71. After the advent of the Kali age, Śūdras and outcastes will become kings and the Brāhmaṇas will be engaged in rendering service to them. They will be begging for alms.

72. No one will be the true disciple, preceptor, son, father, wife or husband in this confused mixture of castes.

73. When Kali Yuga advances, even rich persons will become beggars. The twice-born will be selling liquid beverages.

74. The Brāhmaṇas will be covered with their cloak of piety. They will be assuming the guise of sages. They will be engaged in selling forbidden goods and indulging in sexual contacts with forbidden women.

75. O sage, the Brāhmaṇas who desire to be thrown into hell will maintain themselves through the activities befitting Śūdras; they will invariably hate the Vedas and the Dharma Śāstras.

76. In the Kali Yuga, men will be terribly afraid of hunger. Frightened of drought, they will be continuously gazing at the sky.

77. Extremely distressed by absence of rain, men will somehow sustain themselves by eating bulbous roots, leaves and fruits like the ascetics.

78. In the Kali age, all the people will be distressed through lust, greed and be engaged in sinful activities. They will be short in stature, deficient in good luck and prolific in their progeny.

79. Women will be self-supporting. They will be using the beauty aids like prostitutes; they will disobey their husbands' behests and will be interested in staying in other people's houses.

80. Women of wicked nature entertain a lustful design for men of wicked nature. Even women of noble families will be unfaithful to their husbands through evil activities.

81. Being panick-stricken with the fear of robbers, etc., people will adopt wooden-contrivances as a security measure. People will be extremely harassed by droughts and over-taxation.

82. Being distressed, they will be going to such lands as are full of wheat and barley. Offering the people pleasing tasks, they urge them with auspicious pleasing words (?)

83. People will maintain fraternal relationships till their purpose is achieved. Even mendicants are restrained by friendly relationships.

84. With food as a conditioning factor, disciples will be taken by mendicants.

85. Women scratch their heads with their hands and disobey the behests of their husbands and other elders.

86. When Brāhmaṇas become absorbed in talks on heresy, when they cultivate the company of heretics, the age of Kali will be advancing.

87. That the Kali Yuga has advanced should be inferred by clever people at the very same time when people cease to perform Yajñas and the twice-born do not perform Homa rites.

88. When the Dharmas perish, the whole universe becomes inglorious; infant-mortality is bound to occur and there will be growth of Adharma (absence of virtue), O Brāhmaṇa.

89. Thus, O excellent Brāhmaṇa, the general features of Kali have been narrated to you. But nowhere does the dark age of Kali affect those people who are devoted to Hari.

90. Tapas (penance) is the greatest thing in the Kṛta Yuga. Dhyāna (meditation) in the Tretā Yuga, and Yajña in the Dvāpara. They say that Dāna (charitable gift) alone is the greatest in the Kali Yuga.

91. What is acquired in Kṛta in ten years, in the Tretā in a year, and in the Dvāpara in a month, is acquired in the course of a day and a night in the Kali age.[5]

92. What one achieves by meditating in the Kṛta Yuga, by performing Yajñas in the Tretā and by worshipping in the Dvāpara, one obtains in the Kali Yuga by repeating the name and glorifying Keśava.

93. Kali does not oppress those persons who perform the worship of Hari or who repeat his names and glorify Hari day and night.

94. Kali does not affect those men who with or without desire for the fruits there-of glorify the deity saying "Obeisance to Nārāyaṇa."

95. O Brāhmaṇa, in the terrible Kali Yuga, only those are contented and blessed, those who are absorbed in the names of Hari. Kali does not harass them.

96. Those who are engaged in the worship of Hari, and are devoted to the repetition of the names of Hari, are equal to Śiva. No doubt need be entertained in this respect.

97. After the advent of the terrible Kali Yuga, if one meditates on Viṣṇu whose form is real and who is the support of the entire universe, one does not go to ruin or distress.

98. After the advent of the terrible Kali age that is devoid of all virtue, those who worship Keśava even once, are extremely fortunate.

99. In the Kali age, the holy rites enjoined in the Vedas are likely to be defiled by deficiency or superfluity. Only the remembrance of Hari is conducive to the perfection or completion of the same.

100. Kali does not harass those who always utter the names of Viṣṇu, thus—"O Hari O Keśava, O Govinda, O Vāsudeva, the embodiment of the universe."[6]

101. Kali does not harass even those who utter the names of Śiva, thus—"O Śiva, O Śaṅkara, O Rudra, O Īśa, O blue-necked one, O Three-eyed God !"

102. O Brāhmaṇa, those who speak or utter the names of God thus "O Mahādeva (O great God), O Virūpākṣa (three-eyed one), O Gaṅgādhara (the bearer of the Gaṅgā on the head), O immutable Mṛḍa", have undoubtedly their objects achieved and are happy.

103. Or, those who utter the name of the Lord, thus : "O Janārdana, O Jagannātha, O yellow-robed Acyuta," need not be afraid of Kali.

104. O Brāhmaṇa, in this world, sons, wives, riches and other things are easily accessible to men. But devotion to Hari is difficult to get.

105. Those who are devoid of faith in holy rites, those who are heretics and censure the Vedas and those who are engaged in Adharma (sinful activities) do not desire hell, should they remember Hari.

106. It is only through the repetition of the names of Hari that redemption is attained by the people who commit sins, who are beyond the pale of Vedic path and who are wanting in mental purity.

107. O Brāhmaṇa, this entire universe is submissive to Daiva (fate, destiny). The mobile and immobile beings do only as they are directed by this destiny.

108. After performing according to one's capacity all the holy rites prescribed in the Vedas, a person devoted to God Nārāyaṇa should dedicate them to Lord Mahāviṣṇu.

109. Holy rites dedicated to Mahāviṣṇu, the Supreme Ātman, become complete merely by the remembrance of Hari.

110. Sins do not bind those who are engaged in devotion to Hari. Hence, devotion to Hari is difficult to be attained by the wicked-minded in the world.

111. O ! In the frightful and terrific Kali Yuga, those who are devoted to Hari are very fortunate and noble-souled even if they are not in close contact with saintly persons.

112. O Brāhmaṇa, it is true that all the holy rites of those who are engrossed in the remembrance of Hari and those who are absorbed in the repetition of Śiva's names attain perfect completion.

113. O how fortunate are those who are engaged in the names of Hari ! What a good luck ! They are worthy of being worshipped even by Devas. Of what use is much talk ?

114. Hence, only what is beneficial to the worlds, is being proclaimed by me. Nowhere does Kali harass those men who are fond of the names of Hari.

115. My very life is only the name of Hari, only that name and nothing but that name. I emphatically declare that in the Kali Yuga salvation is never possible otherwise, not at all."

Sūta said :

116. O Brāhmaṇa, thus enlightened by Sanaka, Nārada attained great delight. He again submitted thus :—

Nārada said :[7]

117. O holy lord, O knower of all scriptural texts, the splendour of the universe, the great eternal Brahman has been revealed by you who are extremely merciful at heart.

118. This is the greatest merit. This is the greatest penance that one remembers the lotus-eyed lord who destroys all sins.

119. O Brāhmaṇa, this universe is manifold. It has been mentioned by you to have been evolved out of this knowledge alone. How can I understand it without an illustrative example ?

120. Hence elucidate that thing by the enlightenment of which the Brahman can be known. Tell it to me so that the depressed mind can steady itself.

121. O Brāhmaṇa, on hearing these words of the noble-souled Nārada, Sanaka remembered the great Nārāyaṇa and replied thus :

Sanaka said :

122. O Brāhmaṇa, I am going to perform meditation. Ask Sanandana as you please. He is an adept in the Vedānta Śāstra. He is worthy of being revered and saluted by the noble. He will clear your doubts.

123. On hearing these words uttered by Sanaka, Nārada began to ask Sanandana about the Mokṣa Dharmas i.e. holy rites leading to salvation.

SECOND PĀDA

CHAPTER FORTYTWO

Cosmogony : The Origin of the Universe[1]

(A Dialogue between Bhṛgu and Bhāradvāja)

Nārada submitted :

1. O Brāhmaṇa, kindly narrate to me whence this universe comprised of the mobiles and immobiles was created and to whom it goes at the time of dissolution. O Sanandana !

2. By whom was this world created along with the oceans, the sky, the mountains, the clouds, the earth, the fire and the wind ?

3. How were the Bhūtas (Elements or living beings) created ? How were the different castes divided? What is the arrangement for their purity ? How do they get impurities ? What are their rules regarding Dharma and Adharma ?

4. Of what nature is the soul of the living individuals? Where do those who die go? May your honour recount everything from this world to the other.

Sanandana replied :[2]

5. O Nārada, listen. I shall tell you this ancient mythological anecdote, the scripture narrated by the sage Bhṛgu to Bhāradvāja who enquired of him about this.

6. On seeing the brilliant great sage Bhṛgu, of enormous prowess, seated on the top of mount Kailāsa, Sage Bhāradvāja enqı ired of him.

Bhāradvāja said :

7. O bestower of honour, how does the individual soul continuously transmigrate into the different forms of life (existence)? How is its liberation from the cycle of worldly existence effected?

8. (How is it) O revered sir, that he who is Lord Nārāyaṇa himself and god Brahmā, the self-born creator, always conduct themselves (as if) in the master-servant relationship?

9. How is it that the controller of universe in whom all the mobile and immobile beings enter at the time of dissolution (of the universe), is (as a matter of fact) devoid of all attributes and untinged (by anything)?

10-12a. How and by whom can he who cannot be specifically particularised and reasoned about, be realized? How do the Vedas respectfully eulogise this great Ātman, who cannot be pursued by Kāla (time) and Śakti and whose conduct is beyond comprehension? How does the individual soul transcend his Jivatva—(the state of being the individual soul) and merge unto the Brahman? O store-house of mercy, I wish to hear this. Kindly narrate it to me (in details)."

12b-13a. When the venerable one was thus asked about his problem by Bhāradvāja, the great sage resembling Brahman (or god Brahman) thereupon explained everything to him.

Bhṛgu replied:

13b-15. The primeval Lord Viṣṇu who was well known to the great sages by the designation Mānasa[3] is the god without the beginning and end, unageing and immortal. He is well known as the unmanifest, permanent, everlasting and unchanging. It is from him that the living beings are created. They are born of him and they die in him. That lord at first created the principle called Mahat (the great principle).

16-17. He is the lord that supports the elements. (He created what is well known as Ākāśa (ether). From Ākāśa originated the water[4] and from the water, fire and wind were evolved. As a result of the contact of fire and wind, the earth was evolved. Thereafter, a brilliant lotus was created by the selfborn deity.

18. From that lotus originated Brahmā, the creator who is the embodiment of the Vedas. He is well known as Ahaṁkāra[5] (the Cosmic Ego), the creator of other elements and the soul of them all.[6]

19-22. That highly brilliant one was Brahmā. The five elements were the five Dhātus (constituents or ingredients of the body). The mountains were his groups of bones (skeletal structure). the earth was the suet and the flesh. The oceans constituted his blood and the firmament his belly. The air (god) was his respiration. The Agni (fire) was his brilliance and the rivers were his blood vessels. Agni and Soma, the sun and the moon were well known as his eyes. The sky is the crown of his head; the earth constitutes his feet and the quarters his arms.[7] There is no doubt about this that he is incomprehensible, and his nature is inconceivable even by the Siddhas. He is the Lord Viṣṇu well known as Ananta (Infinite).

23. He is stationed in all living beings as their soul. He cannot be realized by those who are not self-possessed. He is the creator of Ahaṁkāra which is the cause of origin of all elements. Thence out of the elements was evolved the universe. And it is this that I have been asked by you.

Bhāradvāja said :

24. What are the magnitudes of the sky, the quarters, the surface of the earth, and the wind? Clear this doubt precisely.

Bhṛgu said :

25. Infinite is this beautiful sky inhabited by Siddhas and gods. It supports (in its expanse) all the things scattered about, but its limits could not be ascertained.

26-27. Neither the moon nor the sun sees its end although they go up and down. Even the gods who are self-refulgent like the brilliance of the sun or the fire and whose prowess is well known, cannot perceive the end of the firmament, as it is both inaccessible and infinite, say so, O bestower of respects.

28. This firmament which is over-crowded higher and higher up with highly blazing self-luminous bodies is incomprehensible even to gods.

29. At the extremity of the earth are the oceans. Darkness is remembered as existing at the (other) extremity of the oceans. They say that there is water at the end of that darkness and at the end of the water[8] there is only fire.

30. At the extremity (bottom) of Rasātala (the nether-world) there is water, and at the (lowest) extremity of water, there are lordly serpents. At its end, there is ether again and at the end of the ether, there is water again.

31. Ending with this limit of water is the magnitude of the lord which is more incomprehensible than that of fire, wind and water even to Devas.

32. The colours or nature of the fire, wind, and the surface of the earth are like those of the firmament. But they are distinguished, when the reality is viewed[9] or realized.

33. The sages read about it in the various scriptures as the magnitude of the three worlds and of the ocean, as has been laid down therein.

34. But who can tell the magnitude of what is invisible and what cannot be approached, and when the movement of Siddhas and Devas is restricted.

35-36. Therefore, the designation Ananta (connoting the un-accountability) of the immeasurable infinity (viz. Viṣṇu) has become famous. When the divine form of the noble-souled Mānasa (god Viṣṇu) who is so according to his designation (Ananta), decreases or increases again, who else is able to know it? If there be any other, he must be of His nature.

37. Thereafter from the Puṣkara (the lotus) was created the embodied omniscient lord Brahmā Who is Dharma incarnate, the first and the foremost Prajāpati (Lord of Creation).

Bhāradvāja said :

38. My doubt is that if god Brahmā is born of a lotus, the lotus becomes the elder (of the two). But your holiness stated that god Brahmā was the first-born (in the whole of creation).

Bhṛgu said :

39-40a. In order to offer a seat unto the physical form of Mānasa (Viṣṇu) that attained the state of Brahmā the earth is called Padma (Lotus). The pericarp of that lotus is the Meru which is as lofty as the sky.

40b. This god Brahmā, occupying a seat in its middle, creates peoples and the universe.

Bhāradvāja said :

41. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, kindly explain how lord Brahmā seated in the middle of the Meru, creates different kinds of subjects outside the mount Meru.

Bhṛgu said :

42. Mānasa mentally[10] created the different subjects. In order to maintain and protect the living beings, water was created at the outset.

43. Water which is vital to all living beings was created at first. It is the very life of all beings and subjects grow and multiply thereby.

44. If they are abandoned by it, they perish. The whole universe is surrounded by it. The earth, the mountains, the clouds and all other embodied beings—everything should be known as Vāruṇa (presided over by Varuṇa, the deity of waters) The waters uphold and support everything.

Bhāradvāja said :

45. How was water produced? How were Agni (fire) and Marut (wind) created ? How was the earth created? My great doubt is in this respect.

Bhṛgu said :

46. O Brāhmaṇa, in a former Kalpa of Brahmā,[11] in the assembly of Brahmanical sages, some noble-souled (sages) had a doubt about the origin of the world.

47. Vying with one another, those Brāhmaṇas adopted silence and set meditating. They were motionless and they forsook all food. Thus they remained for a hundred divine years.

48. A speech originating from the Brahman (or words sacred as those of the Vedas) reached the ears of all. A divine speech came out of the atmosphere.

49. Formerly, the infinite firmament became still and unruffled like a huge mountain. As the sun, the moon and the wind were lost, it appeared as if it was sleeping.[12]

50. From that originated water, like a thicker darkness from darkness. From the overflowing froth and foam of the water, the wind rose up.

51-52. Just as an abode[13] (or rather an empty vessel) without any outlet appears silent but when filled with water the wind makes it full of sound, so also, when the extremity of the firmament is continuously restrained by water, the roaring wind pierces through the surface of the sea and rises up.[14]

53. The wind originating from the over-flowing froth of the ocean moves amongst those. After reaching the place of the sky it does not calm down.

54. In the struggle between wind and water, fire of a mighty fire of great brilliance blazed up dispelling all darkness from the sky.

55. The fire in collaboration with the wind raises water to the sky, where it assumes the form of clouds due to the contact with fire and wind.

56. As it goes up the sky, another part of this (i.e. water) that stays behind due to sliminess solidifies into the earth.

57. This earth should be known as the source of origin of tastes, smells, sliminess as well as of living beings. It is from the earth that everything is delivered out.[15]

Bhāradvāja said :

58. (Defective) The five[16] subtle, Dhātus (properties of the five elements) which the lord created (are the Guṇas). These worlds are surrounded by what are termed as Mahā-bhūtas (great elements).

59. When the highly intelligent deity created thousands of bhūtas (living beings), how does bhūtatva (the state of being an element) is begotten in them specifically afterwards (in their post-creation stage).[17]

60. (Defective)[18] Innumerable/immeasurable are the great elements* (?). (From them) living beings are created. Hence the term "great element" (mahābhūta) is suitably applicable to them.

61. Our body is the aggregate of five elements since our Ceṣṭā (activity) is Vâyu (the wind), the cavity is *Mahāṣṭāni is prob. a misprint vide Note 18, p. 511.

Ākāśa (ether), the heat is Agni (fire) the liquid portion is Salila (water) and the mass is Pṛthivī.

62. Hence, the mobile and immobile living beings do consist of these five elements. The ears, nose, taste, touch and vision are termed Indriyas (sense-organs).

Bhāradvāja said :

63. If (you say) that the mobile and immobile beings consist of five elements (I object to it) since in the body of the immobile beings, the five Dhātus (Primary elements) are not seen.

64. The five Dhātus are not perceived in the body of the trees, which are devoid of heat and activity and which are actually solid in form.

65. They do not hear, do not see, they are not cognisant of smell and taste nor do they perceive touch. How can they consist of the five Dhātus (elementary ingredients?).

66. There is no Bhautika feature (the state of being evolved out of the elements) in the trees due to their not being a liquid, not being a fire, not being the earth and not being the wind, not being ākāśa (the sky) as the sky is comprehensible and immeasurable.

Bhṛgu replied :

67. There is no doubt at all that though the trees are of solid nature there is ether in them. (Hence, the perpetual outcome of fruits and flowers from them comes to pass).

68. Due to heat the leaf withers; the bark, the fruits and flowers too wither and decompose. Hence, there is the (sensation of) touch in them.

69. The fruits and flowers become shattered due to the loud report of thunder and the (roaring) sounds of wind and fire. The sound is heard through the ears. Hence, trees do hear.

70. The creeper twines round the tree or spreads all round. The path cannot remain invisible. Hence trees can see.

71. Through merits and demerits and through scents and different kinds of incense, trees that are not affected by sickness, blossom.[19] Hence, trees do smell.

72. Since there is perception of happiness and misery, since the tree if lopped off grows again, I see a soul in the trees. They are not insentient.

73. (Defective) Hence, it takes up water; through fire and wind it consumes the food; as the food undergoes metabolism the growth of the tree takes place.

74. The five Dhātus (elements) are present in the body of all mobile beings. They act in diverse ways on the body whereby the body functions.

75. The skin, the flesh, the bones, the marrow and the fifth (Dhātu)—the sinews—these constitute the earth element in the body.

76. The Tejas element (energy) is the body, (the gastric) fire anger and the eyes as well as the body temperature. These five constitute the fire element in the body (the embodied being) which are created by the (element called) fire.

77. The five ether elements (i.e. the spaces) in the body of living beings are—the ears, the nostrils, the mouth, the heart and the belly.

78. Water elements always present in the bodies of the living beings are five, viz.—the phlegm, the bile, the sweat, the fat and the blood.

79-80. Five types of (organic elemental winds envelop the embodied being. It is through the Prāṇa that the living being delights (others)[20*] (?). The Vyāna is diffused throughout the body. The Apāna blows downwards. Samāna is stationed in the cardiac region. Through the Udāna the living being breathes and through all the five types it speaks.

81. The embodied being perceives the quality of smell from the earthly element and the taste from the water element in him. I shall recount in detail the quality of smell.

82-83. The smell is of nine varieties[21]—the agreeable, the disagreeable, the sweet one, the pungent one, that which spreads wide, that which is harmonious and compact. That which is bland and mild, that which is dreamy and sullied, that which is manifestly calm. Such is the smell that pertains to the earth element. The embodied being sees the splendour through the eyes and perceives touch through the wind element.

84. The sound, the touch, the colour and the taste also are remembered as qualities (of water). I shall recount to you the knowledge of taste (i.e. the details of quality of taste). Listen even as I recount it.

85. 86a The taste has been mentioned to be manifold by the sages of renowned souls. Sweet, saline, bitter, astringent, sour and pungent. Thus, the six types of taste are remembered to be pertaining to the water element.

86b-89a. The fiery element is said to be possessing three qualities, viz., the sound, the touch and the colour. The fiery element perceives the colours and colours are said to be manifold (All types of features are included in the word colour—Rūpa). The Rūpas of the fiery element are sixteen (?), viz. short, long, stout, symmetrical, atomic, circular, white, black, red, blue, yellow, pink, hard, smooth, delicate, slimy, soft and rough.

89b-91. The ether has only one quality, viz. the sound.

I shall tell you the diverse extension (varieties) of the sound —viz. Ṣaḍja, Ṛṣabha, Gāndhāra, Madhyama, Dhaivata, Pañcama and Niṣāda. The quality of the ether (viz. sound) is thus said to be of seven types.

92-93a. Thanks to its power, sound is present everywhere.[22] Yet it manifests itself in various kinds of drums such as drums, kettle-drums and Mṛdaṅga and the conch, clouds and the chariot. Thus the sound originating from the ether is of various kinds.[23]

93b-95. The special quality pertaining to Vāyu is the quality of touch. But the quality of touch is remembered (stated traditionally) to be of various kinds. The special quality pertaining to the wind is of eleven varieties, viz. hot, cool, pleasing and painful; soft, clearly manifest touch, the rough touch, the smooth touch, the slimy touch, the light touch and the heavy touch. Vāyu has two Guṇas, viz. the sound and the touch.

96. (Defective)[24] They say that the sound has been originated from the ether along with qualities of Vāyu unobstructed. Whether perceived or not, its (Vāyu's) movement is uneven[25] (zigzag or irregular).

96. The Dhātus are always developed further by these Dhātus. The fire, the water and the wind—all these are always alert in the embodied beings.

98-99. They are the root cause of the body. They stay enveloping the Prāṇas.[26] When the powerful (Prāṇa) functions depending on the element called the earth, the Agni (fire element) rests on the top of the head and protects the body. Staying either in the cerebrum or in the fire, the Prāṇa functions.

100-101a. That creature is the Ātman of all living beings. It is the eternal Puruṣa. It is the mind, the intellect, the ego, the living beings and the object of the senses. Thus everywhere it is being protected[27] by the Prāṇas.

101b-102. From behind it is enabled to attain its respective movement, by the vital air called Samāna. The Apāna functions after resorting to the fire-element at the root of the bladder and the rectum where it makes the urine and the faecal matter flow out.

103. Experts in anatomical (spiritual) knowledge call that (particular organic wind) the Udāna which though single functions in three (spheres) viz. in exertions, in activities and in restraint.

104. The (vital) wind that abides in all the joints in the human bodies is called Vyāna.

105 The fire that is diffused in the arms[28] is urged by Samāna. It functions by creating the Rasas (lymphatic juices or secretions) and the many Doṣas (disorders in the three bodily humours) and functions.

106. In the middle of Prāṇa and Apāna the (gastric) fire attains its stable position and urged by Prāṇa and Apāna, it digests well.

107. (Defective) The digestive-system (?) extends from the mouth to the Pāyu (Anus) which is otherwise called Gudā (rectum). Hence, all the lymphatic vessels of the embodied beings produce Retas[29] (semen virile).

108. When the organic wind called a combined derangement of the humours[30] (causing fever) takes place, the heat should be known as (gastric) fire. It digests the food of the embodied beings.

109. The Prāṇa that carries the force and heat of the fire goes down to the end of the anus and is obstructed at the extremity of the rectum. It comes up once again and casts the fire upwards.

110. The abdomen is beneath the umbilical region and the Āmāśaya (the receptacle of the raw or uncooked matter the upper part of the belly) is remembered to be above it. All the Prāṇas are stationed at the root of (pakvāśaya) the umbilicus of the body.

111. The Nāḍis (tubular vessels) proceed from the heart and go everywhere—to the sides, above and below. Urged by the ten Prāṇas they carry the nutritive juicy elements[31] (to all parts of the body).

112. The path of the Yogas is also this. Thereby the people attain that highest region. The self-possessed men of equanimity overcoming strain, keep the Ātman at the head (in the Sahasrāra Lotus)

113. When the Prāṇa and Apāna of the embodied beings function thus, Agni (fiery element) is generated and kindled as through in (or under) a cooking pot[32] (?).

CHAPTER FORTYTWO

1. The NP gives three theories of the evolution of the Universe: (1) 'The Popular Purāṇic Trinity Theory' wherein god Brahmā is regarded as the creator of the Universe (Supra 3.3-4) (2) 'The Śākta-Sāṅkhya theory' in which the Parā Śakti (Supreme Potency) of Mahāviṣṇu is credited with the creation. But the process of evolution is that of Sāṅkhyas. (3) The Third theory which may be called 'the Bhṛgu Theory of creation' is discussed in this chapter. The main feature is the special type of evolution proposed herein which is briefly as follows :

Mānasa (Viṣṇu)—Mahat—Ākāśa (the ether)—water—fire—wind—earth.

The NP has not only borrowed this theory from the Mbh. Śānti chs. 182-185 but has incorporated Verbatim the verses in these chapters. This shows the compilatory nature of the NP.

2. This corresponds to Bhīṣma Uvāca in the Mbh. (ibid) v. 5. The rest of the text is a copy of the Mbh.

3. Mānasa—NK (Nilakaṇṭha) the com. on the Mbh. explains by quoting a Śruti text which states :

"Out of Asat was evolved Manas which created Prajāpati. the progenitor of all beings; alternately, whatever is, exists in mind". Hence Mānasa is the name given to the cause of the origin of the Universe. But the adjectives used in vv 13b-15 show that Mānasa is identical with the Brahman or Mahāviṣṇu, NK shows how each of the adjectives is supported in the Upaniṣads.

4. The evolution mentioned here is different from that of the Sāṅkhyas. NK is hard put to it to explain this deviation. He states that the usual evolution—the sky—wind—fire—water—earth are implied here :

He states :

ākāśād abhavad vāri ityādipāṭha-kramo na vivakṣitaḥ kintu ākāśād vāyuḥ, vāyoragniḥ, agnerāpaḥ, adbhyaḥ pṛthivī iti śrauta eva jñeyaḥ.

NK further explains that the names of the elements (wind, etc.) indicate their subtle forms (tanmātras) before these elements were grossly divided. (Tatra vāyvādi-sabdaiḥ sparśa-tanmātram rūpa-tanmātram gandha-tanmātraṁ ca sūkṣmam apañcīkṛta-bhūtajātam ucyate.

5. The Śrutis record that as soon as Brahmā was born he uttered the words "I am He" (So'ham). Hence, he is called Aham or Ahaṁkāra.

6. Sarva-bhūtātmabhūtakṛt : God Brahmā is the soul embodying all bhūtas (sarva-bhūtātman) as well as the creator of those bhūtas (bhūta-kṛt). As NK puts it : Sarvabhūtāni sthūla-viyadādīni, tadātmā taccharīraḥ sa cāsau bhūtakṛc caturvidha-bhūtagrāma-sraṣṭā ceti samāsaḥ.

7. The concept of the deity as the embodiment of the universe which is detailed here is an echo of the Muṇḍaka Up. II.1.4 where the deity is called Sarva-bhūtāntarātmā and still the limbs of his body are said to have been constituted by the sun, the moon, the quarters, etc.

8. This repetition of water indicates the Lord who is the embodiment of water and he is unending—NK.

9. Tattva-darśanāt—NK takes (bhidyante) (a) tattva-darśanāt meaning the bhūtas are distinguished through lack of true knowledge". He who has realized Reality (Tattva) can realize the non-duality—the identity of the soul with the Universe.

10. By the fiat of his will of Saṅkalpād evāsya pitaraḥ samuttiṣṭhanti, quoting such śruti passages, NK states that His Will is enough for creation, no other material is necessary.

11. At the beginning of the Kalpa in Brahmā's region—NK.

12. NK quotes Nihāra-dhūmārka, etc., (Śve. Upa 2-11) for comparison.

13. bhavaha in the NP is probably a mistake for bhājana in the Mbh. (ibid) vii. It is reasonable and within the experience of all that an empty vessel (bhājana) when filled with water makes sound, while "an abode without an outlet" is strange; so with bhājana as the emendation, the translation is "Just as an empty vessel without any aperture appears void of sound, but when with water, air comes in and creates a sound."

14. Tathā salila-saṁruddhe-ghoṣavān,

This (v. 52) also means : "Similarly when the infinite sky (void space) became full of water, and the wind penetrating through the ocean arose with a roar."

15. NK concludes that just as the creation of the Universe is mental (not real) in the case of god Mānasa, similarly we should also realize it to be unreal like a dream (asmadādīnām api iyaṁ sṛṣṭih svapnavad, etc.).

16. rakṣya "to be protected" : is not a satisfactory reading in this context. Mbh. Śānti 184-1 reads "Brahma" which supplies the subject to asṛjat in the text).

17. The plain question is ; why Mahābhūtas (great elements) are also called Bhūtas (which is normally applied to creatures of different categories.

18. V. 60 in the NP appears defective due to the words amitāni mahāṣṭāni in 60a. The original Mbh. (ibid) verse 3a which is quoted in the NP reads:

amitānāṁ mahāśabdo yānti bhūtāni sambhavam

The epithet mahā is given to all things which belong to the category of 'immeasurables' or innumerables.

19. V.17 may alternately be translated thus:

In consequence of smell (pleasant or unpleasant—good or bad) and due to the perfumes of different kinds of incenses, trees recover their strength and blossom forth.

20. The Mbh. reads Praṇīyate for Prīṇayate of the NP. NK interprets: It is the vital breath called Prāṇa which enables a living being to move about; the vital breath named Vyāna gives him strength for exertions.

21. NK has given instances with a slightly different interpretation. Thus nirhārī: overpowering the smell of other things as the gum of Asafoetida used in articles of food.

Saṁhata— A composite mixture of many scents.

Snigdha— As one given out by boiled butter (when transformed into ghee).

Rūkṣa— Dry as of mustard oil.

22. Aiśvaryeṇa— Due to its quality of being all-pervasive like the Supreme Being —NK.

23. The NP v. 92 combines from the Mbh. vv. 40b, 41a, and omitting v. 41C, accepts v. 42a for 93a.

24. The text of v. 96 is defective as it combines Mbh (ibid) vv. 42b and 43a and NP V.97 combines Mbh. vv. 43b and 44a. Reconstructed according to the Mbh. the verses should be translated as follows: 96b-97a. The sound (which is the property of Ākāśa or space) is not heard, when different kinds of touch are inchaotive. The elements or constituents which mix up with other constituents in the body increase in strength.

te śabdādyutpādakā dhātavo dehārambhās tvagādi-golakā dhātubhiḥ prāṇendriyaiḥ āpyāyante ādita ārabhya saṁvardhyante / NK.

25. The reading viṣamā gatiḥ accepted by the NP is from the Bengali Mss of the Mbh. NK specifically states viṣamā gatir iti gauḍa-pāṭhas tu prāmādikaḥ. This reading shows that the author of the NP. copies a Ms. hailing from Bengal or he belonged to that part of the country and accepted the reading from the MS of the Mbh. used in that part.

26. Here ends ch. 184 of the Śānti of the Mbh. the next ch. (185) of the Mbh. is borrowed in the NP. vv. 2b onwards.

27. The Mbh. Śānti 185.5a (which is the same as NP v. 101a) reads paricālyate and NK interprets: The Prāṇa is the creature, the Supreme soul, the eternal Puruṣa, the mind...object of the sense. Thus the living being is made to move about by Prāṇa in every respect."

28. In bāhuṣvagniḥ etc. of the NP. bāhu is meaningless as the vital air called Samāna does not limit its activity to arms only, but covers the whole body, and secondly. the plural No. bāhusu implies more than two arms which means Samāna Vāyu does not function in two-armed beings. The Mbh. reading dhātuṣu for bāhuṣu is better. The mistake is repeated in v. 105 b where NP reads rasān bāhūṁś ca where the proper reading should be dhātūṁś ca as the breath samāna operates on all dhātus (constituents of the body) and not merely on (more than two) hands.

29. Retas in NP v.127 is obviously a blunder. For retas is irrelevant in the channel that extends from the mouth to the anus. That reading rendered the verse defective. The Mbh. (ibid) v. 107 which is borrowed by the NP reads Srotas and means "From this main channel many subsidiary channels or *Nāḍī*s spread out (like branches) all over the body."

NK. takes Srotas as "the passage of the vital wind" and its branches as Nâḍis.

30. NK interprets : As a result of the rapid confluence of the (five) vital airs flowing through these arteries, the heat called gastric fire is generated and it causes digestion.

31. This shows that the NP. anticipated Harvey in physiology.

32. The gist of NK's long explanation: In all the physical and mental functions of the body, Prāṇas, etc. are the instrumental cause. When Yoga characterised by breath-control (prāṇāyāma) is practised, the eternal Brahman reveals itself resplendent. In the final analysis what remains is the Brahman.

CHAPTER FORTYTHREE[1]

The Traditional Duties of Brāhmaṇas

Bhāradvāja said:

1. If the wind is the lord of the Prāṇas and it is the wind alone that functions, breathes and speaks, there is no purpose served by the Jīva, (the individual soul is superfluous).

2. If the heat belongs to the fire, (the element called the Fire), if it is perceived through fire and if the fiery element digests (food, etc.) it, the Jīva, is futile.

3. When a creature dies, the so-called individual soul is not perceived leaving. Only the wind leaves him off and the heat is extinguished.

4. If however, the individual soul is identical with Asu[2] (i. e. Prāṇa, the vital wind) and if it has contact with the wind, it may be seen on a part with the zone of the wind along with the groups of Maruts.

5. Or if the contact be with it (the wind) and if it perishes thereby like a pot of water due to its being released (separated) from a great ocean.[3]

6. If anyone pours water into the well or places the lamp into the fire, it perishes immediately. Similarly, the individual soul too perishes instantaneously.[4]

7-8. The body consists of the five elements and (they say that) it is in this that the soul lives. Therefore, if one of the elements perishes all the others also must undoubtedly perish. If food (and beverages) are not taken in, the watery element perishes. The wind element perishes by means of the restraint of the breath. The (gastric) fire perishes by abstaining from taking food and if anything is taken to purge the belly.[5]

9. Through sickness, wounds and similar distress the earth element also gets shattered. If anyone of these elements is afflicted, the whole mass of the elements perishes.

10. If that (body constituted of five elements) perishes, what is it that the individual soul pursues? What is it that the individual soul feels afflicted?* What does it hear or speak?

11. "When I am in the other world this cow will redeem me." A person thinks like this, offers the gift of a cow and then dies. But whom is it that the cow will redeem ?

12. When the cow, the giver (of that cow) and the acceptor—all these are dissolved here in this world, simultaneously, whence can there be the reunion of all of them ?

13. Whence can these be enlivened again—he who is swallowed up by birds, he who falls down from the top of a mountain and he who is consumed by fire ?

14. If the root of a tree is cut, it does not grow again. When a man is alive[6] all his parts function. But how will the dead come back again ?

15. All the individual souls had been created formerly and they revolve again and again. The dead ones perish even as the seeds perish one after the other.[7]

16. O Brāhmaṇa, this is the doubt that surges in my heart. O omniscient one, clarify it since I depend upon you (and have approached you for this).

Sanandana said:

17. O excellent sage, Bhṛgu the son of Brahmā who was asked thus by him spoke again to clear his doubts.

Bhṛgu said:

18. When the individual is killed or dies himself the Prāṇas cease to exist.[8] The living being (i.e. his soul) transmigrates to another body and this body decays and becomes shattered.

19. The Jiva is not dependent on the body. It does not perish when the body perishes. Just as the fire is seen (to be present) even after the sacrificial twigs are completely burned.

Bhāradvāja said:

20. (You say) that when they (the sacrificial twigs) perish the fire does not perish. But after the fuel has been used up the fire is not verily seen.

---

*NP "afflicted" but Mbh. "Does it know" (Vedayate) XII 10-186.

21. Hence, I understand that if fire is extinguished without further addition of fuel, it definitely perishes since, where it goes is not known. There is no proof of its existence.

Bhṛgu said:

22-25. (You say as follows:—) After the twigs have been used up the fire is not seen. I understand that the tranquil fire without fuel does perish since where it goes is not known. There is no proof of its existence. (Yet understand this.) Just as the fire is not perceived after the consumption of fuel as it has vanished into the ether, and so is without any base and as it is difficult to be perceived, so also, when the body is forsaken the Jiva remains like the ether (invisible). Since it is very subtle it does not perish,[9] undoubtedly in the same way as the fire. The fiery element sustains the Prāṇa. May that be understood as the Jiva.

26-27. The (gastric) fire that is sustained by the wind (i.e. the body temperature is sustained by respiration) perishes when the breath is curbed. When the fire of the physical body perishes the insentient body falls down and merges into the earth. Indeed, the ultimate goal of the mobile and immobile beings is the earth.

28-29. The wind follows (or merges into) the ether; the fiery element too follows it. Since all the three constitute one unit the set of two (viz. the earth and water) is established on the earth. Where there is the ether, the wind is present too. The fire is present where there is the wind. These must be known to be without forms but the embodied beings have forms.

Bhāradvāja said:

30. O sinless one, if the fire, the wind, the earth, the ether and the water are present in the embodied beings, what are the characteristics of the Jiva. Kindly explain this to me.

31. I wish to understand of what nature is the Jiva in the bodies of living beings which are constituted by a set of five things viz. the elements) and take delight in five things (e.g. taste, smell, etc.) and have five cognitive senses.

32. The body is a mass of flesh and blood, fat, bones and sinews. When it is shattered and split the Jiva is not perceived.

33. If the body is without a Jiva but it contains only the five elements, who experiences the pain in the course of mental and physical distress?

34. O sage, by means of his pair of ears, the Jiva hears what is uttered, but when the mind is preoccupied he does not hear it. Hence, the Jiva is futile.

35. What should be seen, everyone sees with the eyes in collaboration with the mind. When the mind is agitated, the eye does not perceive though it may look at things.

36. He does not see, or smell or hear, or speak or know the touch when he (the agent called Jiva) is under the influence of slumber.

37. Who is it that is delighted? Who is infuriated? Who bewails? Who is alarmed? Who shuns? Who wishes? Who meditates? Who is malicious? Who reads or utters words?

Bhṛgu replied:

38. The body holds one that is common to the five. It is the Antarātman[10] (the inner immanent soul). It is he who perceives the odour, taste, sound, touch, form and the Guṇas (attributes).

39. The Antarātman is present throughout the body, in the body consisting of five elements; it perceives the five Guṇas, it is this that experiences pleasure and pain always. Separated from it the body does not understand anything.

40. When there is no perception of colour, no touch and no heat in the fire within the body, the fire is tranquil. When the bodily fire (temperature) is cooled down, (the body) dies by being forsaken by Jiva (who does not die).

41. The whole of this (universe) (?) is full of water; it is the water that is the physical body of the embodied being. There the Ātman is Brahmā in all the living beings. He is the creator of the worlds. He is called Mānasa.[11]

42. That which rests in the physical body like the water-drop on the lotus-leaf is the Ātman. Know that the Ātman is conducive to the welfare of all worlds.

43. Know him as the indwelling soul (Kṣetrajña), the eternal well-wisher of the worlds. Know that the Guṇas (attributes) of the Jiva are Sattva, Rajas and Tamas.

44. Some say that insentience[12] is the attribute of the Jiva. But it is active and it activates everything. Those who know the kṣetra (the physical body) say that the Supreme Ātman has set the seven worlds in motion

45. When the physical body is changed, there is no destruction of the Jiva. O sage, those who have not understood this, call this as untrue. The Jiva moves about in the world (only) after being covered by the body.[13] And its change of body takes place due to its fifth stage (death). (The other four being infancy, childhood, youth and old age).

46. Thus hidden in all the living beings, the Ātman always moves about. It is perceived through the subtle and excellent intellect[14] by the seers of the truth.

47. (Defective) The wise person continuously practising Yoga in the initial and final watches of the night and with his soul sanctified by assimilating pure food realizes the Supreme soul within his own soul.

48. By dint of the serenity and composure of the mind, and by giving up both auspicious and inauspicious Karmans, one should stabilise oneself in the Ātman and be delighted in the mind. He shall thereafter attain infinite bliss.

49. The mental fire in the bodies is called the Jiva (in the bodies). In the matter of decision regarding Bhūtātman, the creation of the lord of subjects[15] is as follows:

50. At the beginning (of creation) it was the Brāhmaṇas alone that Brahmā the Prajāpati created. They were evolved out of his own brilliance. Their lustre was like that of the Sun and fire.

51. Thereafter the Lord created the following things as conducive to the attainment of heaven, viz. truthfulness Dharma (virtue), the eternal Brahman (i. e. the Vedas), the conventional duties and purity both physical and mental.

52-53a. (Defective) Devas, Dānavas, Gandharvas, Daityas, Asuras and the great serpents, Yakṣaṣ, Rākṣasas, Nāgas, Piśācas and human beings (were created). The human beings (were classified) into Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras.[16]

Bhāradvāja said:

53b-54. (You say) that one Varṇa[17] (caste) in the four-fold division of men is different from the other. What is the criterion thereof? Sweat, urine, faecal matter, phlegm, bile and blood circulate within everyone. Then on what basis is the caste divided?

55. Among both the mobile and immobile beings there are innumerable groups and classes. Among these different Varṇas how is a particular Varṇa arrived at?

Bhṛgu said:

56. Originally, there was no distinction among the people. The whole universe formerly created by Brahmā was Brahmanical by nature. Though originally created as equals by Brahmā, it was as a result of their Karmans (acts) that people got divided into different castes.

57. Some of those Brāhmaṇas became fond of erotic enjoyments. They were furious by temperament. They were violent and zealous. They liked risky adventures. They forsook their original duties (of Brāhmaṇas), became red in complexion (i. e. full of Rajo-guṇa) and attained Kṣatriya-hood.

58. Those Brāhmaṇas, who maintained themselves by means of agriculture and lived by tending and rearing up cattle and did not practise original duties as Brāhmaṇas (grew) yellow (a mixture of rajas and tamas) and became Vaiśyas.

59. Those Brāhmaṇas who were engrossed in violence and untruthfulness, greedy and maintained themselves by means of all types of jobs (even forbidden to Brāhmaṇas) and were thus fallen from purity of conduct became dark (full of Tamoguṇa) and degenerated to the status of Śūdras.

60. Thus the (original) Brāhmaṇas affected adversely by these activities were changed into other castes. The power of austerities of those Brāhmaṇas who maintained their prescribed religious rituals and duties, does not perish.

61-62a. There are many sub-divisions of Brāhmaṇas in the different places, but all of them observe holy virtues, rites and restraints. They perpetually retain the Brahman (i. e. they study the Vedas regularly). Brahman (i.e. Vedas) had already been created formerly. Those who know them understand (everything else).

62b-c. There are many types of Piśācas, Rākṣasas, Pretas and Mleccha (outcaste) tribes. The creation by (Brahmā's) mind is verily intent on the religious rituals and duties.[18]

Bhāradvāja said:

63. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, how does one become a Brāhmaṇa or a Kṣatriya? O Brahmanical sage, how does one become a Vaiśya or a Śūdra? O excellent one among the fluent speakers, please explain it unto me.

Bhṛgu said:

64. One who is as follows is called a Brāhmaṇa. He should have been consecrated duly by means of post-natal purificatory rites and other holy rites as well and should himself be pure. He must possess the learning (recitation, etc.) of the Vedas. He must strictly adhere to the religious duties and rites prescribed for Brāhmaṇas.[19]

65. He must closely follow the rules of cleanliness both mental and physical and pure conduct. He must have soundly studied the different lores. He must be fond of his preceptors and elders. He must perpetually observe the holy vows and rites. He must be devoted to truthfulness. Such a person is verily called a Brāhmaṇa.

66. He in whom these qualities are seen is remembered as a Brāhmaṇa, viz. Truthfulness, charitable gifts, non maliciousness (absence of wickedness), kindness, mercy, sympathy and austerity.

67. One who is as follows, is called a Kṣatriya. He practises the duties assigned to a Kṣatriya, i.e. the military profession). He practises studying the Vedas He must be interested in giving religious gifts and collecting taxes.*

68. Derivation of the word Vaiśya is as follows:— viśati āśu iti Vaiśyaḥ.[20] One who enters (worldly transactions) immediately is called a Vaiśya. Through the animals he is interested in taking to agricultural activities. He loves to donate charitable gifts and is pure. He is endowed with the study and the learning of the Vedas.

69. One who is always habituated to all kinds of diet, one who regularly performs all odd jobs, is impure, one who has forsaken the study of the Vedas and one who has no conventional duty is remembered as a Śūdra.

70. If a (born) Śūdra possesses all good characteristics and a (born) Brāhmaṇa does not possess the same that Śūdra is no longer a Śūdra and that Brāhmaṇa is no longer a Brāhmaṇa.

71. By every possible means restraint be put on covetousness and anger. This as well as self-control is the holiest of all wisdom.

72. Those two (covetousness and anger) attempt to destroy welfare. They must be avoided by all means. One shall save one's prosperity and glory from perpetual anger;[21] one shall save one's austerity (power of penance) from malice.

73. One should save one's learning from (the feeling of both) honour and dishonour and one should save oneself from errors and mistakes.

74. O Brāhmaṇa, he is a real renouncer and intelligent man, he whose every religious enterprise (e.g. sacrifice) is unfettered by longing expectations and he who has dedicated every thing (in his possession) to Tyāga (renunciation for the sake of others).

75. One should refrain from injuring or doing violence to all living beings; he should be friendly unto all. Renouncing all possessions and monetary gifts he should subdue his sense-organs intelligently.

*In my (Veṅk. Edt.) text, the reading is Dānāddānaratir 'One who likes to give charitable gifts but not accepting them from others' (but collecting taxes from subjects).

76-78. One shall abide by that which causes no sorrow,[22] one that will afford him freedom from fear here and hereafter. The (Brāhmaṇa) should be perpetually engaged in austerities, self-control, restraint over the mind. He should be desirous of conquering what is not conquered. One should remain unattached to worldly affairs. What can be perceived by means of the sense organs is Vyakta (the manifest). That which is beyond the scope of the sense organs, and which can be grasped by inference from its symptoms and characteristic features should be known as Avyakta (unmanifest). If there is a nuclear conviction of reality one should continue to ponder more and more. When one is (thoroughly) convinced (about the truth)[23] he should steady the mind therein.

79. The mind shall be controlled through the Prāṇa (Breath-control) and the Prāṇa should be concentrated in the Brahman. One attains Nirvāṇa (extinction as a prelude to salvation) through Nirveda (complete detachment). One should not be worried or think of anything else.

80-81a. O Brāhmaṇa, it is verily by dispassion (and renunciation) that one gets (real) happiness. One should always be (striving) for purity and should be endowed with the norm of the conduct of the good.

81b-82a. Highest compassion for all beings—all these constitute the characteristic of twice-borns.[24] He (a twice-born) should observe Truthfulness as a sacred vow and should practise Penance, (mental and physical) purity. It is the truth that creates the subjects. The whole world is sustained by Truth. One goes to heaven only by truthfulness.[25]

82b-83. Falsehood is the feature of darkness; one is led downwards through darkness. Those who have been caught hold of by darkness, those who have been enveloped by darkness do not see the brilliant light (of heaven). They say that Naraka (hell) is darkness itself; it cannot be brilliant with light.

84. Both Satya (truth) and Anṛta (falsehood) is attained by the people roaming over the Earth. Even in that case, the predilection in the world should be thus towards Truth and falsehood.

85-86. Light and darkness indicate Dharma and Adharma as also happiness and misery. Wise, foresighted persons who observe what is created in the world affected by miseries and pleasures both physical and mental but both originating from or leading up to Asukha (i. e. unhappiness), do not become deluded. A clever man should (therefore) endeavour to get liberated from misery.[26]

87-88. Both here and hereafter pleasure is non-permanent. Just as the light of the moon eclipsed by Rāhu becomes faded and dim, so also the happiness of living beings, oppressed by darkness, perishes.

89. Happiness is said to be of two kinds, viz. the physical and the mental. Here, in this world verily all actions in regard to any object are said to be pursued for the sake of happiness. As to the other world there is nothing better than Apavarga (salvation). That alone is to be desired. It is a desirable quality. Its origin is caused by the endeavour for the same through virtuous activities. All the activities are aimed at the acquisition of happiness which is its purpose.

Bhāradvāja said :

89. It has been said by you that pleasures have the greatest status.

90. We do not accept this. Nor is it so in the case of sages who establish themselves in the Supreme.

91. This desirable special quality cannot be attained. They do not practise this. It is reported that Lord Brahmā, the creator of the three worlds, stands alone in austerity. He is a celibate. He does not entangle himself in erotic pleasure.

92. Moreover, Lord Viśveśvara, husband of Umā, controlled Kāma who attacked him by reducing him to bodilessness.

93-94 Hence, this is not accepted by noble-souled ones.[27] Nor am I convinced of this by you. It has been stated by you that women constitute the highest, ultimate happiness.[28] It is only a popular saying in the world. There are two types of benefit (or result). Happiness results from good deeds and misery otherwise.

Bhṛgu said :

95. Here it is being (thus) explained. Darkness (Tamoguṇa) has manifested itself from Anrta (falsehood). Those who are prevailed upon by darkness pursue only Adharma and not Dharma. Those who have been affected by anger, covetousness, delusion, violence, falsehood and similar vicious things do not attain happiness either in this world or in the other one. They are shattered and scattered through various kinds of sickness, pain and oppressions. They are afflicted by various distressing features such as capital punishment, imprisonment and tortures; they are overwhelmed by the distress and strain of hunger, thirst and tedium; they are subjected to various miseries of physical strain due to rain, gusts of wind, oppressing heat and biting cold; they are afflicted by various mental miseries caused by the death of or separation from kinsmen or the destruction of wealth; they are also dejected due to other causes such as old age, death, etc.

96. In the heaven there is neither physical nor mental pain; there is no old age or sin; it is always pleasure alone there; but here (in this world) both pleasure and pain are experienced.

97. They say that there is only misery in the hell, that the highest region (of the Lord) has pure happiness. The earth is the mother of all living beings; women are also of the same nature.

98-99. The male is lord of the progeny (begetter). They know that the semen virile is of the fiery element. Hence, he is the creator of the worlds of Dharma, of good conduct,[29] of well-performed penance, of self-study (of the Vedas) and of the performance of Homa. The sin is subdued through the sacrificial rites. There is excellent tranquility in the self-study of the Vedas.

100. They say that enjoyment of pleasures is due to charitable gifts; and that one shall attain heavenly pleasures through penance. They say that Dāna (charitable gift) is of two types; that for the purpose of benefit here and that for the purpose of benefit in the other world.

101. Whatever is given to the good men is conducive to the pleasures in the other world; whatever is given as charitable gift to bad men is conducive to the pleasures in this world only. The benefit enjoyed (from charitable gifts) is in accordance with charitable gift offered.

Bhāradvāja enquired:

102. What is performance of holy rites ? Who performs them? What are the characteristics of Dharma ? Of how many types is Dharma? It behoves you to explain it.

Bhṛgu said:

103. The acquisition of the benefit of heavenly pleasures is only unto those learned men who are engrossed in carrying out their prescribed religious duties. He who is otherwise becomes deluded.

Bhāradvāja submitted:

104. It behoves you to explain to me here the respective conventional duties of the four stages of life ordained formerly by Brahmanical sages.[30]

Bhṛgu said:

105. Four Āśramas (stages of life) have been specified for the preservation of Dharma, even at the very outset, by Lord Brahmā who used to carry out what is beneficial to the worlds

106. They mention that the residence in the house of the preceptor is the first Āśrama. The boy in this stage of life, properly controls his self by means of purificatory rites, consecratory rites, observances and holy vows. He performs the worship of the sun, the fire and the deities during the two Sandhyàs (The Dawn and Dusk). He eschews all lethargy. He purifies his inner soul by means of obeisance to the preceptor, performance of the Vedic Studies and listening to (good discourses).

He takes his holy ablution thrice every day. He regularly practises celibacy, maintenance of holy sacrificial fires, service to the preceptor, begging for alms, etc.; he dedicates the alms so collected (to his teacher) and other activities to the inner soul. He abides by the words of the preceptor. He obediently carries out the behests of the preceptor. (He does not say anything against the preceptor.) He should be devoted to the study of the Vedas which he acquires, thanks to the grace of his preceptor. In this connection there is a Verse:-

107. If any Brāhmaṇa propitiates the preceptor and acquires the Vedas, he attains the benefit of residence in the heaven (and heavenly pleasures). All his mental desires will be accomplished.

They say that the second Āśrama is Gārhasthya (householdership).

108. We shall elucidate the characteristics of the conventional duties followed by the good of that period. The Āśrama of the householder is laid down in regard to those who practise good conduct, who have performed Samāvartana rites (conclusion of study and returned home) and who seek the benefits of joint-performance of holy rites.

109. In this stage (the aim) is the acquisition of Dharma, wealth and love. In view of the acquisition of the Trivarga (i.e. the above-mentioned three aims) he should earn wealth through non-despicable means. A householder should lead his particular stage of life by means of wealth earned by any of these means. He may earn wealth as a result of his pre-eminence achieved through recitation of the Vedas. Or he may earn wealth by means of any method open to a Brahminical sage. He may take wealth from the sea. He may take wealth acquired by good luck or by practice of observances.

110. They cite this stage as the root (support) of all stages (of life). The residents of the abode of the preceptor (i.e. Brāhmaṇas of religious students), Parivrājakas (i.e. Recluses and others such as those who observe the performance of holy rites and vows are also benefited through the house-holders through the alms given or oblations shared.[31]

111. The householders render service to the Vānaprasthas (the forest-dwelling hermits) also generally by supplying them the articles (they require). Hence, these good men generally travel over the earth with the intention of visiting holy centres and sacred rivers. They continue their Svādhyāya (self study) also. While travelling, they take with them the wholesome cooked food they may require on the way.

112. The householders greet and welcome them. Without envy or jealousy they speak to them welcoming words. They offer them good seats and beds. They are hospitable to them and give them food to eat and render other good services.

113. In this context there is a verse. If any guest becomes disappointed and returns from anyone's house, he gives the house-owner all the sins and takes away his merits.

114. Through the performance of sacrifices and other rites (by a householder) the deities are pleased; the Pitṛs are pleased by the oblations and libations offered; the sages are pleased, thanks to the repeated recitations, listening and memorising of the Vidyā (Vedic passages, etc.) and god Prajāpati is pleased, thanks to the procreation of children.

115-116. In this context there are two verses. (Defective) (The Householders) entertain affection to all living beings like the ears and the speech unto the Vāyu[32] (?). The following are despicable (in a householder): Harassing (others), obstructing (others), using harsh words, disrespecting people, arrogance and egotism. The following is a penance common to all Āśramas, viz. nonviolence, truthfulness and absence of anger.

117 Again in the householder's life, one has the good fortune of having garlands, ornaments, good robes, oil bath, enjoyment, etc. every day; they can witness dances, they can hear and enjoy songs and instrumental music; they can have many things pleasing to the ears and cooling to the eyes; they can see beautiful women, they can enjoy the five varieties of food-stuffs, viz. Bhakṣya (that which is chewed and taken in), Bhojya (that which is swallowed), Lehya (lambatives), Peya (beverages) and Coṣya (articles of food squeezed and taken).

118. The householders can have the satisfaction of playing about as they please; they can attain erotic pleasures. He who can perpetually accomplish Trivargas (three aims in life) in the Aśrama of a householder experiences all pleasures here and attains the goal of the elegent and virtuous men.[33]

119. If a householder maintains himself by gleaning, if he is engaged in performing his duties and if he has eschewed all enterprises leading to erotic pleasures—it is not difficult for him to attain heaven.

120. The Vānaprasthas too (Forest-dwelling hermits) pursue their virtuous activities. They visit holy centres, sacred rivers and cascades of water. In the forest full of deer, boars, buffaloes, tigers and wild elephants, they perform their austerities. They move about in those forests.

121-122. They have eschewed all dress and raiments, foodstuffs and mode of behaviour (suited to their former village life); their diet is confined to the medicinal herbs, fruits, roots and leaves; their food-intake is limited and restricted and consists of various products of the forest. They seat themselves on bare ground. They lie down on the earth, stone, sand, gravels or ashes; they cover their nakedness by means of Kuśa grass, hides or bark garments; they grow their hair, beard and moustaches as well as their nails; they take their ablutions (regularly) at the specified time; At the time prescribed for the performance of Homa they offer dry oblations; they take rest after sweeping the earlier offerings of sacrificial twigs, Kuśa grass, flowers, etc; their skins are cracked everywhere due to the exposure to chill or hot winds; their blood and flesh are dried up due to the performance of diverse vowed observances, Yogic activities[34] and they appear to have only skin and bones, yet they keep up their fortitude. By means of their inherent strength they uphold their bodies.

122. He who regularly maintains these rites ordained by the Brahminical sages shall, like fire, burn all his defects and conquer all invincible worlds.

123. I shall reiterate the conventional prescribed duties of the Parivrājakas (recluses). They eschew the sacrificial fires. They leave off wealth, property, wives and all attachment to worldly affairs. They take off their affectionate ties and renounce (everything) and become recluses. They view a lump of clay or a piece of gold or a stone equally; their attention is not diverted to those who are engaged in realising the three fold aims of life.

124. They observe enemies, friends and neutrals equally and impartially; they refrain from injuring either physically or mentally or verbally any type of living being whether an immobile, or a mammal, or a bird or a sweat-born insect; they do not have any fixed abode; they move about on the mountains, river banks, shades of trees and temples; they may go to cities or villages for temporary stay;[35] they never indulge in violence, anger, pride, greed, delusion, miserliness, arrogance, slandering or false prestige.

In this context there are three verses :

125-127. The contemplative sage (muni) who moves about as a muni (silent recluse) after granting freedom from fear to all living beings need not be afraid of any living being at any place. The recluse performs the Agnihotra in his own body; it is through his mouth that he consigns the Haviṣ-offerings obtained through begging for alms to propitiate the bodily fire. The Brāhmaṇa attains the other worlds through the fire of the funeral pyre. He who performs the duties of the Mokṣāśrama (Sannyāsa) as mentioned, should remain pure and keep his intellect properly conceived. As a fire that has no supply of fuel becomes calm, that Brāhmaṇa goes to the Brahmaloka.

CHAPTER FORTYTHREE

1. Chapter 43 in the NP is composed of the text of chs. 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191 and 192 of Mbh. Śānti Parva. As all the verses in these chapters are incorporated en bloc in the NP, when the text of the NP becomes unintelligible the Mbh. text is referred to and the reading in the Mbh. is suggested as the probable emendation. When NK differs his interpretation is also recorded.

2. Vāsu in the NP seems to be a misprint for Vāyu in the original (Mbh. Śānti 186.4). The verse then means: If life is composed of mere air and if it ends by the departure of the wind from the body, it will then mix up with another part of (the outer) atmosphere and would be visible like a whirl-wind (vātyācakravat—NK).

3. The verse is obscure even if vv. 5 & 6 are taken together. NK however, treats them separately.

According to NK, v. 5 anticipates and replies the Digambara Jaina objection that the Jīva is always associated with eight types of Karmans and is never seen separate or independently distinct from them. NK is obviously not correct in limiting the aṣṭa-karma-prakṛti doctrine to the Digambaras only as the Śvetāmbaras (in fact all Jainas) hold it. NK reads Saṁśleṣo yadi vātena instead of NP's yadi vā tena (which is a bit obscure) The translation : "If the Jīva—the individual soul—be in contact with the assemblage (of karmans) dominated by the wind-element and if the Jīva be different from that assemblage, when the assemblage (of karmans) is destroyed like a vessel of water from which the dead-weight of stones is jettisoned it becomes free and floats in the sea."

Jainas compare the soul covered with Kārmic matter to a gourd plastered with clay, due to the weight of which it sinks down in water. But when the clay is washed off, the gourd naturally and automatically comes up and floats. So does the Jīva, free from Karmans, goes straight up to Mokṣa. The Jīva-gourd analogy of Jainas is better than the above Mbh. analogy.

4. Bhāradvāja, as a Pūrva-pakṣin, raises another objection. If as you say, Jīva (individual soul) be a portion of the Brahman, the Jīva gets extinguished in the Brahman, just as water poured into a well or a lamp (after being extinguished) becomes one with fire (Saṅghāta-nāśe brahmāntargatasya jīvasya svarūpa-nāśaḥ NK).

5. Mbh. (ibid) 186.8 reads naśyate koṣṭha-bhedāt kham for koṣṭhabhedārtham of the NP. The Mbh. implies disapppearance of the element of space (kham) if excretions stop.

6. For jīvānyasya pravartante, Mbh. (ibid) v. 14 reads bījānyasya pravartante "It is seeds which put forth sprouts."

7. For praṇaśyati in the NP, Mbh: (ibid) v. 15 reads Pravartate "seeds come forth from seeds". NK. explains: Semen virile is the seed of the body and not adṛṣṭa "the unseen" or Karma.

Here ends ch. 186 from the Mbh. Śānti.

8. For na prāṇaḥ santi jīvasya of the NP v. 18, Mbh. (ibid) ch. 187.1 reads na praṇāśo sti jīvasya: It means: there is no destruction of the individual soul and of whatever he has given (as gift) or of other acts.

9. For na naśyate susūkṣmatvāt, Mbh. (ibid) v. 6 reads na grhyate (the soul) cannot be seen (or inferred).

10. NK explains that it is the mind that is the 'seer' or 'experiencer'. When the mind is associated with sense-organs, one can see etc., but when, as in sleep or the Samādhi state, the mind is dissociated with the body, one does not see, etc.

11. According to NK 41b means : In those waters, it is the soul which manifests itself in the mind. That soul is god Brahmā, the creator of the world, who abides in all things.

12. The gross mis-print in the NP acetana for Sacetana in the Mbh. (ibid) v. 26 makes the verse selfcontradictory. The verse so emended means: they (the knowers of Reality) say that the soul is characterised by consciousness and exists with the attribute of life. (Jīvaguṇa, viz. the body, sense-organ and the mind—NK)

13. dehāntaritaḥ : Better : All that the Jiva does, is going from one body to another.

14. Viz. the realization of one's identification with the Brahman—NK.

15. Or: The Jīva is the element of fiery effulgence that abides in the mind. It is from the Lord that all this creation has come forth. This is the conclusion to be deduced after investigation into the origin of the soul and creatures.

Here ends ch. 187 of the Mbh. Śānti.

16. V.53a reads :

Brāhmaṇāḥ Kṣatriyā Vaiśyāḥ Śūdrāṇām asitas tathā

The line is defective as the first three words are in the nom. case (which is an enumeration of Varṇas or castes in continuation of the previous verse). And those words in the nom. case cannot be connected with Śūdrāṇām asitas tathā. Nor can these words be related with 53b which is an independent speech of Bhāradvāja. This is due to the mis-quotation in the NP of the Mbh. Śānti 188.4-5 which are as follows :

Brāhmaṇāḥ Kṣattriyā Vaiśyāḥ Śūdrāś ca dvija-sattama |
ye cānye bhūtasaṅghānāṁ varṇās tāṁś cāpi nirmame ||
Brāhmanāṇāṁ sito varṇaḥ Kṣattriyāṇām tu lohitaḥ |
Vaiśyānāṁ pītako varṇah śūdrāṇm asitas tathā ||

The NP quoted the 1st three words from 4a of the Mbh. and the last three words from 5b of the Mbh and composed its v. 53a. Hence the defectiveness.

The NP abounds in such misquotations to the despair of the translators who merely depend on the text of the NP as it is.

17. NK explains that the word Varṇa which means complexion or colour here represents certain attributes (varṇena jātyā varṇaḥ sātvikatvādi bhidyate).

18. This verse combines 18a and 20b from the Mbh. (ibid) ch. 188. NK interprets 20b (i.e. 62b and c in the NP): The other creation is like the superimposition of the illusion of a serpent on a string and hence is called mental (mānasī). NK. takes dharma in the sense of Yoga. The mental creation rests upon Yoga.

Here ends chapter 188 in the Mbh. Śānti.

19. The duties of Brāhmaṇas are the everyday performance of ablution, Sandhyā, (twilight-prayer), Japa, Homa (fire worship), worship of deities, performance of Vaiśvadeva and hospitality—NK.

20. One who earns reputation by cattle-rearing, agriculture, commerce —NK.

21. nityaṁ krodhāt from the Mbh. is better, "one should always protect from anger," etc.

22. NK. takes aśokaṁ sthānam as the soul and interprets "One should be absorbed in the meditation of the Ātman."

23. Visrambha— that which can be relied on such as the words of the spiritual preceptor.

24. Here ends ch. 189 of the Mbh. Śānti.

25. The original (Mbh. Śānti. ch. 190) v.1 is a general statement: Truth is the Brahman. Truth is the Penance. The whole universe is upheld and sustained by Truth. It is through Truth (fulness) that one goes to heaven.

26. V. 85 in the NP is Mbh. (ibid) v. 4b and 6a and v. 86 is Mbh. v. 6b and 7a.

27. V. 93 in the NP is obscure : The Mbh. original is tasmād brūmo na tu mahātmabhir ayam pratigṛhīto na teṣām tāvad viśiṣṭo guṇa-viśeṣa iti / Bhāradvāja objects: Hence we affirm that happiness is not acceptable to highsouled people. Nor does it appear to be a high attribute of the soul.

28. The text of the NP: bhavatā tūktaṁ sukhānām paramāḥ striyaḥ is strange as Bhṛgu in his speech made no reference to women as the ultimate happiness. The Mbh. original is : bhagavatā tūktaṁ sukhānna paraṁ astīti / '(I cannot believe in) what your worship stated. viz. there is nothing higher than happiness.'

29. Here (at the end of v.98), ch. 190 in the Mbh. Śānti ends. The NP, however, combines Mbh. Śānti 191. 1b and 2a in one verse, viz, 99 and this odd combination of Mbh. 2b and 3a into verse 100 etc. is carried on in the NP. I have, however, followed the text of the NP in translation.

30. The reading brahmarṣi vihitāṁ purā, though a faithful copy of the Mbh. (ibid) v. 7 is contradicted by Bhṛgu's reply : pūrvam eva bhagavatā Brahmaṇā and Not brahmarṣiṇā. The original reading in the Mbh. v. 7 should have been Brahmaṇā vihitam in view of consistency. That god Brahmā is the original Law-giver or ordainer of order is known to all.

31. bhikṣā-bali-saṁvibhāgāḥ : NK explains : bhikṣā (alms-giving) is to atithis, bali is the food offered on the ground, and Saṁvibhāga is the division of one's property among one's sons.

32. The obscurity in the meaning of these verses is due to the misprints in the text of the NP. The translation is an attempt to interpret rationally the printed text of the NP. The original of the NP verse in Mbh. (ibid) v. 14 is as follows :

vātsalyāt sarvabhūtebhyo vācyāḥ śrotra-sukhā giraḥ / paritāpopaghātaśca pāruṣyaṁ cātra garhitam //

"A person following Grhastha-dharma should speak to all creatures words full of affection and agreeable to the ears. It is censurable to give pain or inflict humiliation or mortification and harsh words."

33. Here ends ch. 191 of the Mbh. Śānti.

34. NK explains niyama—vowed observance such as sitting with fire on four sides under the sun (pañcāgnisādhana), caryā—activities such as pilgrimage to sacred places.

35. The NP has omitted the restriction on the duration of a stay in a town or a village. The Mbh. limits it to five nights (pañca-rātrika) in a big locality and one night in a village.

CHAPTER FORTYFOUR

A Discourse on Meditation

Bhāradvāja said:[1]

1. A world other than this is reported only, but is not perceived. I wish to know about it. It behoves your worship to recount it.[2]

Bhṛgu said :

2. On the northern side of the Himavān which is holy and endowed with all good qualities, there is a region which is holy, lovable and conducive to welfare. It is called the other world.[3]

3. There men do not commit sinful activities; they are pure and absolutely devoid of impurities. They have eschewed greed and delusion. They are perfectly harmless.

4. It is a land on a par with the heaven; all suspicious qualities are said to be present therein. Death occurs at the proper time; ailments do not touch (any one).

5. No one is covetous of other men's wives. The people are devoted to their own wives. No other man is ever killed there. No one is arrogant of his possessions.

6. There is no Adharma (sin), at all. Their knowledge being difinite, no doubt arises (in any one). The benefit of whatever is done is directly obtained there.

7. Some of the men here are endowed with vehicles, seats and (plenty) to eat. They live in palatial houses. They are surrounded by all desirable things. They are bedecked in gold ornaments.

8. In regard to some (it must be confessed that) they anyhow manage to remain alive. With great deal of hard labour, they retain their Prāṇas (vital breath).[4]

9. Here (in this world) some men are devoted to Dharma, and some men are absorbed in roguery. Some men are happy while some are miserable; some are indigent and others are affluent.

10. (In this world) there is hard labour, fear, strain, delusion and severe hunger. Here covetousness is seen and a passion that deludes all ignorant people.

11-12. The intelligent man who knows this, is not contaminated by sin.[5] The penance of those dwindles—those who resort to deceipt, fraud, stealth, censuring, enviousness, obstructing others, violence, back-biting and falsehood.

13. If a learned man were to pursue these, his penance never increases. Here the anxiety over pious and impious rites is of many kinds.

14. This is the Karmabhūmi (land of Karmans or holy rites). After performing suspicious and inauspicious acts here one attains corresponding results, viz. auspicious results due to auspicious activities and inauspicious results, otherwise.

15. Formerly, Prajāpati, Devas and the groups of sages had performed Yajñas and penances (here). Becoming purified (by the sacrificial acts and penances) they had attained Brahmaloka.

16-17. The northern section of the earth is the most auspicious and the holiest. The men who perform meritorius rites and feel regard for Yoga[6] are born here. Others are born in the species of animals and brutes, and when their span of life is exhausted, they get lost on the earth.

18. Those who are eagerly intent on devouring each other, those who are endowed with greed and delusion, move about (or are born) only here. They do not go to the northern quarter.

19. The learned men who worship their preceptors, those who strictly adhere to the vow of celibacy, do understand the path duly of all the worlds.

20. Thus the Dharma formulated by Brahmā (or proclaimed in the Veda) has been succinctly recounted by me. He who understands Dharma (righteousness) and Adharma of the world, is intelligent.

Bhāradvāja submitted :[7]

21. What is called Adhyātma (knowledge, etc, regarding the soul)? Of what nature is it and which is laid down by Śāstras for every person. Elucidate to me, O sage (one whose richness is penance) that Adhyātma precisely (lit. as it actually is).

Bhṛgu explained :

22. O Brāhmaṇa sage, I shall explain what you ask about, namely the Adhyātma. It is conducive to happiness and welfare, O dear one.

23. Everything including the (knowledge about) creation and dissolution has been pointed out by preceptors. On knowing this, the man attains pleasure and happiness, even in this world.

24-26a. He will gain the benefit. It is conducive to the welfare of all living beings. The Mahā Bhūtas (elements) are the earth, wind, ether, water and the fifth one, fire. They are the source of the origin of and the ultimate place of dissolution of all living beings. They dissolve themselves unto him wherefrom they had been created. Just as the waves originate from and merge into the ocean, so also the living beings originate from the elements and merge into them.[8]

26b-28a. Just as the tortoise spreads out and withdraws its limbs so also the Bhūtātman (the Soul of all living beings or the creator) creates and withdraws the living beings or elements unto himself. The creator has made only five great elements for the constitution of) all living beings. But the individual soul does not see it, in proper perspective.

28b-30. The sound, ears and cavities in the body—these three have originated from ether. It is remembered that the three, viz. touch, Ceṣṭā (movement of the limbs) and the skin—are born of Vāyu (the wind element). Colour, eyes, and cooking (i.e. digestive process) — these constitute the three attributes of the fiery element. The tastes, moisture and the tongue—these three are remembered as the attributes of water element. That which is to be smelt (scents, etc.), the nose and the physical body—these three are the attributes of earth.

31-34. The Mahā Bhūtas are only five. The mind is said to be the sixth. O resident of the Land of Bharata*, the sense-organs and the Manas (mind) have (thus) been known. The seventh, they say, is Buddhi (intellect). The Kṣetrajña (the individual Soul) is the eight. The ear is (created) for the purpose of hearing; the skin is for (the purpose of) touching; the tongue is for perceiving the taste and the nose is for perceiving smell. The mind creates doubts, the intellect decides; the Kṣetrajña is stationed like a witness. All that is above the soles of two feet, all that is behind and above are seen by him (the soul).

35. Know that the entire intervening space has been pervaded wholly by the omnipresent lord.[9] All the sense organs (mind and intelligence) have to be known (thus) by men in their entirety.

36a. The three Bhāvas (states) or Guṇas, viz., Tamas, Rajas and Sattva are dependent thereon (on the mind, etc.).

36b-37a. After understanding the intellect as well as the advent and departure of the living beings one slowly attains excellent tranquillity.

37b-38a. The Buddhi is quelled through the Guṇas and the Indriyas (sense-organs) through the intellect. The elements have the mind as constituting their sixth (member). If the Buddhi is absent how can there be Guṇas?[10]

38b-39a. In this way the entire creation, the mobile and immobile, is permeated by it. It (the creation) is born out of it and gets dissolved in it. Hence, it is so specified (in Śāstras).

39b-40. That through which one sees is the eye; that which hears is called Śrotra (the ear); they call what smells the Ghrāṇa (nose); one perceives taste through the tongue; one touches with the skin and feels the touch. That which is called the Buddhi undergoes modification at once.

41. When something is sought (by the Buddhi), it becomes the mind—The bases on which Buddhi rests are five, each

---

* The NP adopted the Mbh. (ibid) v. 12 along with the epithet of Yudhiṣṭhira, viz. Bhārata. Bhāradvāja was not a descendant of Bharata. Hence, this interpretation here, instead of the usual "O Scion of Bharata' intended in v. 12 of the Mbh.

functioning differently. (They are called Indriyas, the invisible principle Buddhi rests on them).

42. The Buddhi stationed in a person (as its basis) spreads over (is concerned with) the three Bhāvas viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas.

43. Sometimes it attains pleasure; sometimes it experiences sorrow and sometimes it feels neither happiness nor misery.

44. Thus the Buddhi occupies the three states (viz. the attributes) in the minds of men. Though identical with the Bhāvas, it sometimes transcends the three Bhāvas, through Yoga.

45. (Defective) Just as the ocean that is the lord of the rivers transgresses its boundary with its waves.[11]

45b-46a. That Buddhi which transcends the three guṇas or stages exists in the mind in a pure subtle state of existence (like the smell of garlic to the pot after washing—NK). The attribute rajas that propels them to action, soon pursues it. At time it makes all the senses function.[12]

47. Sattva is pleasure; Rajas is sorrow and Tamas is anger. Whatever state of mind there is in the world gets merged in one of these three.

48. Thus all the emotional conceptions and feelings of Buddhi (intellect) have been explained to you. All the sense organs must be conquered by intelligent men.

49. Three types of sensations (intelligence ?) are seen in all living beings, viz. that originating through Sattva, that which depends on rajas and on tamas for the origin.

50-51a. The attribute of Sattva produces happiness, of Rajas brings misery. When these two get up mixed with Tamas, then neither pleasure nor sorrow is produced (but it creates delusion.

51b-52a. If anything appeals to you and is pleasing physically and mentally, it shall be said that the Sāttvika emotion is present.

52b-53a. If anything provokes misery and is displeasing to the soul, O excellent sage, know that Rajas has begun to function.

53b-54a. If anything is deluding and confounding and the object is not clear, is incomprehensible and is difficult to be conceived, understand it to be Tamas.

54b-55a. Ecstatic delight, pleasure, bliss, happiness and tranquillity of the mind—If these are present to a certain extent (though rarely) they are called Sāttvika attributes.

55b-56a. Dissatisfaction, distress, sorrow, greediness and impatience—these are the symptoms of the Rajas Guṇa. These are seen effected by the body.[13]

56b-57a. Dishonour, delusion, blunder, sleeping and lassitude—these various Tamo-Guṇas are present in men to a certain extent.

57b-58a. The mind is defective;[14] it wanders along many ways, is of the nature of seeking and entertaining doubts, if such mind is under one's control, one is happy here and hereafter.

58b-59a. Though both Sattva (Guṇa) and the Kṣetrajña (the individual soul) are subtle[15], the difference between them is that one (Intelligence) creates guṇas, while the other (the soul) does not.

59b-60. Just as Maśaka (gnats) and Udumbara (a fig) may be seen united with each other. Though united, they are distinct from each other, so also the Guṇas and the Kṣetrajña are by nature separate entities but they are seen united with one another.

61-62a. Just as the fish and water are separate entities, but are found to be in the state of union, the same is the state with reference to the Intelligence and the Soul. The attributes do not comprehend the Ātman, but he knows the attributes (Guṇas) thoroughly. The Ātman who is the witness of the Guṇas, regards them all as proceeding from himself.

62b-63a. Functioning through (five) senses[16], (the mind the sixth) and Intelligence as the seventh—all of which are (by themselves) inactive and without any consciousness, the Ātman discovers the objects (around it) like a (covered) lamp showing all objects by radiating rays through the apertures (in its cover).

63b-64. The Sattva (Intelligence) creates the Guṇas while the soul (Kṣetrajña) is a (mere) witness. That is the certain relation between Sattva and Kṣetrajña (from times immemorial). Neither Sattva nor Kṣetrajña have any support or refuge.

65-66a. The Intelligence (Sattva) creates the mind but never the Guṇas. When he (Ātman) properly controls their reins by means of the mind, then his soul becomes revealed (within himself), like a lamp burning within a pitcher.

66b-67a. The sage who eschews Prākṛta (ordinary) rites or acts and who is always delighted within his own Ātman becomes the soul of all living beings. He attains the excellent goal.

67b-68a. Just as an acquatic bird does not get wet (or is not besmeared or affected) with water, similarly, a person who is firm in (spiritual) wisdom, (and is free from any hallucination) moves about in living beings (without being attached to and affected by them.)

68b-69a. With the help of one's judgement and knowledge, one should behave in this world in this way, without bewailing or without being elated, but be equanimous and devoid of (even a trace) of jealousy.

69b-70a. A person who lives in his real state of being the Ātman, always creates the Guṇas even as a spider creating its threads. The Guṇas should be understood as the threads (emitted by the spider).

70b-72a. Some opine that the attributes (Guṇas) with regard to such men are not lost while some others say that they are lost. The first depend upon the Śrutis (Pratyakṣa the direct proof) which are not contradicting while the others—who advocate the loss, depend on Smṛtis. Pondering over both these one should decide for one's self which is correct.

72b-73a. In this way the hard insoluble knot in the heart which causes anxiety should be removed and one should dwell in happiness. With all one's doubts resolved one need not feel sorrow.

73b-74a. Just as men smeared with dust (or mud) obtains success (become pure) after plunging into full stream of water, similarly, men of dirty and unclean-hearts attain success by getting perfect knowledge.

74b-75. A person who sees only the other bank of a great river is tormented till he reaches the other side (mere sight of the other bank is not enough). But in the case of the knower of Reality, the mere knowledge of the Truth makes him happy. Persons who in their hearts realise that the soul is untouched by worldly objects (and is one) get that excellent knowledge.

76. Thus a man who realizes the advent and the departure of the living beings, ponders upon it slowly by means of his intellect and attains peace and tranquillity.

77. He who has understood the destructibility of the threefold goals (Dharma, Artha and Kāma) of life and investigating them (and following Yoga) mentally, discards them, becomes the real seer of Reality! (And having obtained bliss through self-realization), he becomes disinterested.

78. By persons who are not self-possessed, the soul is impossible to be realized through senses which are partially employed on diverse objects and which are very difficult to obtain[17] (to control—Mbh.).

79. After knowing this, one shall become enlightened. What else is the characteristic of an enlightened one? Indeed after realising it, learned men consider themselves contented.

80. To the knower (of quality) what appears extremely frightful, to the unenlightened (e.g. the fear of a serpent which is really a rope) inspires no fear at all. There is no better state than Mokṣa (emancipation from Saṁsāra) to anyone. If there be superiority in qualities (in such persons), some difference in the gradation in reality may be seen, say the learned.

81. If a man performs holy rites without any specific aim or desire (in return) that act burns down what acts have been performed (by him) earlier. (Past acts being burnt down and present acts being desireless do not bring about undesirable results. But if such a knower continues to act how can these acts bring about Mokṣa?)

82. People of their own accord produce the world (they live in) and the duration of (their) life (in it). The above are (automatically) created while he is doing an act. Please see that even if he is ever subjected to a frightful state, he does not bewail the good actions.[18]

Bhāradvāja said:

83. Please explain the path of meditation unto me for the achievement of that region on knowing which, O Brāhmaṇa, a man is relieved from three types of distresses.

Bhṛgu said:

84. O Brāhmaṇa sage! I shall recount to you the four types of Jñānayoga (the path of knowledge), on realising which, great sages attain eternal Siddhi.

85. The great sages who are experts in Yoga and are gratified with their perfect knowledge and have fixed their hearts on Liberation from Saṁsāra, perform their Yogic meditation on proper lines.

86. Being freed from the blemishes of the worldly existence, they are liberated. With their liability to get a further birth being eliminated, they stabilise themselves in the pristine Soul-state.

87. (Defective) They are free from mutually clashing pairs such as pleasure, pain, always established in the Sattva Guṇa; they are liberated and they do not possess anything, They cultivate detachment that does not obstruct[19] and that is conducive to mental tranquility.

88. There, the sage should keep his extremely tormented and agitated mind concentrated by means of meditation. Withdrawing within him (as if in a lump) all his sense-organs, the sage should be seated (motion-less) like a log of wood.

89. He should not perceive any sound through his ears, nor feel any touch by means of his skin; he should not perceive any colour or feature through the eyes; nor should he have the taste of anything through his tongue.

90. Being immersed in meditation, the knower of reality should eschew all things to be smelt. The energetic Yogin does not covet these (five types of) objects which excite the senses.

91. Then the clever (devotee) shall withdraw into his mind the Pañcavarga (the group of five senses). He shall then enter into meditation (stabilising) erring mind alongwith the five sense organs.

92. The mind is a wanderer (in objects of senses, etc.) It consists of five gates (the cognitive senses). It is both powerful and weak[20], the wise Yogin should quickly[21] fix his mind into the path of meditation first, making it independent of any refuge.

93. At this time he should 'collect' the sense organs and the mind into one lump (and direct them to the path of meditation). Thus the first path of meditation has been explained by me.

94. The mind which is the sixth aṅga of the Jiva, when thus controlled, will throb like the streak of lightening in the clouds extending as far as the ocean.[22]

95. Just as a drop of water on the leaf (of a lotus) is very restless and moves all round, so also his mind moves about in the path of meditation.

96. For a moment the mind is a little attentive and becomes steady in path of meditation. Then it wanders into the path of the wind. The restless mind becomes flighty like the wind.

97. A person who knows the path of meditation should not be discouraged, should not mind the troubles undergone, should give up lethargy and malice and should again establish his mind in meditation.

98. Pondering, reflection, and discrimination[23] are produced in order (in the meditating Yogi). This is the first meditation of the sage endowed with trance.

99. If he is mentally distressed, he should console himself. The sage should not feel despondent. He should seek what is beneficial to himself.

100. A heap of dust, ashes or cowdung cannot be formed into a saturated paste by sprinkling with water all of a sudden.

101. It should be gradually made into paste, some part remaining dry in the beginning but later on made smooth. Thus everything will become drenched completely in the end.

102. In the same manner one must make the group of sense organs calm and tranquil. They must be withdrawn gradually. Then they will be subdued perfectly.

103. O leading sage! By stabilising one's mind and five senses in the path of meditation first, a Yogī is able to subdue them completely by steadfast (practice in) Yoga.

104. Neither through manly effort nor through divine providence shall he attain that happiness which he attains by restraining the self (in Yoga).

105. Endowed with that bliss, he will find pleasure in the process of meditation. Thus the Yogins attain the blissful salvation (lit. with no ailments).

Sanandana said:

106. O Brāhmaṇa, thus instructed by Bhṛgu, the valorous Bhāradvāja, the extremely virtuous soul, was surprised. He worshipped Bhṛgu.

107. O learned one, thus the creation of the universe has been narrated unto you entirely. O excessively intelligent one, what else do you wish to hear?

CHAPTER FORTYFOUR

1. This is verse 7 in the Mbh. Śānti. ch. 192.

2. After a long discussion, NK. tries to show that this verse is an enquiry to show the path to God-realization (śruti-yuktibhyāṁ jñāto'pi paramātmā na sākṣī kriyate iti tat-sākṣātkāropāyaṁ brūhīti prārthitaḥ Bhṛguḥ.

3. NK treats the whole chapter as a continuous metaphor of a spiritual nature. Vyāsa (and here Nārada) describes an ideal place on this earth as the 'next' or 'excellent' world (paralokaḥ). But NK differs. He interprets: After the realization of the soul (uttare) near the Himālayas i.e. Meru (which stands for the nose) there is the excellent world just in the middle of the eyebrows, etc. NK cites a quotation from mantra-śāstra to 'prove' the identification of the nose and mount Meru, called also the Himalayas.

hema-rūpo bhruvor madhye merus tiṣṭhati parvataḥ / tasyābhito mahī pārśve pañcāśatkoṭi-yojanā //

The Mbh. however, describes an ideal region on the earth. Hence, we have followed the plain meaning of these verses and not the esoteric significance of each point, as is done artificially by NK.

4. It is better to interpret as follows: In that region, some (ascetics) eat abstemiously just enough to keep themselves alive, while others with a great effort practise Prāṇāyāma.

5. V.11a is actually v. 16b in ch. 192 of the Mbh. Śānti. This appears unconnected with 11b and is obscure. But v. 16a and b in the Mbh. (ibid) clarifies it. That verse in the Mbh. means : (16a) Here various opinions prevail and are advocated by persons who did meritorious or sinful acts (16b=11a of NP). The intelligent man who knows all those opinions of both kinds (virtuous and sinful) is not contaminated by sin.

6. Satkāram ṛcchanti—yoge ādaram ṛcchanti prāpnuvanti—NK.

7. The NP omitted ch. 193 and here ch. 194 from the Śānti Parvan (Mbh). is incorporated.

8. As usual, the printed Sk. text of the NP has separated in the original ślokas of the Mbh. in the unnatural way. Here v. 4 in the Mbh. (ibid) 194, consists of 3 lines. But the NP combined 4a and 4b into v. 23 and 4c and 5a of the Mbh. is given as v. 24. In this way the lines of the original ślokas in the Mbh. are found disarranged in the NP, in this chapter.

9. NK. explains : This whole body right from the soles of the feet, what is above and beneath the body and what is within and outside the body— all this is completely pervaded by him. Such is his omnipresence.

10. These are obscure verses in spite of (or because of ?) NK long comm. It appears that he supports Vijñānavāda. He means to say that nothing exists except as it exits in 'Ideas'. After using the arguments of the Advaita school, he sums up : "In the absence of Buddhi (Intelligence), both the cause and products of Buddhi are destroyed. Hence the term guṇa implies attributes like Sattva etc., mind, sense-organs along with their objects.

11. V.45 appears defective as 45a is to be connected with 44b of which it is the illustration. The original Mbh. verse 24 is thus distributed over the two NP verses. The simile is unusual as the ocean according to poets, never crosses its boundary (though facts differ).

12. V. 45b and 46a form one verse (viz Mbh. ibid.25). Hence these lines are translated as forming one Śloka.

13. For deha-hetubhiḥ of the NP, Mbh. (ibid) v. 35 reads hetvahetubhiḥ (These are seen) with or without adequate causes for producing them.

14. For the obscure dūṣaṇam of the NP, Mbh. (ibid) v. 37 reads dūragam. NK interprets : (the mind) which is attached to things which are very difficult to obtain (dūragam) and which is capable of extending to a number of objects simultaneously (bahudhā-gāmi).

15. Yasya in the NP renders this sentence predicateless. For yaṣya, Mbh. (ibid) v. 38 reads paśya. Thus the translation : 'Notice the difference between Sattva (Intelligence —buddhi-sattvam NK).

16. Two printing mistakes in the NP, viz. indriyastu for indriyais tu and pradīpavān for pradīpavat render this verse obscure. I have accepted the correct readings from the Mbh. (ibid) v. 42 and translated accordingly.

17. For durvāpeṣu of the NP, Mbh. (ibid) v. 58 reads durvāryaiḥ 'difficult to control' I have followed NP.

18. The verse has become obscure in the NP due to faulty mixture of vv. 62 and 63 and misprints. The Mbh. reads:

Lokam āturam asūyate janas tasya taj janayatiha sarvataḥ Loka āturа-janān virāvaśaṁs tat tadeva bahu paśya śocataḥ tatra paśya kuśalān aśocato ye vidus tad ubhayam padaṁ satām

As NK explains : People reproach (asūyate) persons afflicted (with evil passions) which drive them to births of diverse kinds. Notice clearly how such afflicted persons suffer from loss of possession and those real learned persons who remain unaffected with grief. Those who know the gradual and instantaneous types of liberation, are the really wise ones.'

Here ends ch. 194 in the Mbh. Śānti.

19. The reading asadgāṇya-vidhādīni is obscure. The Mbh. reading (Śānti 195.4) is asaṅgānya-vivādīni is better. It means, they (live) in places detached from their relatives (wives, children, etc.) and where no disputant lives".

20. Mbh. (ibid) 9: calācalam 'constant in pursuing unstable objects (of senses)'.

21. Mbh. (ibid) reads mano'ntara and means : 'The yogin, in the cavity of his heart fixes etc.

22. Mbh. (ibid) 11 reads samud-bhrānta, 'capricious'.

23. Vicāra, Vitarka and Viveka are the different stages in the progress of Yoga. NK quotes from various works on Yoga in his long comm, to substantiate this.

CHAPTER FORTYFIVE

Exposition of Dharmas leading to Liberation

Sūta said:

1. O Brāhmaṇas! On hearing the words of Sanandana, based on the Dharmas leading to Liberation, Nārada who had understood the principles again asked him about matters spiritual.

Nārada said:

2. O highly blessed one! The treatise on salvation expatiated upon by you, has been heard by me. Even after hearing it repeatedly, I am not fully satisfied.

3. O omniscient sage, please recount to me the Mokṣa-dharma (virtuous path leading to salvation) based on sat (the Reality), whereby the creature is liberated from the bondage of Nescience (avidyā).

Sanandana said:[1]

4. In this context, they cite the ancient mythological anecdote that narrates how Janaka, the Lord of Mithilā, attained salvation.

5. There was a king of Mithilā called Janadeva, in the Janaka dynasty. He was ever engrossed in reflecting upon the courses of conduct which would lead to the attainment of the Brahman which is super-physical and hence bodiless.*

6. Many preceptors propagating heresy and usual dwellers in cemeteries used to live in his house. They being

* As the Comm. explains :

ūrdhva-deham aśarīram Brahma, tat-prāpti-kāraṇam aurdhva-dehikānām

 The text of the NP. is corrupt : It runs :

tasya śmaśānam ācāryā vasanti satatam gṛhe !

The original text in the Mbh. Śānti.ch. 218.4 from which the passage in the NP. is borrowed is as under :

tasya sma śatam ācāryā vasanti satatam gṛhe

'A hundred preceptors always used to live in his palace'

propagators of heretic doctrines advised him on different courses of religious duties

7. Basing himself on the study of the Vedas, he was not properly satisfied with the speculations of his preceptors regarding the nature of the soul, and in their doctrine of extinction (of the soul) after the dissolution of the body or of its rebirth after death.

8. On one occasion, a great sage called Pañca-śikha,[2] a son (disciple) of the sage Kapila, arrived at Mithilā during the course of his wandering all over the earth.

9. He had a thorough mastery over (lit. completed) the interpretation of Śāstras. He was an adept in arriving at a conclusion in the perfect knowledge of the principles of all Dharmas regarding renunciation. He was above Dvandvas (mutually clashing opposites like pleasure and pain). All his doubts were resolved.

10. They call him one of those sages who among men have finished their desires.* He sought eagerly and intensively after the very rare highest eternal bliss.

11. I think that the great sage whom the followers of the Sāṅkhya school call the greatest sage (paramarṣi) Kapila, the Prajāpati (Lord of all creatures) himself, reveals (everything) through that form (of Pañca-śikha).[3]

12. He was the foremost among the disciples of Āsuri whom they call 'long-lived' (cirajivin). It was he who performed a holy sacrifice (of long duration—satra) for a thousand years in *Pañca-srotas (a land of five rivers?)

13 He came to Pañca-srotas and proclaimed to the huge assembly of the followers of Kapila, the real nature of the unmanifest abiding in the Puruṣa.

14. Āsuri[4] who possessed (was proficient in sacrificial

---

* The reading in the NI' is kāmād avasitam which is defective. The chapter is bodily taken from Mbh. Śānti. ch. 218 where the original reading (in Mbh. Śānti 218.8) is Kāmānāvṛtam— "One who is not affected by desires."

 Sāṅkhyas use this term to imply 'the mind' which is said to have five currents. Thus this line may mean "He performed on the mental plane a sacrifice (i.e. meditation) that lasted for one thousand years."

mantras (iṣṭimantreṇa *) and had visualized his person *deha-darśana) and realised through a great deal of penance the distinction between Kṣetra (the body) and Kṣetrajña (the individual soul abiding in the body).

15. In that assembly of ascetics, Āsuri expounded that which is called the Eternal-Immutable, one-syllabled Brahman (Om) which appears in diverse forms.

16-17. Pañcaśikha was his disciple. He was nurtured by a woman with her breast milk. There was a certain Brāhmaṇa house-wife called Kapilī who adopted him as her son, and he used to suck her breasts. Hence, he came to be known as Kāpileya (the son of Kapilī). Thereafter, he attained the perfect and fixed buddhi (understanding in the Brahman).

18. It was the venerable Lord† himself who narrated to me the circumstances which led to (Pañcaśikha's) birth (adoption as a son of Kapilā) and his designation Kāpileya. His omniscience, however, was excellent and unsurpassed.

19. O sage! Janaka, the knower of Dharmas, accompanied by his ministers, knew him (Pañcaśikha) to be spiritually wise. Having come there, Pañcaśikha deluded and confused the hundred preceptors of Janaka by means of his logical reasoning.

20. Janaka became exceedingly attracted and attached to the school of thought of Pañcaśikha‡. Abandoning his hundred teachers, he (Janaka) followed closely behind him (Pañcaśikha).

21. To him (Janaka) who, according to prescription of religious duty, bowed down (to express his being Pañcaśikha's

---

* The original in Mbh. ibid. 13 is iṣṭa-satreṇa saṃsiddho "one who has accomplished the desired sacrificial session."

 This is an obvious misprint for deva-darśanaḥ in the original Mbh. text. It means 'one who has visualized God or attained divine vision.' The NP. reading deha-darśanaḥ is meaningless.

† The Mbh. comm. Nīlakaṇṭha (NL) guesses it to be either Mārkaṇḍeya or Sanatkumāra.

‡ Mbh. gives Kāpi'eyānudarśanāt for NP. Kapileyānudarśanam. According to Mbh. the verse means: By the intelligence and the school of thought of Kāpileya, Janaka became ..."

disciple), he expounded the highly auspicious (philosophy) which is called Sāṅkhya and which leads to the Supreme Liberation from Saṁsāra.

22. After expatiating on the sorrows attending upon birth, he set forth the sorrows in the performance of religious acts. After recounting the miseries inherent in Karman, he explained the sorrows of all the states of life.

23. He lectured upon Delusion for the sake of which there is contact with Dharma (and the religious acts prescribed by it) and the fruition of those acts—Delusion which is unreliable, destructible, unsteady and evanescent.

24. The Pūrvapakṣin or the objector may argue: When the destruction of body is seen and is the direct evidence witnessed by all people in the world, he who, out of his faith in the Sāṅkhya scriptures, argues that something called the soul is distinct from the body and survives the death of the body, is automatically defeated in his arguments.

25. The disputants maintain that the soul's death, or that which is called death is the extinction of the soul. Pain, old age and disease constitute the partial death of the soul. He who considers out of delusion that the soul being distinct from the body survives the death of the body holds an opinion which is unreasonable and untenable.

26. If that which is non-existent in the world is regarded as existent, it may be argued that the king who is regarded so, should never be subject to old age or death.

27. When the problem is about the very existence of an object (lit. whether an object is or is not in existence) and when that whose existence is predicated, presents dark characteristic (asaitlakṣana*) [or 'the indications of non-existence' (asatilakṣaṇe) as the Mbh reads] (under these circumstances) on what basis should people depend in deciding the affairs of life.

---

* The Mbh. reads asatilakṣaṇe (ibid verse 26) for asita-lakṣaṇe of the NP. In the NP. palpably a scribal error, as asati and asita in the Devanāgari script are easily confused.

28. Direct proof is the root (basis) of inference and scriptures* (Kṛtāntaitihyayorapi). The scriptures are contradictable by direct evidence *pratyakṣeṇa). As to inference, its value as evidence is negligible.

29. Everywhere, in every topic, do not depend, simply on inference. There exists no entity called Jīva other than outside this body† according to the view of the Nāstikas (sceptics).

30.‡ The potentiality to produce leaves, fruits, roots, bark, etc. lies in the (small) seed of a banyan tree (vaṭa-kaṇikāyām). Substances, the nature of which is different from that of the causes which produce them, are seen in the following:) Milk and butter are produced from the grass and water consumed by a cow. Different kinds of substances when decomposed for some period in water sometimes produce alcoholic substances whose (inebriating) nature is quite different from that of those substances which produced the spirituous liquor (ghṛta-pākādhivāsanam). In the same way from the semen (vital seed) is produced the body, its attributes alongwith intelligence, consciousness, mind and other possessions. Two pieces of wood produce fire by attrition. The Sūryakānta stone produces fire when it comes in contact with the rays of the sun.

---

* The NP. reads :

pratyakṣaṁ hyetayor mūlaṁ kṛtānta hyetayorapi

The Mbh. (ibid verse 27) reads:

Kṛtāntaitihyayorapi I have accepted it in translation.

 The NP. reads : Pratyakṣo hyāgamo bhinnaḥ which means "Direct Scriptural evidence is shattered or contradicted" I preferred the Mbh reading Pratyakṣeṇāgamo bhinnaḥ and translated it as above.

† The second line of this verse in the NP. is as follows :

anyo jīvaḥ śarīrasya nāstikānāṁ mate stitaḥ

The Mbh. (ibid v. 28b) reads : nānyo jīvaḥ śarīrasya nāstikānāṁ mate sthitaḥ. The omission of nā of nānyo in NP. attributes a totally different and contradictory view to the atheists. Hence I preferred the original reading in the Mbh. viz. nānyo.

‡ As this verse is the same as Mbh. (ibid. v. 29), I have followed the commentator Nilakaṇṭha, as it is nothing but a series of keywords of different arguments which are grammatically loose. An explanatory translation is necessary in such cases. Hence the above translation.

Any piece of metal made red-hot in fire, when immersed in water, evaporates that water (ambu-bhakṣaṇam). Just as a load-stone moves iron, the mind controls the sense-organs.

31.* The Nāstikas are wrong for the disappearance of only the vital airs or animating force upon the physical body becoming lifeless and not the simultaneous disappearance of the body along with the departure or disappearance of the vital force, is the proof of the fact that the body and the soul are not identical but the soul and the body are distinct and different, and that the soul survives the body. As the dead body is seen even after the disappearance of the animating force, death means the departure from the physical body of something that is different from the body. The prayer (for getting something) to deities by those who deny the separate existence of the soul is another sound argument for, if deities who do not have gross material bodies can exist, why cannot the soul exist apart from and without the physical body? Another argument against the identity of the body and the soul: If one dies—the very occurrence of death would be an automatic end of all Karmans which cannot be accepted as there would be an end of inequalities in the world which is not the case.

32. Now the causes that have been mentioned and those that have material bodies, cannot be the causes of the non-material soul and his non-material accompaniment like perception, memory, etc. For the physical objects cannot by themselves be the causes for the creation of non-physical objects. (The causal relation of immaterial objects being produced by material objects is incomprehensible.)

33-34a. Some say that there is rebirth and that it is

---

* The verse as printed in the NP. yields little sense due to corrupt readings. The Mbh. verse (ibid) v. 31 is as follows :

pretībhūte'tyayaś caiva devatādhyupayātanam /
mṛte karma-nivṛttis ca pramāṇam iti niścayaḥ //

The verse in the NP. is :

preta-bhūta-priyaś caiva devatā hyupayācanam /
mṛta-karma-nivṛttiṁ ca pramāṇam iti niścayaḥ //

I have translated the Mbh. verse the corrupt form of which is in the NP.

 The verse consists of 32a and 34b in the Mbh. (ibid) but the sentence is completed by adding 34b in the Mbh. (which is 34a in the NP.).

caused by Nescience, Karmans and strong desire or avidity. They (i.e. the Buddhists) maintain that when one mortal body is being destroyed, another immediately grows up from it. But, when it is consumed by the fire of knowledge the destruction of existence takes place.

34b-36a. It may be asked when the being that is thus born is a different one in respect of form, nature, birth, purposes connected with virtue, vice, etc., why should it then be regarded to have any identity with the being that existed? And if the being that is thus reborn be really different from what it was in the previous birth, what liking or satisfaction can a person have by acquisition of knowledge, learning and the power of asceticism, if all the acts performed by one are to be transferred for the accruing of benefit to another person* (in the next stage of life or existence, without the performer being the enjoyer or the beneficiary of the fruits of those acts.)

36b-37a. Even in this very birth, here, one may be forced to be miserable by the acts committed by another in some previous life or may become happy after being miserable. But proper conclusion should be drawn about 'the unseen' by observing what factually happens in this world.

37b-38a. Just as upon the death of the body caused by heavy bludgeoning with pestles, a second body would not arise from the body that is deprived of life, it is totally a vain (false) knowledge,† if the very loss of the previous consciousness be regarded as the cause of the production of the second knowledge, for the end of the previous consciousness cannot

---

* Sāmānyāt pratipadyate in the NP. makes little sense. The reading in the Mbh. (ibid) v. 36 is sarvam anyat pratipadyate clearly states the Buddhistic position to which objections are raised.

 In this world we see that one is not affected by the good or evil acts of another. This direct evidence is enough to disprove the uncertainty of the doctrine of "the unseen" viz. whether the acts of Mr. X in the previous life can affect Mr. Y in the subsequent life when there is no identity between Mr. X of the previous birth and Mr. Y of the present birth.

Thus the Buddhist theory of momentariness stands refuted.

† Mbh. (ibid) v. 38 reads Pṛthag jñānam act as the cause of a second consciousness arising out of the very end of the first.

38b-39a. Again the Buddhist doctrine of Nirvāṇa or Sattva-saṅkṣaya or extinction of life is open to the objection that Nirvāṇa will become a recurring phenomena like that of seasons or the year or the Yuga (lit. the Kali age), or heat or cold or disagreeable or agreeable objects. The Buddhist Nirvāṇa will not become an end of the cycle of births and deaths—the final emancipation from Saṁsāra like Mokṣa in Brahmanical scriptures.

39b-40a. If, in order to avoid these objections, the opponents i.e. the Buddhists advance the theory that the soul is permanent but every moment each new consciousness attaches itself to it we say: Just as the supports of a house get weakened in course of time leading to the total collapse of the structure, the permanent substance (the soul as posited by the opponents) by being overcome with old age and with death that results in destruction, will in course of time itself be weakened and destroyed. The soul according to Brahmanism is attributeless and hence immutable and eternal. But the Buddhist affirmance of attributes to the soul implies automatically its destructibility, and the permanence of the soul becomes untenable.

40b-41a. All the constituents of the body such as the senses, the mind,* the vital air, blood, flesh, bones become destroyed one after another, each of these entering its own substance (dhātu) or productive cause.

41b-42a. Here is the criticism of the Vedāntic concept of the soul. If the soul be the basis of consciousness, understanding and other attributes and yet is unconnected with any of these then all that is done in the world will be meaningless, especially the fruition of charity and other religious acts and all the injunctions of Śrutis prescribing these acts and all actions pertaining to the conduct of the world will have no meaning, (as the soul being aloof and unconnected with understanding or mind, there is none to enjoy the fruits of meritorious acts and Vedic rites.

42b-43a. In this way many plausible hypotheses or speculations arise in the mind. But no criterion is seen to decide whether this particular view is right, while that speculation is not.

43b-44a. While reflecting on the pros and cons of these views, particular persons follow properly and closely particular views. The intelligence of these is settled and established on some like a tree and ultimately is lost therein.

44b-45. In this way, all creatures become miserable by actions good or evil. It is only the Vedas which bring them back to the right way, like conductors of elephants guiding their elephants.

46. *Many emaciated (weak-kneed) persons lick at (or wish for) objects which are full of happiness. But they are made to suffer a much larger lot of miseries. Being forced to and therefore having given up their coveted happiness (lit. piece of meat), they submit themselves to the power of death.

47. What is the use of relatives, friends, wives and property (possessions) to one who is definitely doomed to die and whose life is unsteady and momentary, and who, having abandoned all these in a moment, leaves this world never to return ?

48. The elements, viz. the earth, the ether, water, fire and even wind always protect and nourish the body. How can one cherish any affinity to this body when one observes

---

* A comparison between the NP. and Mbh. shows how the text of the NP. is incorrect and why one has to refer to the Mbh.

46a of NP. reads :

arthāṁs tathā hanti sukhāvahāṁśca lihanta ete hanti bahavopaśuṣkāḥ /

Mbh. (ibid) 46a reads :

arthāṁs tathā'tyanta-sukhāvahāṁśca lipsanta ete bahavo viśuṣkāḥ / and reflects on this? There cannot be any pleasure with this body which is subject to destruction.

49. Having listened to these words of Pañcaśikha which (being based on the Vedas were free from confusion and deception and which were not connected with delusion as they did not extol Karmakāṇḍa), supremely salutary and dealing with the soul, king Janaka was wonderstruck and proposed to confront him with an argument (Pūrva Pakṣa-Nl.*)

*Janaka submitted:

50. Venerable Sir, if, after departing from this body nobody is capable of retaining any consciousness or knowledge—if this be the case—what is the use of knowledge or ignorance? (We neither gain anything by possessing knowledge nor are we the loosers by being ignorant.

51. Look here, O excellent Brāhmaṇa, if everything is to end up in nothingness, if that be the nature of Liberation what avail are the observances of Yama, Niyama, etc. What special distinction is there in the fruits achieved by a careful or a careless person?

52. If Liberation means dissociation with pleasure-giving persons or objects like celestial damsels, or association with objects of destructible nature like life in heaven, what is the motivation for men to perform religious action or why after beginning the performance of an action, should men continue for attaining the desired goal.

Sanandana said:†

* Here ends chapter 218 in the Mbh. Śāntiparvan.

 Here Mbh. Śānti ch. 219 begins. In the NP. this being a continuation of I.45, the introductory verse of Bhiṣma is omitted. NP. I.45.50 corresponds to Mbh. (ibid) v. 2.

mistaken and overanxious to know the truth, omniscient Pañcaśikha spoke to him.

Pañcaśikha said:

54-56a* In this Mokṣa (Liberation) stage there is no extinction. Nor is that any kind of existence easily conceivable. What we see here is an aggregate of body, senses and mind. The constituents of this aggregate exist independently, control mutually and thus go on functioning.

56b-57a. The ether, wind, heat (fire), water and the earth—the aggregate of these five makes up the body, but the body is not one homogeneous (whole or element).

57b-58. Sentience or intelligence, gastric heat and the vital breaths—these three are called the aggregate of the organs of action. The effects of intelligence, viz. the sense-organs, the objects of senses, such as sight, sound, etc., the inherent power which makes them the sense-potencies or faculties whereby the senses perceive these objects, the mind, the effects of wind, viz., the vital breaths called Prāṇa, Apāna, etc. and the effects of gastric heat, viz., juices and humours generated in the digestive system—all these emanate from the above-mentioned three organs of actions.

59. Hearing, touch, taste (tongue), sight (eyes) and scent—these are the five senses which inherit their attributes from the mind which also is their cause.

60. The mind which is the reflection or attribute of Cit has three states—pleasure, pain and absence of both pleasure and pain.

61† Sound, touch and form—these three form the bases

---

* The division of the lines of these verses corresponds to the original verses in the MBh. as the Mbh. verses give a complete sentence per verse.

 The reading in the Mbh. Citta-pūrvaṁ gatā guṇâḥ / is better than Citta-purvaṁ-gamā guṇâḥ in the NP. As NI. explains: Cittam pūrvakāraṇam yasyā rtha-gaṇasya taṁ cittapūrvaṁ cittamātrotpādakaṁ gatāḥ prāptāḥ guṇâḥ guṇa-kārya-bhūtāḥ /

† The text of this NP verse is confusing :
Śabdaḥ sparśaś ca rūpaṁ ca mūrtyarthameva te trayaḥ / ete hyāmaraṇât pañca saḍ-guṇā jñānasiddhaye // of objects which they inhere. These five (?) good attributes last till death, for the achievement of knowledge.

62. Upon them—the senses—depends the accomplishment of fruits or the successful completion of Karmans which lead to heaven, as also the determination of the truth or essence of all the principles or the topics of spiritual enquiry. They (wise sages) affirm that the ascertainment of the truth is the highest (most potent) seed of Liberation as it leads to Mokṣa and that Intelligence (buddhi) leads to emancipation and as such it is called avyaya—indestructible and to Brahman and hence due to its power to lead to the Brahman which is mahat-great and omnipotent, the Intelligence is called Mahat*.

63. To a person who looks upon this aggregate of attributes viz. the physical body, senses and their objects as the Ātman (soul), there is unending misery as a result of incorrect knowledge and this misery never subsides.

64. Sorrow requires some basis or foundation to affect. What basis is there for misery or sorrow to affect those persons who consider worldly objects including their body as non-soul and are unattached to them, feeling that they (those objects) are neither 'me' nor 'mine'. Hence they never suffer any misery or sorrow.

65. For this a wise (honourable) person should listen to the excellent treatise on renunciation. When it is expounded, it will be conducive for your emancipation from Saṁsāra.

66. Renunciation of all acts—even of those prescribed in Śāstras, is enjoined for persons seeking Mokṣa. Those who have been taught and disciplined in the wrong way (by heretics) have always to bear a heavy burden of sorrows.

67. Vedic sacrifices and rites are advised, for the renunciation of wealth. Vratas—(religious observances and vows)

It means that so long as we live all these faculties are the cause leading to knowledge.

* mokṣa-bījaṁ buddhir iti avyayaṁ mokṣadatvād avyayam iti cāhuḥ / mahad brahma tat-pradatvāt / are meant for the renunciation of enjoyments and pleasures. Performance of penance is laid down for the renunciation of pleasures. Yoga is advised for the renunciation of everything and that is the ultimate limit of renunciation.

68. The path of Yoga which will be enunciated now to you is the only one path shown by the learned for the renunciation of everything, in order to banish all miseries and sorrows.* But otherwise distress and sorrow is the lot of those who go astray from this path.

69. Having spoken of the five cognitive senses with the mind as the sixth—and all of which on the mental plane I shall now tell you the five conative organs for action with physical strength as the sixth.

70. The two hands should be known as organs of action and the feet as the organ of locomotion. The sexual organ is meant both for pleasure and continuance of the race. The anus is the organ for discharging faeces, excrements, etc. from the body.

71. The organ of speech is for the expression of particular sounds. The learned know that the mind is thus equipped with these five conative organs In this manner one should cast off the mind, with intelligence (thus when the mind is shed off automatically, the conative organs are cast off or controlled, and by 'casting off' the Intelligence, its products, viz. cognitive senses are done away with).

72. In the act of audition three factors cause it, viz. the organ (ears), words or sound, and the mind. Similarly, three such factors exist in the perception of touch, of form, that of taste and of smell.

73. In this manner the five triads i.e. fifteen attributes (guṇas) are essential for the above-mentioned five kinds of perceptions. In consequence of these a person becomes aware of these triads (viz. particular organ, its function and the attending mind) about these perceptions.

---

* Nl. quotes Bhalla-viśākhins in support :

Tyâga eva hi sarveṣâm mokṣa-sâdhanam uttamam /

Renunciation is the best means for all to attain Mokṣa.

74. With reference to the perceptions of the mind—there are three categories pertaining to guṇas viz. Sāttvika, Rājasa and Tāmasa. Three categories of consciousness are running through them comprising everything — emotions, passions, feelings, etc.).

75. Rapturous delight, love, joy, happiness, tranquillity of the mind arising out of some cause or resulting from no apparent cause (due to gaining desired object or through renunciation these are the Sāttvika attributes of the mind.

76. Discontent, distress, sorrow, greed and non-forbearance whether due to some cause or without any cause—these are the indications of the attribute called Rajas.

77. Thoughtlessness, delusion, heedlessness, dreaminess and drowsiness (caused by anything)—these are the various Tāmasa attributes.*

78. A person who knows this understanding (knowledge) which leads to Liberation from Saṁsāra and who carefully seeks to realise the Ātman, is never soiled by undesirable fruits of karmans just as a leaf of lotus.

79. When a person becomes liberated from the various kinds of strong bonds pertaining to one's children (subjects in the case of kings) as well as pertaining to gods, and when the person gives up (the sense of) pleasure and pain, he becomes emancipated and attains the highest end, becoming bereft of external signs (such as five vital breaths, mind, intelligence, etc.

80-81a. By understanding the implication of authoritative prescriptions of the Vedas and by practising the auspicious acts and virtues enjoined in the Veda and Āgamas, a person, transcending the fear of old age and death, lies at ease. When both merits and sins are shed off and fruits accruing therefrom to the body (tanoḥ) are destroyed, such persons being unattached at first resort to the Saguṇa Brahman that is in the space of one's heart and then visualize the Virguṇa Brahman.

81b-82a. Just as a spider* residing in his web made of threads woven by itself, becomes free by cessation of weaving out the thread, the same way a person who is released from Saṁsāra sheds off all miseries and they (the miseries) are shattered down and destroyed like a clump or sod of earth dashing against a rocky mountain (adri).

82b-83a. Just as the Ruru (a species of deer) casting off its old horns or a serpent casting off its slough, slips away without being noticed, similarly, a liberated person casts off his sorrow.

83b-84. Just as a bird, leaving off a tree (drumaṁ†) falling into the water flies up to a safer place, in the same manner this person gives up joys and sorrows and becoming liberated and dissociated from his subtle bodies, attains to the highest region (viz. Mokṣa).

85. Having listened to the discourse full of nectarine words delivered by Pañcaśikha himself the king Janadeva carefully pondered upon every point contained therein and ascertained the truth in it. Casting off his sorrow he lived joyfully merged in the supreme bliss.

86. It is reported that beholding his capital city enveloped in fire, it was exclaimed by the king of Mithilā himself: "In this burning city, nothing of mine is burning."[5]

87. O great sage ! He who reads this exposition on the ascertainment of (the means to) Mokṣa and continuously ponders over it, is not affected by calamities and sorrows and becomes emancipated as did the king of Mithilā, after this meeting with Pañcaśikha.

† matsyaṁ yathā va' pyudake patantam| in the NP. makes little sense. "How can a fish falling into the water" is to be connected with the bird. The Mbh. (Ibid) v. 83b gives drumaṁ instead of matsyam.

CHAPTER FORTYFIVE

1. From this follows the extract compiled from Mbh. Śānti 218. 2ff. Instead of Bhīṣma uvāca from the Mbh. here is Sanandana uvāca.

2. Pañca-śikha—An ancient teacher of the Sāṅkhya school. He belonged to Parāśara Gotra (Mbh. xii. 320.24). As a child he was breast-fed by Kapilā and hence was probably called Kāpileya. He was the disciple of Āsuri. He lived in Pañca-Srotas where he performed a sacrifice for 1000 years and came to be known as Pañca-Śikha. He visited the court of Janaka where he defeated the heretic teachers and king Janaka into a polemic contest. King Janaka respected him as his preceptor (Mbh. Śānti 218).

3. Being the disciple of Kapila's disciple Āsuri, he was comparable to Kapila (Nl.).

4. Āsuri—The disciple of Kapila, the founder of the Sāṅkhya school of thought (Bh. P.I.3.10).

5. This saying is attributed to Janaka (when his capital Mithilā was shown to have caught fire) both in the Pāli Canon and Śvetāmbara Jain (Ardha Māgadhī) Canon. cf. mihilāe dajjhamāṇie ṇa me dajjhai kiṁ ca ṇa in the Uttarādhyayana sūtra and

CHAPTER FORTYSIX

The Narration of Spiritual matters

Sūta said:

1. O Brāhmaṇas, on hearing that excellent spiritual discourse, the liberal-minded Nārada delightedly asked Sanandana again.

Nārada said :

2. O sage, O storehouse of mercy! I seek refuge in you. To me kindly relate those things whereby one may not experience the three types of distress such as the Ādhyātmika Ādhidaivika, etc.

*Sanandana said1

3. O learned one, three types of miseries occur to one born here. They occur in the womb or in the course of the process of being born or in the old age.

4. The panacea (for all worldly ills) is the ultimate attainment of the lord, characterised by the state of happiness unexcelled in bliss.

5. Hence, effort to attain it (viz. God-realization) must be made by learned men. O great sage, the cause of attaining it is said to be both knowledge and activity.

6. Knowledge is said to be of two kinds: that which arises out of the Vedic texts and that which arises from discrimination. The Śabdabrahman is that which arises out of the Āgamas. The great Supreme Brahman is that which arises out of discrimination between Reality and illusion.

7. The excellent sage Manu too, after remembering the meaning of the Vedas says thus: May that be heard even as I recount it in an easily understandable manner.

8. "Two Brahmans are to be understood, viz., the

---

* VV.3-30 of this chapter are incorporated from VP. VI. 58-87.

Śabdabrahman and the Supreme Brahman. One who is an adept in the Śabdabrahman understands the great Brahman."[2]

9. The Ātharvaṇa Veda[3] also says—"Two Vidyās are to be known". The greatest Vidyā is the attainment of the Imperishable (Brahman). The other one is the lore of the Ṛgveda, etc.

10-11. Verily, wise sages see him who is unmanifest, unageing, devoid of longing, birthless and unchanging; who cannot be specifically pointed out, who is formless, devoid of hands and feet, powerful and omnipresent, eternal, causeless but the source of origin of living beings, who is pervaded and who pervades everything else.

12. That is the Brahman, the greatest abode. It must be meditated upon by those who seek salvation. It is the subtle one mentioned by the Vedic texts—the greatest region of Viṣṇu.

13. That same form of the greatest Ātman is expressed by the word Bhagavat. The word Bhagavat connotes it. It is so indicated in regard to the imperishable Ātman.

14. That whereby the reality of what has been thus described is factually realized, is the real perfect knowledge. The other consists of the Trinity of Vedas.

15. O Brāhmaṇa, though the Brahman is beyond the ken of Śabdas (sounds and words) the word Bhagavat is used formally in order to honour or to adore the same.

16. O holy lord, the word Bhagavat connotes the pure and Supreme Brahman called also Mahāvibhūti (One endowed with the highest Potency) and is the cause of all causes.

16A.* The syllable *bha has two meanings (1) that which is to be known and (2) the knower. O sage, similarly the syllable ga means the creator, the father of the Āgamas.

17. Six things are indicated by the term Bhag viz: perfect prosperity and glory, prowess renown, splendour, perfect knowledge and detachment.

18. In the Bhūtātman which is the soul of all, all the living

---

* Wrongly numbered 16 in the text.

 VP. VI. 5.73 reads : sambharteti tathā bhartā. The syllable Bha implies the cherisher and supporter of the universe. This reading is better as the syllable 'Bha' (acc. to VP.) is common to both the words : Sambhartā and Bhartā.

beings reside. Hence, the meaning of the word 'va' is the unchanging lord who abides in all living beings.

19. Thus O excellent one, the great word Bhagavān belongs to Vāsudeva who is the greatest Brahman. It does not refer to anyone else.

20. As a technical phrase the word indicates an object of worship. This word indicates Vāsudeva without being used in a secondary sense. When referring to other objects the word is used in a secondary sense.[4]

21. He who knows the origin, dissolution, the advent as well as the departure of the living beings and also he who knows Vidyā and Avidyā, should be expressed by the term Bhagavān.

22. Knowledge, power, strength, prosperity, virility and splendour, the entirety of all these are expressed by the word Bhagavat. Only the despicable qualities[5] are excluded.

23. All the living beings reside in the great Ātman. The lord is remembered as Vāsudeva, because he abides in the Bhūtas.

24. Formerly when requested, Keśidhvaja told Khāṇḍikya of the Janaka dynasty.[6] He factually explained the meaning of the epithet Vāsudeva, the Infinite.

25. He lives in the Bhūtas and the Bhūtas live in him. He is the creator and the protector of all worlds. Hence, Vāsudeva is a lord—the Governor.

26. O sage, he transcends the Prakṛti of all living beings, the aberrations and the faults such as the Guṇas, etc. He goes beyond all coverings. He is the Ātman of all, the space between the worlds is occupied by him.

27. He is endowed with all auspicious qualities and is of the nature of good qualities. (Defective).[7] He eschews the creation of the Bhūtas over-whelmed by too much of misery; he assumes a splendid form voluntarily in accordance with his Will. He achieves the welfare of the entire universe.

28. He is one sole repository of splendour, strength, prosperity, great enlightenment, virility and other qualities. He is greater than the greatest. In the lord of the finite and the infinite beings, there are no (such imperfections of Avidyā such as distress and others.

29. He is the lord called Parameśvara. He is of the form of Vyaṣṭi and Samaṣṭi (the Microcosm and Macrocosm); he is both of the unmanifest and manifest forms; he is the overlord of all, the knower of the entire creation, and he is omnipotent.

30. That whereby he is known is free of defects;[8] it is an extremely pure form devoid of impurities. It is seen and understood. That is the perfect knowledge, anything other than this is said to be Ajñāna (Ignorance).

31.* That Puruṣottama is seen by means of Svādhyāya (study of the Vedas) and Saṁyama (self-control i.e. Yoga), either of them being the cause of attaining him, is called Brahma.

32. One should practise Yoga after Svādhyāya; and one should commit to memory the prescribed Vedic texts after through Yoga.[9] The great Ātman is revealed through the accomplishment of Svādhyāya and Yoga.

33. Svādhyāya is the eye for visualising him. The other eye is Yoga. (The Lord) who is Brahman cannot be seen through the physical eye.

Nārada said:

34. O Holy lord, I wish to know that Yoga. Kindly elucidate that after knowing which I would be able to see the Supreme Ruler, the support of all.

Sanandana said:

35. I shall expound that Yoga, in the same manner as Keśidhvaja formerly explained it to the noble-souled Khāṇḍikya of Janaka race.

Nārada said:[10]

36. O holy lord, who was Khāṇḍikya? Who was Keśidhvaja? How did it happen that they had a dialogue in relation to Yoga.

Sanandana said:

37. Dharmadhvaja of Janaka family was the father. His son was Amitadhvaja. Kṛtadhvaja was his brother who was a king who always took delight in spiritual topics.

---

* VV. 31 ff of the NP. are the same as VP. VI. Ch. 6.

37a*. The blessed twice-born Keśidhvaja was the son of Kṛtadhvaja. The son of Amitadhvaja was named Khāṇḍikya of the Janaka dynasty.

38. Khāṇḍikya who followed the path of action, was banished from his kingdom, accompanied by his preceptor and the ministers. He had limited resources only.

39. After being exiled from the kingdom, he wandered, through the impassable forests. He (Keśidhvaja) performed many Yajñas and resorted to Jñāna also.

40-42. By resorting to the lore about Brahman, he wished to cross the ocean of death. O foremost one among the knowers of Yoga, once as he was performing a sacrifice, a fierce tiger killed his cow in the lonely forest. On knowing that the cow[11] was killed by a tiger, he asked the sacrificial priests about the atonement: "What shall be done in this context?" They replied —"We do not know. May Kaśeru be consulted."

43. O Nārada, on being asked by him, Kaśeru said—"O leading king ! I do not know it. Please refer to Śunaka. He will know it, i.e. must be knowing it.

44-45. He went and asked him. O sage, he told the king,—"Neither Kaśeru, nor I, nor anyone in the world now knows it. Only your enemy Khāṇḍikya who was defeated by you, knows it. O sage, he said, "I shall go to my enemy in order to consult him."

46-48. If he kills me, the benefit of the Yajña becomes already acquired by me.[12] If on being asked, my enemy explains the atonement, O excellent sage, the Yoga will be unaffected." Saying thus, the king, clad in deer skin, rode in the chariot and went to the forest where Khāṇḍikya the king was present. On seeing his enemy coming, Khāṇḍikya said with his eyes reddened with anger. He kept his bow fully drawn.

Khāṇḍikya said:

49-52a. O, will you kill us with the deerskin for your coat of mail? You seem to know (i.e. think) "No one will strike me since I wear deer skin." O fool, tell me. Is there no deerskin on the back of the deer? I thought that sharp and fierce arrows discharged on them would be futile. I will now kill you. You will not be allowed to go alive. O evil-minded one, you are a desperado; my enemy who has taken away my kingdom.

---

* Wrongly numbered 37 in the printed text.

Keśidhvaja said :

"O Khāṇḍikya, it is with a view to clear a doubt that I have come to you, and not to kill you. Considering this, leave off either your anger or the arrow."

52b-55. Thereafter, he (Khāṇḍikya) discussed the matter in private with his ministers and his preceptors and priests. Khāṇḍikya, the highly intelligent one, consulted everyone. The ministers advised him—"This enemy who has come under our control must be killed. If he is killed the entire earth will be under your control." Khāṇḍikya replied to all of them— "Undoubtedly it is so.

56. If he is killed the entire earth will be under my control. But the conquest of the other world will be his, while the whole of the earth may be mine.

57. If I don't kill him, the conquest of the other world is mine without the earth. The conquest of the other world lasts till infinity, while the conquest of the earth is of a short duration.

58. Hence, I will not kill him. I will tell him what he asks." Then Khāṇḍikya Janaka approached his enemy and said :—

59. "Whatever you have to ask me (freely) ask me. I shall tell you." Then, O sage, he told him about the slaughter of his sacrificial cow.

60. Then he asked him about the expiatory observance of this Vrata. O sage, he duly explained everything to Keśidhvaja.

61-62. All the expiatory rites ordained in the context were explained by him. After understanding the matter, and being permitted by the noble-souled one he went back to the sacrificial ground and performed the rites duly. After completing the sacrifice duly he took his ceremonial ablution (Avabhṛtha).

63-65a. Becoming contented, the king began to think— "All the sacrificial priests have been worshipped. All the members of the sacrificial assembly have been honoured. All the suppliants have been duly provided with the desired objects by me. Whatever was worth doing in this world has been performed by me. How is it that I feel in my mind as though some religious duty has not been finished?

65b-66a. While pondering over thus, the king remembered—" O, the requisite fees due to the preceptor have not been given to Khāṇḍikya by me."

66b-67a. The king thereupon got into his chariot again and went to the impassable forest region where Khāṇḍikya the devotee of Svayambhu, was staying.

67b-68a. On seeing him coming again, Khāṇḍikya took up his weapon. He stood ready with the intention to kill him. The king Keśidhvaja then told him.

68b-70. "O Khāṇḍikya, do not be angry. I have not come here to do any harm to you; know that I have come to requite my preceptor. In accordance with your instruction the sacrifice has been duly performed by me. I wish to give you the Gurudakṣiṇā (Preceptor's fees). Please choose it and tell me.

On being thus requested, the king again consulted his ministers.

71. "He is desirous of paying the fees of the preceptor. What shall be requested by me?" The ministers said to him— "He may be requested for the gift of the entire kingdom".

72. King Khāṇḍikya laughed and said— "The kingdom is being begged by contented people[18] whose soldiers have not undergone any stress or strain!

73-74a. The kingdom of the earth is of a short duration. How can it be requested for by people like me? This is it. You people are such advisors as advocate selfish interest. What is the truth underlying this? You are not clever enough to know it."[14]

74b. After saying this he went up near the king Keśidhvaja and said— "will you certainly give the preceptor's fees?" When he said 'Of course', Khāṇḍikya spoke to him.

76-77a. "You are truly an expert in the perfect knowledge of spiritual matters. If the preceptor's fee is proposed to be given to me by you, kindly explain to me that holy rite which is capable of subduing the distress."[15]

Keśidhvaja said :

77b-78a. Why was my thornless kingdom not requested for by you? There is nothing more pleasing to Kṣatriyas than the acquisition of a kingdom.

Khāṇḍikya said :

78b. O Keśidhvaja, you understand, why it (kingdom) has not been requested for by me ?

79-81. Learned men do not yearn much for the entire kingdom. It is the duty of the Kṣatriyas to protect the subjects. Those who are inimical to their own kingdom are to be killed in an honest straightforward war. It was my fault, since I had been weak. There was no harm done by you. This Avidyā will only be conducive to bondage though devoid of a direct onslaught. If I were to crave for the kingdom it is a desire for further births and their enjoyment.

82. Begging and importunity may not be defective in the case of others. They follow only Dharma. It is the considered opinion of good (wise) persons that begging is not conducive to the religious duties (binding on) Kṣattriyas.

83-84a. Hence, the kingdom that belongs to you and is embedded in Avidyā, is not requested for. Even the learned men whose minds are drawn towards Mamatva (sense of possession) yearn for a kingdom. Those who are inebriated due to the great intoxicating beverage of Ahammāna (egotistic self-esteem) (crave for kingdom) but not people like me.

Keśidhvaja said :

84b-85. By means of Vidyā, I am desirous of crossing (surmounting) death. I rule the kingdom and perform various sacrifices. By enjoyment of pleasures, the merit dwindles down, but fortunately your mind is richly endowed with the discriminating faculty.

86. Listen, O delighter of the Janaka family, to the form or nature of Avidyā. It is the misapprehension of the soul in objects which are not the soul. It is the mistaking of one's own what is not one's own.

87. This is the seed, the outcome of the tree of Nescience stationed in two types.[16] In the physical body consisting of the fine elements the embodied being is enveloped in delusory darkness.[17]

88-89. The man of crooked intellect has the deep conviction of 'I am this', with regard to the body severally composed of the five elements, viz. Ether, wind, fire, water and earth. Who will entertain the false conception that the body which is not the soul, is the soul? The objects of enjoyment such as the house, the field, etc. have indeed to be enjoyed through the body.[18]

90. Though the Ātman is not the body, even the intelligent man thinks 'This is mine'. It is thus that he feels in regard to sons and grandsons procreated by that body.

91. Even the learned man feels the sense of ownership in regard to the body which is non-Ātman. Every man performs every action for the enjoyment of the body.

92-93a. When the body itself is something other than the man, it is always interested in binding him. Just as the house made of the earth (a mud-house) is scrubbed, cleaned, and plastered with water and mud, similarly the physical body consisting of earth and other elements is maintained with smearing, etc. with mud and water.

93b-94a. If the body that consists of fivefold means of enjoyment is developed by the same fivefold means of enjoyment, what is it that the man can be proud of ?

94b-96a. The individual soul goes through the path of worldly existence in the course of many thousands of births. He is enveloped by the dust of Vāsanās, impressions of actions and experiences. He attains delusion and exhaustion. O gentle one, when the dust particles are washed off by means of hot water of perfect knowledge, the delusory exhaustion of the wayfarer in the path of worldly existence is subdued.

96b-97a. When delusion and exhaustion are subdued, the man's inner sense organ, the heart becomes clear.

Getting a support that cannot be excelled by anything else, he attains the highest bliss of Salvation.

97b-98a. The Ātman is of the nature of bliss. It is of the nature of perfect knowledge. It is free from impurities. Misery, ignorance and attributes that are their off-shoots belong to Prakṛti and not to the Ātman.

98b. Although water has no direct contact with fire, it has the indirect contact through the pot.

99-100. Just as a wise person carries on his functions of uttering sound, etc., similarly the Ātman, polluted with ego, etc. due to his contact with Prakṛti resorts to dharmas (attributes) connected with Prakṛti. When he sheds off the ego, he is immutable and changeless. The seed (root-cause) of Avidyā has thus been narrated to you by me.

101. There is nothing other than Yoga that is destructive of miseries.

CHAPTER FORTYSIX

1. Vv. 3-30 are a quotation from VP. VI.5.51-87.

2. Though both VP. (ibid) v. 64 and NP. attribute this verse to Manu, it is not found in the extant Manusmṛti. It is a quotation from Maitrāyaṇī Up. VI.22. The Brahman has two aspects : verbal and Real or Spiritual and for the realization of the latter, the mastery over the former is necessary.

3. This is a quotation from the Muṇḍaka Up. I.4.5. The Muṇḍaka belongs to the AV. and hence the quotation is called Ātharvaṇī śruti.

4. In other words, the term Bhagavat which is the general denomination of an adorable object is not used with reference to the Supreme in general but as a special significance. But when the term is used with reference to any other person or thing, it is used in the customary general meaning.

5. The three guṇas and their consequent Kleśas (miseries) which deserve to be eschewed are not found in Bhāgavata.

6. For the genealogy and mutual relationship of Kesidhvaja and Khāṇḍikya vide vv. 37-39 below.

7. The verse in the NP. contains defective wording. The original verse in the VP. (ibid) 84 is as follows :

Samasta-kalyāṇa-guṇātmako'sau ava-śakti-leśāvṛta-bhūta-vargaḥ

He is one with and of the nature of all auspicious attibutes. He has permeated all created beings with but a small portion of His Power.

8. Instead of the confusing reading : sa Jñāyate yena of the NP. VP. (ibid) v. 87 reads saṃjñāyate yena and it gives better meaning as follows :

That whereby, the flawless, pure, Supreme, unsullied (by the contact of Prakṛti) and one (undivided) Brahman is properly known, revealed or realised is the real knowledge. What is other than this is ignorance.

Here ends chapter 5 of VP. VI.

9. Both the study of the Vedas and practice of Yoga are essential for God-realization. When a person is weary of the one, he should pursue the other. But the dictum in Yoga is that one should perform Japa (muttering the name of God or (Mantra) when tired of meditation and vice-verse :

japācchrāntaḥ punar dhyāyed
dhyānāc chrāntaḥ punar japet ||

10. In VP.VI.6.6, it is Maitreya who speaks this verse and the reply of Parāśara in VP. VI.6.7 ff, is the same as given here by Sanandana in vv. 37 ff. These names do not occur in the Janaka dynasty in VP.IV.5 but are recorded by Bh.P.IX.13.19-21.

11. For tasya dhenum of the NP. dharma-dhenum in the VP. (ibid) v. 13 is better, as it is not any cow but the cow related to the sacrifice whose death needed atonement.

12. Prāpta eva mayā yajñe is obscure grammatically. VP (ibid) 18 prapta eva mahā-yajño is clear. Hence adopted in the translation.

13. VP. (ibid) 45 reads Śatrubhiḥ instead of Kṛtibhiḥ in the NP. that makes the clause form a part of the ministerial advice that the kingdom is obtained without military engagement.

14. Another interpretation : "Thus you are the people who tender advice in concerns of this worldly life. But you are not competent enough to advise on matters relating to the higher (spiritual) objects.

15. Here ends ch. 6 in VP. VI. Vv. 77 ff. of the NP. constitute VP. VI. ch. 7.

16. NP. V. 86b-87a constitutes VP. (ibid) v. 11 and the meaning becomes more consistent and clear as follows : "The erroneous notion to regard what is not self as the self and the notion in regarding what is not one's own as one's own, constitutes the double seed of the tree of Nescience.

17. Though this ch. in the NP. is taken from the VP. VI, the lining of the verses is different from the text of the VP. Thus VV. 88b and 89a constitute verse No 13 in the VP VI. 6 and when these are taken together as in the VP, the meaning is changed. Thus 88b-89a means : "Who will look upon the body as the soul when the soul abides indistinctly (apart) from the five elements constituting the body."

18. The lines of verses in the NP are re-arranged according to the VP. VI. 7 and briefly translated for the sake of comparison and noting the difference in the interpretation due to the changes in the lines of the VP. in the text of the NP.

(NP. VV. 89b-90a) What man of understanding would attribute to the incorporeal soul the enjoyments of the body like lands, houses, etc. and would call them his own ?

90b-91a. What learned person will entertain the idea of property, in sons and grandsons born of the body, when the body itself ceases to be the self.

91b-92a. It is for the enjoyment of the body that a man performs an act and to obtain its fruits in the next body. But that again results in the perpetuation of the bondage of the body (bodily existence).

92b-93a. Just as a house of clay is plasted with clay and water, so the body which is composed of the earth, is sustained by the earth (i e. food grown of the earth) and water.

93b-94a. The physical body which is constituted of five elements is nourished by things which are also made of those very elements. Under the circumstances, what did the soul enjoy ?

94b-95a. Wandering through the path of Saṁsāra for thousands of births, the soul enveloped in the dust (particles) of desires, attains nothing but exhaustion in the form of delusion.

95b-96a. When that dust is washed off by the hot water of real knowledge, the exhaustion of delusion of the traveller of Saṁsāra is removed.

96b-97a. When the fatigue caused by infatuation is relieved and the person gets internal peace, be attains the supreme salvation which is unparallelled and undisturbed.

97b-98a. The real nature of the soul is pure, constituted of bliss and knowledge. The attributes such as pain, ignorance and impurity belong to Prakṛti and not to the Ātman.

98b-100a. The water and fire do not come in contact but when the water is placed above the fire in a pot, it bubbles and manifests the properties of fire. Similarly, the soul though absolutely distinct from the Prakṛti and its attributes, and uncorrupted, assumes the attributes of the gross nature, when the soul in association with Prakṛti gets polluted by egotism and other properties.

100b-101. The seed of ignorance is as described by me. There is no panacea on these worldly miseries except the practice of Yoga.

CHAPTER FORTYSEVEN

Exposition of the way to realize the soul

Sanandana said :

1. On hearing these words of Keśidhvaja that consisted of an estimate of spiritual topics and that was like nector, Khāṇḍikya spoke again, urging him.

Khāṇḍikya said :[1]

2. O highly blessed one, O the most excellent one among the knowers of Yoga, recount details of Yoga. In this dynasty of Nimi, you alone are the person who have understood the topics in the Yogaśāstra.

Keśidhvaja said :

3. O Khāṇḍikya, even as I recount, may the nature of the Yoga be heard. A sage who is established in Yoga, does not fall off after attaining merger into the Brahman.

4. Mind alone is the cause of bondage and liberation of men. When addicted to the sensual objects, it is the cause of bondage. When it is devoid of objects, it is the cause of liberation.

5. A wise man possessing discriminative knowledge, should withdraw the mind from the sense-objects and through it for the sake of salvation meditate on the Brahman, the greatest Iśvara.

6. By means of the power of the Atman he should make the mind that is prone to aberration,[2] meditate on the Brahman by infusing it with the nature of Ātman, even as a magnet does it to a piece of iron.

7. The special movement of the mind that depends on the efforts of self is to conjoin to the Brahman and such union with the Brahman is called Yoga.

8. This includes the holy rites with special and peculiar characteristics. He who possesses Yoga is Yogin. He is called a Mumukṣu (one desirous of liberation).

9. At the outset, the Yogin who practises Yoga is called Yuñjamāna. He who is called Viniṣpannasamādhi (of accomplished meditation) is one, who has attained the greatest Brahman.

10. If due to defects and obstacles his mind is not[3] defiled, the former one attains salvation, thanks to the repeated practice in the course of many other births.

11. The latter one who is called Viniṣpannasamādhi (i.e. the knower of Brahman.) attains salvation in the very same birth. The Yogin attains everything ere long after burning the Karmans through the fire of Yoga.

12-14. A Yogin shall practise five Yamas (restraints) and five Niyamas (observances): Celibacy, non-violence, truthfulness, non-stealing and non-acceptance of monetary gifts (these are the Yamas). Svādhyāya (self-study of the Vedas), Śauca (purificatory rites), Santoṣa (contentment) Tapas (penance) and concentration of the mind on the great Ātman. He must keep his mind devoid of lusts. Thus the five Yamas and the five Niyamas have been recounted. If people practise these with specific desires, they yield special benefits; if people practise these without desires they yield salvation.

15. Thus the ascetic should practise the good postures. (like Bhadrāsana). He must be endowed with good qualities. He must perform the Yoga with what are called Yamas and Niyamas.

16. If what are called Prāṇas (vital airs) are restrained by practice, it should be known as Prāṇāyāma. It has two subdivisions: the Sabija (with seed) and the Abija (without seed).

17. When the two vital Airs—Prāṇa and Apāna, overpower each other (are merged together), by regulating them both by proper means, that is the third (variety of breath-control, viz., Kumbhaka).

18. O lord of the enemies, its form is as gross[4] as its Ālambana (support) the support of the Ananta (endless one) is obtained by the Yogin as he practises.

19. The knower of the Yogas shall curb the sense organs drawn towards their objects such as sound, etc. Being devoted to and insistent on Pratyāhāra (withdrawal of the mind from sense-objects), he should make the senses (withdrawn from sense objects but) merging in the mind.

20. If the sense-organs become steady, they become extremely submissive. If they are non-submissive, the Yogin cannot achieve Yoga.

21. After keeping the vital airs under control by means of Prāṇāyāma and the sense-organs by means of Pratyāhāra, the practitioner of Yoga shall make the mind stabilised in an auspicious support.

Khāṇḍikya said:

22. O highly blessed one, may it be mentioned to me, the auspicious support of the mind, by having which the mind dispels the outcome of defects entirely.

Keśidhvaja said:

23. O wise one, the support of the mind is twofold, that too based on the form. The form may be embodied or unembodied; it may be Para (greater) or Apara (smaller).

24. There are three types of Bhāvanās (conceptions). The form and the universe is said to be threefold: The first is called Brahma bhāvanā, the other is known as Karma-bhāvanā and the third is of the nature of both Karma and Brahma.

25. One Bhāvanā is of the nature of Karman, the other one is of the nature of the Brahman, and the third one is of the nature of both. Thus there are three types of Bhāvabhāvanā (conception).

26. O wise one, Sanaka and others are always endowed with the Brahmabhāvanā. while the others, Devas etc. the mobile and immobile beings — all these are endowed with Karmabhāvanā.

27. In Hiraṇyagarbha and others, the Bhāvanā is of the combined nature of the Brahman and Karman. In those invested with authority and with enlightenment, there is the Bhāvabhāvanā.

28. O king, in the eyes of those who differentiate regarding that this is the Universe, that other is some thing different, when all the particularised Karmans and knowledge are not diminished completely.

29. That knowledge is termed Brahman, the knowledge where the differences have completely vanished which is Existence alone, which is beyond the scope of words and which is self-produced.

30 That is the great form of Viṣṇu who is formless and unborn. The characteristics of the great Ātman are contrary to the diversity of the form of the entire Universe.

31. O king, since that (i.e. the greatest form of Viṣṇu) cannot be meditated upon by one who practises Yoga, the gross form of Hari that could be seen by means of the eyes should be meditated upon.

32-35. All these constitute the universe, viz.—Lord Hiraṇyagarbha, Vāsava (i.e. Indra), Prajāpati, Maruts, Vasus, Rudras, Bhāskaras (i.e. Ādityas), constellations, planets, Gandharvas, Yakṣas, Daityas, Deva-Yonis (all kinds of divine and semi-divine beings), human beings, animals, mountains, oceans, rivers, trees, in fact. O king, all living beings, all those causes of the Bhūtas namely those beginning with the Pradhāna and ending with the Viśeṣas, those who are sentient and non-sentient, the single-footed, the bipeds, the multi-footed, and the footless—all these are the embodied forms of Hari. They are of the nature of Bhāvanās of the three types.

36. All this universe, consisting of the mobile and immobile beings, is endowed with the potency of Viṣṇu of the form of the Supreme Brahman.

37. The greatest Śakti is said to be Viṣṇu Śakti; the other Śakti is called Kṣetrajña and the third Śakti is called Avidyākarman.

38-39. O king, the Śakti that is called Kṣetrajña is produced through Karmans. O highly intelligent one, in this worthless worldly existence, it is of the active nature. It attains the distresses of worldly existence. The individual soul is enveloped and concealed by this Śakti. Hence it is called Kṣetrajña Śakti.

40. O king, this is seen in all living beings in varying degrees. In lifeless ones, it is very little and in the immobile beings it exists a little more than that.

41. In the reptiles, it is more than in the immobile beings. It is very powerful in birds. The deer are more powerful than the birds and the beasts are superior to the deer in their strength.

42. Human beings are more powerful than beasts and men wield more power (among human beings). O king, superior to them are the Nāgas, Gandharvas, Yakṣas and other gods.

43-44. Indra is the most powerful among Devas and superior to him is Prajāpati. Hiraṇyagarbha is more powerful than he. O king, all these are his forms, since they are invested with his potency as though with the Ether.

45. O highly intelligent one, the second unembodied form of the Brahman called Viṣṇu is termed sat by the learned men. It is worthy of being meditated upon by the Yogins.

46. O king, it is there that all these potencies are founded. These are not the real forms of Hari. It is another and very great.

47. O lord of men, he assumes the forms of all potencies (Śaktis) having the activities of Devas, animals and human beings in his own sports.

48. His activities based on the Karmans (of other beings) are for helping the worlds. The activities of the incomprehensible Being are pervasive and very benevolent.*

49. O king, that form of the deity, the embodiment of the Universe must be meditated upon for the purification of the soul. It is destructive of all sins.

50. Just as the fire with shooting flames in collaboration with the wind burns down heaps of dry grass and wood, so also Viṣṇu, abiding in the minds of Yogins destroys all sins.

51. (Defective) Hence, this potency is the first and foremost of all potencies. The devotee shall keep it in the mind. If it is duly stabilised it should be known as one with pure characteristics (?)

52. It is the auspicious support of the Ātman that is present everywhere and is accompanied by the mind. It is beyond the three Bhāvabhāvanās (emotional conceptions). O king, it is conducive to the salvation of the Yogins.

53. O tiger among men, all other supports of the mind, Devas and others with Karmans as their source of origin, are impure.

54. (Defective) One who has no desire for any of these supports shall meditate on the embodied form of the Lord. This is to be known as Dhāraṇā since the mind is concentrated there.

55. O ruler of men, may it be heard of what nature should Hari's form be, for being meditated upon. There cannot be a Dhāraṇā (retention) without a support.

56-60. The form shall be—one with beautiful and delighted face; with the eyes large like the petals of a lotus; fine cheeks with a wide and brilliant forehead; its earrings placed equally between ears and shoulders; the neck resembling a conch shell, with the chest marked with Śrivatsa; the three folds in the skin in the curved umbilical region and the belly appearing beautiful; Viṣṇu may be conceived as having eight long arms or four arms, his thighs large and symmetrical, firm lotus-like hands and feet clad in pure yellow robes; bedecked in coronet, beautiful bracelets, armlets, etc. He is surrounded by a halo and is wielding the Śārṅga bow, a Śaṅkha, a mace and a sword. He is to be meditated thus as the Brahman also.

61. The Yogin shall identify himself with the deity, after concentrating his mind and meditate upon Viṣṇu, O king, until the Dhāraṇā becomes firmly fixed therein.

62. Whether the devotee is talking something or standing by or is engaged in some voluntary activity, the retention (Dhāraṇā) does not vanish from the mind. In that case he should consider that (i.e. Dhāraṇā) as achieved.

63. Thereafter, the sensible man shall meditate upon the Lord's form without Śaṅkha, Gadā, Cakra, Śārṅga (bow), etc., but it is tranquil with the rosary in the hands.

64. When this Dhāraṇā is more or less stabilised, one shall meditate upon the Lord's form without such ornaments as coronet, bracelets, etc.

65. Then the sensible man should mentally dwell on that single limb; and subsequently he shall become engrossed in the one (Lord) that has the limbs.

66. At the perception of that form (there shall be) one obeisance and absence of desire for other objects. O king, his meditation is fulfilled by the first six Aṅgas (of meditation).

67. When his perception of the form of the deity without any fanciful conception becomes the outcome of mental meditation, it is called Samādhi.

68. O king, in regard to the thing to be achieved i.e. the great Brahman, that which makes the achievement possible is Vijñāna (perfect knowledge). That which is to be attained to is the Ātman whose Bhāvanās have been dispelled.

69. It is the perfect knowledge of the Kṣetrajña and the sense-organs therefore. After facilitating the achievement of the task of liberation, it has its purpose achieved and it recedes.

70. Then the devotee shall achieve the emotional identity with the great Ātman, he shall become non-different from him. The difference is caused by the ignorance about him.

71. When Ajñāna, the cause of differentiation, is utterly dispelled who will agree to this that the Ātman is different from the Brahman ?

72. O Khāṇḍikya, thus partly in detail and partly in brief, the Yoga has been recounted to you, since you have been asking me about it. What more can I do for you?

Khāṇḍikya said :

73. The excellent nature of the Yoga has been expounded by you. Everything has been done for me. Thanks to your instructions, the impurity in my mind has been entirely annihilated.

74. What has been called by me as 'Mine' is incorrect and not otherwise. Even by those who know what should be known, O king, it cannot be mentioned otherwise.

75. The feelings 'I' and 'My' are the outcome of Avidyā so also their utterance. The truth which is inexpressible is beyond the scope of words.

76. O Keśidhvaja, go, for the attainment of further welfare. Everything has been done for me by you since the unchanging Yoga devoted to salvation has been explained to me.

Sanandana said :

77. Thereafter, having been worshipped duly by Khāṇḍikya, king Keśidhvaja returned to his capital duly worshipped by Khāṇḍikya, O Brāhmaṇa.

78. Khāṇḍikya made his son the king. With his mind, dedicated to Kṛṣṇa, he went to Viśālā for the achievement of mastery over Yoga.

79. He was endowed with the qualities of Yama, etc. He was solely engrossed in deep meditation. The king attained dissolution by merging himself into the pure Brahman called Viṣṇu.

80. For the sake of liberation and eager to dispel his Karmans, he enjoyed the sensual pleasures and performed holy rites without any desire in view.

81. O sage, by means of auspicious enjoyment of pleasures, he wiped off all sins and became free from impurities. He attained Siddhi that utterly quelled the three kinds of Tāpa (misery).

82. Thus everything that you had asked me has been recounted to you. What else shall I narrate to you for dispelling the three types of distress?

CHAPTER FORTYSEVEN

1. VV. 2 ff of this Purāṇa are the same as in the VP. VI. 7 26 ff.

2. For 6a of the NP: ātmabhāvaṁ nayet tena tad brahmadhyāpanaṁ manaḥ, VP (ibid) 30a reads .. nayatyenaṁ tad brahma dhyātum munim and changes the meaning completely. For that Brahman attracts to itself the sage who meditates upon it and who is of the same nature, as the magnet attracts the iron.

3. NP 10a reads dūṣyate nāṣya mānasam instead of cāsya mānasam in VP (ibid) 34a. But this na in the NP. makes the verse self-contradictory. Why should a yogi whose mind is not defined due to obstacles require many more births ? The reading cāsya for nāsya in the VP means : "Should the yogin's mind be vitiated by defects" etc.

4. For ālambanavat sthūlam of the NP 18a, VP (ibid) 42a reads ālambanavataḥ sthūlam (while the Yogi practises) his support (ālambana) is the gross form (Hiraṇagarbha) of the Lord.

CHAPTER FORTYEIGHT

The story of Bharata

Nārada said :

1. O blessed one, the antidote for the three types of distress has been heard by me. Still my mind is confused. It does not attain proper stability, easily.

2. O Brāhmaṇa, how can the sinful transgression against one's own self committed by wicked men, be tolerated by men? O bestower of honour, recount it to me.

Sūta said :

3. On hearing what has been spoken by Nārada, Sunandana, the son of Brahmā, remembered the activities of Bharata. With great delight he said :

Sanandana said :

4. In this context, I shall tell you the ancient traditional story on hearing which your confused mind shall attain great stability.

5. O excellent sage, formerly, there was a king named Bharata. He was the son of Ṛṣabha. This sub-continent is named Bharatakhaṇḍa after him.

6. After attaining the kingdom belonging to his father and grandfather in due succession, he protected it righteously. He delighted the subjects like their father.

7. He performed various kinds of sacrifices and worshipped Lord Viṣṇu, the embodiment of all Devas. He meditated upon him with the mind centering round him in the course of carrying out different activities.

8. He procreated sons. He was unattached to sensuous objects. The learned king left the kingdom and went to the hermitage of Pulastya and Pulaha.

9-10a. He went to the great holy centre Śālagrāma frequented by people desirous of liberation. O sage, he became an ascetic and performed the propitiation of Viṣṇu with great devotion, rendering service(unto the Lord) with things obtained by him.

10b-11a. O Nārada, every day in the morning he plunged into the pure clear water and prayed to the Sun with devotion muttering the Supreme syllable expressive of the Brahman (i.e. Oṁ or Gāyatrī).

11b-13a. He then returned to the hermitage. With great purity and devotional piety, he worshipped Vāsudeva the Lord of the universe with the materials of worship such as sacrificial twigs, Kuśa grass, clay, etc. brought by himself. He worshipped with fruits, flowers, leaves of Tulasī and clear water.

13b-14a. On one occasion, that highly blessed king took his ablution in the River Cakra. With great purity and attention he stayed in the water performing Japa for three Muhūrtas.

14b-15a. O Brāhmaṇa, a thirsty hind who was about to be delivered of a young one, came to the bank from the forest, in order to drink water.

15b-16a. As she had almost completed drinking the water, there arose the great roaring sound of a lion which was frightful to all living beings.

16b-17a. On hearing the roaring sound of the lion, the hind leapt to the bank of the river. While she was climbing the steep side of the bank, the foetus fell down into the river.

17b-18a. Bharata caught hold of the fawn that fell off from its mother's womb and was carried away by the forceful current and the waves of the river.

18b-19a. O leading sage, due to the misery on account of the fall of the foetus and the steep ascent, that hind fell down dead.

19b-22. On seeing the hind dead in the tragic circumstances, the royal saint took up the fawn and brought it to his hermitage. The king nurtured the young one of the hind day by day. O sage, nourished by him, it duly grew up. At first the fawn used to graze at the outskirts of the hermitage. Then it went to the forest, it went far into the forest but, afraid of tigers, it returned soon. After some time it used to go very far into the forest in the morning and return to the hermitage in the evening.

23-24a. Bharata kept it inside the hut in the hermitage during nights. His mind became highly involved with the deer-fawn that used to be near him or away from him by turns. O sage, his mind was not so much drawn towards Viṣṇu.

24b-25a. Remember that he had abandoned his kingdom and even sons; that he had eschewed all connections with his kinsmen. Still he had great affection (feeling of kinship) with the fawn.

25b-26. When the fawn was away from the hermitage for a long time, his mind was agitated by various doubts such as, "Has it been devoured by the wolves?" "Have tigers seized upon it ?" "Has it been struck down by the lion?" When the fawn was by his side his face was bright with delight and love.

27. As his mind was attracted by the feelings of 'myness', his Samādhis (trances and concentration) became disturbed often. After some time the king died.

28. At the time of passing away, he was looking at the fawn. Like a father by the son, he was looked at by the fawn with tears in its eyes.

29. O sage, since his mental fancy was of that nature, he was born as a deer—O excellent Brāhmaṇa. Since he had the faculty of remembering previous births, he became unenamoured of worldly existence.

30. He left off his mother (i.e. the mind) and went to Śālagrāma. He nourished himself by means of dry leaves and grass.

31. Thus he expiated for the evil action that had been the cause of his birth as a fawn. Having left off his body, he was born again as a Brāhmaṇa who had the faculty of remembering his previous births.

32. He was born in a leading, pure family of Yogins of good conduct. He was richly endowed with all knowledge. He was conversant with all principles and topics in the scriptural texts.

33-34. That excellent sage perceived his own Ātman beyond Prakṛti. O great sage, thanks to the knowledge of Ātman that he had acquired, that highly intelligent one saw Devas and others, nay, all living beings, without any difference. He was invested with the sacred thread, but he did not repeat the Vedic text as uttered by his preceptor.

35. He did not observe holy rites. He did not learn scriptural texts. When he was addressed many times, he made some stupid irrational statement.

36. Even that speech lacked in qualities of cultural refinement. It was often uttered in vulgar rustic language. O sage, accursed in body, he was always clad in dirty clothes.

37-40. Saliva oozed from the interstices of his teeth. He was always harassed by citizens. He used to remember the words of Hiraṇyagarbha (or Brahmā*) as follows: "Excess of respect affects the prosperity of Yoga. A Yogin dishonoured by the people achieves Yogic power. Hence, a Yogin should perform holy rites of good men without defiling them. He should so perform them that the people should begin to disrespect him and avoid associating with him." The highly intelligent one thus thought of the words of Hiraṇyagarbha, and showed himself to the public as one with sluggish features and of unsound mind. He regularly ate cakes made of Kulmāṣa grain, vegetables and fruits from the forests.

41-42a. He ate whatever he got and whenever it happened. When his father passed away, he was compelled to work in the fields by his brothers, nephews and other kinsmen.

42b-43a. All his limbs became stout, though he was fed on rotten food. He became a sluggish worker. With food for his wages, he helped the whole world.

43b-44a. (On seeing) him so unrefined but having the features and activities of a Brāhmaṇa, a charioteer of the Sauvīra[1] king considered him worthy of being taken as an unpaid labourer.

44b-45a. O Brāhmaṇa, that king was seated in a palanquin. He was thinking of going to the excellent hermitage of sage Kapila on the banks of Ikṣumatī river.[1]

45b-46. He wanted to ask the great sage Kapila who was well learned in the topic of virtues leading to salvation, as follows—"What is it that is conducive to the welfare of men in this world which is mostly full of miseries." On being urged by the words of the charioteer, he carried his palanquin.

47. O Brāhmaṇa, he, the sole receptacle of all knowledge, was taken as an unpaid labourer. He was one among other men who too were unpaid labourers.

48. Endowed with the faculty of remembering events of past lives, he bore the palanquin as he was desirous of wiping off his sins. He, the most excellent one among the intelligent men, slowly walked ahead gazing at the yoke of the palanquin.

49-50a. The other bearers walked quickly. On observing the irregular movement of the palanquin, the king said—"O palanquin-bearers! What is this? Go ahead at even step."

50b-51. Again the movement of the palanquin was irregular. The king laughed and asked them, "what is this? You are moving otherwise!" When the king (mildly rebuked) them many times, the palanquin-bearers said—"This fellow does not thus move quickly."

The king said:

52. "Are you tired? You have borne the palanquin only for a short distance. Are you not used to strenuous work? Aren't you seen a bulky fellow?"

The Brāhmaṇa said:

53. "I am not stout. Your palanquin has not been borne by me. I am not tired. I have no fatigue or trouble. O lord of the earth, the bearer is another one."

The king said:

54. "You are actually seen to be stout. The palanquin is still above you. Fatigue in carrying a load occurs to embodied beings (as they have to exert and carry the load).

The Brāhmaṇa said:

55. "O king, tell me what you have directly perceived. The qualifications of strong or weak may be added afterwards.

56. This is a false statement—"The palanquin is borne by you. The palanquin is still above you." All this is false, O Sir, listen to my words now.

57. The two feet are on the ground. The shanks rest on the pair of feet. The thighs are on the pair of shanks. The belly has the support of the pair of thighs and hips.

58. The chest, the arms and the shoulders rest on the belly. This palanquin is supported by the shoulders. How can it be said that I am the support ?

59. The body designated as 'you' is stationed within the palanquin. "You are there. I am here". This is also a wrongly put statement.

60. O king, you, I , and the others are to be borne by the elements; the whole class of living beings (and the elements) are fallen in the current of the Guṇas.

61. O Lord of the earth, these—sattva and other Guṇas are subject to the control of Karmans. The Karman accumulated due to ignorance is present in all creatures

62. The Ātman is pure, imperishable and quiescent. It is devoid of Guṇas. It is beyond Prakṛti. The Ātman alone abides in all creatures but he has no increase (fatness) or decrease (slimness) .

63. O king, when there is neither increase nor decrease, it was childish ignorance (that prompted you to say I am stout). On what basis was it uttered by you ?

64-66. (Defective) This palanquin rests equally on the ground pair of feet, shanks, thighs, hips, belly and other things as well as on the shoulders. When the burden is equal, O king, the palanquin is not borne by you or the other creatures alone. A great burden originating from mountains, trees or houses nay, from the whole earth has to be borne by you and by me. As the Puruṣa has distinctness (separate existence) from the sense organs which are the products of Prakṛti what heavy load is to be borne by me, O King. O King the Puruṣa is separated from the sense organs produced from Prakṛti [?]

67. The material that constitutes this palanpuin is a conglomeration of all elements, grown large equally in regard to you, me or the entire world.

Sanandana said:

68. After saying this the Brāhmaṇa who was bearing the palanquin became silent. Thereupon the king hurriedly got down to the ground and touched his feet.

The King said:—

69. O Brahmin, be pleased with me. Leave off the palanquin. May it be revealed to me who you are, in the guise of a low and degraded man.

70. I am eager to serve you. O learned one, may everything be mentioned by you, viz—who you are, whose son you are and what the reason for coming here is?

The Brahmin said:—

71-73. May it be heard, O king. It cannot be explained who I am. Everywhere the action of arrival is prompted by some utility [enjoyment of pleasures]. The enjoyment of pleasures and the experience of miseries is accomplished through the body, etc. A creature attains the body, etc. in order to experience the outcome of Dharma and Adharma, O king, everywhere, in the case of every creature the reason is Dharma or Adharma. Hence, how is it that the reason is being asked?

The king said:—

74. There is no doubt in this that Dharma or Adharma is the cause of all effects. The transmigration from one body to another is for experiencing pleasure or pain.

75. As to your statement that it cannot be said who am I in regard to the Ātman, I wish to state as follows.

76. O brahmin, How is it that it is not possible to say "I am he who exists. O twice-born, the word Aham (I) refers to the Ātman and not to the body.*

The Brahmin said:—

77. The word Aham refers to the body and not to the Ātman. The mistaken identity of the Ātman with the non-Ātman may be due to the secondary sense of the word (or the effect of hearing).

* For doṣāya in this and the next verse read dehāya.

78-79. It is the tongue, teeth, lips and palate, O king that say Aham [I]. All of them must be meant by Aham [I] since all of them have been the cause of utterance. For what purpose does the tongue say of its own accord the word 'I'. Nor it is cogent to say aham means 'I am the tongue, I am the speech'. Is the utterance "I am" made through proper cause? Still it is not correct to say that I am the speech [?]

80. O king, the physical body characterised by the head, hands. etc. is separate from the Puruṣa. Hence, where shall I fix the term Aham ?

81. If there be any other person than I, O excellent king, I am not the body even if others wish to speak of it.

82. When, only one Puruṣa is present in all bodies it. is futile to say, "Who are you ?" 'Who am I', etc.

83. "You are the king." "This is the palanquin." "We are the bearers going ahead." "This is your world". O king, it is not the reality to say thus.

84. A log of wood is obtained from a tree. From that this palanquin is fashioned out—this palanquin occupied by you. O king, is it termed as a tree or a log of wood?

85. The people do not say, "The great king is seated on the tree" when you are riding in the palanquin nor do they say that you are sitting on a log of wood.

86. The palanquin and the mass of log—each has its name and situation. O excellent king, may the palanquin that gives you delight be pondered over by you.

87. Similarly, the separate nature of the umbrella from the ribs may be considered. Wherefrom is the umbrella born ?" This argument is applicable both to you and to me.

88. Man, woman, cow, goat, horse, elephant, bird, tree etc—it should be known that these are the terms given to bodies in the world, the bodies caused by Karmans.

89. The Being (Puruṣa) is neither a deva nor a man, nor an animal nor a tree. O king, these are different shapes of physical bodies originating from Karmans.

90. O king, the object that is called a king in the world or the object that is called 'king's soldier' or any other object is not true. It is sheer imagination.

91. What is that object which perishes after sometime? O king, what is the object that is evolved after transformation?

92. You are the king for the whole world, son to your father, enemy to your enemy, husband to your queen, father to your son. O king what shall I say? Who are you?

93. Who are you? This head? Or, does the head belong to you? Who are you? this belly? Or does the belly belong to you? O lord of the earth, are you the foot, etc? Don't they belong to you?

94. You are separated from all limbs, O king, ponder carefully on the topic 'Who am I?'

95. When the real situation is this, how can what should be evolved out of separate foot etc. be conceived as 'By me' 'I' etc, O king [?]

CHAPTER FORTYNINE

*Exposition of the Virtuous Path to Liberation

Sanandana said:

1. On hearing this speech, full of profound truth, the king respectfully bowed to him and submitted :

The king submitted :

2. Venerable Sir, what has been authoritatively stated by you certainly contains the ultimate truth, but on hearing it, the functioning of my mind is as it were whirling.

3. If this discriminative knowledge exists in remaining beings, that which is superior to and beyond the ken of Prakṛti has been shown by you.

4-5. But the statements : "I do not bear the palanquin, the palanquin does not rest over me. The body whereby this palanquin is borne, is different from me. The propensity of creatures is due to influence the guṇas (attributes) and it is urged by activities (Karmans). (This being the case) what is there as mine (done by me) in it." This is what was spoken by you.†

6. O knower of the highest truth ! When such doctrines are heard by me, my mind which has become anxious to know the ultimate truth gets agitated and perplexed.

7. Even at the outset, I was out to go to the sage Kapila, O highly fortunate Brāhmaṇa, to enquire of him about the doubt "What is the most excellent thing in this life."

---

* This chapter is a combination of chapters 14, 15 and 16 of the II Aṁśa of VP. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa).

 VP reads : yad aśeṣeṣu for yadi śeṣeṣu of the NP. VP. means: The discriminative knowledge existing in all creatures is the Brahma (the great principle) itself, beyond the ken of Prakṛti (I have no doubt about it.)

† VP. (Ibid) v. 7, Śaṁsa me "Please explain to me".

8. But in the meanwhile such a statement has been made by you as makes my mind rush to you, for getting acquainted with the great objective in life.

9. It is reported that verily, the sage Kapila is the ray (portion) of Lord Viṣṇu, the pervader (embodiment) of all beings, who has incarnated for the dissipation of the delusion of the world.

10. Me-thinks really it is the venerable Lord Kapila himself, who with a desire for our welfare, has manifested himself to me in what has been spoken to me.

11. O twice-born one! Your honour is the veritable ocean with billows of all divine wisdom. Be pleased to explain to me what is the excellent-most welfare for the dissipation of my delusion.

The Brāhmaṇa replied :

12. You are asking again what is a welfare ? You are asking this in the real sense of the term.* O king, all ultimate truths are certainly conducive to welfare.

13. To a person who, after propitiating deities, covets for wealth and property, desires to have sons or a kingdom, everyone of these is respectively the highest good.

14-15a. The association of the great Ātman of a person possessing discrimination is an excellence conducive to welfare. Excellent is the performance of sacrifice (and other rites) the fruit of which is obtaining the pleasures in the heaven. But the real excellent welfare lies in not coveting its fruit.

15b-16a. There are hundred and thousand types of welfares of this kind, but these are not the real objects in life. Listen from me what is the ultimate truth or welfare.

16b-17a. If wealth be the ultimate reality, why is it spent for the sake of Dharma? Or why is it utilised for obtaining desired objects ?

---

* VP. (II. 14.12A) reads Paramārthaṁ nu pṛcchasi for NP.'s paramārthena.

 VP. (ibid) 12b reads Śreyāṁsyaparamārthāni. The VP. verse means the opposite of the NP. verse above : "O king what are you again enquiring about—What is the most excellent thing or the ultimate truth? All such kinds of welfare are not the ultimate truths.

17b 18a. If a son be the highest object (worth coveting) then, O king, he himself becomes the highest object of another (i.e. of his father) and his father thus being the son of another (viz. that of his father), becomes the greatest object of another person.

18b-19a. Hence, in the world of mobile and immobile beings, the son (who is the product of his father) cannot be the highest object. Or, otherwise, the products of all causes would be the highest covetable objects.

19b-20a. If the acquisition of a kingdom (and such other forms of prosperities) in this world be the highest object, the Paramārtha sometimes becomes accomplished only to disappear or to be destroyed later on (as the highest objective is never thus lost, acquisition of kingdom cannot be with Paramārtha—the highest object.)

21b-22a. If in your opinion, the performance of sacrifices accomplished with the mantras of the Ṛg, Yajur and Sāma Vedas, be the highest object in life, may my say in the matter be listened to.

22b-23a. O king! The thing that is the product of the earth as its cause, partakes of the nature of its cause (i.e. becomes of the same material as its cause) and becomes made of clay.

23b-24a. In the same manner, the act (of sacrifice), the performance of which is accomplished with perishable objects like sacrificial sticks, clarified butter, Kuśa grass and such other things, is bound to be temporary and perishable.

24b-25a. But the ultimate truth (or the highest objective in life) is considered as imperishable by all the (spiritually) wise. There is absolutely no doubt that (the life in heaven, etc.) which has been attained by using perishable objects is certainly transient and perishable.

25b-26a. If it be my (your*) view that a religious act performed without the desire of getting its fruit in recompense, is the real paramārtha (the highest object or the truth),

---

* In the context, this (tava) is the correct reading.

(it is wrong for), it is only the means of Liberation (from Saṁsāra but the paramārtha is never the means (but the end).

26b-27a. If meditation over the soul (distinguishing it as different from the body) be called the highest truth, it (that meditation) is for the establishment of the discrimination between the soul and the non-soul. But paramārtha (the highest truth) is above such distinctions and differences. (Hence, such a meditation cannot be paramārtha).

27b-28a. If the merging of *paramārtha (rather paramātman the Supreme Soul) and the individual soul is desired (accepted) as the highest truth, it is illusory and false, for one (different category or) matter cannot be substantially and completely merged with another kind of matter. (If the individual soul and the Supreme soul are essentially different, they can never merge. But the fact of the matter is that they are really one. And the highest Truth is the recognition of their essential oneness and not their combination or (merging).

28b-29a. Hence, O king, there is no doubt that all these are (different kinds of) welfares (but they are not the ultimate objectives—paramārtha). Listen from me, in brief, what is the highest objective or the truth.

29b-31a. O king! It is the soul (that is the ultimate end or the truth). It is one, all-pervading, uniform, pure, attributeless, transcendental to Prakṛti, devoid of birth, growth, etc., omnipresent, embodiment of knowledge, never related or un-relatable with unrealities like name, form, etc. in the past, present or the future.

31b-32a. The specific knowledge that He (i.e. the soul) is essentially one, though abiding in one's own body as

---

* This is a misprint for Paramātman, for there is the repetition of Paramārtha in the same line in the NP. which is meaningless. The line in NP is as follows :

Paramārthātmanor yogaḥ paramartha itiṣyate /

VP. reads:

Paramātmātmanor yogaḥ paramārtha itiṣyate /

I follow the reading in the VP.

well as that of others, is the true knowledge. He who knows it* has the real knowledge.

32b-33. The diffusive wind, though one and pervades the whole of the flute, is distinguished as Ṣaḍja and other notes of the musical scale, when it passes through the different perforations (of the flute), the supreme soul, though one, has manifold forms arising as a consequence, of different external acts.

34-35a. He assumes different forms like gods, etc., but he is not of such behaviour. Listen here, O king, what happened formerly and what was sung by Ṛbhu who wanted to awake (i.e. impart) enlightenment in the Brāhmaṇa Nidāgha.

35b-36. Ṛbhu was the son of the Supreme god Brahmā. He was innately endowed with the knowledge of true spiritual wisdom. He had formerly a disciple (called) Nidāgha, the son of Pulastya.

37-38a. With extreme delight, he imparted to him the whole of spiritual wisdom. Although he acquired the knowledge of reality, he had no inclination towards non-duality. Ṛbhu surmised this about Nidāgha, O king.‡

38b. O warrior ! It is reported that there was a city called Nāgara (VP. Vīranagara) on the bank of the river Devikā !§

39-40a. It was founded by Pulastya and was prosperous and very beautiful. O excellent king, in the beautiful grove adjoining the city, dwelt an expert in Yoga named Nidāgha who formerly became his (Ṛbhu's) disciple.

---

* VP. reads : Dvaitino'tathya-darśinaḥ / He who sees the duality (in the Soul and in the non-soul or in the individual and Supreme soul) has no correct vision (of the true knowledge).

 This line in the NP. viz.

devādibhedam adhyāste nāstyevācaraṇo hi saḥ / is defective. The original line in the VP. (ibid) v. 33 is :

devādibhede'padhvaste nāstyevāvaraṇe hi saḥ /

When the difference in the investing form such as that of god, etc., is lost, there is then no distinction.

‡ Here ends ch. 14 in the VP. II.

§ The river Deeg, a tributary of the Ravi. —De, p. 55.

40b-41a. After a lapse of one thousand divine years, Ṛbhu went to his city (Vīranagara) with the intention of seeing his disciple.

41b-42a. When the (daily) sacrifice to Viśvedevas was over and he (Nidāgha) was standing at the door (waiting for a guest), he (Ṛbhu) was seen by Nidāgha who conducted him to his house.

42b-43a. After washing his hands and feet and when he was (comfortably) seated, Nidāgha respectfully requested : O excellent Brāhmaṇa, please take food.

Ṛbhu said :

43b-44a. O prominent Brāhmaṇa ! If I am to partake of food in your house, please mention the articles of food (to be served). I never like to take bad food.

Nidāgha replied :

44b-45a. O excellent Brāhmaṇa, you may partake of whatever food you like such as saktu (barley), gruel, fried cakes of meal, available in my house.

Ṛbhu said :

45b-46a. These are bad food-stuffs. Please give me such sweet food such as rice boiled with sugar, wheat. flour cakes (Saṁyāva), milk-pudding, sugar-cane juice (and such sweet dishes).

Nidāgha said to his wife :

46b-47a. O mistress of the house ! Prepare a sweet dish from whatever is the most delicious and sweet edible in the house.

47b-48a. When thus instructed, his wife, in compliance of her husband's commands, prepared sweet and delicious dishes.

48b-49a. Nidāgha who stood before him till the great sage had partaken of the sweet dishes, bowed him respectfully and enquired :

49b-51a. Are you well satisfied with the food? Has your mind felt contentment from the food partaken by you?

What is the place of your residence? Where do you propose to go? Be pleased to tell us from which place you have come?

Ṛbhu replied :

51b-52a. O Brāhmaṇa ! When a hungry person takes food, he does feel satisfied. How can I feel satisfaction, when I had no hunger ? How is it that you ask me about it?

52b-53. When the earthen element in the body is parched by the fire (element), hunger is engendered. Thirst is produced among men, when the moisture of the body is absorbed by the gastric fire. Hunger and thirst are the functions of the body with which I am not concerned.

54a. As there is no possibility of hunger (affecting me), I am ever satisfied.

54b-55a. Pleasure and satisfaction of the mind are the faculties of Citta (mind), O Brāhmaṇa. These are in no way related to the Puruṣa (soul).

55b-56. As to your three queries : "Where is your residence? Whither you go, or whence have you come?" Please listen to me. Puruṣa is omnipresent and pervades everything like the sky.

57. Hence is the query 'Whence', 'Where', 'Whither' about the puruṣa meaningful and rational ? I am neither going, nor coming, nor is my dwelling place in any place.

58a. Nor you are you; nor others others, nor I I.

58b-59a. If you are curious what explanation I offer for the distinction I made between sweetened and unsweetened food, listen to what I say, O excellent-most Brāhmaṇa.

59b-60. What is sweet becomes unsweet when it causes satiation and repulsion (when overeaten) and what is not sweet tastes sweet when a person (out of hunger) imagines it to be so. Does such a food exist there, which at first, in the middle and in the end is equally tasty?

61. Just as a house built of earth becomes reinforced when plastered with clay, similarly this body which is made of earth becomes strengthened with the particles of the earth which constitute articles of food.

62. Barley, wheat, pulse, butter, oil, milk, curds, raw sugar, fruit and the like consist of atoms of earth.

63. Hence, having realised that it is the mind which decides what is sweet and non-sweet, one should be equanimous in outlook with the notion of identity and this serene mind with this effect of identity is the only means of liberation.

64.* O king, having heard his (Ṛbhu's) speech implying the essence of the ultimate truth, the highly fortunate Nidāgha fell at his feet and spoke the following words :

65. Be gracious unto me, O Brāhmaṇa, please let it be disclosed who you are that have come for my good, as by listening to your words, my delusion has been dispelled.

Ṛbhu replied :

66. I am Ṛbhu, your spiritual preceptor who have come here to impart to you spiritual wisdom, O Brāhmaṇa ! I shall communicate to you enlightenment about the highest truth.

67. Know that the whole universe is only one. It is of undivided, entire nature of the Supreme spirit designated as Vāsudeva.

The Brāhmaṇa said :

68. "So be it," said Nidāgha. Then being worshipped with fervent devotion and due prostration at his feet by Nidāgha, the venerable Lord (Ṛbhu) went his way‡

69† Again after the expiration of another (divine) millenium, the spiritual preceptor (Ṛbhu) came to the same city (Vīranagara) for imparting spiritual knowledge to Nidāgha, O Lord of the people.

70-71. Then he saw sage Nidāgha on the outskirts of the city. While a king escorted with a large army and attendants was entering the city, his disciple Nidāgha was standing far afar, avoiding the crowd. His throat was parched with hunger, and he was returning from the forest with sacred sacrificial sticks (fuel) and kuśa grass.

---

* As VP. states vv. 63 & 64 are spoken by the Brāhmaṇa.

‡ Here ends ch. 15 of the VP. II.

† This is verse no. 1 of ch. 16 of the VP. (ibid) and it is preceded by (Brāhmaṇa uvāca).

72. Seeing Nidāgha there Ṛbhu approached him (and finding that he was not recognized by Nidāgha) saluted him and asked him, "Why are you standing here in such a lonely place, O Brāhmaṇa?"

Nidāgha replied :

73. O Brāhmaṇa! There is such a huge crowd of people, as this king is desirous of entering this beautiful town. Hence I am standing here.

Ṛbhu asked :

74. O excellent Brāhmaṇa ! I believe you to be well informed. Please tell me which is the king here and who are the other persons ?

Nidāgha replied :

75. He who is riding the stately elephant that is in rut and huge like a mountain peak, is the king and the others are his attendants.

Ṛbhu said :

76. Both the king and the elephant are seen by me simultaneously. But you have seen them separately with their special features.*

77. Explain to me, therefore, what is the difference between them, as I wish to know which is the elephant here and who is the king, O highly fortunate one.

Nidāgha replied :

78. That which is under is the elephant and he who is above it (the elephant) is the king. O Brāhmaṇa, do you not know the relation between that which is borne and that which bears.

Ṛbhu requested :

79. O Brāhmaṇa ! Please enlighten me so that I can

---

* NP reads nirviśeṣeṇa for VP na viśeṣeṇa "without specific characteristics distinguishing them".

understand what is that which is called the underneath (the lower section) and what is it that is above (the upper section).

The Brāhmaṇa narrated :

80. As soon as he spoke this, Nidāgha jumped upon Ṛbhu and said : Please listen to my reply to what you are enquiring about.

81. I am above like the king and you are underneath like an elephant. This practical demonstration is given by me for your understanding, O Brāhmaṇa.

Ṛbhu asked :

82. O excellent Brāhmaṇa! If you are sitting as if you are a king and if I am the elephant, please let me know which of us is you and which is I.

The Brāhmaṇa said :

83. As soon as Nidāgha heard these words, he instantly bowed down to his feet and said, Venerable Sir, you are Ṛbhu, my spiritual preceptor.

84. The mind of no other person is so much consecrated by the concept of non-duality as that of my spiritual preceptor. I, therefore, presume that you are my preceptor who have come to me for imparting instruction.

Ṛbhu replied :

85. Due to the service rendered by you previously and out of deep love, your teacher called Ṛbhu has come to impart him spiritual instruction.

86. O highly intelligent one! The entire range of the philosophy of non-dualism which is the epitome of the highest truth—the essence of which is the non-duality of all--has been succinctly communicated to you.

The Brāhmaṇa said :

87. After saying this, the preceptor Ṛbhu imparted to him the lore, (the non-dualistic philosophy). Impressed by that advice, Nidāgha became devoted to non-dualistic philosophy.

88. He saw all creatures as being non-distinct from his Ātman. And thus (in due course) the Brāhmaṇa got the highest liberation into the form of the Brahman.

89. In the same way, O knower of the dharma you also be equal to your friends and enemies. Acquiring the knowledge of the soul, identify yourself with the soul who is all pervading.

90. Just as the sky, though one, appears diversified as white, blue, etc., so is the soul though one, looked upon as different by persons with erroneous visions.

91. That one which abides here in all things is the Immutable Viṣṇu. There is none other than He. He is I, you and all others. He is the embodiment of the Universe. Give up the error of differentiation.

Sanandana said :

92. The king when thus enlightened, became truthful of vision, eschewed the notion of distinct existence. While the Brāhmaṇa, who, due to the recollection of his previous births, had obtained the perfect knowledge, and in this very life, attained Emancipation (from Saṁsāra and had not to take another birth).

93. O prominent sage ! The highest truth pertaining to the soul which has been elucidated to you is efficacious to grant Liberation to Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas who ever listen to it.

94. I have explained to you as and what has been asked by you, O Brāhmaṇa ! This is the pure knowledge about the Brahman. What else shall I explain to you ?

CHAPTER FIFTY

The arrangement of notes and syllables

Sūta said :

1. On hearing these words of Sanandana, sage Nārada spoke to his brother Sanandana, as though not fully satisfied.

Nārada said :

2. Venerable Sir ! Everything of whatever has been asked by me, has been narrated by your worship. But despite hearing the stories of Hari repeatedly, my mind does not feel satisfied.

3. It is heard that Śuka, the son of Vyāsa, was a great knower of Dharma. He became disgusted (with the world) both internally and externally. He attained very great Siddhi (spiritual accomplishment).

4. O Brāhmaṇa, without the service rendered to the great ones, no man can gain perfect knowledge. How did, then, the infant son of Vyāsa attain perfect knowledge ?

5. I am eagerly listening. Kindly recount to me the secret of his birth as well as his activities. O highly blessed one, you are the knower of the scripture on salvation.

Sanandana said :

6. O Brāhmaṇa, listen. I shall narrate to you the origin of Śuka succinctly. O sage, on hearing it, a man becomes the knower of reality of the Brahman.

7. It is not through the ageing years or greying hairs, riches or kinsmen that the sages performed their Dharma (and gained esteem). A person who is Anūcāna (so well-versed in the Vedas and their Aṅgas that he can both repeat them and teach them) is a great man unto us.

Nārada said :

8. O bestower of honour, O Brāhmaṇa, how does a person become an Anūcāna. Please narrate to me that achievement. I am eager to hear of it.

Sanandana said :

9. O Nārada, listen. I shall recount to you the characteristics of an Anūcāna. On knowing them, a man becomes well conversant with the Vedas along with their Aṅgas (ancillary subjects.).

10. Śikṣā (the science dealing with laws of euphony, phonetics), Kalpa (treatise on rituals and ceremonials), Vyākaraṇa (Grammar), Nirukta (Etymology and Semantics), Jyotiṣa (Astronomy) and Chandas (Prosody)—the learned men know that these are the six ancillaries of the Veda.

11. The Ṛgveda, the Yajurveda, the Sāmaveda, and the Atharvaveda—these are the four Vedas mentioned while ascertaining Dharma.

12. The excellent Brāhmaṇa who learns the Vedas alongwith the Aṅgas, from his preceptor becomes an Anūcāna and not otherwise, even (by studying independently) through crores of books.

Nārada said :

13. Mention the characteristics of ancillaries as well as those of the Vedas in details. Among us, O bestower of honour, you are the greatest scholar of these (Vedas) alongwith their aṅgas.

Sanandana said :

14. O Brāhmaṇa, this unparalleled burden of problems has been placed on me by you. I shall, however, succinctly narrate the quintessence of these definitely.

15. Svara (Note or Accent) is glorified as the most important item in the Śikṣā by sages and Brāhmaṇas well-versed in the Vedas. I shall describe that to you. Listen.

16. In the authentic treatise of the Science of Svaras (notes), it is enjoined that the Svarāntaras (the type of the interval of the Svaras—notes) viz. Arcika, Gāthika and Sāmika[1] are to be employed for specific purposes.

17. The Svara with one interval is used in Ṛgveda mantras, the Svara with two intervals is used in the Gāthās (religious Verses) and the Svara with three intervals is used in the Sāman hymns. One should know that this much is the interval in regard to the notes in these).

18. Those who make use of the aṅgas of the Ṛk, Sāman, and Yajus in the Yajñas without the thorough knowledge of Śikṣā will be committing the blunder of Visvara (wrong intonation.).

19.* A mantra uttered with a defective accent or deficient in Svara and badly pronounced Varṇa (syllable) does not convey the proper meaning. It is like a Vāgvajra (thunderbolt in the form of words). It injures the house-holder (on whose behalf the Yajña is performed) just as the compound word Indraśatru (the Bahuvrihi compound was used instead of Genitive Tatpuruṣa) when there was the wrong utterance of Svara.[2]

20. In the treatises (of Śikṣā) the bases of pronunciation is the chest, throat and head. These are called Savanas or Sāmans with half the intervals.

21. Uras (chest) has seven Vivāras (expansions) so also the Kaṇṭha (throat) and the Śiras (the head). You are incapable of clearly understanding. Such is the rule regarding the Exposition.

22. The first Svara (viz. Ārcika) is to be used in chanting the Kaṭha (Kāṭhaka) Saṁhitā, the Saṁhitā called Taittira (i.e. the Taittiriya Saṁhitā of the Black Yajurveda), the Ṛgveda and Sāma-Veda Saṁhitās.

23. The Ṛgveda continues (i.e. is chanted) in the second (i.e. Gāthika) and the third (viz. Sāmika) Svaras as well. From the material point of view, the Svara is (classified as) Ucca (high pitched) Madhyama, (the middle one) and Saṅghāta (combined or a vowel with its consonant).

24. (Out of the seven Svaras) The Āhvarakas[3] use the third, first and Kruṣṭa (loud, sixth) Svaras, the chanters of the Taittiriya Saṁhitā use the four Svaras beginning from the second and ending with the fifth.

25. O great sage, the Sāma-singers use (in chanting) the first, second, third, fourth, the fifth Mandra and the sixth (Kruṣṭa).[4]

---

* Cf. Pāṇinīya Śikṣā v. 52. and Nāradīya śikṣā 1.1.5.

26. The second and first of these svaras are associated with Tāṇḍya-Brāhmaṇa* and its school Bhāllavi. These are the Svaras of the chanters of Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and the Vājasaniya—the Saṁhitā of the white Yajurveda.

27. These(Svaras)are especially laid down(for the above), although (all) Svaras are common to all the Vedas.

28.‡ I shall now explain to you the functions of the Svaras in the Sāma-Veda. The ancillary (viz. Sāma-veda Śikṣā) though brief is profound in meaning.

29. The characteristics of Tāna (the protracted tone or a key-tone in music), Rāga† (a musical mode or order of sounds), Svaras, Grāmas (Gamuts or scale in music) and Mūrchanās (or mūrchā a melody) which are sacred, sanctifying and meritorious, have been already[a] expounded to you.

30a. The education of the twice-born castes is characterised by the (study of) the Ṛgveda, Yajurveda and Sāmaveda.

30b-31a. Svaras are seven, grāmas are three and Mūrchanās are twentyone. Tānas are fortynine—all these constitute the svara-maṇḍala.

31b-32a. Ṣaḍja (Sā), Ṛṣabha (Re), Gandhāra (Ga), Madhyama (Ma), Pañcama (Pa), Dhaivata (Dha) and Niṣāda (Ni) is the seventh Svara.[c]

---

* Nāṇḍi-bhāllavinau. Out of this Nāṇḍi is an obvious misprint for Tāṇḍi—as in the Devanāgari—script ta and na are often mistaken for each other, Bhāllavi is the name of the school of that (Tāṇḍa) Brāhmaṇa, vide MW p. 754.

‡ After completing the general discussion about the use of svaras (Svara-sañcāra) in Vedas, the NP. deals with the Svara-Sañcāra in the Sāma-veda.

§ According to Bharata (Nāṭya-Śāstra) Bhairava, Kauśika, Hindola, Dīpaka, Śrī and Megha are the primary Rāgas. Other writers give different names. Each Rāga has "female consort" or a Rāgiṇī and their union gives rise to several musical modes.

 This is a gradual rise (crescendo) and fall in the volume of Svaras.

Quoted in Apte—Sk. Dict.

a. This is a misplaced quotation, for the description of this is not yet given. Many verses from this chapter are quotations from a common source (Nāradīya śikṣā) of the NP. and Nārada's Saṅgīta Makaranda.

b. It is hazardous for a translator to combine such lines as 30b & 31a as constituting one verse in the absence of MS evidence but such a combination gives the complete sense syntactically.

c. Cf. Bharata—NS (Nāṭya-Śāstra) 28.31.

32b. Grāmas (scales is Music) are said to be three, viz. Ṣaḍja, Madhyama and Gāndhāra.

33. Ṣaḍja is born of the earth (Bhū-loka), Madhyama from Bhuvar-loka (the ether, the atmosphere just above the earth) and Gandhāra from the heaven (or the firmament) —These are the three abodes of Grāmas.

34a. It is remembered (by ancients) that Grāmas and Rāgas are due to the particular (combinations of) Svaras.

34b-35a. In the case of Sāma-singers, twenty Tānas (protracted tones) are in the Madhyama-grāma, fourteen are in the Ṣaḍja-grāma and fifteen are in the Gandhāra (Grāma) (Thus 20+14+15=49 are distributed in three Grāmas).

35b-36a. The seven Mūrcchanās 'Modes' or regulated rise and fall) of the Devas are Nadi, Viśālā, Sumukhi, Citrā, Citravati, Mukhā and Bolā.

36b-37a. The seven Mūrcchanās of the Pitṛs are Āpyāyini, Viśvabhṛtā, Candrā, Hemā, Kapardini, Maitri and Bārhati.

37b-39. The seven Mūrchanās pertaining to sages (Ṛṣis) should be known as follows: Uttara-Mandrā in the Svara called Ṣaḍja, Abhirūhatā in Ṛṣabha, Aśvakrāntā in Gandhāra is remembered as the third Mūrcchanā, Sauvira verily in Madhyama (the Svara Ma,), Hṛṣikā in the Svara called Pañcama, the Mūrchanā called Uttarā should be known in Dhaivata and Rajani in the Svara Niṣāda.

40. The Gandharvas depend upon the seven Mūrcchanās of Devas. Undoubtedly the Yakṣas depend upon the seven Mūrcchanās of Pitṛs.

41-43a. The seven Mūrcchanās of sages are remembered as Laukika (worldly, popular) The Ṣaḍja note pleases Devas, the Ṛṣabha note pleases sages, the Gandhāra note pleases Pitṛs, the Madhyama note pleases Gandharvas, the Pañcama note pleases Devas, sages, and Pitṛs, the Niṣāda note pleases Yakṣas and the Dhaivata pleases the whole multitude of living.

43b. The good qualities of music are ten viz., the Guṇas (good qualities) such as : Rakta, Pūrṇa, Alaṁkṛta, Prasanna, Vyakta, Vikruṣṭa, Ślakṣṇa, Sama, Śukumāra and Madhura.

[Rakta (lovely, charming) : the harmonious mingling of the notes of the flute and the lute and (the voice of the singer) is called Rakta.

Pūrṇa (complete) : So called as it complements (Svara and Śruti (a division of the octavo) as well as the 'filling in' of the metre and the syllable.

Alaṅkṛta (Bedecked): Properly emanating from the regions of the heart, the head (i.e. the upper part of the palate) and the throat. i. e. lowering down or raising up the Svara from the throat region.

Prasanna (Easily intelligible): That which is free from inhibitions, choking and hesitation (confident, uninterrupted).

The Vyakta (clear) : That which correctly renders the following grammatical subtleties, viz., the Pada (the word), the meaning, the base, the alteration, the augment, the Kṛt and Taddhita suffixes, the compound, the root, the Nipāta (the exceptional and the irregular forms and particles), the preposition, the vowels, the gender, the gloss, the Vārttika (an explanatory rule)*, the meanings of the cases and the numbers.

The Vikruṣṭa (Distinct) : That which is uttered loudly with the clear pronunciation of words and syllables is called Vikruṣṭa.

The Ślakṣṇa (soft, bland): Accomplishment and presentation (of song) with rapid and quick accentuations (like ucca, nica, pluta and their combination), dalliance, beating of time, etc.

The Sama (the equanimous): The simultaneous applying together of Svaras in the proper place (in the rise and fall of Svaras.)

The Sukumāra (the gentle, tender) that which is accompanied by soft words, letters, notes and the cooling[5] sound is called Sukumāra.

The Madhura (sweet) that which is rich in the qualities of pleasing and jingling words and syllables occurring naturally is called Madhura.]

---

* It is a supplementary rule which explains the meaning of that which is said, of that which is left unsaid and of that which has been imperfectly said e.g. Kātyāyana's Vārttika on Pāṇini.

A (good) song is endowed with all these ten qualities.

In this context the following verses are cited:

44-45. There are fourteen defects[5] in music (song), viz., Śaṅkita (hesitant) Bhiṣaṇa (terrible), Bhita (frightened), Udghuṣṭa (pronounced loudly), Anunāsika (nasally produced) Kākasvara (shrill tone as that of a crow), Mūrdhagata (undue cerebralization) (or Ūrdhvagata—that has gone too high up), Sthānavivarjita,* Non-observance of the places of articulation), Visvara (Discordant), Virasa (unpleasant or disagreeable), Viśliṣṭa, (disjoined), Viṣamāhata (odd and non-sensical), Vyākula (Agitated or bewildered) and Tālahina (out of tune).

46. The preceptors wish for the quality of Sama ; the scholars wish for the quality of Padaccheda (i. e. Vyāpta mentioned above); women wish for the Madhura (sweet) quality and the other people wish for Vikruṣṭa (a loud song) with clear pronunciation of words or letters.

47-48. The Ṣaḍja note has the lustre of the petals of the lotus; the Ṛṣabha note, the reddish yellow colour like that of the parrot; Gāndhāra note is gold-coloured; the Madhyama note is white like the Kunda flower, the Pañcama note is of black colour; they know that Dhaivata is yellow in colour; and the Niṣāda has all the colours — these are the colours of the Svaras.

49-50. The Pañcama, the Madhyama and the Ṣaḍja—these notes are remembered as Brāhmaṇas. Both the Ṛṣabha and the Dhaivata notes are Kṣatriyas. The notes Gāndhāra and Niṣāda are partially Vaiśyas and partially Śūdras undoubtedly because they are fallen.

51. That scale of notes should be known as Ṣāḍja in which the Svara Ṛṣabha is devoid of Mūrchanā, Pañcama is combined with Dhaivata and falls in the Madhyama Rāga along with Niṣāda.

52. If the Pañcama note ceases, the Gāndhāra becomes the internal note, and the Ṛṣabha is accompanied by Niṣāda, know that Pañcama also like this (i.e. Ṣāḍja).

53. It is called Madhyama Grāma when Dhaivata is weak, Gāndhāra rules (i.e. becomes dominant) and the Niṣāda has Gatāgata (comes and goes).

54. It is called Ṣaḍja Grāma when Niṣāda is Iṣatspṛṣṭa (i.e. slightly touched or intoned); the Gāndhāra is predominant and the Dhaivata is tremulous.

55. It should be known as the Kaiśika (Rāga) based on Pañcama (Pa) and with proper support, where a low sweet tone (Kākali) is perceived accompanied by Āntara-Svara (internal note).

56. After associating Kaiśika through all the Svaras all round, if (it is commenced from) there is Nyāsa (fixation) in the Madhyama note, it is called Kaiśika Madhyama.

57. When Kākali is seen and there is the importance (predominance) of Pañcama, Kāśyapa calls that Kaiśika-rāga as originating from Madhyamagrāma.

58. The word Gandharva represents all the constituents or parts of musicology: Intelligent persons know that the letter Ga stands for vocal music, the letter Dha means playing on the musical instrument, and the letter va symbolizes the musical instruments.

59-60. [These verses give the correspondence between the notes of the flute and those of Sāma (singing):] What is the first note of the Sāma-singers is the Madhyama of the flute, what is the second (of Sāma) is remembered as Gāndhāra [of the flute] and the third is Ṛṣabha, the fourth is called Ṣaḍja while the fifth will be Dhaivata and the sixth should be known as Niṣāda while the seventh is Pañcama.

61. The peacock gives out the Ṣaḍja note and the bulls bellow the Ṛṣabha note; goats and sheep bleat the Ġāndhāra note; and the Krauñca bird (heron or curlew) chirps the Madhyama note.

62. During the (spring) season when flowers bloom, the cuckoo coos the Pañcama note. The horse neighs the Dhaivata note and the elephant trumpets the Niṣāda note.

63. The Ṣaḍja note originates from the throat; the Ṛṣabha note is remembered as one produced from the head (or the upper palate), the Gāndhāra note is a nasal one and the Maâhyama note originates from the cardiac region.

64. The Pañcama note originates from the cardiac region, the head and the throat. One should know that Dhaivata originates from the forehead and the Niṣāda is born from all the joints.

65. Ṣaḍja note is so called because it originates from six organs, viz. — the nose, the throat, the cardiac region, the palate, the tongue and the teeth.*

66. The wind originating from the umbilical region and striking against the throat and the head sounds like the bellowing of a bull. Hence it is called Ṛṣabha.

67. The wind originating from the umbilical region and striking against the throat and the head blows (as if) wafting sweet fragrance. For that reason the note is called Gāndhāra.

68. The wind originating from the umbilical region and striking against the thigh[6] and the heart comes back to the umbilical region. Stationed in the middle (of all the notes) the note is called Madhyama.

69. The wind originating from the umbilical region and striking against cardiac region, cavity of the heart, throat and the head produces the Pañcama note, since it originates from five places or organs.

70. Excepting Dhaivata and Niṣāda, all the other five notes are known as originating from five organs.

71. As the notes are found abiding in five places, it is maintained (as produced ?) in all places. The note sung by the Fire-god is Ṣaḍja and that sung by Brahmā is Ṛṣabha.

72. Gāndhāra was sung by Soma (the moon) and the Madhyama note by Viṣṇu. Understand that the Pañcama note was sung by you alone (i.e. Nārada).

73-75. The notes Dhaivata and Niṣāda were sung by Tumburu. It is said by the learned men that the deity of Ṣaḍja, the first note is Brahmā. The deity of Ṛṣabha is Hutāśana (the fire-god) since its lustre is warm and brilliant. When this note of Gāndhāra is presented, cows are satisfied. Hence it is so called. Undoubtedly on hearing this note, the cows stand still. The deity of the Pañcama note is Soma. It is remembered as Brahmarāṭ (Royal Brahman).

76-78. On attaining Grāma (?) its increase and decrease is like that of the moon. Since this note over-reaches all the notes

* Cf. Nārada Śikṣā. 1-57

previously originating, this note is called Dhaivata. Since all the other notes sit down (i.e. are submerged) the (last) note is called Niṣāda. It excels and dominates all the other notes, as its deity is Āditya (the Sun).

79. In the sphere of music there are two types of Viṇā (lute), viz. the Dāravi (wooden) and the Gātraviṇā. The Gātraviṇā is used for singing Sāmans. Listen to its characteristics. That in which the singers of Sāmans sing is called Gātraviṇā.

80-82. It is accompanied by the manifestation of the note; it is 'coloured' by the thumb and the other fingers. The hands should be placed controlled above the knees and kept together. (The student) should imitate the teacher and his mind should not be elsewhere. At the outset, the Praṇava is uttered and the (seven) Vyāhṛtis (utterances Bhūḥ, Bhuvaḥ, etc.).

83. The Sāvitri mantra is then chanted. Then only the regular song is begun. The sphere of Svaras must be fixed up after spreading out all the fingers.

84. One shall not touch the thumb with the (other) fingers nor the fingers with the thumb. The fingers shall not be kept separated from one another leaving much space in the middle. Nor should he touch it at its root.

85-86. He shall touch it always with the tip of the thumb at the middle joint. In order to differentiate the Mātrās, two Mātrās and the extended (span of time), the knower of the division shall point out two Mātrās by means of the fingers of the left hand, where three lines are seen, one shall specify the Siddhi (sandhi ?) therein.

87. (Where the lines are seen) shall be known as the Parvan (joint) and the remaining portion is called Antara. In the Sāmans one shall make the interval as much as that between the joints. In the Ṛks (Mantras of RV.)one shall make the interval as much as that between two gingelly seeds.(?)

88. The sensible man shall place the Svaras in the middle Parvans (joints) closely knit with one another. He shall not shake any of the limbs even slightly.

89-91. (Defective) The learned singer shall dust his hand with the earth-particles below (?) He shall remain steady, calm, and fearless and utter the syllables. He shall withdraw all his sense organs like the tortoise its limbs. His eyes shall be fixed and the mind concentrated. Just as the lightning is seen in the middle of the clouds, like a thread in a necklace of jewels, similarly should the padas be distinct just as the shearers of the hair pass the scissors over it silently. As he utters the letters (of the Mantra) he shall keep the nose held with the hand like (holding) the cow's ear.

92. Fixing the eye to the tip of the hands, he should ponder over the meaning of the holy scripture. He should duly express the sentence by means of the hand and mouth.

93. He shall conclude the letters in the same manner as he utters it. (No different system be introduced in the same mantra). And the beating of time should be synchronous with the song, nor should he tremble (?). [There should be no omissions or additions nor should he tremble]

94-96a. He must sing the Sāmans with the quality of Sama (smoothly) like the flying movement of the Śyena (falcon) in the air. Just as the path of the fish moving about in the water is not observed, just as the movement of the birds in the sky is not visible, so also the Śruti (a division in the octave) of the note (is not noticeable). Just as the clarified butter present in the curds, or the fire latent in the firewood is obtainable only with effort so also the Śruti is latent in the Svara.

96b-97a. He shall make the transit from one Svara to another, the joining of notes, not very intense (strained), or manifest. He shall make it even, gradual, its continuity being uninterrupted like the subtle and imperceptible change from the sunshine to shadow.

97b-98a. This verse gives six defects or mistakes in the 'Protraction' (Karṣaṇa)[7] of the tones and advises to avoid them. They are as follows: (4) The 'non-arrival' (anāgata) stage is before the beginning of the second note, the completion of the first svara is the atikrānta stage. The first note should not be 'pulled or protracted' in both the stages. He should not interrupt the first mātrā for this. It will be Viṣamāhata. He should not pass on to the next Svara, with tremulous note (as if trembling.) During the period of karsaṇa, the note should not be extended beyond three mātrās. He should give up the asthitānta. He should stabilise in the next Svara for a period of three mātrās only (not of two mātrās).

98b-99a. If a note swerves from its place of origin or goes far beyond its place of origin, the singers of Sāman call it Visvara (discordant) and the players on the Viṇā (lute) call it Virakta (unsymphonic).

99b-100a. For the purpose of practice, one shall adopt Druta Vṛtti (quick movement), for the performance one shall adopt the middle movement and for the purpose of instructing the disciples one shall adopt the slow movement.

100b-101a. In this way, the learned Brāhmaṇa who has mastered the treatise of Sāma-gāna (singing of Sāmans) according to the scientific method of study, should impart injunctions in the Śikṣā texts to pupils with the movement of his hands.

101b-103a. The place (of origin) of the kruṣṭa (Seventh or Fifth Svara) is in the head, of the first Svara (Ṣaḍja) in the forehead, of the second (Ṛṣabha) Svara in between the eye-brows, of the third (Gāndhāra) in both the ears, of the fourth (Madhyama) in the throat, and of the Mandra (Pañcama) in the tongue. And the place of Niṣāda called atisvara is located at the heart (chest cavity).

103-105. Kruṣṭa Svara (seventh and fifth) should be placed upon (and thus as if 'fixed') on the tip of the thumb. The place of the first svara is the thumb. The Gāndhāra is located in the index finger, the Ṛṣabha in the middle finger, the Ṣaḍja in the ring-finger and the Dhaivata in the small finger. The Niṣāda should be indicated below at the beginning of the small finger. As it is not completely distinct from the Mandra, it is called aparva (अपर्व); as it is not separately (audible and) grasped it is called asaṁjña (undesignated). And due to its continuity by nature ? (or non-relation with gender, number etc.) it is called Avyaya (indeclinable).

106-109a. When Mandra becomes lower it is called (Parisvāra Niṣāda). Deities live by (depend for their life on) the Kruṣṭa Svara and human beings by the first (Ṣaḍja), the animal world by the second (Ṛṣabha), Gandharvas and Apsaras by the third, the oviparous beings (like birds) and Pitṛs (manes) live by the fourth (Madhyama). Piśācas (goblins), Asuras and Rākṣasas subsist upon the Mandra while the (lower) mobile and immobile world lives upon the low Atisvara (Niṣāda). In this way all the created beings are sustained in life by the Svaras of the Sāman.

109b-110a. A person who is not an expert in the Śrutis (the divisions of the Octave) known as Diptā, Āyatā, Karuṇā, Mṛdu and Madhyamā (terms explained below) does not* deserve to be called a preceptor.

110b-111a. The Śruti of the five Svaras viz. Mandra (Pañcama) second, fourth, atisvara (sixth) and the third (Gāndhāra) is called Diptā while that of the seventh Svara is karuṇā.

111b-112a. The Śrutis known as Mṛdu, Madhyamā and Āyatā are in the second Svara. I shall now separately deal with their distinctive characteristics.

112b. When based on the third svara, it is the Āyatā Śruti of the second svara, while when it is based on the fourth svara (viparyaya), it is the Mṛdu Śruti of that Svara.

113a. When Śruti depends (entirely) on its own Svara and does not shift or change to another Svara it is the Madhyamā Śruti. It is after duly considering (and examining) these that the Sāma notes are to be applied (sung).

113b-115a. The Śruti which is established in the Kruṣṭa note ends up finally and settles on the Dvitiya. Ṛṣabha note is called Diptā but if it does so with Prathama (Ṣaḍja), it is regarded as Mṛdu (soft Śruti). It is also called Mṛdu śruti, if it finally settles on the Caturtha (Madhyama) svara, but if it does so with mandra svara it is called Diptā. The Śruti which may be settled or established on any svara at the time of completion of Sāma-singing, becomes Diptā.

115b-116a. After the completion of the note (Svara), Śrutis like Āyatā should not be used. Even after completing the note but before the end of the musical concert Śruti should not be used in between two Svaras. (A Śruti is to be used in pluta-prolongated Svara) but not when a short or a long syllable is to be sung. Nor where the note called Ghuṣa is sung.

* This single na in the text is to be taken with both the clauses.

116b-117a. Where there are two gatis (viz. 'ā', 'i' Bhāva and 'ā','u' Bhāva of palatal vowel i,) and the sandhi of the final syllable of a word with sibilants ś,ṣ and s—in these five 'places', the note is called ghuṭi. (Here no Śruti is allowed).

117b-118a. In Śrutis where the note (Svara) or the interval between svaras is not completed and the notes, viz. short, long and ghuṭa—are all devoid of Śrutis, Śruti is not to be sung. In this position the svaras by themselves act as Śrutis.

118b-119a. (In places other than Sāman) know that the Śruti called Diptā is in the Udātta (highly or acutely accented Svara.) Learned persons know that the Diptā Śruti is in the Svarita (mixed tone lying between high and low) tone. Mṛdu (soft) Śruti should be recognised in the Anudātta (the grave) accent or which is not raised or accented as Udātta) Svara. In the Gandharva method of singing (where Śrutis are absent) Svaras are to be used like Śrutis. The grandeur and sublimity of Śrutis lies in tones (svara).

119b-120a. The kinds of svaras are five—udātta, anudātta, svarita, pracaya (svarita followed by svarita) and Nighāta (svarita preceding pracaya is affected. This affected svarita is Nighāta).

120b-121a. Henceforth, I shall explain to you the three svaras connected with Ṛks (ārcika Svara). They are udātta (the acute accent, the highly accented svara), anudātta (the grave accent), and the third svara, svarita (mixed tone or accent lying between udātta and anudātta.)

121b-122a. If the svara which is called udātta is beyond svarita, that is called Pracaya by experts (in that science). There is no other variety of svara elsewhere.

122b-123a. The accent or Svara called svarita is remembered as of two kinds : (1) varṇa-svara and (2) atita-svara. In the same manner, a varṇa (a syllable) which requires a period one mātrā (mātṛka) to pronounce becomes long (of more than one mātrā) after uccarita (articulation).

123b-124a. That svara should be known of seven types by having a look at the desinence. What it is, where it is and how it is should be understood by its (actual) use in the word.

124b-125a. The seven notes should be applied (for hearing) to the right ear. This science (of Phonetics-Śikṣā) has been composed by ācāryas (learned preceptors) with a view to serve the interests of their sons and pupils.

125b. There is no tone (svara) louder than the Udātta and no tone lower than the low (Anudātta).

126-127a.* What is the position of svāra — the particular form of the svāra which came to be designated as Svara. The common (Sādhāraṇa) Svara between Udātta and Anudātta is known by the teachers of the Sikṣā Śāstra under the designation svāra.

127b-128a. In the Udātta are found Niṣāda and Gāndhāra and in the Anudātta, the svaras Ṛṣabha and Dhaivata and Ṣaḍja, Madhyama and Pañcama have svarita as their source.

128b-129a. That after which comes the sound 'k' and 'kh' as well as that which employs the sibilant sound called Jihvā-mūliya ≍ (viz. ≍k, ≍kh,) should be regarded as Mātrā. By its very nature it is kalā as well. (This should be applicable to the sounds upadhmāniya i.e. ≍ p, ≍ ph.)

129b-131a. There are seven Svāras: Jātya Kṣaipra, Abhinihita, Tairavyañjana, Tiro-virāma, Praśliṣṭa, and the seventh Apāda-vṛtta. Now I shall describe the separate, distinct characteristics of these. After defining them I shall give specific illustrations of these.

131b-132a. The syllable (or letter-akṣara) which is accompanied with -y- or-v- sound and becomes Svarita and has no Udātta svara in front of it (i.e. following it) is called the Jātya svāra.

132b-133a. When an Udātta (acutely accented) i or u has a Sandhi with an anudātta (grave accented) a- in the initial position of word and thus become svarita (a mixed tone between high and low tones) y or v, it should be regarded as the characteristic Kṣaipra Svāra.

* In Prātiśākhyas, the term Svāra is used for Svarita (the circumflex accent). They record the following seven varieties of Svāra : Kṣaipra Nitya, Pratihata, Abhinihata, Praśliṣṭa, Pada-vṛtta, and Tairo-vyañjana (All with slight difference in terminology are explained in the NP. below). Cf. Taittirīya Prātiśākhya XX. 1-7.

133b-134a. The Anudātta that comes after an Udātta e or o and gets disappeared (lost in previous -e or -o) is called abhinihita svāra.[8]

134b-135a. If in Chandas (Vedic literature), there be a Svarita vowel preceded by an Udātta that bahu-svāra (svarita that is optionally found everywhere) is called Tairavyañjana[9] (or rather Tairo-Vyañjana according to Prātiśākhyas).

135b-136a. When a Svarita vowel comes after Avagraha (separation of a compound word into its component elements as shown in the Vedic Pada pāṭha) and if the Avagaha be acute-accented (Udātta), it is called Tiro-virāma (or Tairo-virāma)[10] of the Prātiśākhyas).

136b-137a. Where an acute-accented (Udātta) i is seen combined with a grave-accented (Anudātta) i, regard it as Praślişţa Svara.

137b-138a. The Śāstric treatise gives the following characteristic of Padānta-vṛtta: If the vowel is acutely accented, and its combination with the previous Pada (word) becomes separate (For example: ka iṁ veda/ RV. VIII.33.7).

138b-140a. The illustration of Jātya[11] svāra is : sajātyena (RV.VIII.20.21). The Kṣaipra Svāra is in Śrutyagre (prob. a misprint). In te manvata (RV.IV. 1.16) is the Abhinihita svāra. The Tairavyañjana svāra is in ūtaye (i.e. u+ūtaye). In Viṣkaṣita (Viṣkabhita ?) there is Tirovirāma. The praślişţa svāra is in hi i govarṇa (?). The Pādavṛtta vowel is in ka iṁ veda, (RV. VIII.33.7).

These are the seven svāras.

140b-141a. With the exception of Jātya svaras, the syllable which follows upon an acute accented syllable is the characteristic of Svarita (the circumflex accent between the acute-udātta and the grave-anudātta accents).

141b-142a. If the above-mentioned four svāras are udātta or if they precede an anudātta, from the scientific point of view it creates vibrations (the wording of the text kaṁsaṁpuṁsphuti is confusing). The example of it is juhvògniḥ.

142b-143a. When the previous pada (word) ends in -i and is followed by -u the intelligent man should clearly understand it to be a short vibration (the larynx vibrating for a short while).

143b-144a. If a pada with two ukāras (u vowels) follows a pada (a word) ending in -i, one should know that there is a long vibration in -i. Here the example is Śāgdhūsū (some misprint and hence obscurity in the illustration).

144b-145a. It should be known that in the diphthongs (e, ai, o and au) there are three long vibrants (kampas). For example manyā yathā(?), na Indrābhyām. The rest are declared as short ones.

145b-146a. If there be any Anudātta affix after many Udāttas, it should be regarded as Śiva-Kampa (in the second and third Udātta) if the pratyaya is Udātta.

146b-147a. Where two (three, four) syllables are Udātta and they are followed by an Anudātta or Udātta, learned people know that the previous and the syllables preceding it are Udātta.

147b-148a. There is no reduplication of r or h. Nor are the second and fourth letters of different classes of consonants (i.e. kh -gh, th-dh- etc) geminated.

148b-149a. The fourth letter be combined with the third and the second with the first and the first, middle and end letters of a class (such as k, g, and ṅ) may be geminated.

149b-150a. If in a conjunct consonant, the non-final letter (e.g. k, kh, g, gh,) is followed by the nasal, then yama[12] of its own varṇas intervenes and becomes the same as the previous syllable.

150b-151a. Seeing the nasals (last letter of each of the five classes) conjoined with the sibilants ś, ṣ, and s- or with semi-vowels (y, v, r, and l), yama (sounds) recede like travellers on seeing high-waymen.

151b-152a. (When in Vedic recitation) the third and the fourth letter (of the five classes of consonants) is a conjunct, the pada is to begin from the fourth. If the second letter or the third letter is conjoined with -h, the latter word is to begin with -h.

152b-153a. The nasal (utterance) the (upadhmāniya (≍ p or ≍ ph) the phonetic element substituted for a visarga followed by p and ph and the jihvāmūliya (≍ k or ≍ kh) : the phonetic element into which a visarga is changed when followed by -k or -kh) seldom form a part of a word; it is not repeated (twice) in the word. If the previous syllable or letter be a conjunct with r or h, the following letter is doubled.

153b-154a. Where the conjunct has a circumflex accent (or the accent intervenes between udātta and anudātta or vice-versa), the svarita should be placed at the beginning of the next aṅga (parāṅga is the consonant which begins the next pada).

154b-155a. When after being separated from the conjunct the consonant that appears freed (and separate) from the next consecutive word, it should be regarded as pūrvāṅga. And the consonant which begins the next word is parāṅga.

155b-156a. The latter part (letter) of the conjunct (should be accented as it) is the main factor (a leader) of the conjunct (as that is a 'resting-place' of the svara). The previous member of the conjunct consonant is svarita (but should be pronounced without an accent.)

156b-157a. Anusvāra, end of the pada (word) affix, gemination (due to the repetition of the same letter at the beginning of the next word), the consonant r, and svara-bhakti (vowel-separation, insertion of a consonant (glide) sound in a conjunct with r or l e.g. Tryambakaṁ (yajāmahe) is pronounced as Triyambakam—all these are included under pūrvāṅga.

157b-158a. At the beginning of a word, or in the middle, in (pronouncing) conjunct consonants and avagraha, ya should be known as a geminated-ya (yy -). It is remembered that in other places it is simply a ya.

158b-159a. With the exception of the unseparated conjuncts of r and h in the initial and final positions in words and -ry -, other letters or syllables are not duplicated.

159b-c. A conjunct consonant is (metrically) guru (of two mātrās). A consonant conjoined with a nasal or a visarga are obviously guru. The rest are atomic (laghu- of one mātrā).

For example hri, goḥ. In this, the first is a conjunct consonant while the second is accompanied by a Visarga. The gurutva (heaviness) of a vowel followed by a conjunct consonant or a visarga is obvious.

160. The Udātta (acute accent) remains as acute (i.e. the acutely accented vowel remains as it is.). What is Svarita (circumflex accent) becomes anudātta (grave accent) in the body of the word. The anudātta vowel remains unchanged. The *pracaya type of accent becomes anudātta (accentless).

161. The (following) words (occurring in different mantras) such as Agniḥ, Sutaḥ, Mitram (a friend), Idam, Vayam, Ayā, Vahā, Priyam, Dūtam, Ghṛtam, Citta m and Abhi—are anudātta.

162. The (recitation of) Śruti starts with an unaccented syllable (anudātta vowel) in words like Akka (Arka?), Suta, Yajña, Kalaśa, Śata and Pavitra.

163. In words like Hāri, Varuṇa, Vareṇya, Dhārā and Puruṣa, the vowel with r is svarita (circumflex). In the word Nara, the vowel with r is always Svarita except in the case of Viśvānara which- na- is svarita.

164. In the two Mantras pertaining to Varuṇa: viz. ud uttamaṁ tvaṁ Varuṇa (RV. I. 24. 15) the Va of Varuṇa is svarita and not ru (despite the r-element).

In the Mantras (1) uru-dhārām araṁkṛtam (RV. VIII. 1. 10) and (2) uru dharesva dohate (misprint for uru-dhareva dohate RV. VIII. 93. 3), in the words dhārā dhā is svarita and not the syllable with r (An exception to the rule in v. 163.) In these examples the syllable whether of one mātrā (short) or two mātrās (long), the first half mātrā is udātta and the rest is anudātta.[13]

Where a dvi-svara (dissyllabic, containing two vowels) is used, the short vowel should be pronounced as long.

165. In the Kampa, ut-svarita and Abhigita (terms explained already) the short-vowel should be protracted. (As to the duration of a mātrā, according to one authority) a mātrā

* Pracaya is a specific feature or quality (Dharma) of the Anudātta accent, when a vowel, accented grave, is preceded by a Svarita (Circumflex accent and is followed by another grave-accented vowel. The grave accented vowels which are not followed by an acute or circumflex (accented) vowels are neither distinctly circumflex nor distinctly grave. They are uttered slightly like acute. e.g. Imam me Gaṅge Yamune Sarasvati (me, ti herein are uttered thus).

extends upto the twinkling of the eye while the others hold that the duration is that of a flash of lightning.

166. While it is opined by some others that duration of a mātrā is the time required to pronounce the vowel ṛ (the reading ṛksvara is a bit confusing as literally it means 'a vowel in a ṚK-mantra').

167. A compound may be dissolved but the members of the compound should retain their original form in the Saṁhitā. For that initial syllable[14] (?) that Svara is known as the end of the member of the compound.

168a*. (Everywhere the words putra, mitra, sakhi, ahi, Śatakratu, Āditya, Viprajātaveda. Satpati, Gopati, Vṛtrahā, samudra deserve to be dissolved (when members of a compound).

In cases of svarayupuvo (?) Devayavaḥ (Devayuvaḥ), Aritam (Aratim?), Devatātape (? Devatātaye), Cikitiḥ, dha Caiva(?), the learned persons do not dissolve the compound.

168b-169a. According to my view four vivṛtis (rather vivṛtti—separation of two vowels which were euphonically combined into one) should be known according to the order of the letters. Listen to their names from me.

169b-170. When the first pada has a short vowel which is followed by a long vowel (like a calf followed by the mother cow), the Vivṛtti is called Vatsānusṛtā, but the vivṛtti in which the previous pada ends in a long vowel followed by a short vowel in the latter pada, is called Vatsānusāriṇi. When vowels in both the padas are short, it is called Pākavati, while vowels in both the Padas are long, that vivṛtti is called pipilikā.

* The text gives the above portion in brackets. Hence this matter is bracketted here. It is included under v. no. 168, although the printed text gives it no number.

 168b ff : These verses describe the pause (technically called Virāma in Prātiśākhya works) which is to be taken (at the end of the word or at the end of the first member of the compound (which is shown split up in the Padapāṭha) or inside a word or at the end of the word or at the end of a vowel when it is followed by another vowel. The Taittirīya Prātiśākhya (XXII. 13) gives four kinds of such pauses : (1) Ṛg-virāma—pause at the end of a foot or a verse and the duration of the pause in three mātrās. (2) Pada-virāma pause of two mātrās between two words and e.g. iṣe tvā ūrje tvā. (3) A pause of one mātrā between two words the preceding one ending in a vowel, and the following one beginning with a vowel but the vowels are not euphonically combined e.g. sa idhānaḥ. (4) A pause of half a mātrā between two vowels inside a word e.g. dra-ugam.

The difference in time or duration between these vivṛttis is of one mātrā.*

171. According to some other teachers, the duration between these two is half, while according to others it is just atomic (aṇumātrikam).

172. When m (makāra) is followed by affixes beginning with the consonant r, ś, ṣ, and s, the m is changed into anusvāra. If followed by -y, -v- (p-v- in the print of text is wrong) and l-, it becomes para-savarṇa, while before sparśa varṇa contact consonants viz. ka-varga, ca-varga, ta-varga etc., it is changed to the last (nasalised) consonant.

173. When the preceding word ends in -n and is followed by a vowel beginning the next word, the vowel preceding -n in the previous word is coloured (affected and changed into nasalized pronunciation) and hence it is called 'coloured' rakta (e. g. mahān asi mahā̃ ३ asi).

174. If the preceding word ends in -n and is followed by y-, v- and h- (in the following word,) half the mātrā of the vowel preceding -n is slightly (atom-like) coloured (i.e. nasalised).

175. If the previous word ends in a conjunct of n and is followed by another word it is changed into four forms. Sometimes it becomes r (repha), sometimes it colours (slightly nasalises) the syllable, sometimes it is dropped and sometimes it becomes an anusvāra.

176. The colour (raṅga) is emanated from the heart and resembles the sound produced by a bell-metal. It is soft and of two mātrās in duration, as illustrated in the pronunciation of dadhvān. (In other words, raṅga is the nasalisation of a vowel)

---

* Some Śikṣā treatises say that the duration between these different Vivṛttis should be one mātrā, one half mātrā, three-fourth mātrā and one fourth mātrā respectively. But the duration between two words of a compound-word split up in the Pada-pāṭha should be one mātrā.

177. Just as a woman from Saurāṣṭra pronounces (the nasalized vowel in) Arñ, the same way raṅga of nasalized vowel be produced.[15] This is my opinion, O Nārada.

178. The four classes of words [viz. Nāma (substantives), Ākhyāta (verbs), Upasarga (prepositions) and Nipāta (particles)] end in the ten syllables viz. g, ḍ, d, b, ṅ, ṇ, n, m, ś, and s. These are declared as word endings.

179. The vowel (accent) may be acute, grave or circumflex, consonants have to follow the svara (they have no independent accentual status.)

180. Authoritative preceptors have declared the prominence of only three accents of svaras. Consonants are like beads while vowels are the thread (which weaves and holds them together).

181. Just as a powerful monarch snatches away (and annexes) the kingdom of a weak king, similarly the (accented) vowel, being powerful, takes possession of the weak consonants.

182. O-bhāva (i.e. O,-u-bhāva in the NP is a misprint), vivṛtti, ś, ṣ, s, r, (repha) and the special pronunciation of the Visarga before k-, kh- and p-, ph- (specially known as jihvā-mūliya and upadhmāniya. These eight are the transformations of sibilants.

183. The interval between two vowels placed near each other in Saṁhitā[16] should be regarded as visarga or is changed to a palatal.

184. If in a penultimate diphthong (like e, o, ai and au) y or v is dropped, there is the consonantal vivṛtti, विवृत्ति and the pratisaṁhitā of vowels.

185. Where the pause is on a sibilant (and under exceptional cases) there is -v- in the Sandhi (Saṁbhāvaḥ ?), that vivṛtti or hiatus should be called vowel-hiatus (svara-vivṛtti).

186. If the vowel o of the previous pada is to be linked up (prasandhāna[17]), then the next pada begins with ṛ (e. g. vāyo ṛ-). And this 'link up' should be regarded as vowel-ending. What is different from this is the 'link-up' (Prasandhāna) of sibilants.

187-188. If the first or the last letter of a class (e. g. t-, n- of the dental class) are at the end of a pada and is followed by sibilants, ś, ṣ and s, it is changed to the second position. When they are combined with sibilants as the second member of the conjunct, the first member of the conjunct consonant, even if it be the first letter(like t, k, p) of a class is to be shown (pronounced) as the second letter (such as th, kh, ph) but should not be recognised or represented as actually the second letter e. g. Mat-sya, K-sura, Ap-saras (their pronunciation will have some aspiratory tinge like th, kh, or ph but for all purposes they are t, k, and p).

189. In ordinary metrics, to understand the metre, etc. of a verse (śloka) there are three causes: (1) Chandomāna, (2) Vṛtta (the metre) and (3) the end of the pāda (Pādānta). But Vedic mantras (Ṛcs) have been composed in their own respective metres (like Gāyatri, Jagati, Triṣṭubh) ; the metrical feet of ordinary metres are governed by the number of letters and their being of one or two mātrās.

190. The r-element present in the vowel ṛ or in Svarabhakti should be indicated as a separate syllable (for calculation of mātrās or Akṣaras. But in Svarabhakti the letter (without the repha, -r- element) should be calculated alongwith the affix.

191. In the letter ṝ, the consonantal r is distinctly apprehended and its nature as a vowel (vowel form) is clearly perceived. If the r is not conjoined with a sibilant, know it to be laghu (short, of one mātrā only).

192. If the vowel ṝ, is combined with a sibilant and is compressed[18] in pronunciation, the syllable should be regarded as a guru (heavy i.e. of two mātrās). Here the illustration is (the form) Tṛcam. Here ṛ is short.

193. There is no doubt that in the following five instances, the (vowel) ṛ is short (the illustrations are: Ṛṣabha, Gṛhita, Bṛhaspati, Pṛthivi and Nir-ṛti).

194. In case of words with conjuncts beginning with ś, ṣ, s, h, and r in the initial position, there is internal svarabhakti (in the same word without insertion of i, or u as a glide), when it is being conjoined with another word.

195. Svarabhakti is of two types—one characterised by ṝ, the vowel and the other by r, the consonant. These are known as Svarodā and Vyañjanodā (respectively) by contemplative grammarians.

196. The learned ones know that the svarabhakti in the case of sibilants (ś, ṣ, and s) is (vowel-born) svarodayā and open (vivṛta), while that with h is vyañjanodayā (consonant-born) and closed (saṁvṛta).

197. A person resorting to svarabhakti should avoid three defects viz. Svarabhak ti with i, u and a faulty (pronunciation).

198. The following syllables are not regarded as Laghu (short, of the duration of one Mātrā) : 1. That which is followed by a conjunct consonant; (2) or which is followed by ch; (3) or is combined with a Visarga; (4) or which possesses two mātrās (=is long) or (5) is at the end of a foot (word) or (6) be combined with an Anusvāra or (7) ends in ghuṭ (the first five case affixes).

199. The metre (viz. Āryā) whose first and third foot consists of twelve mātrās, the second contains eighteen and the last consists of fifteen mātrās only. This characteristic has been spoken of (the Āryā). That (metre) which is different from this is Vipulā.

200. If a syllable is short (laghu) and if it is not followed by a conjunct consonant, it is still laghu (of one mātrā only). If a short (vowelled) syllable is followed by a conjunct consonant or if it itself is long, it should be regarded as guru (heavy or long of two mātrās).

201-202a. Where Vivṛtti is found in front of the vowel, it should be regarded as a guru vowel, there is no (prevalence of) Kṣaipra (or kṣipra-sandhi)[19].

202b-203. There are eight kinds or types of svaras of a pada: Antodātta, Ādyudātta, Udātta, Anudātta, Nica-Svarita, Madhyodātta, Svarita, Dvirudātta. These are the eight designations of those padas.

204. (Now follow the illustrations of the above Padas);

(1) Agnir vṛtrāṇe—(RV. VI. 16. 34). Here Agniḥ is Antodātta.

(2) Somaḥ pavate (RV. IX. 96. 5 also VS. 7. 21). Here Soma is Ādyudātta.

(3) Pra vo yahvam (RV. I. 36. 1). In this pra is udātta while vaḥ is Anudātta.

(4) (Balaṁ nyubjam) Vīryam (Sāma Veda I. 95). Here Viryam is Nica-svarita.

(5) Vidhema haviṣā (AV. I. 31. 1). Here Haviṣā is Madhyodātta.

(6) Bhūr, Bhuvaḥ, Svar-(Ait. Br. 5. 31.4. etc.). Here svaḥ is svarita.

(7) Vanaspatiḥ (AV. XII. 3. 15). Here both va and spa are Udātta. This is an instance of Dvirudātta.

(8) Tāmyat (?). This is Madhyodâtta. Nipātas are Anudâtta. In prepositions, Svarita follows the initial vowel. There are two Anudāttas in Ākhyātas (conjugations ?). The dhārya letter after the svarita e.g. nihotā satsi. Here Satsi is a dhārya letter, as it follows the svarita in o tā which are the *pracaya sthānas. There is the previous Svarita, becomes toned down to a grave accent.

205. A wise reciter should tone down the svara to a grave accent wherever pracaya is seen. Where there is merely a soft circumflex accent, there is no need to tone it down.

206. The duty of a preceptor is of five types—Mukha (mouth, Nyāsa, Karaṇa. Pratijñā and Uccāraṇa. It is said here that utterance with a vow (sapratijña uccāraṇa) or positive vocal utterance is creditable.

Those (castes) to whom the science of Śikṣā is not available (or who are not eligible for the same), the affirmative assertion (backed by a tradition of gurus) is to be resorted to. For Karaṇa (phonetic treatise) is of the form of the affirmative teachings (of traditional gurus).

207. O Nārada! You, Tumburu, Vasiṣṭha, Viśvāvasu and other Gandharvas are not able to comprehend the entire lore of Sāma-singing due to the niceties and subtleties of the Svara-śāstra.

208. You should always take care of your gastric fire (i.e. digestive capacity). Take in wholesome (?) food which contributes to it). When food is digested, one should wake up at dawn and meditate on the Brahman.

209. It is desired (prescribed) that after autumnal equinox, to vernal equinox, one should get up early at dawn for the study (and recitation of the Vedas).

---

* Vide note on Pracaya. p. 623.

210. Getting up early in the morning, one should silently chew the tooth-brush twig of (any of) the following trees: Mango, Palāśa (Butea frondosa), Bilva (Aegle Marmelos), Apāmārga (Achyranthes Aspera), Śirīṣa (Acacia Sirissa).

211. The following trees too are holy: Khadira, Kadamba, Karavīra, and Karañja. All thorny and milk-exuding trees are holy and conducive to fame.

212. By using these for the purification of the mouth, sweetness in tone and subtlety of tone in generated. He is able to utter every syllable clearly and distinctly as recognised by the ancient teacher Audavati (a misprint in the text for Audavraji—the ancient sage and scholar of Vedic grammar, who revised the original text of the Ṛk-tantra-Prātiśākhya of the Sāma Veda).

213. The student should always take in Triphalā (the three Myrobalans) along with salt. This increases digestive power and intellect, heightens the clarity of tones and distinctness in the utterance of letters (syllables).

214. After performing the necessary morning duties (like brushing the teeth, taking bath, which is necessary for the care of the gastric fire, he should purify himself by taking in honey (Dhūma in the printed text is probably a misprint for Madhu) and ghee, and then start the recitation.

215. It is the general rule in all branches of the Veda that one should start recitation in a low tone. After reciting seven Mantras in a low tone, one should then utter in the desirable (or prescribed) tone.

216. At dawn, one should not strain his voice as would obstruct the normal breathing. For such obstructions in breathing cause wrong intonation (Vaisvarya). Not merely that, it certainly spoils the sweetness of vowels and consonants.

217. Just as there is no absolvement to a person eating forbidden food coming from an evil source, as in the case of saving the life of a person (bitten by a poisonous serpent) from the poison of the venomous serpent in the form of the sin of wrong pronunciation in this case), similarly a person who imbibes the fruitless (lit. burnt) teaching (of Vedas etc.) with wrong pronunciation, accentuation etc., of syllables from a bad (incompetent) teacher (Ku-tirtha) cannot escape the sin of distorted pronunciation, etc. learnt from that sinful teacher (like serpent-poison spread within the body).

218. The Vedas, coming from (i.e. taught by) a good teacher well-rehearsed and well-established in good intonation—when orally recited shine beautifully.

219. A person with frightful appearance, protruding lips, pronouncing all syllables through the nose or with a choked voice or tongue-tied (due to difficulty in the movements of the tongue) is not eligible to utter Mantras.

220. A person exercising control over his mind and one who has concentrated it and whose teeth and lips are shapely, becomes pure after performing his bath, avoids singing (or sing-song manner) should pronounce the syllables of the Mantras (clearly).

221. The following five types of persons cannot grasp a new lore:—A fierce person, a stubborn or arrogant one, an idle person, a sick person and one with unsteady (scattered) mind.

222. One should acquire learning slowly, should hoard wealth slowly (i.e. saving even small amounts); one should climb a mountain slowly (by degrees); one should travel on foot slowly (not more than a Yojana at a stretch).

223. An ant walking slowly and steadily covers even a thousand Yojanas. But Garuḍa, if he does not move at all, cannot cover the distance of even a single foot.

224. A (person whose) speech is affected by sins (or defects) does not deserve to utter the text of the Vedas just as a clever (intelligent) beautiful maiden does not deserve to hold a conversation with a deaf person.

225. He who recites the Vedas in a low mumbling voice as though he is afraid, remains always in doubt about thousands of its forms.

226. Studies carried on with the help of books only and not under (i. e. near) a preceptor, do not shine in the assembly of learned men like a woman impregnated (out of wedlock) by a paramour (from point of social status).

227. Having observed how even a heap of collyrium disappears (by its daily use) and how ant-hills become accumulated in a high, huge heaps (by slow but continuous additions of particles of earth by ants), one must utilise every day by engaging one's self in religious gifts, studies and religious acts.

228. That a very big ant-hill is built up by insects (ants) with very small particles of earth is not due to the (immense) physical power (of the ants). Sheer hard work is its cause.

229. If a lore is studied (repeatedly) for thousands of times and taught to pupils for hundreds of times, it (automatically) comes to the tip of the tongue like water flowing from a higher level to a lower level.

230. Just as horses of noble breed go to sleep for the half part of half the night (i.e. for three hours only), similarly sleep does not (nay should not) occupy the eyes of students for a long period.

231. A student should not be late for studies by spending a long time for his meals. Nor should he be enmeshed in temptations about women. A person desirous of mastering a lore should traverse (fig. study) long and fast like eagles and swans flying over seas.

232. A person who is afraid of (i.e. does not mix with) crowds of men and shuns the formation of company of friends as if it were a hell, and protects himself against association with women as if they were ogresses—only such a person attains mastery over learning.

233. Dishonest persons do not get wealth (or learning); nor do cowards or persons whose heads are swollen with pride; nor can people afraid of public criticism or who put off their work (out of procrastination) can earn money or learn a lore.

234. Just as a person digging with a spade or pick-axe (reaches the water-level in the bowels of the earth and) gets water, so, a student, bent on rendering service to the teacher, obtains learning possessed by the teacher.

235. Learning can be obtained either by rendering service to the teacher or by paying sumptuous amount of money (as the fee) or by exchange of one type of lore for another (by imparting one's expertise in a particular field for learning the special technique of another field). Otherwise learning cannot be mastered.

236. Even if one masters a lore by dint of his intellectual gifts, even without serving a teacher, it does not yield fruit to him like a barren young woman.

237. O Nārada! In this way, I have briefly indicated to you the treatise on Śikṣā by just pointing out to its direction. By understanding this first accessory to the Veda, one becomes eligible to be absorbed in the Brahman.

CHAPTER FIFTY

1. It is not understood why Niṣāda (Atisvāra) is omitted. Cf. Tait. Prātiśākhya XXIII. 12.

2. Ārcika (pertaining to Ṛks), Gāthika (pertaining to Gāthās) and Sāmika (pertaining to Sâma-singing).

3. This refers to the wrong pronunciation of Indra-Śatru in svāhendra-śatrur vardhasva (TS. II. 5.2.1), by vṛtra's father.

4. N. of a school, Taittirīya Prātiśākhya —MW, p. 163.

5. Kuharaṇa also means indistinct pronunciation in low tone. Cf. Naradīya Śikṣā I 3.11-12.

6. Probably a misprint for urasi (on the chest)

7. Cf Nāradīya śikṣā I.7.19.

8. Abhinihita is a sandhi or euphonic combination in which the vowel a, as a first or second member, is absorbed into the other member. e.g. rathebhyaḥ+agne=rathebhyo'gne or dāśuṣe+agne=dāśuṣe'gne. Here a- of agni is absorbed in the preceding -o and -e. —A Dict. of Sk. grammar, p. 34.
Here the term is used with reference to the absorbed vowel. -a.

9. Here the definition in the NP does not explain why Vyañjanā is associated with this vowel. The fact is that this is a kind of svarita or circumflex-accented vowel which follows the acute-accented vowel, with the intervention of a consonant between the acute-accented vowel and the circumflex vowel which (vowel) was originally grave, e.g. iḍe, havye. Here the vowel—e is a Tairo-vyañjana-svarita. cf. Svaro vyañjana-yutas tairo-vyanjanaḥ—Vājasaneyi Prātiśākhya I. 117.

10. Tairo-virāma is a kind of svarita, a vowel with a circumflex accent which follows an acute-accented vowel characterised by an Avagraha, i.e. coming at the end of the first member of compound e.g. gopatāviti go'patau. Here the vowel a of pa which follows the (') avagraha is called Tairo-virāma-svarita.—A Dict. of Sk. gram, p. 178.

11. Jātya is a variety of svarita or circumflex accent, e.g. svaḥ nyak. Cf. Ṛk Prātiśākhya IV.4.

12. yama is a twin letter available in pronunciation before a nasal letter and similar to it, when the nasal consonant is preceded by any one of the four consonants of the five classes. The S. K. on Pāṇ. VIII.1.1 explains it as a transitional sound intervening between a non-nasal and the following nasal as a counterpart of the non-nasal. e.g. Aggniḥ, ghghnanti, cakhkhnatuḥ,

13. Pan. I. 2.32 S.K. explains āditaḥ=the first half of the mātrā should be understood as Udātta and the latter half as Anudātta.

14. Yettikṣarādikaraṇam is a bit obscure.

15. Cf. Pāṇiniya Śikṣā, V. No. 26

16. Cf. Saṁhitāyāṁ yat svarayor antaraṁ tad vivṛtti-saṁjñaṁ syāt—Uvvaṭa on Śaunaka's Ṛk-prātiśākhya II.1 This interval is one mātrā according to the Taittirīya Prātiśākhya XXII. 13 but is of only one half Mātrā according to Ṛk. Tantra-35.

17. Prasandhāna—this term means repeating a word in the krama-pāṭha and joining it with the following word e.g. RV.I. 1 to be recited thus: iḷe purohitam, purohitam yajñasya. But in this verse, "joining or linking up" is implied.

18. When in pronunciation of vowels and consonants a fault is caused by the compression or contraction of the place of utterance, it is called Pīḍana cf. vyañjanānām atiprayatnenoccāraṇam pīḍanam.

Ṛk-Prātiśākhya XIV.5

19. According to Prātiśākhyas, a euphonic combination of the vowel i, u, ṛ, ḷ, with a following dissimilar vowel. The name kṣipra (quick, short) is given to this Sandhi as the vowel, short or long which is turned into a consonant, becomes very short.

CHAPTER FIFTYONE

The Treatise on Rituals (Kalpa) [1]

1. O leading sage, henceforth I shall recount to you the treatise on rituals, on understanding which a man becomes efficient in holy rites.

2. There are five Kalpas, viz., (1) Nakṣatra Kalpa (i.e. Kalpa pertaining to the constellations), (2) Veda Kalpa, (3) Saṁhitā Kalpa, (4) the fourth Kalpa is that of Āṅgiras and the (5) fifth one is Śānti Kalpa.

3. The narration precisely and in detail of the presiding deities of the constellations is indicated in the Nakṣatra Kalpa. The same thing should be known here also.

4. O leading sage, the injunction regarding the Ṛks etc. for the purpose of the achievement of the Puruṣārthas, viz. virtue, wealth, love and liberation, has been mentioned in detail in the Veda Kalpa.

5. The sages (seers of the mantras), the metres and the deities of the Sūkta- mantras have been specified in the Saṁhitā Kalpa, by the sages who have seen the Reality.

6. In the Āṅgirasa Kalpa the ṣaṭkarmans[2] have been specified by the self-born deity (Brahmā) by way of enjoining black magic and spells.

7. O excellent sage, the modes of subduing the evil portents of divine, earthly and atmospheric origin are separately mentioned in the Śānti Kalpa.

8. These characteristics are succinctly mentioned in the context of defining Kalpa. The special characteristics of these are separate in other Śākhās or *Branches.

9. Since all these are of utility in the Gṛhya Kalpa (i.e. the Kalpa pertaining to the duties of a householder), I shall recount them to you, O excellent Brāhmaṇa. Listen attentively.

---

* Śaṅkha in the NP. is probably a misprint for Śākhā as 'the conch-shell' is inexplicable in this context.

10. The Oṁkāra (the syllable Om) and the word Atha—these two words formerly pierced through the throat of god Brahmā and came out (were uttered). Hence these two are auspicious ones.

11. He who has completed the rites mentioned and wishes to do the subsequent ones, shall utter the word Atha. It is sought for the purpose of endless benefits.

12. Kuśa grass which is spread (in a particular way) is extolled for the rite of sprinkling water (in the prescribed way) round the fire. In the desired holy rite, the number (of kuśa grass-blades) should not be less or more, lest it should be fruitless.

13. The rite of Parisamūhana is enjoined as a preventive action against worms, germs, insects, etc. that crawl and move about on the surface of the Earth.

14. O Brāhmaṇa, the three (parallel) lines that are enjoined, should be made equal. It has been laid down that they should not be made smaller or larger.

15. O Nārada, the fat of the demons Madhu and Kaiṭabha has spread over the Earth. So, it should be smeared over the cowdung.

16. It has been mentioned that the cowdung of certain types of cows should not be used in the holy rite of Yajña—viz. the barren cow, the wicked or defiled cow, the cow with afflicted limbs and the cow whose calf is dead.

17. O Brāhmaṇa, the rite of Proddharaṇa (i.e. sprinkling of water upwards) is intended for the purpose of eradicating such terrible beings as moths, etc. that always roam about in the atmosphere.

18. One should scrape or scratch the ground with the Sruvā (sacrificial ladle or spoon) or the Kuśa grass. It has been enjoined by Brahmā for the achievement of *Asthikaṇṭaka (bones and thorns?)

---

* NP. reads : asthi-Kaṇṭaka-siddhyartham. Hence this strange translation. I suggest °Śuddhyartham for °siddhyartham, as the emendation. The emendation will mean : "For the purification of bones, thorns etc." In the Devanāgari script, such slips (si- for śu-) are possible.

19. The waters represent all the groups of Devas and Manes (Pitṛs). O Brāhmaṇa, hence the sprinkling (the altar) with water has been laid down by sages who are experts in injunctions.

20. It is mentioned that the sacrificial fire should be brought by women endowed with Saubhāgya (good fortune) (i.e. woman having her husband and sons alive) in an auspicious earthen pot. The fire should be placed in the earthen pot sprinkled with water.

21. On observing the wastage (i.e. disappearance by being stolen away by demons) of the nectar, the fire latent in the sacrificial twigs has been placed on the altar by Brahmā and all other deities (for its protection).

22. O Nārada, Dānavas and others are standing (in readiness to create trouble) to the south of the Yajña. For the sake of protection from them, one should establish god Brahmā in that direction.

23. The vessels (intended for consecration and cooking) and all other vessels must be placed in the north; the Yajamāna (the householder on whose behalf the Yajña is being performed) sits to the West. O Nārada, all the Brāhmaṇas sit to the east.

24. The maxim (or situation) is that whether in playing dice, business transactions or performance of sacrifice, if the performer be unconcerned or has an indifferent attitude, that activity goes to ruin.

25. The Brahmā and the Ācārya must be appointed from one's own Śākhā (branch of Veda) in the course of the rite of Yajña. There is no restriction in the case of the Ṛtviks. They should be invited and honoured according to availability.

26. The two Pavitras (the Kuśa grass twisted into a ring like loop with a tail) must be three Aṅgulas in length. The Prokṣiṇi (the vessel containing the holy water) must be four Aṅgulas in length. The Ājyasthāli (the vessel holding ghee) shall be three Aṅgulas in length and the Carusthāli (the vessel in which the Caru i.e. food offering is kept) must be six Aṅgulas in length.

27. The Upayamana (the Kuśa grass used to place down fire) shall be two Aṅgulas long; the Sammārjana (that used for sweeping) shall be one Aṅgula in length. The Sruvā (sacrificial ladle) is enjoined to be six Aṅgulas long and Srucā (sacrificial spoon) is said to be three and a half Aṅgulas long.

28. The sacrificial twigs are a span in length, the Pūrṇapātra (vessel filled with water) is six Aṅgulas in length. The Praṇitā vessel eight Aṅgulas in length is placed to the north of the Prokṣiṇi vessel.

29. Whatever sacred water is there in the world as rivers and oceans, is present in the Praṇitā vessel. Hence it should be filled with water.

30. O Brāhmaṇa, the Vedikā (sacrificial altar) is said to be naked and devoid of garments (otherwise). Hence a wise man shall clothe it by means of the Darbha grass.

31. The Pavitra consists of three cutters, viz. the thunderbolt of Indra; the discus of Viṣṇu and the trident of Vāmadeva in the form of the Darbhas.

32. The sprinkling must be done from the water taken from the Praṇitā vessel. Thereby the holy rite becomes the yielder of great merit. It is glorified as very sacred.

33. The Ājyasthālī (the vessel holding ghee) shall be made with a Pala weight of metal. The earthen pot shaped by the potter's wheel is remembered to be demoniac (in character).

34-38. The vessel Sthāli, etc. shaped by means of the hand is said to be divine. The auspiciousness or inauspiciousness of all rites depends on Sruvā. In order to make it sanctified it is warmed in the fire. When it is held at the tip there is no widowhood (?), if it is held in the middle deficiency of progeny (or death of children is the result); if it is held at the root, the Hotṛ dies. Hence it should be held after considering all this. The following six deities resort to the Sruvā at the interval of each aṅgula viz:- Agni, the sun, the moon. Viriñci (i.e. Brahmā), the wind god and Yama. Agni may lead to the destruction of objects of pleasure; the sun may cause sickness; the moon does not yield any special result; Viriñci is the bestower of all desired objects; the wind god is said to be the bestower of prosperity and Yama is considered to be the bestower of death. (Hence the sruva should be held at the fourth or fifth aṅgula).

39. The Sammārjana and the Upayamana are to be made with Kuśa blades of grass. The former one may be of all* the branches (?) and the other of five branches (or blades of darbha grass).

40. In order to make Sruvā and Sruk, it should be known that the trees, Śriparṇi, Śami, Khadira Vikaṅkaṭa and Palāśa are used.

41. A Śruvā, a Hasta (24 Aṅgulas or about 18 inches) long is commendable, and a Sruk of thirteen Aṅgulas is also commendable. This is laid down for the Brāhmaṇas. In the case of others, it should be one Aṅgula shorter.

42. O Nārada, it is laid down (in Smṛtis) that the sprinkling of the vessels is for the destruction of defects (defilement) due to the glances of Śūdras, the fallen ones and donkeys and other beings (at them).

43. If the vessel is not filled up completely, there may be a loop hole in the Yajña. O Brāhmaṇa, if it is filled (completely), the Yajña becomes full.

44. Learned persons have known that eight muṣṭis (a particular measure of capacity-'handfuls') make a Kuñci (kiñcit is a misprint), four kuñcis make a Puṣkala[2] (a particular measure of capacity), four Puṣkalas make one Pūrṇa-pātra (a full vessel).

45. When the time for Homa has arrived, one shall not offer any seat anywhere. If it is offered, the fire may be excited and may give a terrible curse.

46. Two Āghāras (sprinklings or oblations of ghee) are said to be the two nostrils, the two oblations of Ājya, two eyes, this is said to be the face of Prajāpati and the waist is (formed out) of the Vyāhṛtis.

47. The head, the hands and the feet—these five are said to be of the homa called Pañca-vāruṇa (?). O Brāhmaṇa, what is Sviṣṭakṛta (offering belonging to Agni) and the Pūrṇāhuti (the final offering) are the two ears.

48-51. The physical body of the Fire god should be

‡ Probably the reading should have been sapta instead sarva as seven darbha blades are used for the former.

conceived as follows*:—It has two faces, one heart, four ears, two noses, two heads, six eyes, tawny colour, and seven tongues. It has three hands on the left side and four hands on the right side. In the four right hands it holds the Sruk, Sruvā, Akṣamālā (rosary) and Śakti (javelin). It has three girdles, three feet, a vessel for ghee and two chowries. Agni is seated on a ram. It has four horns and the lustre of the morning sun. It has a sacred thread and it is bedecked in earrings and has matted hair. One shall perform the rite of Homa after conceiving the physical body of Agni thus.*

52. The Brāhmaṇa who performs the Homa rite by using (mere) hand for oblating milk, curds, ghee and any fried object becomes the slayer of a Brāhmaṇa.

53. The food that a man eats, his deities also eat; (but) for the prosperous achievement of all desired objects, the gingelly seeds must be used more in the Havis offered.

54. In the course of Homas, three Mudrās (ritualistic gestures or symbolic representations by certain positions of fingers, etc.) should be shown, viz. what is designated as the hind, the she-swan, and the sow. While magic spells and incantations are used, the mudrā called the sow should be used and during the auspicious rites, the gestures of the hind and the she-swan shall be used.

55. The ritualistic gesture called the (female) swine shall be by means of all the fingers; that of the she-swan shall be without the (use of the small finger); the mudrā called 'the hind' shall be by means of the three fingers, viz. the middle, the ring finger and the thumb.

56. One shall perform the Homa with gingelly seeds along with curds, honey and ghee the magnitude being the same as (mentioned) before, grasping these with all the five fingers.

57. In all auspicious rites the Kuśa grass-blades should be held closely to the ring finger.

---

* Cf. RV. IV. 58.3 and the description of the fire god in the Smṛti or Paurāṇic verses in the Vaiśvadeva of Ṛgvedins.

Vināyaka-Kalpa

58. Vināyaka (god Gaṇeśa) has been appointed as the controlling head of Gaṇas (like Puṣpadanta and others—Mit. = *Mitākṣarā for creating as also in warding off impediments in acts (conducive to the attainment of Puruṣārthas), by gods Rudra, Brahmā and Viṣṇu.

59-61a. Understand the symptoms of a person who is haunted (lit. caught hold of) by Vināyaka: In dreams (he sees that) he is carried away by (a stream of) water or is drowned in deep water; he sees men with shaven heads and clothes reddish (blue Mit.) colour, (in dream that) he is riding carnivorous birds (like vultures) and beasts of prey (like tigers). He sees that he is surruonded by Caṇḍālas, donkeys and camels. (He feels that)while he is going he is hotly pursued by enemies (to attack him).

61b-63a. Such a person's mind becomes distracted or agitated; all his efforts (at success) become fruitless; without any reason, he becomes dispirited. Even though born in a royal family (and endowed with bravery, learning and such other qualities -Mit.); a maiden (though possessing beauty, good family-background etc.) does not get a spouse and a married woman does not become pregnant. A learned Vedic Scholar does not get preceptorship and a student (though endowed with discipline and other virtues) gets no study facility or tuition. A merchant gets no profit nor a husbandman gets profit in his agricultural activities.

63b-c. (For the propitiation of Vināyaka for pacification of troubles) on a meritorious day (with a favourable constellation) such a person's ablution as per due formalities should be performed with the viscous pulp of white mustard seeds (after extracting oil), while benedictory mantras are being recited by (learned) Brāhmaṇas (who should perform puṇyāhavācana-Mt.).

---

* This is a famous commentary on the Yājñavalkya Smṛti. It was the paramount authority on the Hindu Law in British Courts and even after, before the Hindu Code Bill. Its author, Vijñāneśvara (A.D. 1070-1100) being such an authority I follow his interpretations, as this and the next Kalpa are borrowed from the Yāj. Smr. by the NP.

 NP. 63c is a combination of the 1st part of Yāj. I. 277b and the latter half of Yāj. I. 278 b.

64. Clay must be taken from (five places, viz.) the stables of horses, elephants, an ant-hill, from the confluence of two rivers and from a deep lake. Rocana (yellow pigment), scents, Guggulu (gum-resin), etc., must be thrown quickly* (into the water).

65. (Defective) Water must be brought from the deep lake in four pots of the same colour. The Bhadrāsana (the honoured holy seat) must be placed on a red-coloured hide of a bull (when the haunted person is thus seated. Brāhmaṇas should recite Svasti mantras.

66. (After recitation of Svasti mantras, Suvāsinīs—women whose husband and sons are alive—should pour water over the haunted person from the pitcher kept to the eastern side of the Bhadrāsana while the following Mantra is being uttered).

"I sprinkle you with waters endowed with innumerable potencies, flowing in hundred(s) of streams, sanctified by sages (like Manu). May the purificatory waters sanctify you."

67. (Water from the second pitcher placed to the south should be poured with the following Mantra): "May king Varuṇa bless you with fortune. May the sun, Bṛhaspati, Indra, Vāyu, (each of them) confer auspicious blessings on you. The seven sages have bestowed blessings on you."

68. (Incantation while pouring the third pitcher): "May the water goddess destroy for ever whatever is inauspicious (and unlucky) in your hair on the head (Mit.) the parting of the hair, the forehead, ears and eyes."

69. (The fourth pitcher is to be poured while reciting the previous three mantras—After water from the fourth pitcher is poured) holding in the left hand blades of Kuśa grass, mustard oil should be oblated (poured over) the head (of the haunted person) with a ladle (spoon) made of Indian fig tree, when the person is thus bathed.

70-71a. (While pouring the mustard oil as oblations the following names of Vināyaka preceded by Oṁ and followed by Svāhā should be uttered per oblation as follows: Oṁ Mitāya Svāhā, Oṁ Sammitāya Svāhā, Oṁ Śatāya Svāhā, Oṁ Kaṭaṅkaṭāya Svāhā, Oṁ Kūṣmāṇḍāya Svāhā, Oṁ Rājaputrāya Svāhā. (Then in fire Caru oblations be given with these very Mantras and the remaining portion of the Caru should be oblated with bali-Mantras to Indra, Agni, Yama, Niṛṛti, Varuṇa, Vāyu, Soma, Iśāna, Brahmā and Ananta using each name in the dative case followed by namaḥ 'Bow to,' as follows Om Indrāya namaḥ, etc.

---

* For āśu of NP., Yāj-1.279 reads apsu.

71b-75. As an offering (Naivedya) the following articles are to be presented to Vināyaka (and his mother—Pārvatī*) :—rice once beaten (half-polished), boiled rice mixed with powder of sesamum seeds, fish both raw and cooked, flesh both raw and cooked, flowers of variegated colours, incense, three kinds of spirituous liquor, radish, Puris, Apūpa (baked or boiled pies), garland of Voṭa (Vaḍe—in Marathi), boiled rice mixed with curds, milk pudding, flour-cake with raw sugar or jaggery along with laḍḍus (Mit.).

He should then bow them down with head (with the Mantras as follows

The remainings of this offerings should be placed in a winnowing basket which is spread over with Darbha grass, and should place that Bali where four roads meet (with the following invocation†

After offering Arghya (with water, flowers, etc.), he should again offer Dūrvā -grass and mustard-flowers filling the cavity of his folded and joined hands (añjali).

76. (He should then pray)

"Be pleased to bestow on me beautiful form and features, renown, fortune, sons, wealth and grant me all desired objects."

---

* I am following Mitākṣarā on Yāj. in interpretation. The Mantras for bowing are :

(a) tatpuruṣāya vidmahe / vakra-tuṇḍāya dhīmahī / tan no dantī pracodayāt //

(b) subhagāyai vidmahe / kāma-mālinyai dhīmahī / tan no gaurī pracodayāt. /

 Mit. quotes the Mantras which may briefly be translated here : "May Devas, Ādityas, Vasus Marut-gods, Aśvini-kumāras, Rudras, Suparṇas, serpents, planets, Asuras, Yātudhānas, Piśācas (Goblins), reptiles, Mātṛ-devatās, (divine mothers), female evil spirits, Yakṣas, Vetālas, Yoginis, Pūtanās (goddesses of epidemics), spirits causing yawning etc.), Siddhas, Gandharvas, Vidyādharas, men, guardians of quarters, protectors of different worlds, Vināyaka-godlings creating impediments accept this offering.

O great sages beginning with Brahmā, the promulgators of peace ! May there be no trouble or impediment or sin or enemies to me. May goblins and departed spirits be statisfied and bring us happiness."

77. After worshipping Durgā, the consort of Śiva, he should worship Śiva, the Lord of Umā, by means of incense, lights, food-offerings, scents, fragrant garlands and unguents.

78. Thereafter the worshipper should wear white garments, garlands of white flowers and apply (sandalpaste like white) unguents to his body. He should feed the Brāhmaṇas and give a pair of clothes to the preceptor (who conducted this worship with full knowledge).

79. After performing the worship of Vināyaka the person desirous of wealth, peace, nourishment, prosperity, longevity and virility should worship the planets.

The rite conducive to Pacification of Planets

80. The nine planets are to be installed in the following order, viz. the Sun, Moon, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, Saturn, Rāhu and Ketu.

81. For attaining auspiciousness, the replica or representation of the planets should be made of what follows respectively:* copper, crystal (silver in NP), red-sandalwood, two in gold and silver (gold in NP), iron, lead and bell-metal.

82a. Or they may be painted on the canvas-cloth in their respective colours or they may be represented by means of esoteric diagrams with coloured powders or pastes.

82b-83. (The procedure of worshipping planets). Each planet should be worshipped by offering cloths, scents, or unguents and flowers according to the complexion of the planets. They should also be offered scents, Bali (food-offerings), incense and Guggulu (a particular fragrant gum resin). For each (presiding) deity (of the planets). (oblation of) Caru (and Samidhs) be offered (in the fire) with the following (nine) mantras.

* v. 81 is defective as the objects are duplicated and do not make up the number 9 required for the planets. Thus NP reads :
tāmrakād rajatād rakta-candanāt svarṇakād api /
hemno rajatādayasaḥ sīsāt kāryā śubhāptaye //
Here rajata 'silver' and gold (svarṇaka & heman) are repeated twice The original verse (Yāj. I..297) is accepted for translation.

84-85. The following are (the Pratikas of) Mantras of the planets (1) Ā kṛṣṇena (RV.I.33.2), (2) Imaṁ devā (VS.9. 40), (3) Agnir mūrdhā (RV.VIII.44.16), (4) Udbudhyasva (VS.15. 54), (5)* Yad aryaḥ (RV.2.13.15), (6) Annāt parisrutaḥ, (7) Śan no deviḥ (RV.X.9.4), (8) Kāṇḍāt (VS. 13. 20), (9) Keturṁ kṛṇvann aketave (RV.1.6.3) (?).

86. The sacrificial sticks (special to each planet) are as follows: the sun-plant (arka), palāśa (tree), khadira (Acacia catechu), Apāmārga (the Achyranthes Aspera) the pippala, Udumbara (the Indian fig. tree), Dūrvā and Kuśa grass.

87. To each of the planet one hundred eight or twenty eight sacrificial sticks (that of the sun-plant for the sun, the palāśa twigs for the moon, etc.) smeared with honey or ghee or curds or milk should be oblated.

88-89. The Naivedya offered should consist of the following articles: rice cooked with jaggery, milk-pudding, haviṣya (food partakable to sages), Ṣaṣṭikā grains cooked in milk, cooked rice with curds, Havis (rice cooked in milk) Cūrṇa (rice mixed with sesame), rice mixed with flesh (Mit.), boiled rice of various colours (due to its various components). These articles should be offered (to each planet) in due order. The wise person should give meal to Brāhmaṇas according to his (financial) ability and the availability of the foodstuffs. The food etc. should be offered after duly honouring them (by washing their feet, etc.).

90. The following is the prescribed religious fee (Dakṣiṇā) for the planets (respectively); a cow, a conch, a (strong) bull, gold, (yellow) cloth, (a white) horse, a black (tawny?), coloured cow, iron (a weapon), a goat.

91. The different articles (offered as Dakṣiṇā) should be a Pala in weight. At the time of monetary gifts this should be said, "O Brahmaṇa, boon has been granted by these: Being worshipped (bless) them."

---

* the mantra should be Bṛhaspate ati yad aryo (RV. 2.13.15)

 The text in Yāj : "A boon has been granted to these planets by god Brahmā." "Ye planets, when worshipped you worship (reciprocally) the worshippers (by removing their calamaties and conferring blessing on them) Yāj. I.307.

92. "Wealth, nobility, rise in position of leading men are controlled by planets. The existence and the nonexistence of the universe depends on the planets. Hence, planets are highly adorable."

93-94. The performance of worship every day of Lord sun with red-sandal, etc.) as well as that of god Skanda and the great god Gaṇapati leads to accomplishments of desires, fruits of one's religious acts and unsurpassed affluence.

95. If a person begins to worship planets without performance of Mātr-yāga (a sacrifice in propitiation of divine Mothers), the Mothers get angry with him and create impediments.

96-97. Those who seek auspiciousness should perform Vasordhārā (a particular libation of ghee at the Agni-cayana) by means of holy mantras of Vasu. Gaurī and other holy mothers should be propitiated by them on auspicious occasion.

98. The mothers are sixteen in number viz.—Gaurī, Padmā, Śacī, Medhā, Sāvitrī, Vijayā, Jayā, Devasenā, Svadhā, Svāhā, Mātṛkā, Vaidhṛti, Dhṛti, Puṣṭi, Dṛṣṭi and Tuṣṭi—these sixteen should be worshipped on the occasions or for the sake of prosperity alongwith the Ātmadevatā (the family deity). They are even superior to Gaṇeśa.

99-100. All the necessary items in the worship should be followed: viz. the invocation, offering of pādya and Arghya, ablution, sandal paste, Akṣatas (raw rice grains), flowers, incense, burning light, fruits, Naivedya, Ācamaniya, betel leaves, areca nut, showing of lights (Nirājanā) and Dakṣiṇā. All these must be offered for their satisfaction.

The Pitṛ-Kalpa* (Śrāddha)

101-102. I shall now explain to you the Pitṛ-Kalpa which increases wealth and progeny. The following are the occasions for the performance of Śrāddha.: The new moon day; the Aṣṭakā days, Vṛddhi (prosperous occasions like the birth of a son),

* The NP has borrowed this section from the Śrāddha-Prakaraṇa of the Yāj. Smṛti I. 217 ff. The printed text has the lines of the Yāj. disarranged with printing mistakes in addition. Please vide Supra ch. 28 and notes, as the topic of Śrāddha is treated there.

 The 8th day in the dark half in the months covered in the seasons Hemanta and Śiśira—Āśvalāyana.

the dark half of the month, the two Ayanas (southern and northern transits of the sun), availability of suitable Brāhmaṇas (as detailed in the next verse—Mit.), equinoxial transits of the sun, (the first point of Aries or Libra into which the sun enters at the vernal or autumnal equinox), Vyatipāta (a particular evil *yoga or time) Gajacchāyā (a particular day), the solar and lunar eclipses and whenever one feels inclined to perform a Śrāddha.

103-106a. The following Brāhmaṇas are regarded as the "wealth or assets to Śrāddha,† (Brāhmaṇa-sampadaḥ mentioned in the above verse): proficient in (recitation and teaching) all the Vedas, Śrotriya (well-versed in the Vedas), the knower of the meaning of the Vedic texts, a middle-aged person—Mit., the knower of the meaning of the Veda-mantras, one expert in teaching and observing the vow of the Jyeṣṭha-sāma portion of the Sāma-veda,†† the expert (as described above) in the tri-madhu and tri-suparṇa hymns, ‡sister's son, a Ṛtvik (a priest officiating at a sacrifice), a son-in-law, the father-in-law, or the maternal uncle who can perform a sacrifice, the knower of the Triṇāciketa hymns, a grandson (through a daughter), the disciples, kinsmen and relatives‡, performers of prescribed karmans, practitioners of austerities, keepers of five (sacrificial) fires, strict followers of the vow of celibacy and those who carefully serve their parents.

106b-109a. The following (Brāhmaṇas) are despicable (and should not be invited for Śrāddha)*:

One affected with heinous diseases (like leprosy), one possessing a surplus limb or deficient in a limb, a squint-eyed person, a son of a remarried widow, a religious student who violates the vow of celibacy, a bastard, one of deformed nails or of conspicuously black teeth, a salaried teacher, a eunuch, a (false) accuser of girls (a girl-teaser or outrager of the modesty of girls), one accused of serious crimes, a traitor of friends, a backbiter or slanderer, one who sells (sacrificial) Soma, one who marries or takes up Agnihotra before his elder brother, one who abandons his parents or preceptor, one maintaining himself on the earnings of unchaste women, the son of a Śūdra, the husband of a divorced woman, a thief, a person fallen from holy rites.

109b-110a. The house-holder himself remaining self-controlled and pure, should invite Brāhmaṇas on the previous day itself. The invited Brāhmaṇas too must control themselves mentally, verbally and physically.

110b-111a. He should welcome and honour the Brāhmaṇas as they come in the afternoon (on the muhūrta called Kutapa-Mit.). After they have sipped water as Ācamana he with a Pavitra (of Darbha grass) in his hand (fingers), should seat them in their respective seats.

111b-112a. In the rites pertaining to deities he may have (invited) as many Brāhmaṇas as he can afford. In the rites concerning Pitṛs, he must have odd number of Brāhmaṇas. He should seat them on a ground purified (by smearing with cow-dung Mit.) covered and sloping to the south.

112b-113a. The two Brāhmaṇas representing deities should be seated with their faces to the east. And each of the Brāhmaṇas representing Pitṛs should be made to face the north (or one Brāhmaṇa for Devas and one for Pitṛs may do). In the case of the Śrāddha of the maternal grandfather, the procedure of Brāhmaṇas representing gods etc. is the same.

 Cf. Manu III. 187 : vide Pd. P. Sṛṣṭi 9.85.88. and the Matsya 16.17-20, also S. Śrāddha, P. 406.

113b-114a. He (the householder) gives them water for washing their hands and even number of Kuśa-grass (blades) for the purpose of a seat. When so permitted by Brāhmaṇas, he should invoke the gods with the Ṛk verse *Viśvedevas (RV. I. 3. 7).

114b-116a. After scattering the barley grains in a vessel along with the Pavitra, he should pour water with the Mantra Śanno devi (RV.X. 9. 4). Repeating the Mantra Yavo'si (VS. 5. 26; TS. I. 3. 11), he should scatter barley grains. He should then pour the arghya water into the hands, repeating the Mantra Yā divyā (TB. 2. 7. 15. 4). After giving water, serving food, with a lamp lighted, applying fragrant sandals and flower-garlands (he should give them water to wash hands).

116b-117. He should then change† his sacred thread, hang towards the left part of the body over the right shoulder (when he deals with rites concerning Pitṛs—manes) offering Kuśa grass (blades) twice in number to the Brāhmaṇas representing Pitṛs, he should invite his fathers (i.e. father, grand-father and great-grand-father) with the mantra Uśantas tvā nidhimahi (RV. X. 16. 12, AV. 18. 1). After inviting the Pitṛs, he should, with the permission (of the Brāhmaṇas—representatives of Pitṛs) perform the Japa (undertone recitation) of the mantra Ā yantu naḥ pitaraḥ (Mit.)

118-119a. The rites to be performed with barley may be performed with gingelly seeds. Offering Arghya along with barley grains put in their vessel according to the ritual he will repeat the mantra Pitṛbhyas sthānam asi (Yāj. Smṛ. I. 234,) and place the vessel with (its) face downwards.

119b-120a. Wishing to perform Agnau-Karaṇa (offering into sacrificial fire), he takes cooked rice soaked in ghee and formally requests the permission (to offer oblations). If the Brāhmaṇas say "Do so" and permit him he oblates them formally into the fire‡ as in Pitṛ-yajña.

* The Smārta Mantra—āgacchantu mahābhāgāḥ etc.—is also recited.

 The NP reads haste Pādyaṁ viniḥkṣipet The oddity of pouring water meant for washing feet into the hands being obvious, the Yāj. reading (which is the original one) hasteṣvarghyaṁ vinikṣipet is accepted.

† NP reads sapradakṣiṇam but the original text and the actual practice of Śrāddha shows that the reading apradakṣiṇam in the Yāj. I. 232 is correct.

‡ In practice, now-a-days, these are offered in the hand of Brāhmaṇa in stead of in fire. This is sanctioned by Manu.

Agnyabhāve tu viprasya pāṇāvevopapādayet (quoted by Mit.)

120b-121a. After the Homa is over, he will carefully (with great concentration) place the remaining food into vessels. Those vessels may be of whatever material available, but particularly silver vessels are recommended.

121b-122a. After keeping food into the pots, the pots are invoked with the mantra Pṛthivī te pātram (Mānava-Śrauta-sūtra II 9. 2.) and make the Brāhmaṇa place his thumb on the food with the Mantra Idaṁ viṣnur vicakrame (RV. I. 22. 17).

122b-125a. He shall then repeat the Gāyatri along with the Vyāhṛtis and the three Ṛks beginning with Madhu vātā etc. (RV. I. 90. 6-8). After the Japa he must say, "All of you, take food at your leisure". They also shall take food with restricted speech. (The householder) shall serve them the desirable food and ghee. He shall not be angry. He shall not be in a hurry. Till they are satisfied (the food is offered). (While they take food) he shall repeat the Japa as before. He shall formally ask them "Are you satisfied ?" He shall then take the formal permission regarding the leavings of food etc. He shall then take the cooked rice and strew them on the ground. Water shall be offered once for each.

125b-126a. Taking all the strewn food along with the gingelly seeds he shall stand facing the south. He shall place the Piṇḍas near the Ucchiṣta (leavings of the food) as in the case of Pitṛyajña. To the maternal grandfather also, the Śrāddha offered is like this. He shall then offer water as Ācamana. He should then request them to give the benediction Svasti and they say it. He should then request them to bless him with benediction. He should pour water on their hands and they utter that blessing.

129a. He shall say then "May the Viśve devas be pleased." When the Brāhmaṇas say this, he shall repeat it.

129b-130a. He should then pray to Brāhmaṇas: "May donors flourish and multiply in our family. May Vedas increase (by recitation, teaching etc.); May my race flourish. May not our faith in Śrāddha and other religious rites dwindle. May we have abundant (gold etc.) to give."

130b-131a. After saying such pleasing words, he should (go round them and) bid them adieu. He should repeat the mantra Vāje vāje (RV. I.10 7?) and with delighted heart take leave of Pitṛs with due formalities.

131b-132a. The Arghya-pātra in which Arghya water given to the Brāhmaṇas was poured, should be placed with its face upwards and the Brāhmaṇas be formally let go (after being blessed by them).

132b-133a. After accompanying the departing Brāhmaṇas to the border (of the village), he should circumambulate them clock-wise and returning, he should eat the food partaken of by his Pitrs. On the night of the Śrāddha he (alongwith the invited Brāhmaṇas) should observe celibacy.

133b-134a. Thus repeating the circumambulation, he shall perform Nāndi and other Yajñas to the Pitṛs during the occasions of prosperity. The Piṇḍas must be made of barley grains and mixed with curds and Karkandhu (the fruit of the Jujube tree).

134b-135a. The Ekoddiṣṭa (śrāddha with a single Brāhmaṇa) consists of one Arghya and one Pavitra. It is devoid of devas.

135b-136a. It has neither the Āvāhana (invocation) nor the Agnaukaraṇa (consigning of cooked food into the fire). The circumambulation is anticlockwise. (Here the difference between the two Śrāddhas is :) Here akṣayyasthāne upatiṣṭhatām should be uttered (instead of akṣayyodaka etc). At the time of bidding goodbye to the Brāhmaṇas, after reciting Vāje vāje he should request with the words abhiramyatām (please do enjoy) and they would say abhiratāḥ (enjoyed). (This is to be performed at mid-day-Mit.).

136b-137. He shall have four vessels made filled with gingelly seeds and scented water. For the purpose of Arghya, water shall be poured into the vessels of the Pitṛs from the vessel of the Preta (the dead one). At that time the two mantras beginning with Ye Samānāḥ (VS. 19.45) etc. shall be repeated. He shall perform the other rites as before.

138-140a. This rite of Ekoddiṣṭa and Sapiṇḍikaraṇa is for women also. If the Sapiṇḍikaraṇa is performed after a year, the food along with the water pot shall be given to a Brāhmaṇa for a year(?). Every month, this rite shall be performed on the day of death. The rite is performed every year, and month as well as on the eleventh day.

140b-141a. The Piṇḍas shall be given to the cows, goats or Brāhmaṇas or consigned to fire or water. While the Brāhmaṇas are present at the place of the meal, the leavings of food of the Brāhmaṇas shall not be swept.

141b-142a. The Pitṛs are delighted for a month with Haviṣyānna (cooked rice soaked in ghee) and for a year with milk pudding. The meat of the following shall be offered in the different months, viz—fish, deer, ram, birds, goats, Pṛṣat deer, Eṇa deer, Ruru deer, boar and hare. If these are offered the Pitāmahas are satisfied.*

142b-145a. If a person staying at Gayā (or at any highly sacred place like Prayāga, Naimiṣa,—Mit.) gives i.e. performs Śrāddha with the flesh of a rhinoceros, a kind of fish called Mahāsalka, honey, food suitable to sages, flesh of a red-coloured goat, Mahāśāka (i.e. Kālāśāka or Narcā in Hindi), white goat, he attains eternal benefit (or bliss). That is particularly so, if it is performed on the 13th day of the dark half of Bhādrapada when the constellation Maghā is on that day.

145b-148a. A person who offers Śrāddha from the 1st day of the dark half of Bhādrapada upto the new moon day (with the exception of the fourteenth day which is reserved for those killed with a weapon in battle, etc.) forever gets (as a fruit of performance of Śrāddha on that particular tithi as follows): a (beautiful) girl (of good character and characteristics),

---

* The Mitākṣarā clarifies that it is haviṣyānna (rice boiled in milk) that should represent each kind of flesh for Śrāddha.

 Mahākalpa in the NP is most probably a misprint as this is a list of food-stuffs).

(intelligent, handsome) sons-in-law, small beasts like sheep, good-mannered sons, success in gambling, (Harvest in) agriculture, profit in commerce, two-hoofed animals like cows, one-hoofed animals like horses, sons with the brilliance of Vedic studies, etc., gold and silver (also other metals like lead, zinc), leadership in one's caste, fulfilment of all desires (of heaven etc.) The (ekoddiṣṭa) Śrāddha on the fourteenth day of the dark half of Bhādrapada is (reserved) for persons who die of being struck with weapons.

148b-152a. If a person, full of faith, deep reverence, devoid of arrogance and jealousy performs a Śrāddha with due formalities on every Nakṣatra (constellation) beginning from Kṛttikā (the Pleiades) and ending with Bharaṇi will attain the following desired objects : the heaven, progeny, exuberance of Ātmic (spiritual) powers, bravery or fearlessness, fertile fields, physical strength, a (virtuous) son, prominent social status (in one's community), popularity, affluence in wealth etc., prominence, auspiciousness, unchallenged command, commerce, agriculture, cows, etc. health, fame, absence of sorrow (due to bereavement of a dear person), attainment of the highest (Brahman) region, money, gold, etc. (mastery over) the Vedas, effectiveness of medicines, metals (except gold and silver), cows, he and she-goats and longevity.

154b-155a. In this way are narrated a few special features or particulars of the Kalpādhyāya. The details should be known in Vedic tantras and other purāṇas.

155b-157. He shall attain auspicious goal here and hereafter. The man who devoutly listens to this chapter on Kalpa during the holy rites pertaining to the Devas and the Pitṛs obtains the benefit of the holy rites pertaining to Devas and Pitṛs. He obtains wealth, learning, renown, and sons here and the highest goal hereafter.

158. Henceforth, I shall recount to you the treatise on Grammar which is called the face of the Vedas. I shall recount it succinctly. Listen attentively.

CHAPTER FIFTYONE

1. Kalpa deals with Vedic rituals. According to the topic discussed, it was classified as śrauta, Gṛhya and Dharma sūtras. The NP. divides them under: (1) the Veda, (2) Saṁhitā (3) Aṅgiras, (4) Śānti, and (5) Nakṣatra Kalpa. NP. borrows mostly from Yāj. Smr. in this chapter.

2. These are measures of capacity. vide SKD III p. 203 where Āpastamba Śrauta Sūtra is quoted.

CHAPTER FIFTYTWO

*Exposition of Grammar

Sanandana said:

1. O Nārada, I shall now explain to you in brief Vyākaraṇa (grammar) by means of (illustrations of) readymade forms (inductively?); grammar is regarded as the mouth of the Veda.

2. Words are either Subantas (substantives) or Tiṅantas (verbs). O Brāhmaṇa, the seven cases are covered by Sup-terminations. The (inflexions) Su, Au, Jas constitute the Prathamā (the first i.e. the Nominative) case. It consists of the Prātipadika (the noun in its uninflected state before case-terminations are applied).

3. A significant form of a word, not being a verbal root (Dhātu) or an affix (Pratyaya) or a word ending in an affix is called Prātipadika (crude-form or Nominal base)[1]. The Nom. (Nominative) case-affix is employed when the sense is that of addressing (Sambodhana)[2] or where there is the additional sense of gender only or to denote the subject.

4. Am, Au, Śas are the inflections of the Accusative case. That which is done (by the agent) is Karma (object). In the object, the Accusative case is used.[3] And also when a word is joined by (i.e. governed by) the word Antarā or Antareṇa it takes the second case-affix[4] (i.e. of the objective case).

5. Ṭā, Bhyām, Bhis are the terminations of the third (Instrumental) case. In denoting the agent or the instrument the third (Instrumental) case-affix is employed)[5]. That

* As stated in the Introduction, the presentation of Sk. Grammar in the NP is popular but unsystematic, as he gives a number of examples without discussing the rules. But vv 2-24 show that the NP has given a number of Pāṇini's sūtras in a verse form, vide the Kāraka Prakaraṇa and the annotations on these verses. It appears that this section was written after the 7th cent. A.D. that is after Pāṇini regained his popularity by Bhartrhari's Vākyapadīya and such other works.

wherewith something is done is the instrument and he who does it is the agent (Kartā).

6. The desinences of the Dative case are Ṅe, Bhyām, Bhyas and they are to be used with Sampradāna Kāraka. The person to whom something is desired to be given, something is owed[1] or something appeals (or is liked) is called the Sampradāna.

7. Ṅasi, Bhyām, Bhyas are the terminations of the fifth (Ablative) case. They are to be used in the Apādāna Kāraka. Apādāna is that from which something moves away, gets separated or is taken away.

8. The terminations for the sixth (Genitive) case are Ṅas, Os and Ām. It is mainly used when the relationship of possession or ownership is indicated. Ṅi, Os, Sup are the terminations of the seventh or, Locative case. It shows Adhi-Karaṇa.

9. O prominent Brāhmaṇa! it (the term Adhikaraṇa) is used in the sense of Ādhāra[7]. Verbs implying protection govern the Ablative case. That which is desired or that which is abhorred are called Apādānakas (and they take the Ablative case).

10-11. The ablative case is used when the preposition Pari, Apa, Āṅ, Itara and Ṛte[8] are used as Karma-pravacaniya[9] and with words denoting quarters. The karma-pravacaniyas govern the accusative case also. The words Prati, Pari and Anu[10] are Karma-pravacaniya when used in the sense of (1) 'sign', 'in the direction of', (2) 'mere statement of a circumstance or as regards (ittham bhūta), and the word Abhi in the above sense of 'in the direction of', 'as regards' but not when it means division or 'share of'[11]. Anu is used in the sense of Saha. In the sense of hina[12] (inferior, subordinate to) and Upa[13]. They are used as Karma-pravacaniyas (governing instrumental).

12. In the case of roots implying motion, the place to which the motion is desired or directed take the termination of the second (Accusative) or the fourth (Dative) case[14]. In denoting the indirect object, which is not an animal, of the verb manya ($\sqrt{man} + ya$) 'to think'. The Dative case is (optionally) employed, when contempt is to be shown[15].

13. The Dative case is used with words Namaḥ (Bow to), Svasti (peace and bliss), Svāhā, Svadhā (to be uttered in offering oblations to gods and manes respectively), alaṁ 'a match for' and Vaṣaṭ[16] (a mystic term in sacrifices). This case termination is used when the crude-form (base) ends in an affix denoting 'condition' or having the force of the infinitive of purpose (which has—tum as the affix)[17].

14. The instrumental case is used with Saha[18] (accompanied by), in an attribute pointing to the physical defect of a person[19]. While indicating time, abstract notion both the Locative as well as the Genitive case is used.

15. The Genitive and Locative case terminations are used when they are conjoined with words Svāmin 'master', Īśvara 'Lord', Adhipati 'Sovereign ruler', Sākṣi 'witness', dāyāda 'an heir', Sūtaka (Prasūta in the Sūtra) 'born'[20] and with words specificating an individual from the class (nirdhāraṇa)[21]. But only the Genitive in Hetuprayoga[22] i.e. after a noun implying the cause of an action, when the word hetu is used only with such a word (e.g. annasya hetor vasati. 'He dwells for the sake of food' and not the Instrumental.

16 The Genitive case is used with objects of verbs connoting memory, attempting or exerting for or doing violence to or with a word denoting an agent and the object when it is used alongwith a word ending in a Kṛt affix[23].

17a-b. The terminations of the Genitive are not used to express the agent or the object, when the word is formed by a past participle (in kta and ktavatu[24]. In the case-ending beginning with Sup, etc., the alternative uses should be known.

17c. In case of roots (of 1st, 2nd conjugations) like Bhū, Vā, which end in (i.e. take the inflexions) Tiṅ. There are ten Lakāras[25] (tenses and moods) for conjugation.

18-19. Tip, Tas, Anti are the inflexion of the Prathama[21] Puruṣa (but in modern Sk. grammar it is called the 'third') person. Sip, Thas, Tha are the inflections of the Madhyama Puruṣa (called the 'second person' in modern Sk. grammar). Mip, Vas, Mas are the terminations of the Uttama Puruṣa (designated 'first person' by modern Sk. grammarians). The above terminations are in the Parasmaipada.

In the Ātmanepada set of roots, the terminations of the third person are Te, Āte and Ante. Those of the second person are Se, Āthe and Dhve; and those of the First person are E, Vahe and Mahe. It should be known that there are other substitutes for these terminations in Liṅ and other tenses and moods.

20. When a substantive is used it is called the 'third person.' When the word Yuṣmad ('you' or 'thou') is used it is called the 'second person', and when the word Asmad ('I' or 'we') is used it is called the 'first person'.

21-22. Bhū and others (i.e. other roots of different conjugations) are called Dhātus. Those ending in San and other suffixes are (also) called Dhātus. In the present tense Laṭ is used. In the past Tense (not of the present day), and with the use of the particle Mā sma, the Laṅ (Past Imperfect) is used. In expressing benediction, Loṭ is used. To denote injunction, permission, etc. as well as in giving blessings Liṅ (the Potential mood) is used. These are the twofold uses of Liṅ, O Sage.

23. In the past not witnessed by the speaker personally, Liṭ (Perfect) is used. In the future (not of today), Luṭ (I future) is used after the roots.

24. In denoting the past, Luṅ (the Aorist) is used. In case of Atipatti (lapse or non-occurable condition) Lṛṅ (लृङ्) (conditional mood) is used.

Now understand the ready made examples beginning with Saṁhitās (sandhis).

When the object and the agent (of a verb) are united with the action (Taddhita suffix is used as in the case of) Dhaureya (one worthy of bearing burden) and Kauṅkuma (pertaining to saffron).

53. In the sense of 'born of', Taddhita suffix is used and the example is Kānīna (born of a virgin); the word Ksatriya (one who protects from wound), Vaidika (one who follows the injunctions of the Vedas). Both Cora and Caura mean 'thief' The usage, 'he sees the face like the moon" is for the purpose of equality.

54. In the sense of an abstract noun the sulfixes—Tvam etc. are used. Examples are Brāhmaṇatva, Brāhmaṇatā and Brāhmaṇya (all mean Brahminhood). The word Goman means "one who has cows", similarly, Dhanin and Dhanavān mean "one who has wealth". In the sense of magnitude Kiyān (How much) is used.

55. The words Tundila and Śraddhā-lu are derived after the suffixes have been added in the sense of "that which has occurred." 'Tundila' (one who has protuberant belly) and 'Sraddhālu' means "one who has faith", Dantura (one who has long projecting teeth). In the following cases the Taddhita suffix-'In' is in the sense of 'it exists', 'possessing' Sragvin (one who has garlands), Tapasvin (one who performs penance), Medhāvin (one who has excellent intellect), Māyāvin one who has Māyā (deception).

60-62. Kiṁtarām, Atitarām (too much), Abhihyuccaistarām (highly, etc.). To indicate the measure some suffixes are used. Jānudaghnam, Jānudvayasam and Jānumātram (upto the knee). To specify one among many, we say 'Katara' (which of the two?). In order to specify the ordinals there are suffixes : Dvitīya (second), Tṛtīya (third), Cāturtha (fourth), Ṣaṣṭha (sixth), Pañcama (fifth) Ekādaśa (eleventh). O Nārada, Katipaya, Katitha and Kati mean; 'How many?'

63. Viṁśa and Viṁśatitama both mean 'twentieth'. Similarly 'Śata-tama' and other words. O leading sage, in order to indicate divisions of number there are suffixes as for example : Dvidhā, Dvedhā, Dvaidhā (in two ways).

64. In indicating frequencies, suffixes are used e.g. Pañcakṛtvaḥ (five times) : Dviḥ (twice), Triḥ (three times) Bahuśaḥ (many times). Dvitayam and Dvayam mean the same. So also Tritayam and Trayam.

65. Suffix—rā is used in signifying dimunitive forms Kuṭīra (a small hut); Śamīra (a small fruit, legume) Śuṇḍāra (a small trunk of the elephant), Straiṇa (belonging to women) Pauṣṇa (belonging to the sun). Tundibha (one who has the umbilical region 'protruding'; Vṛndāraka (Deva); Kṛṣīvala (farmer).

66. Malina (dirty); Vikaṭa (hideous); Gomi (an owner of cattle); Bhaurikī (treasurer), Utkaṭa (exceedingly manifest); Avaṭīṭa and Avanāṭa both mean flat-nosed. Nibiḍa (dense, compact); Ikṣuśākinam (having sugarcane as crop?).

steal), Acorayat (he stole), Corayet (he should steal) Coryāt (may he steal), Acūcurat (he stole), Acoriṣyat (? Acorayiṣyat) (if he had stolen).

Thus there are ten Gaṇas or conjugational classes.

The causal form is Bhāvayati (causes something to be), the desiderative form is Bubhūṣati (desires to become). As the frequentative form, O sage (we have) Bobhūyate (again and again he becomes).

80-81. In the Yaṅluk (i.e. where Yaṅ termination is omitted) the form is Bobhaviti. O Nārada, in order to denote wish or emulating action. Putriyati is the form meaning 'desires a son for himself' or 'behaves like a son'. O Brāhmaṇa know that a root with an Anudātta Ātmanepada (low tone) or letter 'N' as its 'IT' (i.e. indicatory mark) takes Ātmanepada terminations. When the duty is interchanged it takes Ātmanepada (as for example vyatilunite, 'he reaps the harvest' (though it is some one else's duty). The root Viś - after the preposition Ni takes Ātmanepada terminations. Where the Ātmanepada does not have access, the Parasmaipada terminations are used by grammarians.

82-85. If the root has a Svarita or Ṅ for its indicatory mark, it takes both padas (but when the fruit of the action goes to the agent, it takes the Ātmanepada terminations). In the impersonal passive, Yak termination is used. O sage, in order to indicate the excellence and facility in the action, the activity of the agent is not taken into consideration. Then the other Kārakas too take up the term Kartṛ (agent), as in the use Asiḥ Sādhu Chinatti (the knife cuts well), Sthāli Pacati (the vessel cooks). If the root is transitive, the terminations are added to both the impersonal and the passive bases (?) Hence the use Odanaḥ pacyate (the rice is cooked). If the root is intransitive it is impersonal and active only. O sage, if the action and the fruit of the action are in one and the same person, it is intransitive.

86-88* If they (i.e. action and the fruit to the action) are stationed in different substantives, the root is said to be

---

* cf. gauṇe karmaṇi duhyādeḥ pradhāne nī-hṛ-kṛṣvahām /
buddhi-bhakṣārthayoḥ śabda-karmakāṇāṁ nijecchayā // prayojya-karmaṇyanyeṣāṁ ṇyantānāṁ tādayo matāḥ / Kārikā quoted in Siddhānta Kaumudī on Pān. 7.1.69.

transitive. When roots that take two objects are to be changed into passive, the secondary object is turned into the nominative in the case of roots Duh, Yāc etc. (e.g. Gauḥ Duhyate Payaḥ). But in regard to the roots Ni, Hṛ, Kṛṣ, and Vah, the main object is turned into the nominative in the passive (e.g. Ajā grāmaṁ Niyate "The goat is taken to the village"). But in the case of roots of the sense of knowledge or eating, any of the two objects may be turned into the nominative (e.g. Bhojyate māṇavakam odanaḥ or Bhojyate māṇavakaḥ odanam). (In the case of causal roots, (the object so caused) the Prayojyakarman is changed into the nominative. (Devadattaḥ grāmaṁ gamyate—Devadatta is made to go to the village). The tiṅ terminations are remembered in the receptacle of the fruit as well as the action. The action is important in the case of the fruit. The meaning of the Tiṅ is an attribute.

89-90 The Kṛtya suffixes are used in the impersonal and passive forms. The Kṛt suffixes are used in the active forms. Example for a Kṛtya suffix is Edhitavyam and Edhaniyam. The Agent and the Kārakas etc. are cited in the event of the past (?). Gamya etc. are indicated in the future sense and the remaining is considered applicable in the present. (?)

Compounds

91-92. Examples of compound words are given now: Adhistri and Yathāśakti are examples of Avyayibhāva. Examples of *Tatpuruṣa are Rāmāśrita, Dhānyārthi (one seeking grains) Yūpadāru (wood intended for sacrificial post) Vyāghrabhi (fear from tigers) Rājapuruṣa (A king's officer) and Akṣaśauṇḍa (clever at the dice). Now Dvigu is explained: Pañca-gava "an aggregate of five cows", Daśagrāmi (collection of ten villages), Triphalā (the three myrobalans). The last word is conventionally used in this sense.

93. When the two words constituting a compound are equally important and have the same meaning it is called Karmadhāraya. Examples are Nilotpala (blue lotus) Mahāṣaṣthi

---

* These examples are according to cases e.g. Rāmam āśritaḥ Rāmāśritaḥ is the accusative (Dvitiyā) Tatpuruṣa and illustrates Pan. 2.1.14, while the last akṣeṣu śauṇḍaḥ akṣa-śauṇḍaḥ, a locative (Saptamī) Tatpuruṣa is an illustration of Pan. 2.1.40.

(A form of Durgā in Tantras). The example for Nañtatpuruṣa is abrāhmaṇaḥ (non-Brahmin). Kumbhakāra (potter). —This is an example of a Kṛt Samāsa.

94. O Brāhmaṇa, the examples for a Bahuvrihi compound where the meaning refers to another word (as its qualifying adjunct) are: Prāptodaka (where the water has reached), it qualifies Grāma (village) Pañcagu (one [illegible] has five cows Rūpavadbhāryaḥ (one whose wife is beautiful), Madhyāhnaḥ (middle of the day), Sasutādikaḥ (one who is accompained by sons and others).

95. The particle Ca has two meanings viz. Samuccaya aggregate, assemblage) and Anvācaya (secondary statement). The example for the former is Gurum ca Īśaṁca Bhajasva (worship the preceptor and God). The example for the latter is Bhikṣām aṭa, gāṁ ca ānaya (Go begging and also bring a cow).

96. Example for Itaretarayoga Dvandva is Rāmakṛṣṇau (i.e. Rama and Kṛsṇa). As a Samāhāra (collection the form is Rāmakṛṣṇaṁ). O Brâhmaṇa, only the Brahman is worshipped. As it is devoid of Dvandvas (clashing opposites).

CHAPTER FIFTYTWO

1. NP. 3 is an echo-verbatim reproduction of Pān. (Pāṇini) 1.2.45 & 2.3.46. Thus Pāṇ. 1.2.45 is :

Arthavad-a-dhātur apratyayaḥ prātipadikam

NP. 3b

Arthavat prātipadikaṁ dhātu-pratyaya-varjitam

2. Pāṇ. 2.3.47.
3. Pāṇ. 2.3.2.
4. Pāṇ. 2.3-4.
5. Pāṇ 2.3.18.
6. Pāṇ. 1.4.35, 1.4.33.
7. Pāṇ. 1.4.45, 2.3.36.
8. Pāṇ. 2.3.29, 1.4.88, 2.3.10.

9. When certain prepositions, particles or adverbs are not connected with a verb, yet they govern a noun in particular cases they are called Karma-pravacanīya e.g. ā : ā mukteḥ saṁsāraḥ 'the saṁsāra lasts till Mokṣa'; anu : Japam anu prāvarṣata 'It rained heavily after the performance of Japa.'

10. Pāṇ. 1.4.90.
11. Pāṇ. 1.4.91.
12. Pāṇ. 1.4.85-86.
13. Pāṇ. 1.4.87.

14. Pāṇ 2.3.12. The Sūtra further clarifies that the cases are used in denoting the 'object' when actual motion is meant and the object is not a word expressing 'path'.

15. Pāṇ. 2.3.17.
16. Pāṇ. 2.3.16.
17. Pāṇ. 2.3.15.

18. The original sūtra is Saha-yukte' pradhāne 2.3.19 which means : when the sense is that the word in the Instrumental case is not the principal but the accompaniment of the principal thing or person. For example : putreṇa Sahāgataḥ pitā 'the father has come with the son. The same rule holds about the synonyms of Saha such as Sāka, Sārdha. —Siddhānta Kaumudī.

19. Pāṇ. 2.3.20 For example : pādena Khañjaḥ 'Lame foot'.
20. Pāṇ. 2.3.39.
21. Pāṇ. 2.3.41.
22. Pāṇ. 2.3.26.
23. Pāṇ. 2.3.65.

24. After these the Instrumental case must be employed to denote the agent and the Accusative case to denote the object. For example, Viṣṇunā hatā daityāḥ or Daityān hatavān Viṣṇuḥ 'Viṣṇu killed demons'. This Sūtra (2.3.69) debars the Genitive which would have been applicable under Pāṇ. 2.3.65. The NP. however, partially quotes Pāṇ. 2.3.69 which includes affixes ending in-U, -Uka, -Tṛn, and those having the sense of Khal.

25. The Lakāras are as follows : Laṭ (Present), Liṭ (Perfect) Luṭ (First Future), Lṛṭ (Second Future), Leṭ (Vedic Subjunctive), Loṭ (Imperative). Laṅ (Imperfect), Liṅ (Potential), Luṅ (Aorist), Lṛṅ (Conditional).

26. Old traditional Sanskrit grammarians use the term Prathama Puruṣa, Madhyama Puruṣa and Uttama Puruṣa for what European and (imitating them) Indian grammarians designate as the 'third person', the 'second Person' and 'the first person'. In translating the following verses I use the modern terminology though the NP uses the old traditional terms.

27. But Bhaṭṭoji Dikṣita on Pān. 6.1.101 clarifies that ṛ+ṛ will be either ṛ or ṝ thus Hotṛ+Ṛkāra will also be Hotṛkāra. The NP.'s Pitrarṣabha is doubtful. The v.l. Pitṛsabha is better.

28. Here Nom. sg. Rāmaḥ is necessary as there is duplication of the Instrumental case in the verse and the nom. goes unrepresented. An emendation like Rāmaḥ sarvahitaṁ karoti 'Rama does things beneficial to all, may be suggested. The italicised words contain the declension of Rāma (Masc. Noun ending in—a) in the sg. no.

29. V. 40 illustrates Pāṇini's sūtras for declension of feminine nouns ending in vowels e.g. 7.1.18, 7.3.114, etc.

30. Pāṇ. 8.2.34.

31. Gavāc (he who honours cows or who drives cows) has the following bases according to the meaning—the traditional verse quoted in the Siddhānta Kaumudī on Pān. 8.2.68 records the following bases : Go-añca, Gavāñca, Go'ñca, Goac, Gavāc and Go'c.

32. Pāṇ. 4.1.105.

33. Pāṇ. 4.199.

34. Vide Vārttika Pāṇ. 4.1.110

35. If Cikka (Areca nut).

36. N. of a man with the patronym Kauṣitaki—MW-266.

37. a Deśya word.

38. Kakṣīvat for Kakṣyā-vat—Kāśikā on Pan. 8.2.12. A Vedic seer of many Sūktas. But the next word—untraced, possibly carmanvat.

CHAPTER FIFTY THREE

*The Exposition of Nirukta

Sanandana continued :

1. I shall now delineate to you the excellent accessory of the Veda, called Nirukta. It is said to be of five kinds and pertains to Vedic conjugations or verbal formations.

2. Therein at some places is found epenthesis, in other cases is seen metathesis, at some places is found modification of the syllable, at other places, (we get) haplology.

3. O Nārada, where due to the change or loss of a syllable, light is thrown on the special connotation of the root, it is called Saṁyoga.

4. (Now follow the illustrations of these processes :) By addition of a syllable, the word Haṁsa ($< \sqrt{han}$ —) 'a swan' is formed[1] (by the addition of sa). The word Siṁha[2] 'a lion' is formed by metathesis, gūḍhotmā (gūḍha + ātmā) is formed due to change of syllable (here the vowel ā is changed to u) while in pṛṣodara (pṛṣat + Udara) there is a loss of a letter (t).

5. The fifth kind of modification should be known in words like bhramara 'a bumble bee' (from $\sqrt{bhram}$ + ara by the uṇādi sūtra artikamibhramicami etc., cf. $\sqrt{kam}$ — > kamara, $\sqrt{cam}$ — > camara)

In the Vedic (language) there are changes or options in the formations of words etc. Here is the example of Punarvasū. (In the Vedas, the two stars Punarvasū may optionally be singular and connote a dual vide, Pāṇ. I. 2. 61).

6. The form nabhasvat (nabhas +vat 'like the sky' vaporous', retains ½ S though followed by — vat (vide the Vārtika- 'nabho 'ṅgiromanuṣāṁ vatyupasaṅkhyānam on Pāṇ. I. 4. 9 or by the *Vārtika Vṛṣaṇvasvaśvayoḥ/. The form Vṛṣaṇśva retains ½ n ½ even

---

*Being a technical and difficult subject, an explanation is added in the translation itself as mere literal translation would be unintelligible.

वृषण्वस्वश्वयोः ।

though the derivation is viśā aśvo yasya saḥ, (whereas in classical Sk. it would be Viśāśva. Sometimes the Parasmaipada is used in stead of the Ātmanepada (In Classical Sk., the prepositions or proverbs like pra -, ā -precede the verb and are called gati). But in the Vedic, these pre -positions are used after the verbs (as post-positions). They are called gatis (e.g. haribhyām yāhyoka ā RV. VII. 32.4) Here ā-yāhi is the verb but ā- is placed separately after the verb in the Vedic.

7. (In the Vedic) there is a change in the cases. For example, dadhnā juhoti, 'He offers oblations of curds (into the fire)'. Here the word dadhi is in the Instrumental case in stead of the Acc. case. But as per Pāṇ.II.3.3. the object of the verb √hu - - 'to sacrifice' takes the terminations of the Instr, as well as of the Acc. case.

The Aorist form of abhi + ut + √ sad - is abhyutsādayāmaka (instead of Cl. Sk –Classical Sanskrit- -abhyudasiṣadat) in the Vedic (as per Pāṇ. III.1.42), and dhvanayit (<√dhvan 'to sound') as per Pāṇ. III.1.51 (in Cl. Sk. adidhvanat is found. But in RV.I.162.15 we find : mā tvā'gnir dhvanayit). These are the prominent instances. The forms like niṣṭarkya (- nis +√kṛt — 'to cut') and others are similar[3] And also formations like gṛbhāya and others. Here √ gṛbh + śāyac √ gṛbhāya, the —h in grah 'to seize' is √ transformed to bh i.e. √grah - < √gṛbh -in Vedic (vide Pāṇ. III.1.84 and S. K. on it.[4] e.g. gṛbhāya jihvayā madhu (RV.VIII.17.5).

8. Due to optional formations (in the Vedic) the writers on this science desire (accept) changes in declension, conjugation, Padas (Parsmaipada and Ātmanepada,) gender, person, tense, consonants, vowels, causatives and yaṅ (the intensive suffix--ya).

9. The verse lists the following peculiar Vedic forms :

rātri : rātri + ñiṣ in the Vedic as per Pāṇ. IV.1.31 for class. Sk. rātri 'a night'.

Vibhvi : fem. of vibhu as per Pāṇ. IV 1.47 we get vibhu+ñiṣ (i.e. the affix—i) in forming the feminine.

Kadrū : As per Pāṇ. IV.1.71 the feminine affix --Ū*ṅi* (—Ū) comes after the words Kadrū 'tawny' (and kamaṇḍalu 'water bowl').

āviṣṭya : As per Vārttika on the above sūtra the affix—tyap is added to the word āvis in the Veda e.g. āviṣṭyo vardhate / Vājasaneyinaḥ : As per Pāṇ. IV.3.10.6 the affix—ṇini comes in the sense of "enunciated by him", after the word Śaunaka e.g. (Śaunakinah "who study the chandas as per Śaunaka." Similarly, Vājasaneya + ṇini = Vājasaneyin : who studies the Veda as per Vājasaneya.

10. The following Vedic forms are explained as below: Karṇebhiḥ : Instr. Pl. of Karṇa "an ear". The termination —ebhiḥ instead of the usual —ais as per bahulaṁ chandasi (Pāṇ. II.4.76.).

yaśobhagya : (yaśo-bhāgya— in the printed text of the NP is not correct) is dissolved as follows : yaśas tad eva bhagaḥ : This Karmadhāraya compound has bhaga changed to bhagya by the addition of the suffix—yat as per Pāṇ. IV.4.131,32.

yaśobhagya and others include forms like veśobhagya. caturakṣaram indicates four-lettered formulas like āśrāvaya astu śrauṣaṭ.[5] devāsaḥ : The Nom. pl. of deva 'a god' (vide Pāṇ. VII.1.50) sarva-devatāti : sarva-deva + tātil (pleonastic) e.g. savitā naḥ suvatu sarvatātim / —RV.X.36.14 tvāvat 'like you'. Here, as in asmad & yuṣmad, the affix—vatup showing similarity is added.

11. The following forms are formed thus :

ubhayāvinam : Here the possessive affix vini (i.e. vin) is added (optionally) as per Pāṇ. V.2.122 and the final—a in Ubhaya is lengthened as per Vārttika : Chandovit prakaraṇe dirghaś ceti vaktavyam /

Pralayādyāḥ is prob. a misprint.

Tṛcam : tri — Ṛc (a Sūkta with three Ṛks). This form is derived, thus : tri > tṛ by Samprasāraṇa + C<Tṛc.

*apaspṛdhethām

avyāt—as in vasubhir no avyāt ayo asman mukhas tathā / If ayo be a misprint for āpo, the quotation in the NP is probably :

apaspṛdhethām*—Imp. 2nd p. dual of apa+√spardh 'to challenge'). As per Pāṇ. VI.1.36, the reduplication of the root, vocalisation of ra and the elision of a irregularly is accepted in the Vedic.

avyāt*—As per Pāṇ. VI.1.116, the e or o retain their original form in the middle of Vedic verse in the case of avyāt (avadyāt, avakramuḥ, etc.) though 'a' in these has a 'v' & 'y' following it.

āpo asmān mātaraḥ śundhyantu / RV X.7.10 and the form is as per Pāṇ VI.1.118, the short a is retained after āpo (also 'uṣāṇo, Vṛṣṇo etc.)

12. The following forms are derived thus :

Sagarbhyaḥ : 'a brother of the whole blood, by the same father and mother'. Here sa = samāna 'common' but the affix—yaṅ (—ya) is as per Pāṇ. IV.4.114.

sthāpadi or asthāpadi (a misprint prob. for aṣṭāpadi ?) Ṛtvyam 'seasonal' ṛtau bhavam. This formation from ṛtu is as per Pāṇ. VI.4.175 the final —u is changed to —va (similarly vāstva < vāstu)

Rajiṣṭha : ṛju > iṣṭha 'the most straight-forward & delicate' vide Pāṇ. VI.4.162 for the change of ṛ > ra— before the affixes — iyas, — iṣṭha tri-pañcakam :— triṇi pañcakāni yatra Bahuvrihi comp.

Hiraṇyaya—'golden, abounding in gold'

Hiraṇya + ya (mayaṭ)

Hiraṇyayena is a part of the mantra hiraṇyayena savitā rathena (RV.1.35.2)

naram—(misprint ? otherwise no Vedic speciality) parame vyoman : instead of Vyomni, the Loc. sg. term is dropped as per supāṃ suluk /

13. The explanation of the following irregular forms :

urviyā (Sk. uru-ṇā) But —yā is affixed instead of —nā, as per Vārttika—ṛyāḍiyāji etc. on Pāṇ. VII. 1.39.

svaprayā—(?) Is it a misprint for svapnayā ?

vāravadhvāt—(?) Is it a misprint for vārayadhvāt ?

Aduha (?) The root √duh is obvious but the special formation—not clear.

Vadhi (?) The Vedic special form is Vadhim & not Vadhi. We have in RV. I.165.8, X.28.7 the form Vadhim from √Vadh. The Cl. Sk. form would be avadhiṣam.

yajadhvainam < yajadhvam + enam. These are joined after dropping — m of °dhvam.

Emasi — irregular for imaḥ by Pāṇ. VII.1.46.

snātvi (as in svinnaḥ snātvi malād iva — AV. VI.115. 3, VS.20.20). Also —tvi for Class. Sk. —tvā vide Pāṇ. VIII.1.49 (cf. pītvī < √pā — to drink) gatvā pacāsthabhiḥ : Out of this asthabhiḥ may be a misprint for aṣṭhabhiḥ. Instr. pl. of asthin. The rest is anybody's guess. (possibly gatvāya cāsthabhiḥ /).

14. (The following irregular forms are explained).

Gonām — Gen. Pl. of go 'a cow'--Pāṇ. VII. 1.57

Aparihvaratah As per Pāṇ. VII 2.31 √ hru is substituted for √hvar (Bhvādi 978) before a participial affix.

cāturi or āturi (?) prob. a misprint.

Grasita ppp. of √gras — (Cl. Sk. grasta) treated as seṭ (cf. skabhita) vide Pāṇ. VII.2.34.

Paśya — Nothing special.

Dadhat as in dadhad ratnāni dāśuṣe RV.IV.15.3. It is the Ved. subjunctive of √dhā.

Babhūtha—Perfect 2nd p. sg. of √bhū in Vedic, vide Pāṇ. VII.2.64.

Praminānti is prob. a misprint for praminanti for classical SK praminanti — mi -- is shortened to— mi — as per Pāṇ. VII.1.81

Avivṛdhat — Aor -- 3rd p. sg. of √vṛdh — As per Pāṇ. VII. 4.8., in Vedic (Chandas), ṛ is substituted invariably for penultimate ī or ṛ of a causative stem in the Reduplicative Aorist.

15. (The following forms are derived as follows :) mitrayu 'friendly-minded'. As per Pāṇ. VII.4.35, rules of lengthening or the substitution of --i for the final vowel of the stem before the affix kyac is not applicable in the Vedic.

Durasyu--duṣṭa ivā'carati & 'Wishing to do harm'. As per Pāṇ. VII.4.36, duṣṭa becomes duras — before the affix— kyac. [The NP. gives durasyā which is prob. a mis-print).

hātvā: Abs. of √hā 'to abandon' √hā. >> √hi (hi) optionally in Vedic (Pāṇ. VII.4.44).

Sudhita : 'well-placed' ppp. of Su —√dhā. Pāṇ. VII.4.45 sanctions √dhā >> ppp --dhita in Sudhita, Vasudhita, nemadhita.

Dadharti should have been dādharti. As per Pāṇ. VII.4.65, in Vedic the Caus. Aor. 3 p. sg. of √dhṛ becomes dādharti cf. dardharti, dardharṣi sanctioned in the same Sūtra.

Svavadbhih : Instr. pl. of Svavas. As per Vārt. on Pān. VII.4.45, —t is substituted for --s in the case of Svavas. 'He whose protection is good (derived from Su— √av) 'to protect well'.

Sasūva. — Perf. — 3 p. sg. of √sū 'to give birth to' Formation as per Pāṇ. VII.4.74.

Dhiṣva — Imp. II p. sg. of √dhā — as per Pāṇ. VII 4.45 (but Cl. Sk. form is dhatsva).

16. (the following forms are explained thus :)

praprāya as in praprāyam agniḥ (RV.VII.8.4) shows the reduplication of the prefix pra — as per Pāṇ. VIII.1.6 Pāṇini sanctions pra, sam, upa and ut as pādapūraṇas (the completers of the foot of a verse).

Harivate — Here v is substituted for m of the affix — mat, as the stem Hari ends in —i. Pāṇ. VIII.2. 15 sanctions this change for stems ending in —i —i or ī.

Akṣaṇvataḥ (a misprint for akṣaṇvantaḥ) vide RV. X. 71.7 (akṣaṇvantaḥ karṇavantaḥ sakhāyaḥ) ;

A— kṣaṇ — vat 'not injuring'. As per Pāṇ. VIII.2.16. The augment— nuṭ is added to the possessive affix, after stems ending in — an.

Supathi — tara : Supathin + tara * > Supathi-tara (as per Pāṇ. VIII.2.7) and —n ṇuṭ is augmented to tara by Pāṇ. VIII.2.17.

Rathi-tari : 'rathin — tari >rathi (Pāṇ. VIII.2.7) & lengthened to -rathi + tari as per Vārttika on VIII.2.17. nasat (? Is it nasatta <na — √ sad for Pāṇ. VIII. 2.61 sanctions nasatta and niṣatta.

Amnar : The original word is amnas 'unawares'. According to Pāṇ. VIII.2.70, it becomes amnar before Sandhi e.g. amnareva.

Bhuvaratho : Pāṇ. VIII.2.71. states that in Chandas —ru or —ra replace the final of the word Bhuvas.

17. (the special formations recorded in this verse)

Brūhyādeḥ : Acc. to Pāṇ. VIII.2.91 the first syllable of brūhi, preṣya, śrauṣaṭ, vauṣaṭ, and āvaha is pluta or prolated. Thus we say : agnaye 'nubrū3hi / (By the next Sūtra) both the syllables become prolated or Pluta as in 'O3śrā3vaya) ' when the Adhvaryu (the chief sacrificial) priest gives order to the Āgnidhra priest (who is to kindle the fire.).

Dāśvān — p.pf. from √daś — 'to honour' √daś + Kvasu but here the reduplication and the augment —i — are prohibited as per Pāṇ. VI.1.12.

Svatavān — nom. sg. of sva-tavas 'inherently powerful'. This formation takes place in case of yāpau but yāpau is obscure, (a misprint probably for Pāyu ?)

Tribhiṣṭvam <tribhis + tvam; As per Pāṇ. VII.3.103—S coming within the (Vedic) metrical foot is changed — Ṣ before the t — of tvam and of tatakṣuḥ.

nṛbhiṣṭutaḥ < nṛbhis -|- stutaḥ. Here ending —s of nṛbhis is changed to —ṣ— as per Pāṇ. VIII.3.105 the cerebralization of st — > ṣṭ - in ṣṭutaḥ and stoma in go-ṣṭoma (< go + stoma) is allowed.

18-19. (The following forms are derived as explained below).

Abhiṣuṇaḥ — As per Pāṇ. VIII. 3.107, the s — > ṣ — of the particle — ṣu is permissible when it stands in the beginning of a second word and preceded by a word ending in i etc. (in the Vedic) e.g. madhusthānam : madhuṣṭhānam.

Ṛtāvāha — obscure. Is it a misprint for Ṛtāṣāha, mentioned by Pāṇ. in Saheḥ pṛtanarṭābhyāṁ ca ? (Pāṇ. VIII.3.109).

nyaṣidat — Here — s — > — ṣ — in this form (though — s is preceded by ā) is permissible as per Pāṇ. VIII.3.119.

Ṇṛmaṇāḥ — As per Pāṇ. VIII.4.26, in the Vedic na of a second term is changed to ṇa when preceded by ṛ — even though there is a hiatus (Avagraha) between the two terms.

Optionals are of four types : sometimes it shows a tendency to add, sometimes to withhold, sometimes both are optional and sometimes a new substitute is added. Such is the word formation in the Vedic.

√ bhū (I. conj.), √ Vā (II conj). — These are the dhātus (roots indicating different conjugations). They are remembered as being Parasmaipadī.

20*. Thirty-six roots (dhātus) beginning with √edh — 'to prosper'— are Udātta (of acute accent) and Ātmanepadi.

*verses from 20 onwards are based on Pāṇinīya dhātupāṭha and the verses are practically quotations from it. For example, after listing 36 dhātus from edh—'to prosper' to √katth—'to boast', Pāṇ. Dhātupāṭha remarks :

edhādaya udāttā anudāttetaḥ ātmanebhāṣāḥ. And after listing 37 (No. 38 to 74) dhātus from √at 'to move constantly' to √śundh—' to purify or to get purified', the Dhātupāṭha concludes : atādaya udātta udāttetaḥ parasmai-bhāṣāḥ. NP. repeats or paraphrases in verse these remarks of Pānini's-Dhātupāṭha.

And thirtyeight dhātus beginning with √ at :- 'to go constantly' or 'to obtain' are Parasmaipadi.

21. Fortytwo dhātus beginning with √śi-, √kr-, are spoken of as belonging to Ātmanepada. Fifty dhātus beginning with √phakk- 'to move slowly' are laid down as udāttet i.e. Parasmai-padi.

22. Twentyone roots beginning with √varc — 'to shine' are spoken as Anudāttet or Ātmanepadi, while the group of forty-two dhātus beginning with √gup- 'to protect' are said to be udāttet (parasmaipadi).

23. Grammarians have stated that ten Dhātus beginning with √ghiṇ—'to take, to grasp' (cf. Pkt. √geṇha-) are anudāttet (Ātm. pada)[6] while twenty-seven roots[7] beginning with √aṇ- ('to breathe' are also Udāttet (Parasmaipada).

24. Grammarians have regarded thirty-four[8] Dhātus beginning with √ay[9] — 'to go' as Anudāttet (Ātm. pada), while seventy-two (in all) Dhātus[10] with √mavy[11] 'to bind' as its first are Parasmai-padis.

25. √dhāv — 'to run' is declared as the only root which is svaritet while fiftytwo Dhātus beginning with √kṣudh[12] — 'to be hungry' are spoken as Anudāttet (Ātm. padi).

26. Eighty Dhātus [13]beginning with √ghuṣ — 'to make noise', 'to proclaim' are regarded as Udāttet (Parasmaipada) while twenty-two Dhātus[14] from √dyut — 'to shine' are considered as Anudāttet (Ātm. pada).

27 In the group beginning with √ghaṭ — the thirteen roots are spoken as ṣit[15] and Anudāttet (Ātm. pada). Thereafter fiftytwo[16] dhātus from √Jval —'to burn' are regarded as Udāttet (Parasmaipadi).

28. √rāj — to shine is both Udātta and Svarita.[17] While the three roots √bhrāj, √bhrāś, √bhlāś, are spoken as Anudātta (Ātm. pada), while Dhātus from √syam — 'to shout' No. 851) onwards are Udāttet (Parasmaipadi).

29. There only one Dhātu √sah — 'to bear' (recorded as √ṣah in the Dhātupāṭha is Anudāttet and √ram — 'to play' is Ātm. padi. Thereafter three dhātus beginning with √ṣad (or √sad—) are udāttet, while four Dhātus e.g. √kuc — and others are Parasmaipadi.

30. Thereafter thirtyfive Dhātus beginning with √hikk-

-- 'to make an indistinct sound' (Dhātupāṭha — ibid Nos. 886—921 upto √guh -- 'to conceal) are Svaritet or both the Padas.[18] Similarly √Śri — 'to serve' and the four roots √bhṛ-, √hṛ- , √dhṛ— and √nī—are also Svaritet.

31. Fortysix Dhātus[19] from √dhe—'to drink' are said to be Parasmaipadi, while eighteen[20] dhātus from √smi 'to smile' are opined to be Ātm. padi.

32. Three roots beginning with √Pū 'to purify (Dhātu nos. 991-993) are described as Anudāttet (Ātm. padi). √hṛ— 'to take away' is Parasmai-padī, while the three roots √gup— 'to protect' (nos. 995-998) are Ātm. padī.

33. √rabh - , √labh—, √svaj -, √had—) these four roots are Anudāttet, while √Kṣvid-- 'to be wet' is Udāttet and fifteen roots from √skambh --(Dhātupāṭha records √skand—) are Parasmaipadī.

34. √kit — 'to desire' is Udāttet (Parasmaipadī) while √dān-- ('to cut' ' and √Śaṇ-- to shine are Ubhaya-padi (i.e. are found both Par. & Ātm. pd). Nine roots beginning with √pac - 'to cook' (Dhātu nos. 1021-1029 from √pac — to √vah 'in Pāṇ. Dhātupāṭha) are Svaritet. They are regarded as Parasmaipadī, (and Ātm. pd) as well.

35. Three more dhātus are Svaritet --. √Vad— and √vac -- both meaning 'to speak' are Parasmaipadī. In this way, one thousand and six are said to be the roots of the group of Dhātus beginning with √bhū (i.e. of the 1st conjugation).

DHĀTUS OF THE 2ND CONJUGATION

36. √*ad — 'to eat' and √han' — 'to kill or to go' are spoken of as belonging to Parasmaipada). And the four Dhātus beginning with √dviṣ 'to hate' (i.e. Dhātu Nos. 3-6 of Pāṇ. Dhātupāṭha) are regarded as Svaritet (both Par. pada and Ātm. pd.).

37. Here the Dhātu √cakṣ 'to speak' is regarded as *Ātm. pd., while thirteen roots from √ ir— 'to go' (Nos. 8-20 in Pāṇ. Dhātupāṭha) are Anudāttet (Ātm. pd).

*√vad is a misprint as this conjugation is called adādi and as such √ad— & not √vad (of the 1st conj.) can be the original.

the Dhātupāṭha states udātto anudātted atmanepadi /

38. O sage ! grammarians have proclaimed √sū — to give birth to and √śi — 'to sleep' as Ātmane-padīs, while seven Dhātus beginning with √sū (it should be √yu as per Dhātupāṭha).

39. O lord of sages ! Only one root viz. √ūṛṇu 'to cover' is said to be varita (i.e. both Par. pd & Ātm. pd), while three dhātus beginning with √ghu (a misprint for √dyu as evidenced in the Dhātu-pāṭha — Dhatu No. 30) are spoken as *Parasmaipadis.

40. O Nārada ! √stu — 'to praise' is the only root pronounced and remembered /as Par. pd. by the grammarians.

41. Eighteen Dhātus beginning with √rā 'to give' (prob. from √yā 'to go' to √vac 'to speak', in the Dhātupāṭha) are Par. pd. O Nārada ! Only √i — 'to study' (adhyayane) is declared as Ātm. pd.).

42. Four Dhātus from √vid — 'to know' to √rud — 'to weep', nos. 54-57 in the Dhātupāṭha are considered as Par. padi √svap — 'to sleep' is pointed as Par. pd.

43. √Śvas — 'to breathe' etc. (syamādayaḥ in the NP. is probably a misprint as per series of roots in the Dhātupāṭha) have been told by me as Parasmai-padī. √didhi 'to shine' and √vevi— 'to go' (rarely used in Cl Sk.) are Ātmanepadī, O sage.

44. Three roots beginning from √pṛth (prob. a misprint for √prath— 1st conj. are Ātm. and the Pāṇ. Dhātu-pāṭha reads: '68 √sasa, 69 √sasti svapne, 70 √vaśa kāntau' as the three Dhātus in the serial list of roots of 2nd conj. are proclaimed as Udāttat (Par. pd). *Carkarita is a term for any intensive formed without the syllable ya like carkariti < √kṛ—. √hnu — 'to cover' is declared as Anudātta, O excellent sage.

45. Thus seventythree roots have been said to be included in the 2nd conjugation (adādi gaṇa).

(Now begins the list of the 3rd conjugation -juhoṭyādayaḥ)

---

*Pāṇ. Dhātupāṭha. 2nd conj. enumerates four dhātus viz. √dyu-, √su-, √ku and √stu. NP. records the first-three in this verse and relegates √stu to the next (no. 40) verse.

Ṣasādaya udāttā udāttetaḥ parasmai bhāṣāḥ—Pāṇ. Dhātupāṭha.

This is listed as Dhātu No. 71 in the Dhātupāṭha.

DHĀTUS OF THE III CONJUGATION

The four roots from √dā (√hu ?) are regarded as parasmaipadi.[21]

47. √bhṛ is svaritet (both Par. pd & Ātm. pd) & 'ohāk' (√hā 'to abandon') is udāttet. √mā 'to measure' and √hā — 'to go' are Anudāttet. √dā — to give — √ dhā 'to hold', 'to contain' are symbolised as 'it' indicating their being svarita (both Par. pad and Ātm. pad).

47. Three roots beginning with vānitir (prob. a misprint for ṇijir in the Dhātupāṭha) are spoken of as Svarita (both Par. pd and Atm. pd.), while twelve dhātus from √ghṛ—to besprinkle' are regarded as Parasmaipadīs.

48a. Thus twentytwo roots have been mentioned in the 3rd conjugation (hvādika gaṇa).

DHĀTUS OF THE IV CONJUGATION

48b. Twentyfive Dhātus beginning with √div.—'to shine' have been spoken of as being Parasmaipadī.

49. O Nārada ! There are two Ātmanepadi Dhātus viz. √sū—'to give birth to' and √dū. 'to trouble'. The seven Dhātus beginning with √pū—are regarded as Ātmanepadī.

DHĀTUS OF THE V CONJUGATION (SVĀDI GAṆA)

55. Nine roots beginning with √su — 'to extract soma juice' are described as being svaritet (both Par. & Ātm. pd), while seven roots such as dunoti (√du -- to trouble) are Parasmaipadīs.

56-57a. The two roots √aś — 'to pervade' and √stigh — — 'to mount over' are known as Anudāttet (Ātm. pd.), while fourteen Dhātus beginning with √tik—'to go', 'to assail' are Parasmaipadī here. O excellent Brāhmaṇa ! Thirty two dhātus are spoken of as constituting the svādika gaṇa (V conjugation).[24]

DHĀTUS OF THE VI CONJUGATION (TUDĀDI GANA)

57b. O excellent sage ! Six dhātus[25] beginning with √tud— 'to trouble' are said to be svaritet (both Par. pd. & Ātm. pd.)

58. √ṛṣ — 'to go' is udāttet (Par-pd.), while nine roots from √juṣ—'to be pleased' are Ātm. pd., and one hundred and five Dhātus[26] beginning from √vraśc — 'to cut' are declared as Udāttet.

59. O chief of sages ! Only one Dhātu √gur 'to make exertion' is declared as Udāttet. Four roots beginning with √nu — 'to praise are considered as Parasmaipadī.

60. The Dhātu √ku —'to sound' is spoken of as Anudāttet (Ātm. pd.). Here ends the Kuṭādi gaṇa. √pṛ— 'to be active' and √mṛ— 'to die' are Ātmanepadīs, while six Dhātus from √pi-, √ri-- 'to move 'to go' are Parasmaipadīs.

61. Two roots viz. √dṛ. -- 'to honour', and √dhṛ --'to exist, to live' are spoken of as Ātmanepadīs, while sixteen Dhātus from √pracch — 'to ask' are Parasmaipadīs.

62. Thereafter, O sage, six roots beginning with √mil— 'to join' are spoken of as svaritet (both Par. pd. and Ātm. pd.) And Three Dhātus beginning with √Kṛt--'to cut' are Parasmaipadīs.

63a. Thus there are one hundred and fifty seven dhātus in the VI conjugation (tudādi gaṇa).

ROOTS OF THE VII CONJUGATION

63b. Nine roots beginning with √rudh — 'to obstruct are svaritet (both Par. and Ātm. pd.), Kṛti (Veṣṭane) is parpadī.

64. Three Dhātus from √indh—to kindle (& √khid — & √vid) are said to be Anudāttet (Ātm. pd.) (Twelve Dhātus from) √śiṣ — 'to leave as remainder', √piṣ— 'to reduce to powder' are udāttet. In this way, there are twentyfive roots in the VII conjugation (rudhādi gaṇa).

DHĀTUS OF THE VIII CONJUGATION (TANĀDI GAṆA)

65. Seven Dhātus[27] beginning with √tan — 'to spread' are proclaimed as being Svarita (both Par. & Ātm. padīs) √van — 'to beg', 'to request' and √man — 'to think' are Atmanepadi and √kṛ— (technically called ḍukṛñ) 'to do' is Svarita (both Par. and Ātm. Pd.).

66a. In this way, ten dhātus have been proclaimed as belonging to the eighth conjugation.

DHĀTUS OF THE IX CONJUGATION (KRYĀDI GAṆA)

66b-67. Seven Dhātus[28] beginning with √kri—'to buy' belong to both the Padas. Four dhātus beginning with √stambh and which are used (by Pāṇini) in the Sūtras are Parasmaipadī. O chief of sages, twenty two dhātus from √krudh— 'to get angry' (This is obviously a misprint for √'knūñ' as stated in the Dhātupāṭha) are Udāttet (Par. pd.)

68. √Vṛ — 'to select' is Ātmanepadī. Twenty-one Dhātus from √Śranth —'to loosen' are Parasmaipadī while √grah — 'to take' is svaritet (both Par. padī & Ātm. padī).

69a. In this way fiftytwo roots[29] have been enumerated in the IX conjugation by the learned.

DHĀTUS OF THE X CONJUGATION: (CURĀDI GAṆA)

69B. One hundred and thirtysix Dhātus beginning from √cur — 'to steal' belong to (both) parasmaipada and Ātmanepada.

70. O sage ! Eighteen (but actually thirtynine roots from 140 √cit — to 178 √kusm--) Dhātus are Ātmanepadī. O sage ! Roots from √carc — 'to study' upto √dhṛṣ (Dhātu nos. 318) are declared as belonging to both Parasmaipada and Ātmanepada.

71. Fortyeight Dhātus from √kath — (Dhātus 319-365)

—known as adantas, and ten Dhātus beginning from √pad — (i.e. Dhātus 366-375) are Ātmanepadī.

72. Here eight roots beginning from √Sūtr 'to cover' are spoken as belonging to both Parasmaipada and Ātmanepada by the wise. In the sense of a root (verb) the prātipadika gets the affix ṇic (—i) and is formed in most cases like the application of the —iṣṭha.

73-74. This affix —i is in the sense 'does for the sake of' or 'tells the other'. In the sense of causative, this ṇic is added. Eight roots beginning with √Citra (root no. 385 onwards) upto √Saṅgrāma (root no. 390) are spoken as Anudāttet by the learned grammarians. Sixteen Dhātus from √Stoma 'to praise, are the illustrations of adanta dhātus.

75. The meaning of "optionally" (bahulam etan nidarśanam—as stated in the Gaṇa-pāṭha) is that it includes all the remaining dhātus irrespective of their use in (Pāṇini's) Sūtras, laukika Sanskrit and the Chāndasa (Vedic) language. All dhātus belong to all conjugations and have different meanings.

76. In addition to these roots, dhātus ending in the affixes beginning with —san (i.e. the twelve affixes viz. —san, —kyac, —kāmyac, —kyaṅ, —kyas, —ācāra-kvip, —ṇic, —yaṅ, —yak, —āya, —iyaṅ and —niṅ.) are also called roots, and also Denominatives (e.g. Garuḍāyate — acts like a Garuḍa). In this way innumerable number of Dhātus are formed here. O Nārada. Here it is explained in a nutshell. The details are given in the relevant treatises.

77. In Dhātus ending in the vowels, all Dhātus with the exception of those ending in —ū and —ṛ and the roots √yu- √ru √kṣṇu, √śi, √snu, √nu, √kṣu, √śvi, √ḍi, √śri, √Vṛ (of both Padas)— are regarded as Anudātta or Aniṭ.

78. The following is the list of one hundred and two Dhātus ending in consonants which are Anudātta or Aniṭ.
√śakḷ, √pac, √muc, √ric, √vac, √vic, √sic, √pracch, √tyaj, √nij, √bhaj, √bhañj, √bhuj, √bhrasj, √masj, √yaj, √yuj, √ruj, √rañj, vi √ ji, √svañj, √sañj, √sṛj

79. √ad, √kṣud, √khid, √chid, √tud, √nud, √pad, (4th conj), √bhid, √vid, vi-√nad, √śad, √sad, √svid, √skand, √had, √krudh, √budh,

80. √bandh, √yudh, √rudh, √rādh, √vyadh, √śudh,

√sādh, √sidh, √man (IV conj.), √han, √āp, √kṣip, √chup, √tap, √tip, √tṛp, √dṛp.

81. √lip, √lup, √vap, √śap, √svap, √sṛp, √yabh, √rabh, √labh, √gam, √nam, √yam, √ram, (not rabhiḥ i.e. √rabh-- as in the text of the NP.), √kruś, √daṁś, √diś, √dṛś, √mṛś, √riś, √ruś, √liś, √viś, √spṛś, √kṛṣ.

82. √tviṣ, √tuṣ, √duṣ, √puṣ, (IV conj.) √piṣ, √viṣ, √śiṣ, √śuṣ, √ślis, √ghas, (= ad), √vas, √dah, √dih, √duh, √nah, √mih, √ruh, (√lih, √vah.)

83b-85. Ca and others are called Nipātas.[30] The 'pre'-positions like pra—are known as gatis (gavayaḥ in the NP should have been gatayaḥ); words which have been created in different quarters, regions and periods have a number of connotations. And, O Brāhmaṇa , they are characterised by all genders. Here Gaṇapāṭha, Sūtrapāṭha Dhātupāṭha Anunāsika Pāṭha are called Pārāyaṇa.

O Nārada ! All words whether laukika (current) or Vedic — are permanent and imperishable.

86a. The vocabulary collected by grammarians is hence intended for recitation.

86b.-88. The formation of the (already formed, permanent) words is briefly explained by (the study of) its original form (the noun base or root), terminations, substitutes, the augment, etc.

In this manner a bit of Nirukta has been briefly related to you. Who is capable of recounting it in its entirety, as it is infinite (limitless), O Nārada ?

CHAPTER FIFTYTHREE

1. Hantīti haṁsaḥ.

2. $\sqrt{}$hiṁs 'to kill' : hiṁs—a = hiṁs a & metathesis by Pān. VI. 3. 109. Bhaṭṭoji Dikṣita quotes this very verse in the NP. to elucidate the above sūtra of Pāṇini. If Bhattoji Dikṣita is not presumed to have consulted the NP. both S.K. (Siddhānta Kaumudī) and the NP. used a common source.

3. As a matter of fact though the form niṣṭarkya is sanctioned by Pāṇ. III.1.123 the formation is extremely irregular.

nis + $\sqrt{}$kṛt + ya (ṇyat instead of the regular kyap) and the root $\sqrt{}$kṛt becomes $\sqrt{}$tṛk and we get niṣṭarkya.

4. As a matter of fact the change—bh>—h is accepted by modern linguists and Vedic $\sqrt{}$ gṛbh- >class. Sk $\sqrt{}$gṛh. grah—is more natural linguistically.

5. In the Vedic, the following seventeen letters are implied in akṣara-saṁtīha (collection of letters viz. āśrāvaya (4 letters), astu śrauṣaṭ (4 letters), ye yajāmahe (5 letters), yaja (2 letters) and vaṣaṭ (2 letters) = 17 letters in all.

29. Pāniniya Dhātupāṭha lists sixty one roots in this conjugation.

30. Pāṇini gives no definition of a Nipāta, but states a number of particles with no gender, number or sense beginning with ca : cādayo'sattve /

CHAPTER FIFTYFOUR

Mathematics and Astronomy

Sanandana said :

1. I shall now set out the auxiliary (of the Veda) called Jyotiṣa which had been enunciated by Brahmā in days of yore and through the mere knowledge of which men can attain the fulfilment of their ordained duties.

2. O Brāhmaṇa ! the science of Jyotiṣa, which has been expounded in four lakhs of verses, falls into three sections, devoted, respectively, to mathematics and astronomy (Gaṇita), horoscopy (Jātaka) and natural astrology (Saṁhitā).

3-4a. Topics of Mathematics and astronomy. In the Gaṇita section have been set out the arithmetical operations (*vv.*12b-59); computation of the mean and true positions of Planets (vv. 6o-127); 'the questions' (on time, place and direction)[1] (vv. 128-53a); lunar and solar eclipses, (vv. 153b-65a); the diagrammatic representation thereof,[2] (gnomonic) shadow, (vv. 165b-67a); elevation of the lunar horns (vv. 167b-69), (planetary) conjunction (*vv.*170-73) and the (vyati-)pātas[3] (*vv.*174-87).

4b. Topics of Horoscopy. In the Jātaka section are treated — the signs (rāśi) (of the zodiac), their divisions (and properties); Nature of the planets (and their properties; (Manifold inferior) births, tion (of planets); Miscellaneous matters (relating to the association of planets) :

7. Malefic combination (of planets; Female horoscopy; Death; Reconstruction of lost horoscopes; and Effects of decanates.

8. Topics of Natural astrology. The contents of the Saṁhitā section are: Effects of the motion of the planets (across the different signs) (vv. 1-108); Abdalakṣaṇa (Characteristics of the year) (vv. 109-33a); Tithi (Lunar day) (*vv.*133b-56a); Vāra (Weekday) (vv. 156b-67a); Nakṣatra (Asterism) (vv. 167b-211a); Yoga[4] (vv. 211b-19a); Tithyartha or Karaṇa[5] (vv. 219b-23).

MATHEMATICS

12b-14a. Notational places. Eka (one), daśa (ten), śata

(hundred), sahasra (thousand), ayuta (ten thousand), lakṣa (lakh), prayuta (ten lakhs/million), koṭi (crore), arbuda, abja, kharva, nikharva, mahāpadma, śaṅku, jaladhi, antya, madhya, parārdha—these are the names (of the notational places), each succeeding one being ten times (the preceding).

14b. Addition and subtraction. Addition and subtraction (of numbers) can be done either in a forward or in a backward manner.[6]

15a. Multiplication. In multiplication, the multiplicand (guṇya) is multiplied up to its last digit (by the multiplier) (and the products added together).[7]

15b. Division. O sage ! In division that is the quotient (phala) which when multiplied by the divisor is completely subtractable (from the dividend).

16a. Square. The product of a number multiplied by itself is called varga (square); the learned call it also (by the term) kṛti.

16b-18a. Square root. (Mark off the odd digits of the number whose square root is required.) Having subtracted the (greatest possible) square from the last odd place, keep that 'root' apart. Double that 'root' and divide the remainder and place the quotient alongside the previously obtained 'root'. Subtract, O Brāhmaṇa, the square of that and again divide as before by the (newly formed) 'root'. O great sage, by repeating as above (till all the digits are completed) the square root is obtained.

18b-21a. Cube and cube root. The product of the multiplication thrice of the same number is called its ghana (cube). The method to derive the cube root (pada) is as follows : The first place (unit's digit of the number whose cube root is required) is termed 'odd'; the next two digits (i.e., the tens and hundreds) are termed 'even.' (Mark off the digits of the number into groups of three digits each in this manner, each group having one 'odd' and two 'even-s'). Subtract from the last (group having an) odd place the (greatest possible) cube; that is the cube root (mūla) (of that group). Divide (the next) even place with thrice the square of the (previous) cube root and place the quotient alongside the previous cube root. Square the new quotient and multiply it by three and by the last cube root and subtract it (from the next even place). Subtract, the cube (of the new cube root-digit) from the next odd place. Repeat the process and the cube root of the number is obtained.

21b. Fractions. Two fractions are reduced to a common denominator when their numerators and denominators are multiplied by the denominator of one by that of the other.

22. Fractions of fractions. O sage ! Enquirers into science should understand that in fractions of fractions (bhāga-prabhāga), the products of their numerators and of their denominators give the correct figures (of the numerator and denominator of the resultant fraction).

23-24a. Associated and dissociated fractions. Associated fractions (bhāgānubandha) and dissociated fractions (bhāgāpavāha) are those in which a number is increased or decreased (by a fraction of its own). Here, multiply the whole number by the denominator (talasthahāra), ascertain whether the fraction is positive or negative and accordingly add to or subtract from it the numerator.

24b. Addition and subtraction of fractions. O sage ! (Addition and subtraction of fractions are effected by) adding together or subtracting one from the other their numerators (after reducing the fractions) to a common denominator.

25a. Denominator of an integer. When a denominator is not attached to a number, take 1 as its denominator.

25b-26. Multiplication and division of fractions. The product of the multiplication of two fractions is obtained by dividing the product of the numerators by the product of the denominators. In the division of two fractions, the numerator and denominator of the divisor are inverted and the process of multiplication applied.

27. Square etc. of fractions. For the square, cube, square root and cube root of fractions, calculate the respective squares etc. of the numerator and of the denominator. These for zero are always zero.

28-29. Inverse operations. When the result (of certain operations) is 'given' (dṛśya) and the original number is to be found (rāśiprasiddhaye), calculate taking the denominator as the numerator and the numerator as the denominator, the square as the square root and the square root as the square, minus as plus and plus as minus. However, in such cases of inverse operation where a part (of an item) has been added to or subtracted from it, the denominator to which the numerator has been added to or subtracted from should be taken as the denominator, and the denominator as such should be taken as the numerator; the rest (of the calculations are to be done) as before.

30. Operations with assumed numbers (Iṣṭakarma). When an intended number (uddiṣṭa-rāśi) has been multiplied, divided, has a part of its taken away from it or added to it (and the result is dṛṣṭa 'known'), the intended number can be found by multiplying that result by an assumed number and dividing by the resultant (obtained by subjecting the assumed number to all the said operations).

31. Operations with sums and differences. The difference (of two numbers) when added to or subtracted from the sum (of those two numbers) and (the result) divided by two, will give the two numbers.[8] (This operation is called) Saṅkrama. The difference of the squares (of two numbers) will give their sum.[9] (And from the said sum and difference), the individual numbers (can be found as stated above).

32-34. Methods to get perfect squares based on any assumed number (vargakarma). Multiply the square of an assumed number by 8 (gaja), subtract 1, halve it and divide by the assumed number. This would be one (number). Square this number and add 1. This would be another such number.[10]

Or, 1 divided by twice the assumed number and the assumed number added is one (number). The other number is 1. The sum or difference of these two numbers reduced by one would be the squares of the two (desired) numbers.

Or, multiply the square of the square and the cube of the assumed number and add 1 to the first. The two desired numbers are obtained. These are according to the methods to be adopted in arithmetic (vyakta-gaṇita) and algebra (avyakta-gaṇita).

35-36. Operation involving the addition of a quantity to squares. When a resultant (dṛṣṭa) is obtained by adding to or subtracting from a square its root multiplied by a multiplicand, that resultant should be added to the square of half the multiplicand and the root of the result calculated. To this result half the multiplicand is added (when guṇaghanamūla had been subtracted) and subtracted (when the guṇaghanamūla had been added) and the result squared. (This would give the required number). (This is called) Guṇa-(Karma).

When, however, the resultant (dṛśya) is less or more by a part of the (required) number, the resultant and the root are to be appropriately reduced or increased and using them the required number is calculated as before.

37. Rule of three (In a Trairāśika) the Pramāṇa (argument) and Icchā (requisition) are to be of the same denomination and (are to be placed) at the beginning and at the end. Phala (fruit) (which would be of a different denomination) would be placed in the middle. Phala multiplied by Icchā and divided by Pramāṇa (ādya) will yield the Icchā-phala. In the Inverse (rule of three), (the method is) reversed.

38. Rule of five etc. In Pañcarāśika etc. the pramāṇa side and the phala side are properly set down. By dividing the product of the larger number (of quantities) by the product of the smaller number (of quantities) the result is obtained.

39a. Capital and interest. Capital is obtained through calculation with an assumed number (iṣṭakarma-vidhi, see verse 30, above). That subtracted from the composite amount (of capital and interest) will give the interest (kalāntara).

39b-40a. Rate multiplied by time, and the interest multiplied by the invested time are to be calculated and kept independently. Each divided by their sum and multiplied by the composite amount, would yield results which are respectively the capital and the interest.

40b-41a. (In the matter of the loan of different amounts for different periods, the individual income is identical), while arranging the sides (as in Pañcarāśika etc., see above, verse 38), if the product of the smaller number of quantities and the months be greater than the product of the larger number of quantities, the interest divided by the total number of months, would give the rate.

41b. (In the case of investments by different people making up the capital), the investment by each (kṣepa) multiplied by the total income (miśra) and divided by the total investment (kṣepayoga), would give the (proportionate) income (phala).

42a. Time for filling a tank. (When different pipes individually take different times to fill a tank, in order to find the time required to fill the tank if all the pipes are opened together), divide the denominators by the numerators of the individual fractions of time taken by each to fill the tank), find the sum (of the new fractions obtained) and (with that sum) divide 1. The time to fill (the tank) is obtained.

42b-43. Geometrical progression (Guṇottaraśreḍhi). The sum of the series in geometrical progression (mānaṁ guṇottare) (is found thus): when the number of terms (gaccha) is odd, reduce it by 1 and multiply; when it is even, halve it and square. (Continue the process) till the number ends. Then, beginning from the last term (gacchānta) perform backwards (vyasta) the operations of multiplication (guṇa) and squaring (varga) (in continuation). From the result subtract 1, divide the remainder by 'guṇaka-1' and multiply by the first member of the series (prāg-ghna).[11]

44-45a. Triangles and quadrilaterals. In the case of plane figures (kṣetra), like triangles and quadrilaterals (tri-caturaśraka), the following apply; The hypotenuse (karṇa) is the square root of the sum of the squares of the base (bhuja) and altitude (koṭi). The base would be the square root of the difference between the squares of the hypotenuse and the altitude. And, the altitude would be the square root of the difference between the squares of the hypotenuse and the base.[12]

45b-46a. (The rational sides of a right angled triangle, as calculated from any two numbers would be : (1) The square of the difference of two (natural) numbers added to twice the product of the numbers, which is equal to the sums of their squares; (ii) the product of the sums and differences of the two numbers, which is equal to the difference of their squares, and (iii) twice the product of the numbers.[13]

46b. Circumference of a circle. O sage, the diameter of a circle multiplied by 22 (ākṛti) and divided by 7 (adri) will give the circumference of a circle.[14]

47-48. Relation of Sine, Reversed sine and Diameter. Experts in trigonometry say: Reversed sine (śara) is given by multiplying together the sum and difference of the sine (jyā) and the diameter (vyāsa), finding the square root thereof and halving the result. The sine (jyā) is given by (diameter-minus-reversed sine) multiplied by the reversed sine, finding its root and doubling it. And, the diameter is obtained by squaring half sine, dividing it by the reversed sine and adding to the result the reversed sine.[15]

49-50a. Sine of an arc. Let the (circumference minus arc) multiplied by the circumference be called 'First' (prāg). One fourth the square/of the circumference is multiplied by 5 and the 'First' subtracted therefrom. With the result divide (Diameter 'First'). O brāhmaṇa ! the result obtained would be the sine (jyā) (of the relevant arc).[16]

50b-51a. Arc from sine. One fourth the sine is multiplied by the square of the circumference and divided by four times the diameter to which the sine is added. The result is subtracted from one fourth the square of the circumference and the square root (of the same is calculated). Thus, when subtracted from half the circumference, gives the arc.[17]

51b-52a. Measure of corn heaped up in a cone.

When coarse, medium and fine grain are heaped, the heights (vedha) (of the cones so formed) would, respectively, be one-ninth (aṅka) one-tenth (āśā) and one-eleventh (iśa) of the respective circumferences. The measure of the grain in cubic cubits (ghana-kara) would be given by the square of one-sixth (aṅga) multiplied by the height.[18]

52b-53a. Measure of water in a tank. The length of the (stretch of) water multiplied by its breadth and height in inches and divided by 3100 (khakhendurāma) will give the volume of water in droṇa measures.[19]

54b-55a. Measure of rubble. The height, breadth and length, in inches, O brāhmaṇa, of a heap of rubble, multiplied together and divided by 1150 (kha-akṣa-iśa) would give its volume in droṇa measures.

55b-56a. Measure of metal. In the case of metal pieces, the length, breadth and height, in inches, multiplied together and divided by 585 (bāṇa-ibha-mārgaṇa) should be declared to be the volume of the heap in droṇa measures.

56b-57. Gnomon and the lighted lamp. O sage ! the gnomon[20] multiplied by the distance between the lamp and the gnomon and divided by the height of the lamp less the gnomon, gives the gnomonic shadow.[21]

Again, the gnomon multiplied by the distance between the gnomon and the lamp and divided by the gnomonic shadow, gives the height of the lamp.[22]

58. The height of the lamp-minus-gnomon multiplied by the gnomonic shadow and divided by the gnomon will give the distance between the lamp and the gnomon.[23]

58b-59a. Two gnomons and the lighted lamp. The distance between the shadow tips multiplied by the shadow and divided by the difference between the shadows gives the base (bhūmi of the relevant shadow).[24]

59. The base multiplied by the gnomon, and divided by the shadow gives the height of the lamp by the rule of three.[25]

ASTRONOMY

Mean Planets (Madhya-graha)

60. (Operational) mathematics has been set out concisely, as above. Now, shall be set out in brief, (the computation of) the mean planets etc. according to (astronomical) mathematics.

61-62a. The aeon (yuga). O brāhmaṇa ! The measure of the (great) aeon (mahā-yuga, caturyuga) is said to be 43,20,000 (khacatuṣka-rada-arṇava) (divine) years.[26] Four tenths of it is said to be the kṛta-yuga; three tenths form the Tretā-yuga; two tenths the Dvāpara-yuga; and one tenth the Kali-yuga.

62b. Seventyone yugas plus one kṛta-yuga period form (the time duration of) one Manu.[27]

63. O foremost among brāhmaṇas ! fourteen Manus occur during the day-time of God Brahmā. That much period, again, O foremost among brāhmaṇas ! is said to be His night.

64. O Nārada ! the years that have gone by from the beginning of creation by God Brahmā might be consolidated and the computation of planets could be commenced from that beginning. Alternatively, the computation could be done from the beginning of any desired yuga.

65. Revolutions of the planets. The number of eastward revolutions (bhagaṇa) in a yuga (i.e., mahā-yuga) or (caturyuga), of the Sun, Mercury (Budha) and Venus (Śukra) and of the śighrocca[28] of Mars, Saturn and Jupiter is 43,20,000.

66. The number of revolutions of the Moon is 5,77,53,336; that of Mars is 22,96,832.

67. The number of revolutions of the śighrocca of Mercury (Budha) is 1,79,37,060. The revolutions of Jupiter are 3,64,220.

68. The number of revolutions of the śighrocca of Venus is 70,22,376. The revolutions of Saturn are 1,46,568.

69. The number of revolutions of the Moon's mandocca (apogee) is 4,88,203 and the retrograde revolutions of the Moon's ascending node (pāta) are 2,32,238.

70. Terrestrial and Lunar days.[29] The time from sunrise to sunrise is a terrestrial civil day (bhūmi-sāvana-vāsara). The number of terrestrial days in a (mahā-yuga) is 1,57,79,17,828. The number of lunar days (tithi-s) in the yuga is 1,60,30,00,080.

71. Additive months[30] and Subtractive days.[31] (In a mahā-yuga) there are 15,93,336 additive months (adhimāsa) and 2,50,82,252 subtractive days (tithi-kṣaya).

72. Solar months[32] and lunar months.[33] There are (in a mahā-yuga) 5,18,40,000 solar months (ravi-māsa), and the number of lunar months is 5,34,33,336.

73-74. Mandoccas or Apogees of the planets.[34] The number of eastward revolutions of the Sun's apogee (Śūrya-mandocca) in a Kalpa period is 387; that of Mars 204; that of Mercury 368, that of Jupiter 900; that of Venus 535; and that of Saturn 39.

74b-76a. Pātas or Nodes of the planets.[35] Now, to the retrograde (vāma) revolutions of the nodes (of the planets) in a Kalpa: Of Mars it is 214, of Mercury 488, of Jupiter 174, of Venus 903 and of Saturn 662.

76b-79. Ahargaṇa or number of days from the epoch.[36] The (solar) years, called bhagaṇa that have elapsed in the current yuga are converted into (solar) months (by multiplying them by 12) and added to the (lunar) months Madhu, (Caitra)—Śukla (bright fortnight). etc. which have elapsed (in the current year), and the result is written down separately (in two places). It is then multiplied by the number of additive months (in a yuga) and divided by the number of solar months (in a yuga). The quotient got (which will be the elapsed additive months) is added to the result (in months) got before and converted into days (by multiplying by 30). The number of days elapsed (in the current month) is added to it and the result written down in two places. (In one place) it is multiplied by the subtractive days (tithikṣaya) (in the Yuga) and divided by the number of lunar days (in the Yuga). The quotient obtained would be the elapsed subtractive days. These (elapsed subtractive days) are subtracted from the result (kept as above, in the second place). The result would be the number of elapsed terrestrial days (from the commencement of the yuga) to the previous midnight at Laṅkā.[37]

79b-80a. Lords of the day etc. The Lords of the current day, month and year are reckoned, as counted from the Sun. Thus, (the ahargaṇa) divided by 7 and (the remainder) counted from Sunday will give the name of the Lord of the day. (Again, the ahargaṇa) is divided by the number of days in a month and that in a year (viz., 30 and 360); the quotients are then multiplied, respectively, by 2 and 3, and the products increased by 1. The results are divided by 7 and the remainders counted from the Sun will give the Lords of the present month and year, respectively.

81b-82a. Mean planets. The number of revolutions of a planet (in a Mahāyuga) multiplied by the (currently) elapsed terrestrial days and divided by the number of terrestrial days (in the yuga) will give the elapsed revolutions of the planet (in signs, degrees etc.).

82b-83a. Mean apogees and nodes. In the same manner, can be computed the mean positions of the apogees with direct motion, mentioned before. The nodes, too, (should be computed) similarly, but the results have to be subtracted from the circle (cakra, 180° or 12 signs) because of their retrograde motion).

83b-84a. Measurements of the Earth. The diameter of the Earth is 1600 yojanas.[38] The square there is to be multiplied by 10, and the square root of the product will give the circumference of the Earth.

84b. The Earth's circumference multiplied by the sine colatitude (lambajyā) (of a given place) and divided by the radius (trijivā)[39] is the exact circumference of the Earth at that place.

85-86a. Deśāntara correction to due terrestrial longitude. The Deśāntara (i.e., the distance of the place, in yojanas, along the said local circumference, from Zero or Laṅkā-Ujjain meridian) is multiplied by the daily motion of the planet (in minutes) and divided by the local circumference of the Earth. The quotient, which would be in minutes (kalā), should be subtracted from the mean planet (at Laṅkā, vide verse 81b-82a, above) if the place is east of the meridian, and added if it is to the west of the meridian. The result would be the mean position of the planet at the given place.

86b-87a. The central meridian. On the central meridian, which extends from the capital of the demons (Laṅkā) to the divine mountain (Meru), are (the cities of) Avantikā (Ujjain), Rohitaka and the one near the 'Tank' (Kurukṣetra).

87b-88a. Beginning of the weekday (Vārapravṛtti). A weekday (at a place) commences (at midnight at that place, which would be) midnight (at Laṅkā meridian, vide verse 79) to which the deśāntara-nāḍis (time-difference due to terrestrial longitude) are added (if the place is) to the east and subtracted from (if the place is) to the west (of the meridian).

88b-89a. Mean-position of a planet at any time. The desired time in nāḍi-s (after the local midnight as calculated above) multiplied by the mean daily motion of the planet and divided by 60 gives a result in terms of minutes. This, when added (to the mean position at midnight) if the time taken after midnight and subtracted from it before midnight, will give the position (of the planet) at the desired time.

89b-91a. Vikṣepa or Celestial latitude of the Moon and the planets.[40] The Moon is deflected by its node towards north and south from the limit of its declination, the maximum deviation being 1/80 of a circle (i.e. 4°30'). Jupiter (is similarly deflected) by twice one-ninth (i.e., 2/9) thereof (i.e., of the deflection of the Moon (i. e., 2/9 of 4°30' = 1°), Mars thrice (i.e., 3/9 of 4°30 = 1° 30') and Mercury, Venus and Saturn are deflected four times (i.e., 4/9 of 4°30' = 2°).

TRUE PLANETS (SPHUṬA-GRAHA)

91b-93a. Primary Sines. The eighth part of the minutes contained in a sign (rāśi) is the first sine (jyārdha).[41] That divided by itself, the quotient subtracted from the sine and the remainder added to the sine will give the second sine. In the same manner, divide, successively, the sines found by the first sine, subtract (the sum of) the quotients from the divisor and add the remainder to the previous sine. The result will be the next sine. Thus the 24 sines are to be calculated successively.[42]

93b-94a. Krānti or declination. The sine of Maximum declination (Parama-apakramajyā) is 1397.[43] When any sine is multiplied by this and divided by trijivā (sine 90°, i.e., 3438), the arc of the result would be the declination (of the planet required).

94b-95a. Sines re. planetary positions. When (the longitude of) the planet is subtracted from that of its mandocca (higher apsis of the equation of the centre) or from its śighrocca (higher apsis of the equation of conjunction), the remainder is its kendra anamoly); the pada (quadrant) (of the kendra is noted, and from that) its base-sine (bhuja-jyā) and perpendicular-sine (koṭi-jyā) are found.[44]

95b-96a. In an odd (viṣama) quadrant the base-sine is reckoned from the part gone by (gata) and the perpendicular-sine from the part yet to be covered (gamya). In an even quadrant (sama), the base-sine is reckoned from the part yet to be covered and the perpendicular-sine from the part gone by.

96b-98a. Derivation of sines of arcs. (To derive the sine of any arc, e.g., the kendra-minus-planet, convert the arc) to minutes and divide by 225 (tattva-locana); the result would be the number of the preceding tabular sine (jyā-piṇḍaka). Multiply the remainder (in minutes) by the difference of the preceding and following tabular sines and divide by 225 (tattva-locana). The quotient obtained is added to the preceding tabular sine; the result would give the sine (of the arc taken).

The same procedure is to be adopted also for versed sines (utkramajyā).

100b-101a.[45] Derivation of arcs from sines. Subtract from the given sine the next less tabular sine; multiply the remainder by 225 (tattvāśvi) and divide by the difference between the next lower and next higher tabular sines. Add the quotient to the product of the serial number of the next less sine and 225. The result would be the arc (of the sine taken).

101b-103a. Manda-paridhi (Epicycle of the apsis or the equation of the centre). The number of degrees of the Sun's mandaparidhi is 14, and that of the Moon 32, at the end of the even quadrants; at the end of the odd quadrants, they are 20 minutes less (in each case).

(In the case of the other planets, they are), at the end of even quadrants, 75 for Mars, 30 (for Mercury), 33 (for Jupiter), 12 (for Venus) and 49 (for Saturn). At the end of the odd quadrants, (they are) 72 for Mars, 28 (for Mercury), 32 for Jupiter, 11 (for Venus) and 48 (for Saturn).

103b-105a. Śighraparidhi or Epicycles of the equation of conjunction. The Śighraparidhis at the end of the even quadrants are 235 for Mars, 133 (for Mercury), 70 (for Jupiter), 202 (for Venus) and 39 (for Saturn). At the end of the odd quadrants they are 232 for Mars, 132 (for Mercury), 72 (for Jupiter) 260 (for Venus) and 40 (for Saturn).

106b-107a. Mandaphala or Equation of the centre. The base-sine (bhujajyā) and perpendicular sine (koṭijyā) should be multiplied by the corrected epicycle and divided by the number of degrees in a circle (360). (The result would be the corresponding bhujāphala and koṭiphala, respectively, in minutes). The arc corresponding to the base-sine (bhujajyā) would be the equation of the centre (mandaphala) in minutes etc.

107b-108. Śighraphala or Equation of conjunction. When the kendra is in the half-orbit beginning with capricorn (makarādi), the result from the perpendicular-sine (koṭi-phala) of the distance from the conjunction (kendra) is to be added to Radius (trijivā) and subtracted when in that beginning with Cancer (karkyādi). The square of this sum or difference is added to the result from the base-sine (bhujāphala). The square root of their sum is called calakarṇa (variable hypotenuse).

110b-111.[46] The result from the base-sine (bhujāphala) is multiplied by radius and divided by the variable hypotenuse (calakarṇa). The arc corresponding to the quotient is in minutes and will be the equation of conjunction (śaighrya-phala). This (the Śaighryaphala) is to be employed in the first and fourth process of correction for Mars and other planets.

112. Computation of True planets. For the Sun and the Moon, mandakarṇa alone is required. That for Mars etc. is now stated: (First) that for conjunction, then that for the apsis, again that for apsis and for conjunction--the four in succession (half the corrections being applied of the first two and the entire correction of the last two).

113. When the kendra is in the half or bit beginning with Aries (Ajādi) the equation is additive (dhana) for all planets, both in the correction for conjunction and for the apsis; they are all subtractive in the half orbit beginning with Libra (Tulādi).

114. Bhujāntara correction for the equation of time. The daily motion (bhukti) of a planet multiplied by the sun's result from the base-sine and divided by the number of minutes in a circle (bhacakra). The result, which would be in minutes, is applied to the True planet got (verses 112-13 above) in the same direction as (the equation applied to) the Sun.

115-16. Mean daily motion. The equation of a planet's daily motion is to be calculated like that for the Mean planet in the process for the apsis. The daily motion is multiplied by the difference of the tabular sines corresponding to the base-sine (doriyāntara) of anamoly and then divided by 225 (tattvanetra). The result is multiplied by the corresponding epicycle of the apsis (mandaparidhi) and divided by the number of degrees in a circle (bhagaṇa); (the result) is additive when in the half-orbit beginning with cancer, and subtractive when in the half-orbit beginning with Capricorn.

117-18. Subtract the daily motion of the planet corrected for the apsis from the daily motion of its conjunction (śighra). Multiply the remainder by the difference between the last hypotenuse (antya-karṇa) and the radius and divide by the variable hypotenuse (calakarṇa), verses 107b-108). The result is to be added to the daily motion when the hypotenuse is greater than the radius and subtractive when it is less; (in the latter case, if the result) is greater (than the daily motion) subtract the latter from it; the remainder will be the retrograde (vakra) daily motion (of the planet).

119-120a. Retrogression of planets. Mars and other planets would (commence to be in retrograde motion (vakri) when the degrees of their kendra in the fourth process (verse 112) are, respectively, (Mars) 164, (Mercury) 144, (Jupiter) 130, (Venus) 163 and (Saturn) 115. They cease to be retrograde from when the degrees (of their kendras) are equal to the above-said numbers subtracted from (the degrees in) a circle.

120b-121a. Length of day and night. Sine declination (krāntijyā) multiplied by the equinoctial shadow (viṣuvadbhā)[47] and divided by 12 is the Earth-sine (kṣitijyā).[48] This multiplied by Radius (trijyā) and divided by the 'day-radius' (dina-vyāsa)[49] (gives the sine of the ascensional difference, cara). The correspondic arc (in minutes) would be the ascensional difference in prāṇas[50] (cārāsavaḥ).

121b-122. The said arc added to and subtracted from the fourth part of the day and night, separately, will give the duration of half day and half night respectively, when the declination is north (udak-krānti). The reverse would be the case when the declination is south (yāmya-krānti). Double these (half days and nights) would give (the lengths of) the day and night, respectively.

123. Position of a planet in an asterism,[51] (Since 27 nakṣatra-s or bham-s or asterisms make up the full ecliptic of 360°), the extent in it of one asterism (bha-bhoga) is 800 minutes (or 13° 20'). (And, since the Moon gains in longitude over the Sun one circle or 360° in 30 lunar days or tithis), the extent of a tithi (tithi-bhoga) is 720 minutes. The asterisms crossed by a planet is got by dividing the longitude of the True planet by 800. (The remainder divided) by the daily motion of the planet will give the days etc. (traversed by the planet in the next asterism).

124. Yoga at a given time.[52] The sum of the true longitudes of the Sun and the Moon at the required time, reduced to minutes, if divided by 800, will give the number of Yogas which have elapsed. The portion gone (gata) and to go (gamya) in the current Yoga multiplied by 60 and divided by the sum of the daily motion of the Sun and the Moon will give the corresponding nāḍikās thereof.

125. Tithi at a desired time. Subtract the longitude of the Sun in minutes from the longitude of the Moon in minutes and divide by the extent of a tithi (tithibhoga, 720'); the result will be the tithis elapsed. The nāḍis gone or to go in the current tithi at the desired time are derived by multiplying the remainder by 60 and dividing by the difference between the daily motion of the Sun and Moon at the desired time.

126-127. The Karaṇa at the desired time.[53] The tithis elapsed after the first half of the first tithi of the bright fortnight are multiplied by two and divided by seven (nāga). The remainder, counted as Bava, Bālava, Kaulaka, Taitila, Gara, Vaṇij and Viṣṭi, would give the elapsed karaṇas. The karaṇas from the latter half of the fourteenth tithi of the dark fortnight (to the first half of the first tithi, of the bright fortnght) are Śakuni, Nāga, Catuṣpāt and Kiṁstughna.

ON DIRECTION, PLACE AND TIME

128. Setting the gnomon. On a stone slab, levelled with water, or on hard level plaster, describe a circle with any radius measured in gnonomonic digits.

129-131. At its centre fix the gnomon, of twelve digits of the measure of the gnomonic digits used above. Mark the two points where the (gnomonic) shadow meets the circumference of the circle, before and after noon; these two points are to be called the west and east points, (respectively). Midway between them, draw, (using a pair of compasses), by means of a fish-figure (timi), a north-south line. Also, Midway between the north and south directions, draw, by means of a fish-figure, an east-west line. In the same manner, by means of fish-figures (matsya), draw the intermediate directions between the four cardinal directions.

132. Draw a square circumscribing (the circle), along with the (eight) lines emanating from the centre. Any given shadow is reckoned by the digits of its base-sine (bhujā-sūtra) projected on the square.

133. Prime vertical etc. The east-west line is called the prime vertical (sama-maṇḍala); it is termed also the equatorial horizon (six o'clock circle, unmaṇḍala) and equinoctial circle (celestial equator, viṣuvanmaṇḍala).

134. Agrā (Amplitude). (In the circle) draw another east-west line through the extremity of the equinoctial shadow (viṣuvadbhā); the interval between any given shadow and the line of the equinoctial shadow is termed the amplitude (agrā).

135. The square root of the sum of the squares of the gnomon and of the shadow is the hypotenuse (karṇa). If, from the square of the latter, the square of the gnomon be subtracted, the square root of the remainder is the shadow; the gnomon is found by the converse process.

136. Precession of the equinoxes (Ayanacalana), at any desired time. In a Yuga, the circle of asterisms librates eastward thirty score (i.e., 600) times. This (number) multiplied by the terrestrial days elapsed (at the desired time) and divided by the number of days in a Yuga gives the elapsed liberations, (signs, degrees) etc.

137. Derive the sine (of the ayana-sphuṭa thus got), multiply it by three and divide by ten. The result will be the amount of the precession of the equinoxes (at the desired time). The longitude of the planets should be corrected (by adding to or subtracting from the longitudes) the said precession. It is from this (corrected longitude of the planets) that their declination (krānti), gnomonic shadow (chāyā), ascensional difference (cara) etc. are to be calculated.

138. Latitude and co-latitude from shadow. The radius multiplied separately by the gnomon (12) and the equinoctial shadow (chāyā) and divided by the equinoctial hypotenuse (viṣuvatkarṇa)[54] will give the cosine and sine, respectively, of the latitude. The arcs of these sines will be the co-latitude and latitude. These two will always be inclined to the south.

139. Zenith distance of the Sun. The Zenith distance of the Sun (at any time) would be the sum of the latitude of the place and the Sun's declination, when both are in the same direction; and, their difference when in opposite directions. From the Zenith distance, its sine and cosine are to be found.

140. The shadow and its hypotenuse from Zenith distance. The sine (of the Zenith distance, found as above) and the Radius[55] multiplied by the length of the gnomon in digits (i.e., 12) and divided by the cosine (of the Zenith distance), give, respectively, the shadow of the gnomon and its hypotenuse at midday (ahardala).

141. Sun's declination and longitude from latitude of a place and zenith distance. Find the difference between the degrees of the latitude (of the place) and those of the Sun's zenith distance at noon when both are in the same direction and their sum, otherwise. The sun's declination (apakrama) would be detained.

141b-143a. Multiply sine declination by the Radius and divide by the maximum declination of the Sun (i.e., 1397 minutes). (Taking the quotient as the sine) find its arc. This arc will be the longitude of the Sun (in the first quarter of the ecliptic) beginning with Aries. When the Sun is (in the second quarter) beginning with Cancer, subtract (the arc) from 6 signs (cakrārdha). When (in the third quarter beginning with Libra), add (the arc) to 6 signs (bhārdha). When (in the fourth quarter) beginning with Capricorn subtract (the arc) from 12 signs (cakra); in each case, the result will be) the true longitude (sphuṭa) of the Sun at midday.

143b. Mean Sun. Apply to this the equation of the apsis (mandaphala) repeatedly in the opposite sign and the Sun's mean longitude will be got.

144. Ahorātrāsu of a planet. The diurnal motion (in minutes) of any planet (on any day) is to be multiplied by the number of prāṇas (asus or respirations, of time) contained in the rising periods of the sign (rāśi) occupied by the planet and divided by 1800. The quotient added to the number of prāṇas in a circle is termed the day-night duration in prāṇas of the planet (on that day).

145-146. Right ascensions of the Signs at Laṅkā. (Towards finding the right ascensions of the ends of the first three signs, Aries, Taurus and Gemini, find the declinations of the said ends), multiply the day-radius of three signs (tribhadyukarṇārdha) and divide by their own respective day-radii (svāhorātrārdha), in order, the sines of one, of two and of three signs. The quotients when converted into arc and subtracted, each from the one following, give, beginning with Aries, the times of rising (in prāṇas) (of the three signs) at Laṅkā. They are, respectively, 1670, 1795 and 1935.

147a. Right ascensions at any place. The above, diminished each by its portion of ascensional difference (carakhaṇḍa), as calculated for a place, give the times of rising at that place.

147b-148a. For the three signs beginning with Cancer, invert the times of rising at Laṅkā and add the portions of ascensional difference of the respective signs inverted. The above six, in inverse order, will be the times for the other six commencing with Libra.

148b-149a. Udaya-Lagna (rising point of the ecliptic) at any time. The ascensional equivalents of the parts of the sign (occupied by the planet) which are gone (bhukta) and to come (bhogya) are to be calculated from the longitude of the Sun at the given time. They will be given by the number of degrees traversed and to be traversed, multiplied by the ascensional equivalent (udayāsavaḥ) of the sign and divided by 30.

149b-150a. From the desired time in nāḍikās (as reckoned from sunrise) reduced to prāṇas, subtract the equivalent in prāṇas of the part of the sign to come, and also the ascensional equivalents of the further signs, in succession. In the same manner, subtract the equivalents of the part which has gone by and of the signs which have to go, in inverse order.

150b-151a. If there be a remainder, multiply by 30 and divide by the equivalent of the unsubtracted sign; subtract or add the quotient, appropriately, to the whole signs. The result would be the point of the ecliptic at the horizon at that time.

151b-152a. Madhyalagna (Point of the ecliptic at the meridian). From the east or west hour-angle of the Sun in nāḍis (nata-nāḍi), calculate as above using the equivalents in right ascension (laṅkodayāsavaḥ) and apply the result as an additive or subtractive equation to the Sun's longitude. The point of the ecliptic upon the meridian (Madhya-lagna) at that moment would result.

152b-153-a. Time from Lagna. (In order to find the instant when a given point of the ecliptic would be upon the horizon), add together the ascensional equivalents, in prāṇas, of : (1) the part of the sign to be traversed by the given point (on the ecliptic) if it is less (than the longitude of the Sun), (2) of the part traversed if it is greater (than the longitude of the Sun), and (3) of the intervening signs. The sum (in prāṇas) will give the instant (for the given lagna).

SOLAR AND LUNAR ECLIPSES

153b-154a. Possibility of a lunar eclipse. (Compute the True Sun, Moon and Node at the syzygies). If sine (Sun-minus-Node) is less than 14 (Indra), there is a possibility of an eclipse. The said sine in minutes is to be multiplied by 11 (Śiva) and divided by 7 (śaila). The result is called Śara in digits (aṅgulas), and would be directed towards the hemisphere in which (Sun-minus-Node) lies.

154b. Eclipser and the eclipsed. (In the solar eclipse, which occurs only at new moon), the Moon obscures the Sun; and in the lunar eclipse, (which occurs only at full moon), the shadow of the Earth obscures the Moon.

154b-155a. Half the (angular) diameters of the eclipsed and the eclipser minus the śara is called channa (ka), (the eclipsed portion, reckoned in digits).[56] Subtract, (if possible), the eclipsed body from the channa; the result would be kha-cchanna (empty space eclipse).

155b-156b. Computation of the lunar eclipse. Half the angular diameters is to be added to the śara, the sum multiplied by ten and divided by channa. The square root (of the product) is found and a sixth of it is subtracted from it and divided by the angular diameter of the Moon (glau-vapuḥ). The result will give the half-duration of the eclipse (sthityardha) in ghaṭikā etc.

156b-158a. The sthityardha (is placed at two places). Sine Sun-minus-Node in degrees is doubled and the number taken as palas. They are subtracted from or added to the sthityardha if Sun-minus-Node is less than 6 signs or 12 signs, respectively, and vice versa if otherwise. The results got would be the true sthityardha (as reckoned) from the commencement and completion of the eclipse. The eclipsed portion (in digits) multiplied by 20 (nakha) and divided by the angular diameter of the eclipsed body will give the results called Vi(ṁ)śopaka-s.

158b-159. Computation of the solar eclipse. (In the solar eclipse), the mid-eclipse occurs at the moment of conjunction. Calculate the tribhona-lagna (rising point of the ecliptic-minus-three signs) of the Sun for the moment of conjunction (parvānta) and keep it apart. (For the tribhona-lagna) calculate the parallax in latitude in degrees (natāṁśa) by combining, appropriately, the declination (krānti) and latitude (akṣa). Divide it by 22 and square the result. If the square is less than 2, halve it and add to the square; if the square is more than 2, subtract 2 from it, halve the result and add to the square. The result thus got is added to 12 and the sum is called 'divisor' (hara).

160. Find the difference between tribhona-lagna and the Sun, reduce it by a tenth thereof, multiply by 14 (purandara) and divide by the 'divisor' (found in verse 159). The result would be the lambana (parallax in longitude, in nāḍikās). If tribhona-lagna is more than 12 (arka), the lambana is positive and, if otherwise, negative.

161. The lambana-nāḍikās are multiplied by 13 (viśva); the result is to be reckoned in terms of minutes and added to or subtracted from Sun-minus-Node appropriately and (from its sine) its śara is determined (vide verse 154a). The lambana therefrom is multiplied by six. After appropriate addition and subtraction thereof, re. tribhona-lagna, the natāṁśas are again calculated.

162-163a. A tenth part of these natāṁśas are subtracted from 18 and the result multiplied by the said tenth part. The product is subtracted from 18 minutes and divided by 6. The result will give parallax in longitude (nati) in the same direction of the (previous) natāṁśas. Appropriate application of this subtractively or additively in accordance with opposite directions or the same direction of the two, will render the śara accurate.

163b-165a. Using the said śara, the (exact) eclipsed portion (channa) and half duration of the eclipse are to be found (as before). The half-duration is multiplied by 6; the result, which would be in degrees, is kept at two places and the tribhona-lagna subtracted from or added to it, respectively, and the lambana calculated from the two, as before. The results being appropriately applied, the exact (first and second) half durations are obtained. These subtracted from and added to, as the case may be to the mid-eclipse (madhya-kāla), will give the exact times of the commencement and the conclusion of the eclipse.

MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS

165b-166a. Heliacal visibility of the planets[67]. The kālāṁśa-(degrees of time) of the planets beginning with the Moon are : 12 (Moon), 17 (Mars), 13 (Mercury), 11 (Jupiter), 9 (Venus) and 15 (Saturn). The heliacal setting and rising of these planets occur, respectively, at times got by subtracting (the kālāṁśas) from sunrise and by adding them to sunset.

166b-167a. Shadow of a planet. Consider the reflection of a planet (in water or in a mirror) and ascertain the ocular altitude (dṛgaucyaṁ lambam). The distance between the foot of the gnomon and the spot of the reflection, multiplied by 12 (ravi) and divided by the ocular altitude, will give the measure of the shadow of the planet (in digits).

167b-168. Elongation of the Moon's horns. At sunset (on the desired day) the tithi and its divisions (nāḍikā, vināḍikā etc.) gone and to go are accurately determined. The tithis are multiplied by 16 and the square of the tithis subtracted therefrom. The result is multiplied by the equinoctial shadow (akṣabhā) and divided by 15. The direction of the result is taken as north and corrected appropriately with the declination (in minutes) of the Sun and also by śara of the Moon in minutes applied reversely. The result is divided by twice the tithis. The valana (deflection) in digits towards the direction of the correction (i.e., the direction in which the Sun is with reference to the Moon) is got.

169. Subtract from the tithi one-fifth of itself; (the measure of) the illuminated part of the Moon (phase, sita) is obtained. The horn of the Moon will be elongated in the direction of valana. The measure in digits of the elongation shall be ascertained by means of a diagram.

170-171a. Conjunction of the planets. The numbers 5, 6, 7, 9 and 5 (corresponding to the five planets Mars etc.) are multiplied by Trijyā-minus-the respective śighrakarṇa and (placed at two places. One set is divided, respectively by 21, 12, 6, 24 and 3 and the result is applied to other set, i.e., subtracted if the hypotenuse is larger than trijyā and added otherwise. The results divided by 3 will be the angular diameters of the discs of the several planets beginning from Mars.

171b-172a. Time of conjunction. (When it is necessary to determine when two planets will meet): If the two planets are both regular or retrograde, the difference in their longitudes is divided by the difference of their rates of motion; if one is regular and the other retrograde, (the difference of their longitudes) is divided by the sum of their rates of motion. The result in days etc. would give the time to pass for their conjunction.

172b-173. Mutual non-obscuration of planets in conjunction. (The two planets in conjunction) should be corrected by their respective parallaxes in latitude (nati) according to their śaras, it being addition if in the same direction and subtraction otherwise. When the north-south difference of the two planets is less than half the sum of their diameters, there will be (visual) distinction between the two, (there being no obscuration). True (sphuṭa) results can, of course, be arrived by working with the parallax in longitude (lambana) etc. as in the case of the solar eclipse.

VYATIPĀTA AND VAIDHṚTA : MALIGNANT SITUATIONS OF SUN AND MOON

174. Vaidhṛta.[58] When the Sun and the Moon are in the same ayana, i.e., on the same side of either solstice, if the sum (of their longitudes) is one circle (360) , and both have equal declinations, that situation is called Vaidhṛta.

175. Vyatipāta. When the Sun and the Moon are on the opposite sides of either solstice and have equal minutes of declination, that situation is called Vyatipāta, the sum (of their longitudes) being a half-circle.

176. Time when declinations are equal. When the longitudes of the Sun and the Moon corrected by the degrees of precession of the equinoxes as found by observation, is equal to 12 signs or 6 signs, respectively, compute their declinations.

177. Then, if the declination of the Moon, which is in an odd quadrant, and had been corrected for its latitude (Vikṣepa), is greater than the declination of the Sun, the situation of pāta is already past.

178. If less, it is still to come. In an even quadrant, the reverse is the case. If the Moon's declination is subtractible from its latitude, the rules as to the quadrant are to be reversed.

179. Multiply the sines of the two declinations separately by Radius (trijyā) and divide by the sine of the maximum declination (parakrāntijyā, viz., 1397) and find the arcs (of the two results). The difference (of the arcs) or half that difference is to be added to the Moon's longitude when the pāta is yet to occur.

180. It is to be subtracted from the Moon's longitude when the pāta is past. The said (difference) when multiplied by the Sun's daily motion and divided by the Moon's daily motion, gives a correction, in minutes, to be duly applied to the longitude of the Sun, (being subtracted from the Sun if the pāta is past and added to it if the pāta is yet to occur).

181. A similar correction is to be applied, in the reverse order, to the Moon's mode. This operation is repeated until the declinations (of the Sun and the Moon) are equal.

182. Mean time of the Pāta. The pāta occurs at the moment when the declinations are equal. (To find out whether a pāta is past or yet to come): If the Moon's longitude at the pāta found by applying the correction to the Moon (vide verse 180) is less or greater than (the Moon's longitude)at midnight (of that day), the pāta is past or is yet to occur, respectively.

183. True time of Pāta. The minutes of the interval between the Moon's longitude (at the Mean pāta), as ascertained, and that at midnight, when multiplied by 60 and divided by the Moon's daily motion, will give the time of the pāta in nāḍikās.

184. Half-duration of the Pāta. Multiply half the sum of the diameters of the Sun and the Moon by 60 and divide by the difference of their daily motions. The result will be the half-duration, (sthityardha (of the pāta), in nāḍikā etc.

185. Beginning, Middle and End of the Pāta. The true time (of the pāta (vide verse 183) is the middle (moment of the pāta). That diminished by the half-duration (vide verse 184) is the moment of its commencement and that increased by the half-duration is the moment of its end.

186. Consequence of the Pāta. Compared to the beginning and the end, the middle moment of the pāta is extremely harmful. It is like burning fire and is to be avoided in all (auspicious) rites.

187. O brāhmaṇa ! Thus has been stated, in brief, matters relating to mathematics and astronomy (gaṇita). I shall, now, set out horoscopy (jātaka) commencing with (the statement of) the nomenclature of the rāśi-s (signs).

CHAPTER FIFTYFOUR

NOTES

1. Hindu texts on astronomy call this section as Tripraśna-adhyāya, since it deals with 'problems' concerning the 'three' topics, viz., time, place and direction.

2. Actually, however, this topic is not treated in the Purāṇa.

3. The two vyatīpatas, being malignant aspects of Sun and Moon, called Lāṭa and Vaidhṛta, occur at the moments when the sum of the longitudes of the Sun and the Moon is equal to 180° and 360°, respectively. These moments are considered to be highly inauspicious (vi-ati-pāta).

4. For the constitution and list of Yogas, see below, note under verse 211b. See also ch. 54, Verse 124 and footnote.

5. For the nature of karaṇa and the list thereof, see below, note under verse 219b. See also ch. 54, verses 126-27 and footnote.

6. The idea is that the operation could start from the unit digits i.e., from the right end of the numbers, as is the general practice, or from the highest digits of the numbers at the left end.

7. For the detailed working, see Līlāvatī of Bhāskarācārya, (edn. Hoshiarpur, 1975). So also, for the arithmetical operations set out below.

8. Written in modern convention, this would be

$$\frac{(a+b)+(a-b)}{2} = a; \quad \frac{(a+b)-(a-b)}{2} = b$$

9. $$\frac{a^2-b^2}{a-b} = a+b$$

10. 1. Verses 32-34 give three methods to derive, on the basis of any assumed number, sets of two numbers which when squared and added together or one subtracted from the other, and reduced by 1, give perfect squares.

Method I. The numbers are : $\frac{8x^2-1}{2x}$ and $1/2\,\frac{(8x^2-1)^2}{2x}+1$.

Sum of their squares minus $1 = 64x^4-2+\frac{1}{64y}4 = (8x^2-\frac{1}{8y}2)^2$

Diff. of their squares minus $1 = 64x^4+6+\frac{1}{64x}4-32x^2-\frac{1}{2x^2} = (8x^2-2+\frac{1}{8x^2})^2$

Method II. The numbers are : $(x+\frac{1}{2x})$ and 1.

Sum of their squares minus $1 = (x+\frac{1}{2x})^2+1^2-1 = (x+\frac{1}{2x})^2$

Diff. of their squares minus $1 = (x+\frac{1}{2x})^2-1^2-1 = (x+\frac{1}{2x})^2$

Method III. The numbers are : $(8x^4+1)$ and $8x^3$

Sum of their Squares minus $1 = (8x^4+1)^2+(8x^3)^2-1 = (8x^4+4x^2)^2$

Diff. of their Squares minus $1 = (8x^4+1)^2-(8x3)^2-1 = (8x^4-4x^2)^2$

Thus, all the results obtained are perfect squares.

11. Here, the first two lines give the method to calculate the last term of the series and the third line, the sum of the series. Thus, in a geometrical series, if m is the first member (mukha, prāg), g is the common ratio (guṇaka), r is the number of terms (gaccha) and s the sum of the series (dhana, sarvadhana) :

The last term $= m \times gr$

Sum of the series $= \frac{m(g^r - 1)}{(g-1)}$

For detailed working, see Līlāvatī, op. cit., 125 (pp. 256-64).

12. Thus, in a right angled triangle, if a is the altitude, b the base, and h the hypotcnuse, $a^2 + b^2 = h^2$.

13. The three sides would thus be i. $(a-b)^2 + 2ab = a^2 + b^2$; ii. $(a+b)(a-b) = a^2 - b^2$; iii. 2ab, for $(a^2 - b^2)^2 (+2ab)^2 = (a^2 + b^2)^2$.

14. Thus the circumference of a circle is $22/7d$.

15. Thus: $śara = 1/2 \quad (vyāsa - \sqrt{(vyāsa + jyā)(vyāsa - jyā)}$

$jya = 2\sqrt{(Vyāsa - śara) \times śara}$

$Vyāsa = \frac{(1/2 jya)^2 + śara}{śara}$

16. If a is the arc, c circumference, d diameter and s sine;

'First' $= (c-a) \quad a$

$Sine = 4d \times \frac{a \ (c-a).}{5/4c^2 - a(c-a)}$

17. $Arc = \frac{c}{2} - \sqrt{\frac{c^2}{4} - \frac{5\ s.c^4 \div 4}{4d + s}}$

18. Different heights for different grains are suggested for the reason that when made into a conical heap, coarse grain would pile up higher while fine grain would slip down and so pile up only to a lesser height.

19. Droṇa is one of the bigger measures of volume used in ancient and mediaeval India.

20. The gnomon in general use in ancient India was a strong, straight, cylindrical rod, made of metal or of wood, 12 inches in height, and pointed at the tip. In use, it was fixed firmly on a hard, level surface at the centre of a graduated circle.

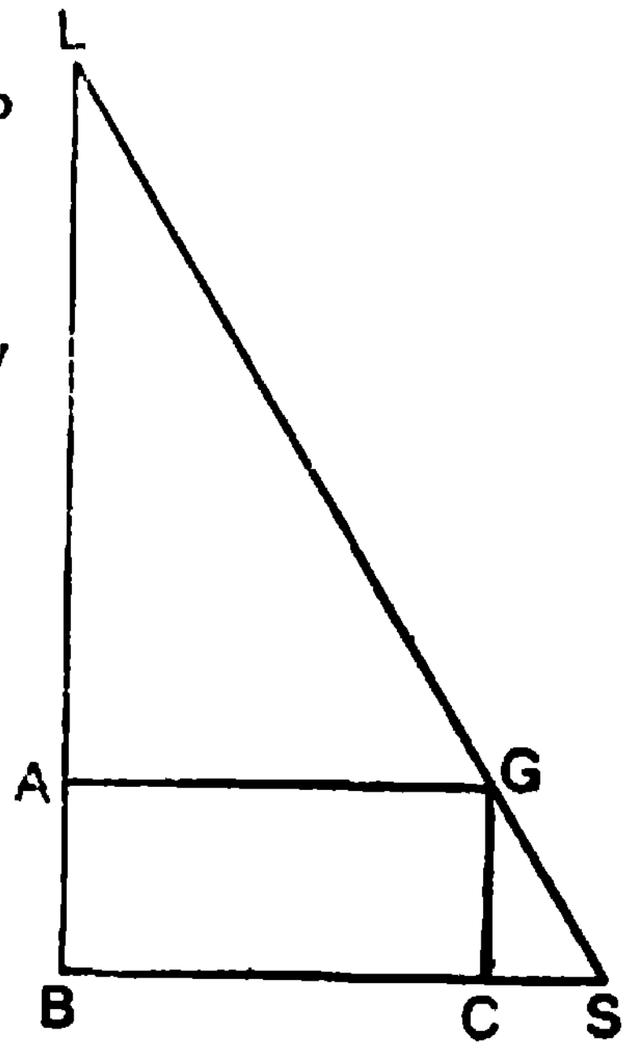
21. In the figure, LA = Height of the lamp

GB = Gonomon

CS = Gnomonic shadow

By the application of the rules of similar triangles, shadow,

$$CS = \frac{GC \times BC}{LA}$$



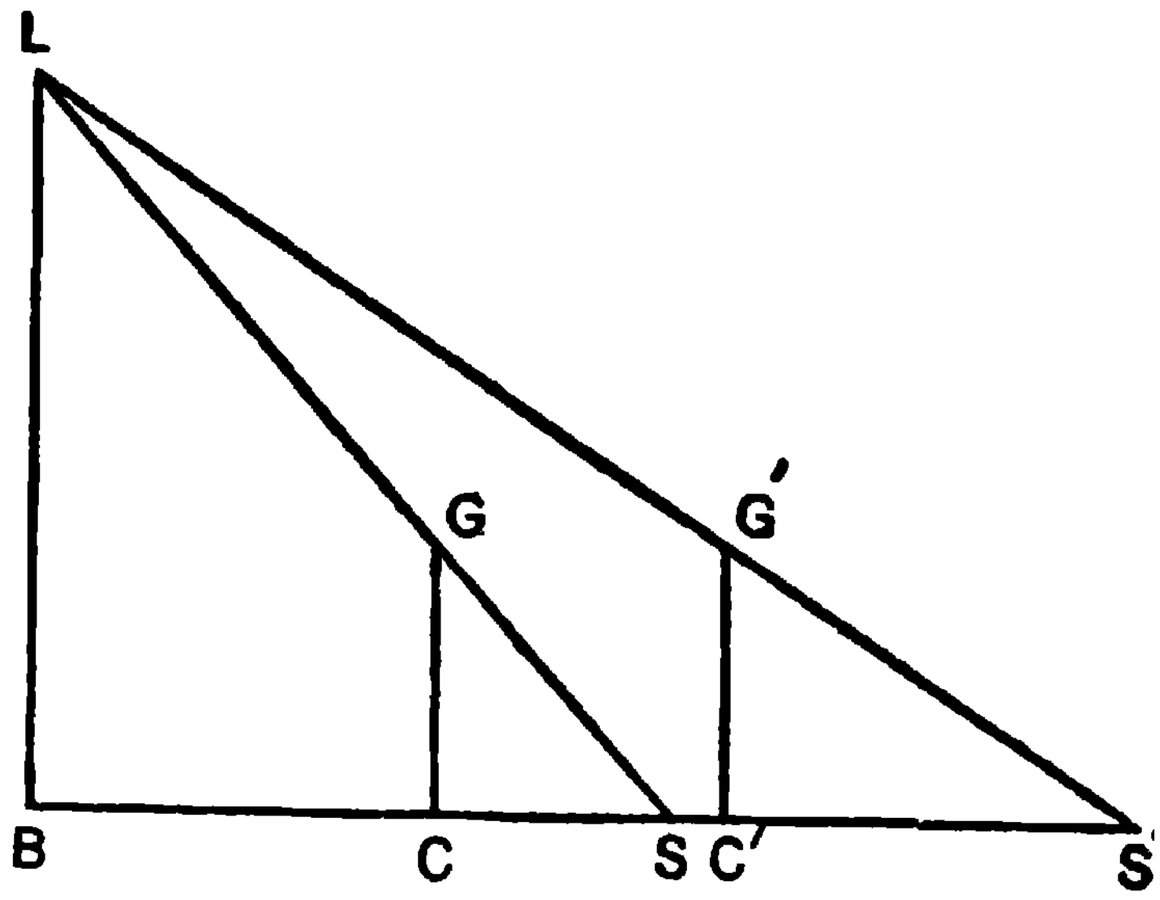
22. Height of the lamp,

$$BL = \frac{GC \times BC}{CS}$$

23. Lamp to gnomon,

$$BC = \frac{LA \times CS}{GC}$$

24. If LB, the lamp, GC and G' C', the two gnomons, CS and C' S', the two shadows BS and BS', the two bases,



$$\text{Base } BS = \frac{SS' \times CS}{(C'S' - CS)}$$

$$BS' = \frac{SS' \times C'S'}{(C'S' - CS)}$$

25. Lamp $LB = \frac{BS \times GC}{CS} = \frac{BS' \times G'C'}{C'S'}$

26. A 'divine' year (divya-varṣa) is equal to 360 'mortal' years or siderial years of current astronomical parlance.

27. Manu is one of the mythical progenitors of man and the time mentioned here is called a manvantara. 14 manvantaras constitute a longer Puranic duration of time mentioned in the next verse, which is termed Kalpa.

28. By Śīghrocca is meant the farthest point from the centre of the earth in the orbit of the planet, or the higher apsis of the epicycle related to the equation of conjunction.

29. A lunar day (tithi) is equal to one-thirtieth of a lunar month (cāndra-māsa) which is the interval between two conjunctions (or oppositions) of the Moon, being the period of the moon's synodical revolution, and is reckoned either from new moon to new moon or from full moon to full moon.

30. A lunar month, extending over 29.5306, days, being shorter than a solar month of 30.4380 days, the number of lunar months in about three solar years would be one more than that of the solar months. This extra lunar month is called adhimāsa (additive or intercalary month).

31. A lunar day (tithi) being smaller than a terrestrial day (bhūdina), if the two begin simultaneously at a sunrise, the lunar day will end earlier. This difference will increase day by day and when it is equal to one day (24 hrs.), it constitutes one tithikṣaya or subtractive day.

32. The solar month (saura-māsa), being one-twelfth of a solar year (saura-varṣa) or siderial year (nakṣatra-varṣa), is the time required by the Sun to pass through one rāśi (sign or 30°) of the Zodiac and is equal to 30.4380 terrestrial days.

33. A lunar month (cāndra-māsa) is equal to 30 lunar days (tithis) and is equal to 29.5306 terrestrial days.

34. Mandocca is equivalent to the higher Apsis. The mandoccas of the Sun and the Moon are the same as their Apogees (points on the orbit farthest from the planet), while the mandoccas of the other planets are equivalent to their Aphelions (points on the orbit farthest from the Sun).

35. Pāta (node) is the point at which the orbit of a planet intersects the ecliptic.

36. The ahargaṇa (lit. 'total of days') or bhūdina at any time is the number of (terrestrial) days that have elapsed upto the previous midnight from the time of the commencement of the epoch, which latter is generally taken as the current Yuga.

37. Laṅkā is one of the cardinal hypothetical cities on the Earth's equator where the meridian of the Indian city of Ujjain cuts it. In Indian astronomy, days are reckoned from midnight (or sunrise, according to different systems) at the meridian of Laṅka. For a discussion on the position of Laṅkā, see Āryabhaṭīya, Ed. with Tr., (Delhi 1976), pp. 123-25. See also below, verses 86b-87a.

38. 1. A Yojana, according to this, will be about 4.95 miles or 7.56 km.

Thus, if r is the radius of the Earth, Circumference $= 2r^2 \times \sqrt{10} = 2r \times \sqrt{10}$. Here $\sqrt{10}$ is taken as π as per the formula, cir. $= 2 \pi r$. This works out of 5059.556 yojanas.

39. Trijīvā, called also trijyā, tribhajyā, triguṇa, trirāśijyā, is sine 3 rāśis (or 90) and is equal to the radius of the circle.

40. Vikṣepa (celestial latitude) is the deviation of the planets from the plane of the ecliptic.

41. Thus : The cycle $= 360°$, rāśi or sign $= 1/12 \times 360° = 30°\ 1/8$ sign $= 3°45'$ or $225'$. This is the first of the 24 signs contained in a quarter ($90°$ or 3 signes).

42. The second sine, being the sine for the second section (khaṇḍa) $225' + 225' = 450'$, would be : $225/225 = 1$; $450 - 1 = 449'$.

The third sine, being the sine for the third section (Khaṇḍa), $225' + 225' + 225 = 675'$, would be : Present quotient $449/225 = 2$; the sum of the quotients $= 2 + 1 = 3$; the sum reduced from the first sine $225 = 225 - 3 = 222$. The result added/to the second sine $= 449 + 222 = 671$, the third sine.

The process is repeated. The several sines calculated thus are given below :—

No.	Khaṇḍa in minutes	Sine	No.	Khaṇḍa in Minutes	Sine
0	0	000
1	225	225	13	2925	2585
2	450	449	14	3150	2728
3	675	671	15	3375	2859
4	900	890	16	3600	2978
5	1125	1105	17	3825	3084
6	1350	1315	18	4050	3177
7	1575	1520	19	4275	3256
8	1800	1719	20	4500	3321
9	2025	1910	21	4725	3372
10	2250	2093	22	4950	3409
11	2475	2267	23	5175	3431
12	2700	2431	24	5400	3438

43. In Hindu astronomy, the maximum declination (obliquity of the ecliptic) is taken as 24′; and 1397 represents sine 24°.

44. While the mandoccas of the Sun and the Moon are the same as as their apogees, that of the other planets are equal to their aphelions. For details on the concept of and computations with mandoccas and śighroccas in Hindu astronomy, see E. Burgess, Translation of the Sūryasiddhānta, ed. by P. Gangooly, Calcutta, 1935, pp. 53-56.

45. The Venkatesvara Press edn. of Nārada Purāṇa used for this translation, repeats, here, haplographically, two verses, thus erratically increasing serial number of the verses by two. While the repeated verses are dropped in the translation the increased serial number is retained so that there might not be any discrepancy in the number of the verses in the text edition and the present translation.

46. The Venkatesvara Press edition of Nārada Purāṇa used for this translation repeats here haplographically three earlier lines, increasing the serial numbering of the verses correspondingly. Here, the changed verse number is adopted according to the edition; the repeated lines are not translated.

47. Viṣuvad-bhā or Equinoctial shadow at a place is the shadow of the Sun cast by a gnomon of 12 digits at Midday on the day of the Vernal equipox (March 21) or Autumnal equinox (Sept.23) at that place.

48. Kṣitijyā (Earth-sine) is the sine of the arc of the diurnal circle intercepted between the horizon and the six o'clock line.

49. Dina-vyāsa-dala (day-radius), called also dyu-jyā ('day-sine') is the radius of the diurnal circle, in contrast to trijyā which is the radius of the 'great circle' or the 'tabular radius'.

50. Prāṇa or Asu ('respiration') is the period of time required for one respiration and is /equal to 4 seconds.

51. The ecliptic is divided into 27 asterisms or lunar mansions of equal extent of 13°20' or 800' each, called Aśvinī, Bharaṇi etc. The nakṣatra forms one of the members of the five-member, almanac (Pañcāṅga) of the Hindus, the other four members being, Vāra (weekday), tithi (lunar day), Yoga and Karaṇa, for which see below.

52. Yoga, one of the members of the five-membered Hindu almanac, is used only for astrological purposes. It is a period of time of variable length during which the joint motion of the longitudes of the Sun and the Moon amounts to 13°20' or 800', being the extent of a lunar mansion. They are 27 in number, and are mentioned in Hindu almanacs for each day. They have individual names, as follows :—

1. Viṣkambha, 2. Prīti; 3. Āyuṣmān; 4. Saubhāgya; 5. Śobhana, 6. Atigaṇḍa, 7. Sukarma, 8. Dhṛti; 9. Śūla; 1p, Gaṇḍa; i1. Vrddhi; 12. Dhruva; 13. Vyāghāta; 14. Harṣaṇa; 15. Vajra, 16. Siddhi, 17. Vyatīpāta, 18. Varīyas; 19. Parigha, 20. Śiva, 21. Siddha; 22. Sādhya; 23. Śubha; 24. Śukla, 25. Brahman, 26. Indra, and 27. Vaidhṛti.

53. The karaṇa is also an entity made use of only in astrology and forms a member of the five-membered (pañcāṅga), Hindu almanac. Each Karaṇa extends over half a tithi. The four dhruva ('fixed') karaṇas viz., Śakuni, Nāga, Catuṣpāt and Kiṁstugna occupy the four half-tithis as stated above, and the other seven karaṇas repeat eight times through the next 56 half-tithis, when the cycle of 60 karaṇas in a lunar month is completed. The cycle is then repeated.

54. Viṣuvatkarṇa, or equinoctial hypotenuse, is the hypotenuse of the equinoctial shadow found by calculating the square root of the sum of the squares of the equinoctial-shadow and the gnomon.

55. By 'Radius' (with capital 'R') is meant the radius of the great circle or the tabular radius. In Sanskrit it is called trijyā, trijīvā, tribhajyā etc., meaning the sine of three sines or 90°.

56. It might be noted that if the śara is larger and cannot be subtracted from half the (angular) diameters of the eclipsed and the eclipser, there will be no channa (eclipsed portion) and so no eclipse.

57. For a little time before sunrise and after sunset, the planets, near the Sun, would be invisible on account of the sun's brilliance. The times after sunset and before sunrise they would be visible are indicated here.

58. This section, called Pātādhikāra (Section on pātas) in treatises, treats of two astronomical situations called Vyatīpāta and Vaidhṛta which are highly malignant in character. They are computed and used for astrological purposes, viz., to avoid auspicious acts being held at these situations.

CHAPTER FIFTYFIVE

Delineation of Horoscopy

Sanandana said :

1. The twelve limbs of Kālapuruṣa, the Cosmic Being, viz. (1) head, (2) face, (3) arms, (4) heart, (5) breast, (6) entrails, (7) pelvis, (8) genital organ, (9) thighs, (10) knees, (11) shanks and (12) feet are (represented by) the twelve Signs of the Zodiac viz. Meṣa (Aries), Vṛṣabha (Taurus), Mithuna (Gemini), Karkaṭaka (Cancer), Siṁha (Leo), Kanyā (Virgo), Tulā (Libra), Vṛścika (Scorpio), Dhanus (Sagittarius), Makara, (Capricorn), Kumbha (Aquarius) and Mina (Pisces), respectively.[1]

2. The lords of the twelve Signs (Rāśis) beginning with Meṣa (Aries) are in order (1) Mars, (2) Venus, (3) Mercury, (4) Moon, (5) Sun, (6) Mercury (7) Venus, (8) Mars, (9) Jupiter, (10) Saturn (11) Saturn, and (12) Jupiter.

3. In the odd Signs of the zodiac the first Horā i.e. 15 degree portion, is ruled by the Sun and the second by the Moon, while in the even signs the first is owned by the Moon and the next by the Sun. The lords of the three decanates i.e. 10 degree portions, in each Rāśi are those of the same Sign, the fifth one from the first and the ninth from the first respectively.[2]

4. In the odd Signs the lords of Triṁśāṁśas (degree portions) are Mars who owns the first 5 degrees, Saturn who owns the next 5 degrees, Jupiter who owns the next 8 degrees, Mercury who owns the next 7 degrees, and Venus who owns the last 5 degrees. This order of ownership is reversed in the case of even Signs.[3]

5. The Navâṁśas (1/9 of a Sign or 3 degrees and 20 minutes) of Meṣa, Siṁha and Dhanus begin with Meṣa itself; those of Vṛṣabha, Kanyā and Makara, with Makara; those of Mithuna, Tulā and Kumbha, with Tulā; and lastly those of Karkaṭaka, Vṛścika and Mina, with Karkaṭaka. The lords of the Dvādaśāṁśas (1/12 portions of a Rāśī or $2\frac{1}{2}$ degree portions) are those of the 12 Signs beginning with the same Rāśī. Thus the six sub-divisions of a Sign are based upon the Signs of the zodiac.[4]

6. Meṣa, Vṛṣabha, Mithuna, Karkaṭaka, Dhanus and Makara are termed Nocturnal Signs, and these Signs rise with their hind parts first. The remaining Signs are called Diurnal, while Pisces rises both ways. The Signs are called Cruel and Gentle in order. They are also named Male and Female respectively.[5]

7. The three Signs beginning with Meṣa, taken at a time, represent in order Male, Female and Eunuch as well as Movable, Fixed and Dual Rāśis. The four Signs, Aries, Taurus, Gemini and Cancer, represent the four quarters, east, south, west and north respectively. The 12 Signs have their respective haunts or abode.[6]

8. The Exaltation Signs of the Seven planets headed by the Sun are in order Meṣa, Vṛṣabha, Makara, Kanyā, Karkaṭaka, Mina and Tulā. Their highest exaltation points are in order the 2nd (?), 3rd, 28th, 15th, 5th, 27th and 20th degrees in their respective exaltation Signs.[7]

9. The Debilitation Rāśis of the seven planets beginning with the Sun are the 7th ones from their respective Exaltation Signs. The Vargottama Navāṁśas of the three Signs Movable, Fixed and Dual, repeated four times, are in order the first, middle i.e. 5th, and the last one. The 12 Bhāvas or houses beginning with the Lagna or Body constitute the whole personality of an individual.[8]

10. The Mūlatrikoṇa Signs of the seven planets beginning with the Sun are in order Leo, Taurus, Aries, Virgo, Sagittarius, Libra and Aquarius. Caturasra or Square houses are the 4th and 8th ones from a particular Sign, house (Bhāva) or a planet. The Trikoṇa or Triangular houses are the 5th and 9th from the house of reference or the Lagna.[9]

11. The triad of houses (that are termed inauspicious) consists of the 6th, 8th and 12th from the Lagna. The Kendras of Angular houses are the ascendant (1st), 4th, 7th and 10th. The Signs named Human, Watery (or Aquatic), Reptile and Quadruped are strong in the above four Kendras respectively.[10]

12-13. The houses immediately following the Kendras are termed Paṇaphara; and those following the latter, Āpoklima. The colours of the 12 Rāśis beginning with Aries are in order

(1) Red, (2) White, (3) Green, (4) Pink, (5) Brown, (6) Grey, (7) Variegated, (8) Black, (9) Yellow, (10) Saffron, (11) Deep Brown, and (12) Bright.

14. The seven planets beginning with the Sun represent (1) the Soul of Kālapuruṣa or Time, (2) His Mind, (3) His Prowess, (4) His Speech, (5) His Wisdom and Happiness, (6) His Sexual Passion, and (7) His Sorrow, in order.

15. The Sun and the Moon are the Royal planets (King and queen); Mars, the commander of the army; Mercury, the royal prince; Jupiter and Venus, the ministers; and Saturn, the messenger. This is the opinion of the leading luminaries of astrology.

16. The colours of the seven planets are in order (1) copper colour, (2) white, (3) deep red, (4) green, (5) yellow, (6) variegated, and (7) jet black. Their presiding Deities are in order (1) Rudra, (2) Goddess Durgā, (3) Śeṣa, (4) Viṣṇu, (5) Indra, (6) Indra's consort Śacī, and (7) Yama.[11]

17. The lords of the 8 quarters are in order (1) the Sun, (2) Venus, (3) Mars, (4) Rāhu, (5) Saturn, (6) The Moon, (7) Mercury and (8) Jupiter. The following are termed Malefic planets : The weak Moon, the Sun, Saturn, and Mercury in association with a malefic planet.

18. Mercury and Saturn are termed Eunuchs; the Moon and Venus, Female; and the rest, Male. The abodes of Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus and Saturn are in order Fire, Earth, Ether, Water and Air.[12]

19. Venus, Jupiter, Mars and the Sun are the rulers of the Ṛgveda, Yajurveda, Sāmaveda and Atharvaveda respectively. They also preside over the four classes viz. Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras in order. Saturn is said to be the leader of outcasts, and Rāhu, the lord of Mlecchas (barbarians).[13]

20. The Sun, Moon and Jupiter are Sāttvika (pure) in nature; Mercury and Venus, Rājasa (active or passionate); and Mars and Saturn, Tāmasa (dark, inert or ignorant).

21-22. Their clothes are in order (1) thick, (2) new, (3) singed by fire, (4) soft, (5) fine (strong ?) (6) silken and (7) rags. Their metals are (1) copper, (2) silver, (3) copper, (4) lead, (5) gold, (6) bell-metal, and (7) iron. These metals are to be deduced from the rulers of the decanates rising at the time. The six seasons viz. winter, spring, summer, monsoon, autumn and dewy season are ruled over by Saturn, Venus, Mars, Moon, Mercury, and Jupiter respectively.[14]

23. O Nārada, Saturn aspects fully the 3rd and 10th houses, Jupiter the 5th and 9th, Mars the 4th and 8th houses counted from the one occupied by them and all the planets cast their full aspect on the 7th house.

24. The periods allotted to the seven planets from the Sun onwards are in order. a solstice (six months), —a Muhūrta or moment, a day, two months, a month, a fortnight, and a year. Their tastes are in order pungent, bitter, salt, mixed, sweet, sour and astringent.[15]

25-26. The friends of a planet are the lords of the 2nd, 4th, 5th, 8th, 9th and 12th Rāśis counted from the Mūlatrikoṇa Rāśi of the planet concerned. Friends of the seven planets beginning with the Sun are : (1) Jupiter, (2) Jupiter and Mercury, (3) Venus and Mercury, (4) all planets except the Sun, (5) all except Mars, (6) all except the Sun and the Moon, and (7) all except the Sun, Moon, and Mars. Planets that are posited in the 2nd, 12th, 11th, 3rd, 4th and 10th from one are his (temporary) friends.[16]

27. O Sage (Nārada), after ascertaining the natural friends, enemies and neutrals, the temporary friends also should be determined. A natural friend who happens to be a temporary friend also, becomes an Adhimitra (an intimate friend). Similarly, a natural friend would become a neutral, if he has no temporary friendship. A natural enemy, who is a temporary friend, would become neutral. By the same argument a natural enemy would become a bitter enemy too.[17]

28. A planet attains positional strength (Sthāna-bala) by its occupation of its exaltation house, Mūlatrikoṇa, own house and Navāṁśa owned by itself. Murcury and Jupiter get directional strength (Digbala) when they are posited in the East; the Sun and Mars. in the South; Saturn, in the West; and the Moon and Venus, in the North.[18]

29. Planets are said to be strong in their respective seasons, and in the uttarāyaṇa or Winter Solstice; while others get strength by retrograde motion. Planets in conjunction being to the north of others and possessed of brilliant rays are considered to be possessed of Ceṣṭābala or Motional strength.[19]

30. The Temporal strength (Kālabala) of planets is explained by scholars thus : The Moon, Mars and Saturn are strong at night; Mercury is strong always; while the rest are strong by day. Malefics are strong in the dark fortnight, while benefics in the bright one.[20]

31-32. Among the planets, Saturn, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, the Moon and the Sun, each succeeding planet is stronger than its predecessor. When malefics are powerful and benefics devoid of strength; when there a eunuch planet occupies or aspects a Kendra, the birth of a sub-human being (say, animal or bird) takes place. The birth will correspond to the nature of the Aṁśa of the Sun or the Moon (whichever is stronger). When malefics are in their own Aṁśas, and benefics in those of malefics, the birth of sub-human beings is to be predicted.[21]

33-34. Where the Lagna is weak, in addition, scholars should predict the birth of an animal. In the case of quadrupeds the 12 Rāśis beginning with Meṣa represent their (1) Head, (2) Face and Neck, (3) Fore-Legs and Shoulders, (4) Back, (5) Chest, (6) Sides, (7) Stomach, (8) Anus and Hind legs, (9) Genital Organ, (10) Testicles, (11) Haunches, and (12) Tail.

35. The colour of the animal will have to be predicted from the strongest of the Rāśis represented by the Navāṁśa of the ascendant and those that are occupied by planets. The lines on the back of the animal will correspond to the number of planets in the 7th house, or the number of planets aspecting that house.[22]

36. Birds are born when the lord of the ascendant is posited in a Bird Decanate, and in the last Navāṁśa of a Rāśi, in conjunction with another planet. Similar is the result when the ascendant is aspected by or is conjoined with Saturn or the Moon. The nature of bird, whether belonging to water or land, is to be deduced from that of the Navāṁśa of the ascendant. [Or it may be thus :—If the decanate of the ascendant is connected with the Moon (by aspect or conjunction), the bird must be an aquatic one, while with Saturn, it is a land bird.][28]

37. When the Lagna, the Moon, Sun and Jupiter are devoid of strength, the birth of trees should be predicted. The distinction between water and land trees is to be made on the basis of the Navāṁśa of the ascendant, as given previously.

38. The number of trees that are born on land or water corresponds to the one denoted by the number of Rāśis by which the lord of the Lagna is separated from the Lagna.

39. When the lord of the ascendant happens to be the Sun, the trees born are those that are strong internally (i.e. whose pith is strong); if it is Saturn, they would be worthless trees; if it is the Moon, they would be milky trees; if Mars, thorny ones; if Jupiter, fruit-bearing ones; and if Mercury, fruitless ones.

40. If the lord of the Lagna is Venus, the trees will be flower-bearing trees; if it is the Moon, glossy or juicy ones; if Mars, pungent ones. If the concerned planet be benefic posited in the Rāśi owned by a malefic, the result would be a good tree growing on a bad soil.

41. A retrograde planet will yield results similar to those of one posited in another's (i.e. enemy's) Aṁśa. In this world the menstrual flow of women takes place every month owing to the inter-action of the Moon and Mars.[24]

42. When the Moon in her transit comes to an Upacaya house (3, 6, 10 or 11 from the Lagna) in the woman's birth chart and is aspected by Jupiter, man unites with woman for impregnation. If the 7th house from the ascendant at the time of sexual union is occupied or aspected by malefics, the union takes place in a huff; if by benefics, with pleasure.[25]

43. O Foremost of Brahmins, men possessed of strong vitality (virility) would be able to beget issue, if, at the time of coitus, Venus, the Sun and Mercury be posited in their own Rāśis or Aṁśas and Jupiter in a Trikoṇa house from the Lagna.[26]

44. If Mars and Saturn be posited in the 7th house from the Sun and Moon at the time of sexual union, the man and woman would fall ill. The couple would meet with their end, if the luminaries (the Sun in the case of the man, and the Moon in that of the woman) should have Mars and Saturn in the 12th and 2nd places from them, or be aspected by one of these malefics, or conjoined with them.[27]

45. For day-births Venus and the Sun are considered as mother and father respectively; and for night-births they are the Moon and Saturn respectively. When one pair acts as the parents, the other does as maternal aunt and paternal uncle respectively. If these planets occupy even and odd houses respectively, they confer auspicious results on the parents or aunt and uncle, as the case may be.[28]

46. If a weak benefic is posited in the Lagna and aspected by a malefic, or if Saturn in exaltation is posited in the Lagna, being aspected by the weak Moon, and Mars, the woman will certainly meet with death ere long.[29]

47. If the Lagna and the Moon, either together or separately, are surrounded by malefics, then the pregnant woman will die.

48. The same result will follow, if there are malefics in the 4th house counted from the Lagna and the Moon and Mars in the 8th house; or if the New Moon, and Mars and the Sun are in the 4th and 12th houses respectively.

49. If Mars and the Sun occupy the Lagna and the 7th house respectively, the woman's death takes place as a result of a surgical operation, or a weapon. Abortion is likely to take place in the particular month of pregnancy whose lord is eclipsed.[30]

50. If the Lagna at Ādhāna (impregnation) or the Moon are conjoined with benefics, or if the benefics are posited in the 2nd, 4th, 5th, 7th, 9th and 10th houses counted from either, and if the malefics be in the 3rd, 6th and 11th houses, without aspecting the Lagna or the Moon, as the case may be, the foetus will grow happily.[31]

51. It should be predicted that a boy will be born, if the Sun, Moon, Jupiter and the Lagna, being possessed of strength, occupy odd Rāśis and masculine Aṁśas (odd ones); or if Jupiter and the Sun at least are in odd places.[32]

52. The wise should declare the birth of a female, when the above (the Sun, Moon, Jupiter and the Lagna,) or Mars, the Moon and Venus, are posited in even Signs and even Navāṁśas.

53. If the planets (viz. Mars, Venus and the Moon) are posited in dual signs and Aṁśas, and are aspected by Mercury, twins will be born. Similarly, Saturn occupying an odd house other than the Lagna makes for a male birth.[33]

54-56. The pregnant woman gives birth to a eunuch under the following yogas :—(1) The Sun and Moon should aspect each other; (2) Mercury and Saturn should aspect each other; (3) Mars should aspect the Sun in an even Rāśi; (4) Mars aspects the Lagna and the Moon that are in odd Signs; (5) Mars aspects the Moon in an even Sign and Mercury in an odd sign; (6) Mars should aspect the odd Aṁśa (of the Lagna ?). If the Moon and Venus occupying even Rāśis are aspected by a male planet, and if the Lagna, Mercury, Mars and Jupiter occupy odd Rāśis, the result is the birth of twins. The same result will follow, if both the Lagna and Moon occupy either even Signs or dual ones. So too when Mercury situated in his own Aṁśa (or Rāśi) aspects the dual Aṁśas occupied by planets and the ascendant.[34]

57-58. Triplets will have to be predicted on the basis of Mercury's occupation of even and dual Vargas (Rāśi and Aṁśa). When the Lagna is the last Aṁśa of Dhanus, and when strong planets occupying the Aṁśa of the Lagna are aspected by strong Saturn and Mercury, there would be many children in the foetus. The lords of the 10 months of pregnancy are Venus, Mars, Jupiter, the Sun, the Moon, Saturn, Mercury, lord of Lagna, the Sun and Moon respectively.[35]

59. The welfare of the child in the womb in the different months depends on the condition of the lords of the respective months. If Mercury is posited in the 5th or 9th house, and the others weak, the child will have two faces (i.e. heads)and (four) hands and feet.[36]

60. When the malefics, the Sun, Mars and Saturn, are posited in the junctions of Rāśis viz. the last parts of Karkaṭa, Vṛścika and Mīna, the child will be dumb and without feet.[37]

61. Should Mars and Saturn occupy a Sign or Aṁśa owned by Jupiter, the child would have teeth at birth. Should the Moon occupying her own house (Karkaṭaka) which is the Lagna at birth, be aspected by Mars and Saturn, it would be hunch-backed. If the Lagna be the last portion of Mīna and aspected by the Moon, Mars and Saturn, it would be lame.

62. If the Moon, conjoined with malefics, be posited in a Rāśi-Sandhi (i.e. the last part of Karka, Vṛścika or Mīna) without any benefic aspect, the child would be a dullard or imbecile. When the Lagna is the last part of Makara, aspected by Saturn, the Sun and Moon, the child would become a dwarf. If malefics occupy the second and third decanates, it will be born without head and feet respectively.[38]

63. When the Lagna, which is Simha, is occupied by the two luminaries and aspected by Mars and Saturn, the child will be blind. On the other hand, if the aspecting planets are both benefic and malefic, the child will be blear-eyed. If under the above conditions the Sun and the Moon be in the 12th house, its right and left eye respectively will be destroyed.

64. Inauspicious planetary-combinations, though aspected by benefics, do not at all give up their maleficence. If at Niṣeka (impregnation) Saturn occupies the 7th house, and the ascending Navāṁśa belongs to Saturn, child-birth will take place after three years.[39]

65. It will be after 12 years, if the planet concerned is the Moon. In this manner the time of delivery should be considered.[40]

66-67. Note the Dvādaśāṁśa Rāśi of the Moon at Ādhāna (impregnation). The delivery will take place when the Moon in transit passes though the Rāśi that is removed by the number of Dvādaśāṁśas from the Dvādaśāṁśa Rāśi. The distance in degrees travelled by the Moon in the particular Rāśi at birth, being doubled, would give the time of birth in Ghaṭīs from Sun-rise.[40a]

68. The childs' father will be away from home, if the Moon at birth does not aspect the rising Sign (Lagna) and if the Sun has fallen from the Zenith (i.e. 10th house). The father must be in a foreign country at the time, if the Sun is also in a movable Sign.[41]

69-70. The same result should be declared by expert astrologers, if Saturn be in the Lagna, and Mars in the 7th; or if the Moon be between Mercury and Venus; or if the Moon be posited in the Lagna owned by a malefic and in the decanate owned by Vṛścika, and if benefics be in the 2nd and 11th houses or if the Sun be aspected by the benefics.

71. O Great Sage, twins will be delivered from the foetus, when the Sun is posited in a quadruped Sign, and the other planets are possessed of strength.

72. If Mars and Saturn occupy Siṁha-lagna and an Aṁśa belonging to the Moon or Mercury, the child will have a cord around its limb signified by the Navāṁśa Rāśi of the Lagna. The above thing will happen if Jupiter does not aspect the Lagna, the Moon or the Lagna along with the two luminaries.[42]

73-73½. If the Sun or the Moon is conjoined with malefics (in Vṛṣabha?), the child may be illegitimate. If Mars and Saturn occupying Rāśis owned by malefics and conjoined with malefics, happen to be in the 5th or 9th from the Sun, the child's father is imprisoned in his own country or in a foreign land, according as the Rāśi occupied by the Sun is fixed or movable.[43]

74-75½. When the full Moon occupies her own Rāśi; Mercury the Lagna, and a benefic the 4th house, birth takes place in a sailing boat. Similar is the result, when the Lagna is a watery Sign and the Moon is posited in the 7th house. Undoubtedly, O Nārada, birth takes place on water, when the full Moon occupying Gemini or Virgo, aspects the Lagna, or is posited in the Lagna, 2nd or 4th house.[44]

76. Delivery takes place clandestinely, if Saturn occupying the 12th place from the Lagna or the Moon, is aspected by another malefic.[45]

77-77½. Birth takes place in a pit or dungeon, if Saturn occupies the Lagna identical with Karka (Cancer) or Vṛścika (Scorpio) or aspects the Lagna or the Moon. or is conjoined with the Moon or Lagna. If the Lagna of birth is aspected by Mercury, the Sun and Moon, the places of delivery would be a place of sport, a temple, and a barren spot respectively.[46]

77½-79. Birth takes place in a burial ground, if Mars should aspect the Lagna; in a rural place, if the Moon and Venus; in a sacrificial house, if Jupiter; in a house of ornaments and decorations, if the Sun; and in a house of fine arts; if Mercury, in all cases, the aspecting planets being strong.

80. If the lord of the Lagna is posited in his own house or Aṁśa, which is a fixed Sign, the birth takes place in the father's house; and if it is a movable Sign, in transit (during a journey), the nature of the road being determined by that of the Rāśi concerned. The child is abandoned by the mother, if the Moon occupies the 7th house which is trine (5th or 9th) to Mars and Saturn.[47]

81. However, if the ascendant is aspected by Jupiter, the child will live long and be rescued by somebody. On the other hand, if the ascendant occupied by the Moon is aspected by malefics and if Mars occupies the 7th house, the abandoned child will die.

82. If the trine (5th) from Mars and Saturn are aspected (by a benefic), the child lives happily in the protection of a stranger. If the above house be occupied by a malefic, the child will die in a month and a half, even though rescued by others.[48]

83-83½. O Sage, the birth takes place in the house of the father or mother, according as the planet owning the house is strong. If the ascendant is occupied by a debilitated benefic and the Moon and the Lagna are neither together (i.e. the Moon does not tenant the ascendant), nor aspected (by any planet), the birth takes place in a lonely place.

84-85. When the Moon is posited in the 4th house owned by Saturn or in an Aṁśa of Saturn, or aspected by Saturn, the birth takes place in darkness or in dim light and the woman lies down on the floor. Similarly, the direction of the house or the lying-in-chamber should be guessed from the nature of the Rāśi, whether it is Śirṣodaya (rising with its head) or Pṛṣṭhodaya (rising with its hind part first).

86-87. Trouble will have to be predicted for the mother, if there are malefics in the 4th and 7th houses from the Moon. When the strongest (or aspecting) planet in the chart happens to be Saturn, Mars, the Moon, the Sun, Mercury, Venus or Jupiter, the house in which the child is born should be an old house that has been renovated, a burnt one, a newly built one, a wooden house that is not very strong, one with many architectural embellishments, a new house adorned with paintings, or a strong and attractive one, as the case may be.[49]

88. The house of birth or lying-in chamber is in the East, if the ascendant is Tulā, Meṣa, Karka, Vṛścika or Kumbha; it is in the North, if the Lagna is owned by Mercury or Jupiter; in West, if it is Vṛṣabha; and in the South, if it is Siṁha or Makara.

89. The directions of the house are represented by two houses beginning with Meṣa for each cardinal point and a dual house for an intermediate quarter. The legs of the cot are represented by the 3rd, 6th, 9th and 12th houses respectively, as in the case of a house.

90. The number of women in attendance in the lying-in chamber corresponds to that of the planets that are situated between the Lagna and the Moon. The persons inside and outside the room are read from the planets in visible and invisible halves of the Zodiac.[50]

91. The child's body will correspond to the characteristics of the planet that occupies the Lagna, or of the one that is strongest in the chart. Its complexion will be like that of the Moon's Navāṁśa. The delineation of the native's limbs from head to foot, should be done on the basis of the 12 Rāśis commencing from the ascendant (as explained below).[51]

92-93. When any of the three decanates of a Rāśi rises, the native's limbs are allotted to the different houses in the following manner :—(1) When the first decanate rises, those of the 12 houses counted from the Lagna onwards represent the head, eye, ear, nostril, cheek, jaw and mouth on the right and left sides. Similarly, the second decanates of the houses represent in order the neck, shoulder, side, heart, arm, chest and navel on the two sides. The last ones likewise represent the pelvis, the genital organ, anus, thighs, knees, shanks, and feet.[52]

94-95. Whichever decanate Rāśi is occupied by malefics, will have a wound or ulcer in the corresponding limb of the native; if the planet is benefic, the particular limb will have a mole or mark. The mark will be natural or inborn, when the conjoining planet is posited in its own Sign or Aṁśa that is a fixed Rāśi; otherwise it will be an accidental one. If the planet concerned be Saturn, the wound would be one caused by wind or stone; if Mars, by poison, weapon or fire;

if Mercury, by earth (i.e. mud); and if the Sun, by wood, animals or horned animals of the class of goats.[53]

96-96½. There will undoubtedly be a wound, caused by malefics, in the limb signified by the decanate which is occupied by three planets. A decanate that is aspected (by malefics) will cause a mole in the corresponding limb, while one occupied by benefics, a good mark.[54]

97-100. The Sun has a square body, pink eyes, bilious constitution and sparse hair; the Moon has a round body, wind and phlegm in constitution, intelligence, measured (or slow) speech and attractive eyes; Mars is youthful, possessed of fierce eyes, fickle and bilious in constitution; Mercury has all the three humours in his constitution, practises jokes, appreciates tastes and speaks cogently (or with pun); Jupiter has pink hairs and eyes, a tall body, phlegmatic nature and great erudition and Wisdom; Venus has a charming body, attractive eyes, black and curly hair and enjoys happiness; and Saturn has tawny eyes, a bluish or black complexion, coarse hair and indolent nature.[55]

101. Muscles, bone, blood, skin, semen, marrow and fat are ruled in order by Saturn, the Sun, Moon, Mercury, Venus, Jupiter and Mars.

102. When the ascendant, the Moon and malefics are all posited in the last portion of Rāśis, 'when malifics occupy the Kendras from the Moon, when malefics and benefics occupy the first and second half respectively and when Scorpio is the rising Sign, the child will die soon.

103. If there be malefics both in the ascendant and in the 7th house and if the Moon, conjoined with malefics, be not aspected by benefics, the child would certainly meet with its end.[56]

104-104½. When the weak Moon occupies the 12th house, malefics the ascendant and the 8th house, and benefics are not in Kendras; or when the Moon, not conjoined with benefics, occupies the Lagna, the 7th, 8th or 12th house, unaspected by benefics posited in Kendra etc., the child perishes.[57]

105-105½. If the Moon be posited in the 6th or 8th house and be aspected by malefics, the child will die soon after birth. On the other hand, if the Moon in the above yoga is aspected by benefics also, it will die in 8 years. The same result i.e. death in the 8th year, will follow, if the Moon is aspected both by malefics and benefics.[58]

106-106½. When the weak Moon is in the Lagna, or is hemmed in between malefics, or when malefics occupy the 8th house or Kendras; or when the Moon is posited in the 4th, 7th or 8th house, or when the Lagna is surrounded by malefics, the child will die likewise.

107-108. The child will die along with its mother, if malefics occupy the 7th house from the Moon, provided there is no benefic aspect. The same prediction will have to be made, when the Moon occupies the end of a Rāśi without any benefic aspect, and malefics, the 5th and 9th houses; or when the Moon occupies the Lagna and malefics the 7th house.[59]

109. If the Moon is eclipsed at the time and malefics occupy the 8th house, both the mother and child will die soon. The death will be due to a surgical operation, if the Sun be in the Lagna and strong malefics in the 8th house.[60]

110. When Sign Cancer (Karka) rises along with the Moon and Jupiter in it, Mercury and Venus occupy Kendras, and the rest the 3rd, 6th and 11th house, the child will indeed be blessed with an unlimited span of life.

111. The maximum span of life is enjoyed by one, in whose birth Sign Pisces rises with its own Navāṁśa, the Moon occupies Taurus (Vṛṣa) and the 25th degree, and all the planets their exaltations.[60a]

112-114. A strong planet posited in the ascendant or a Kendra, aspected by benefics confers on the native both long life and wealth. One lives for 60 years, if the Moon is in her own or exaltation house, benefics in their own houses, and the lord of the Lagna, possessed of strength, in the Lagna itself. The longevity is of 70 years, when benefics are in the Kendras and the 8th house devoid of planets, and when Jupiter is strong (?). The native lives for 80 years, if benefics occupy their Mūlatrikoṇa houses, Jupiter his exaltation, and the lord of the ascendant is strong. One lives for 30 years only, when strong malefics occupy Kendras and the 8th house is free from planets.[61]

115. When the lord of the 8th occupies the 9th, and Jupiter occupying the 8th is aspected by malefics, the native lives for 24 years. The longevity is of 27 years (or 12 years ?) if the lords of both the Lagna and the 8th house occupy the 8th.[62]

116. When the Lagna is occupied by a malefic and Jupiter, aspected by the Moon, and the 8th house is tenanted by some planet, the child will live for 20 years. The same age is to be predicted, when Saturn is in the Lagna or 9th house, Venus in a Kendra and the Moon in the 9th or 12th.

117. The span of life is 100 years, when Jupiter occupies Cancer (Karka) or when Venus and Jupiter are in Kendras. It is 40 years, when the lord of the 12th house occupies the Lagna, and the 8th house is devoid of benefics.

118. If the lords of the Lagna and the 8th house exchange their positions, the child will live for five years only. When Jupiter and Venus are combined in the Lagna, and Mercury and the Moon in the 8th house, it is 50 years.

119-119½. The above-mentioned spans of life are called those caused by Yoga or planetary dispositions. Now I shall explain the one-called Spaṣṭa or one based on planetary strength or longitudes. When the Sun is most powerful in the chart, the Span is called Piṇḍaja, whereas when the Moon is very strong, it is called Nisargaja; and when the ascendant is very strong, it is Aṁśāyuḥ. Now listen to their delineation.

120-122. The years contributed by the seven planets headed by the Sun, when they are in their highest exaltation, are in order 19, 25, 15, 12, 15, 21 and 20, in the Piṇḍāyurdāya system, while in the Nisargaja one they are 20, 1, 2, 9, 18, 20 and 50 years respectively. Subtract a planet's longitude from its highest exaltation figures. If the result is less than six Signs (Rāśis), it should be subtracted from 12 Rāśis and its Aṁśas be taken towards its contribution.[63]

123. A planet posited in an inimical house loses a part (i.e. 1/3) of its contribution except when it is retrograde. Similarly, one that is combust will lose half of its contribution. However Venus and Saturn do not lose anything on the score of eclipse.

124-124½. When there is a possibility of reduction on two counts for a planet's contribution, only the bigger one should be resorted to. When there is a malefic in the Lagna, the contribution of the Lagna should be reduced thus : Leave off the number representing the Signs in the longitude of the ascendant and reduce the degrees etc. to minutes and multiply the result by the rectified contribution of that planet. Divide the product by the number of minutes in Bhagaṇa (360°, which is 21,600). Now subtract the quotient from the rectified Āyus of that planet. The result will give the final rectified contribution of that malefic.

125-127. The contribution of a malefic (aspected by a benefic?) is completely left out, while that of the benefic is halved. These contributions of the several planets (and the Lagna) thus rectified should be multiplied by their respective multipliers (Guṇakas) and divided by 360. The quotient will give the Āyus in years and the remainder being multiplied by 12 and divided by the above divisor will give the months. The remainder should be multiplied by 30 and divided as before by 360. The result will be days, and the remainder being multiplied by 60 and divided as before will yield Ghaṭīs etc.

127½-128½. The rectified contribution of the Lagna is got by leaving off the Rāśis in its figures and converting the degrees etc. into minutes and dividing the result by 200. The quotient gives years, and the remainder being multiplied by 12 and divided by 200, gives months etc.

129-129½. In the Aṁśāyurdāya system the longitudes of the planets and the ascendant should be converted into minutes and divided by 40. The result will give the years etc. contributed by the planets etc. I shall now explain the rectification of the contributions.

130-131. Subtract the longitude of a planet from the figures for the ascendant. If the result is less than six Signs, there should be rectification, and not otherwise. Convert the balance thus got into degrees and divide it by 30. Then reduce the quotient by 1. The result in degrees is to be divided by 30. This result again reduced by one will be the multiplier.[64]

132. The contribution of a benefic should be reduced to a half and that of a malefic to nil, without doubt. The contributions of planets when multiplied by the Guṇaka give their nett Āyus. This is what is meant by rectification.

133. The degrees etc. in the Āyus of a planet should be divided by 200. The quotient will give years, and the remainder multiplied by 12 and divided by 200 will yield months, days etc.

134. The contribution of the Lagna multiplied by 3 and divided by 10 gives its Āyus in years. The remainder should be multiplied by 12 and divided by 10. The result will give months and days.

135-135½. When the Lagna is very strong, its nett contribution would be the above result increased by so many years as there are Rāśis in the Lagna. The degrees etc. multiplied by two and divided by 12 would give months, and the remainder being multiplied by 30 and divided as before, days etc. This is not done in the case of Piṇḍa and Nisarga systems.

136-137. The Daśā (major period) of that planet which is the strongest among the three viz. Ascendant, the Sun and Moon, will operate in the beginning. Then will come the Daśās of those that are in Kendras. In case there are many planets posited in Kendras (quadrants), then the strongest of them will have precedence over others. If two planets are equally strong, then that which contributes a greater number of years of Āyus, will operate first. In the case of planets that are associated with the Sun, the faster-moving one will come first (i.e. the one which becomes visible first).

138-140. The order of the Daśās is the following : A planet whose Ṣadvargabala is a half (of its maximum), one whose Bala is 1/3, a planet which is situated in a trine, one in the 7th (therefrom), one in the 7th itself, one in the 4th house and one in the 4th or 8th from the previous (This translation is tentative). As in the previous Āyurdāya, here too the rules regarding the precedence of Daśā with regard to the planets posited in quadrants, their order in case of a tie, are the same as noted already. The Guṇakas (multipliers) for the various types of planets are the following: for the Daśānātha (i.e. the planet whose Daśā comes first) it is 84 (or does it mean 4 or 8 according to his strength ?); for one in conjunction with another it is 4; for one posited in a line, it is 28; for one posited in the 7th house, it is 12; and for one in the 4th or 8th house, it is 21.

141. O Nārada, the Daśā period being multiplied by these Guṇakas and divided by the Guṇaikya (the combined Guṇa or product of the Guṇakas) yields the nett result in years.

When the remainder is multiplied by 12 and divided by the above divisor, months etc. are got.

142. The sub-divisions or minor periods of a Daśā are Vidaśās and Upadaśās. When the lord of the sub-period happens to be an Adhimitra (fast friend) or is posited in the former's house, exaltation or in the Lagna, the period should be increased in order by 1, 4, 1 or 7 years(?).

143. A benefic occupying a house increases its prospects, provided he is aspected by another occupying a contributory house. On the other hand, if he is posited in any other house, he will destroy it.

144. Whatever substances are allotted to a planet, all that should be mentioned as occurring in the Daśā of that planet by its occupation, aspect and conjunction, to the person concerned in his profession, life etc.

145-146. If the lord of the sub-period—Vidaśā or Upadaśā—is aspected by an inimical planet, he will cause only disasters. On the other hand, one who is aspected by a benefic, or a friend and is posited in benefic or friendly Vargas, and is strong at the time (of the sub-period) is declared to be a destroyer of all troubles. This applies also to one whose Aṣṭakavarga results are excellent.

147-148. A planet that is posited in its exaltation house identical with an auspicious house counted from the Lagna, Moon or Sun, will yield the best results, while one posited in its own house, Mūlatrikoṇa or friendly house, moderately good effects. The effect of one that is posited in an untoward house, will be undesirable. The effect, good or bad, will be intense or otherwise, according as the planet is strong or otherwise.

149. In a movable Lagna the effects of the three decanates, first, second and third, are good, middling and bad respectively; in a fixed one, they are in order bad, good and middling; and in a dual one, middling, bad and good.

150. The Lagna being aspected or joined by its own lord, Mercury or Jupiter confers excellent results on the native, while being hemmed in between malefics or being aspected or joined by malefics, it leads to his ruination.

151-152. In the Sun's Aṣṭakavarga chart he produces beneficent influences on houses, 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11, counted from his own position; he is good in these houses counted from the positions of Mars and Saturn also; he is good in 6, 7, and 12 from Venus; he is good in 5, 6, 9 and 11 places from Jupiter; good in 3, 6, 10 and 11 from the Moon; he is good in 3, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11 and 12 places counted from Mercury; and lastly in 3, 4, 6, 10, 11 and 12 places from the Ascendant.

153-154. The Moon is beneficial in places 1, 3, 6, 7, 10 and 11 from himself; in 3, 6, 7, 8, 10 and 11 places from the Sun; in places 2, 3, 5, 6, 9, 10 and 11 from Mars; in 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10 and 11 places from Mercury; in 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 10 and 11 places from Jupiter; in 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, 10 and 11 places from Venus; in 3, 5, 6 and 11 places from Saturn; and in 3, 6, 10 and 11 places from the ascendant.

155-156. 165. In the above beneficial houses (mentioned in the Aṣṭakavarga charts of the planets) put vertical lines and in others mere dots. If these houses that contain benefic lines happen to be auspicious, when counted from one's natal sign i.e. Rāśi, and also to be owned by a benefic, friendly planet or the planet concerned or to be the planet's exaltation, the result must be wholly favourable, and in others it will be unfavourable.[64a]

166. The effects of benefic lines from 1 to 8, contained in a Rāśi, are in order (1) hardship, (2) loss of wealth, (3) trouble, (4) moderate effects, (5) acquisition of wealth and happiness, (6) influx of money, (7) happiness, and (8) accomplishment of one's ambitions.

167. The seven planets beginning with the Sun represent seven relations in order : (1) Father, (2) Mother, (3) Enemy, (4) Friend, (5) Brother, (6) Wife, and (7) Servant. When the Ascendant, its lord, the Moon and Sun are well-placed, the native will be blessed with wealth, fame and security.[65]

168-169. When the Navāṁśa (of the Lagna or 10th house) is owned by the Sun, the subject earns his living by (selling) grass, gold, horses, elephant-drivers, etc.,when it is owned by the Moon, through agriculture, marine products and women; when by Mars, through metals (or ores), weapons and adventures; when by Mercury, through poetry, fine arts (architecture etc.) and the like; when by Jupiter, through Gods (i.e. worshipping Gods), Brahmins and mines; when by Venus, through silver, cattle, gems etc.; and when by Saturn, through murderous deeds, wearisome tasks and mean activities.

170. If Saturn, Jupiter and Mars are exalted at a birth and when the ascendant is strong, the native will become a great monarch. When the Lagna is Vargottama and when the Moon is aspected by four or more planets, the same effect will follow.

171. When Mars is exalted, the Sun and Moon in Dhanus, and Saturn in the Lagna, the native becomes a landlord or king. The same effect takes place, when the exalted Sun is posited in the Lagna, Jupiter in the 10th house, and the Moon and Saturn in the 7th house.

172. When Saturn or the Moon occupies the Lagna in exaltation, the Sun and Mercury the 6th house, Venus and Mars in Tulā and Meṣa respectively; or when Jupiter is in Karkaṭaka Lagna along with the Moon and Mars, one becomes a King.

173. One becomes a King, if at one's birth the Moon occupies Vṛṣabha-Lagna, and the Sun, Jupiter and Saturn in the 4th, 7th, and 10th houses; or if Saturn occupies Makara-Lagna and the Moon and others the 3rd, 6th, 9th (?) and 11th (?)houses.[66]

174. When Jupiter and the Moon are together posited in Dhanus, Mars in Makara, and the exalted Sun or Venus in the Ascendant; or when the Karka-lagna is occupied by Jupiter, Meṣa by the Sun and the 11th house by Mercury, the Moon and Venus, the native becomes a King.

175. When the Lagna happens to be Vṛṣabha, occupied by the Moon, Signs Siṁha, Kumbha and Makara are occupied by the Sun, Saturn and Mars respectively, a king is born.[67]

176. When the Lagna is Meṣa occupied by Mars, or when it (Lagna) is Siṁha occupied by Jupiter, the native becomes a king. The same effect takes place, when Mars and the Sun occupy the 5th house, Jupiter, the Moon and Venus the 4th house, and Mercury the Lagna which is identical with Kanyā.

177. An illustrious king is ushered into the world, when the Lagna happens to be Makara occupied by Saturn, the Moon occupies Meṣa, the Sun Siṁha, and Venus and Jupiter Tulā and Mithuna respectively.[68]

178. Under the above planetary configurations even an ordinary person's son will become a king. On the other hand, O great Sage, under the following yogas only a king's son can hope to be one such.

179. One becomes a king, if three or more planets possessed of strength occupy their exaltation houses or Mūla-trikoṇas. The same event takes place, when the Sun is posited in Siṁha, the Moon in the ascendant identical with Meṣa, Mars in Makara, Kumbha or Vṛścika and Jupiter in Dhanus.

180-180½. O Sage, when Venus occupies the 4th house identical with his own Rāśi, and the Moon the 9th house, either joined or aspected by benefics, and the rest the 3rd, 1st (6th ?) and 11th houses, one becomes a ruler.[69]

181-181½. A virtuous king is born, if Mercury occupies the Lagna in strength, a benefic (Jupiter) possessed of strength an auspicious house (or 9th ?) and the rest the 9th, 2nd and the Upacaya houses (3, 6, 10 and 11).

182-182½. One becomes a king with the Moon, Saturn and Jupiter occupying the 10th, 11th and the ascendant respectively, Mars and Mercury the 2nd house, and Venus and the Sun the 4th house, at one's birth.

183. When the Moon occupies the ascendant identical with Vṛṣabha, Jupiter and Saturn the 2nd and 6th respectively, and the rest the 11th house, the person concerned becomes a ruler.

184-184½. Jupiter in the 4th house, the Sun and the Moon in the 10th house, Saturn in the Lagna and the rest is in the 11th house, produce kings. Similarly, Mars and Saturn in the Lagna, the Moon, Jupiter, Venus, the Sun and Mercury in the 4th, 7,th, 9th, 10th and 11th respectively usher kings into the world.[70]

185-185½. One attains kingship or a kingdom during the major period (Daśā) of the planet posited in the ascendant or the 10th house, or of one that is very strong; whereas that of such planets as are posited in inimical houses, in debilitation etc. is productive of great troubles.

186-187. If at a birth all the planets are posited in any two contiguous quadrants (Kendras) (i.e. 1 and 4, 4 and 7, 7 and 10 or 10 and 1), the yoga named Gadā or Mace is generated. If all the planets occupy only the 1st and 7th houses, it will be called Śakaṭa (carriage). The Yoga called Vihaga (Bird) is caused by the planets occupying the 4th and 10th houses. Śṛṅgāṭaka is brought into effect by all the planets being posited in the 5th, 9th and 1st houses. The Hala yoga is brought about by all the planets being posited in mutual trines beginning with any house other than the ascendant.[71]

188. The yoga termed Vajra (Diamond or Thunderbolt) is caused by benefics being posited in the 1st and 7th houses, and by malefics in the 4th and 10th houses. Yava yoga (Barley) is the result of the benefics and malefics exchanging the positions mentioned in the previous yoga (i.e. benefics should be in 4th and 10th and malefics in the 1st and 7th houses). The Kamala (Lotus) yoga is the effect of all the planets occupying the Kendras in any manner. The Vāpi (Well) yoga is the result of the planets occupying houses other than the Kendras (i.e. in Paṇapharas or Āpoklimas).[72]

189. The Yūpa yoga (Plough) is the effect of all the planets occupying the four houses beginning with the Lagna. The Sarayoga (Arrow) is caused by their staying in the four contiguous houses from the 4th house. The Sakti yoga is caused, if they occupy the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th houses. Daṇḍa (Rod) is caused by their occupying the 10th, 11th, 12th and 1st houses.[73]

190. When all the planets occupy the seven contiguous houses beginning with the Lagna, the yoga is called Nau (Boat); while the Kūṭa yoga (Fraud) is caused by the planets being in the 7 houses beginning with the 4th house. The Chatra (umbrella) yoga results from the planets occupying the 7 houses beginning with the 7th house. The Cāpa (Bow) yoga is caused by the planets occupying the 7 houses beginning with the 10th house. The Ardhendu (Crescent) yoga results from their occupying seven houses other than the above, i.e. beginning with any Panaphara or Āpoklima house.[74]

191-192. Cakra (Wheel) yoga is formed by all the planets occupying all the odd houses; and Samudra (Ocean), the even houses. Seven yogas called (Viṇā (Lute), Dāman (Garland), Pāśa (Noose), Kedāra (Field), Śūla (Spike), Yuga (Yoke) and Golaka (Sphere) are caused when all the seven planets are posited in 7 Rāśis, 6, 5, 4, 3, 2 and 1 respectively. When all the planets are in movable Rāśis, the yoga called Rajju (Rope) is formed.[75]

193. When the planets are only in fixed Rāśis, Musala (Stave) yoga is formed; in dual Rāśis, Nala (Reed) yoga. The Mālā yoga (Wreath) is formed by the benefics (Jupiter, Mercury and Venus) occupying the Kendras; by malefics (the Sun, Mars and Saturn) therein, Sarpa (Serpent) yoga is formed.

194. One born under the Rajju Yoga becomes envious and fond of wandering; one of Musala yoga is blessed with wealth and honour; one born under the Nalayoga becomes deficient in a limb and full of prominent veins; under the Mālā or Srak yoga, commands pleasures; and under Sarpayoga, gets afflicted or becomes miserable.[76]

200. The yogas termed Sunaphā, Anaphā and Duradharā are formed when there is any planet, other than the Sun, in the 2nd, 12th and both the houses respectively. In the absence of any of these three yogas, Kemadruma yoga is formed.

201. A person born with the Sunaphā yoga at birth will enjoy the wealth earned by his own efforts, be charitable, wealthy and happy; and with Anaphā yoga, one becomes healthy, famous, dressed attractively and of good character.

202. Under Durdhara-yoga one enjoys pleasures, becomes happy, wealthy, munificent and charitable; while under Kemadrumayoga, one becomes very dirty, miserable, mean and penniless.

203-204. O Sage, if the Sun is conjoined with the Moon, the native will become a mechanic or mason; with Mars, a wanderer; with Mercury, famours, clever, learned and wealthy; with Jupiter, engaged in helping others; with Venus, earning one's livelihood by means of weapons; and with Saturn, clever in metallurgy and pottery.[79]

Among the planets Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, the Moon, Venus, Saturn and the Sun, if any four planets should combine in the 10th or 2nd house (?), a Buddhist monk, an Ājīvaka monk, an aged mendicant, a wandering recluse, and an ascetic living on rain-water respectively are brought into existence. In case the planets owning the concerned houses are defeated in a planetary war, there will be a fall from asceticism.

212-213. Should the planets be tiny or eclipsed, one would not actually don the ochre robes; on the other hand, should they be powerful, persons would be strongly attached to their respective ascetic orders. O Nārada, one will become an ascetic, when the lord of the Lagna, being unaspected by any planet, aspects Saturn; or when Saturn aspects the lord of the ascendant that is eclipsed; or when Saturn, the Sun and the lord of Lagna occupy the Aṁśa of Mars or the Sun; or when the Moon is aspected by Saturn.[82]

224. When the natal Sign and its lord are strong, and when the Moon also is possessed of strength, all good results will accrue to the native; otherwise they will be the opposite of what has been given above. The same result will follow, if she is combined with or aspected by those that are posited in a Rāśi that is owned by a friend of the lord of the Lagna-decanate.

237-238. The results of the Moon's being placed in the various Dvādaśāṁśas (1/12 of a Sign) have already been enunciated. Those of her Navāṁśa placements will now be explained: When the Moon is posited in the Navāṁśa Rāśi owned by Mars (i.e. Meṣa or Vṛścika), the native becomes a policeman (or watchman), interested in killing, single combat, and quarrels, and wealthy; when in one of Venus (Vṛṣabha or Tulā), foolish and addicted to others' spouses; when in one of Mercury (Mithuna or Kanyā), a poet, happy, dancer (actor), thief, learned and an artist (or artisan).[93]

241-242. When the Sun is aspected by the Moon and other planets, the results are the same as for the Moon being aspected by others (vide Ślokas 230-235). When a planet is posited in Vargottamāṁśa, own house or in another's house, the good results enumerated will be full-fledged, middling or very meagre, as the case may be : If the owner of the Aṁśa (occupied by a planet) is strong, he bestows very good results, according to the effects of the (Rāśi occupied and the aspects he receives from others.

243. If the Sun should occupy the Lagna at birth the native would become a hero, stubborn, of defective eyes and merciless; if the Lagna is Meṣa, he will suffer from cataract in the eye and be wealthy; if it be Siṁha, night-blind.

245. The Sun in the 3rd house makes one learned and full of prowess; in the 4th house, depressed (or unhappy) and afflicted; in the 5th, bereft of wealth and issue; and in the 6th house, powerful and victorious over his foes.[97]

246-246½. 250. The Moon in the tenth house confers virtues or piety, intelligence and riches; in the eleventh, fame, intelligence and wealth; and in the twelfth, meanness and loss of limbs. These are the results mentioned by the wise for the Moon's stay in the various houses at a person's birth.

251. Mars occupying the Lagna at birth causes wounds in the body; the second house, makes one eat forbidden or rotten food; the third house, perform virtuous deeds; the fourth house, sinful activities; and the remaining houses, as in the case of the Sun.

252. Mercury gives the following effects in the first eight houses beginning with the ascendant : (1) Learned; (2) Wealthy; (3) Leader of men; (4) Scholar; (5) Minister; (6) Having Enemies; (7) Appreciator of virtues; and (8) a paragon of virtues. In the remaining four houses the effects are similar to those of the Sun.[100]

253. Jupiter produces the following effects in the 12 houses :— (1) Learned; (2) of pleasant speech; (3) Miserly; (4) Happy; (5) Wise; (6) Vanquisher of foes; (7) Intelligent; (8) Mean; (9) Ascetic; (10) Blessed and Wealthy; (11) Greedy, and (12) Wicked.[101]

254. Venus causes the following effects in the first five houses : (1) Passionate and Happy; (2) Quarrelsome; (3) Anxious for sexual pleasure; (4) Happy; and (5) Having many daughters; and in other houses he gives the same results as Jupiter.[102]

255-255½. Saturn occupying the ascendant at birth makes one penniless, sickly, voluptuous, slovenly, sickly during childhood and indolent; but if it is his exaltation, one becomes virtuously disposed, a king or administrator of a village, learned and of attractive physique. In other places he is similar to the Sun.

256-257. A planet in exaltation yields its results in full; in Mūlatrikoṇa, three-fourth.; in the house of a benefic as well as in its own house, a half; in the house of a friendly planet, one-fourth; in an enemy's house, very little; and in its debilitation and when it is eclipsed, the result is nil.

258-259. When one or more planets are posited in their own houses, Mūlatrikoṇa, exaltation or friendly houses the person becomes a worthy scion of his family, leader of the family and respected by his kinsmen; wealthy, happy, enjoyer of pleasures and a king; or enjoyer of others' wealth, protector of friends and relatives (or protected by friends and kinsmen), leader of a group:; commander or king, as the case may be.[103]

260-261. When benefic planets are posited in odd houses and in the Sun's Horā the native becomes famous, very enterprising, brilliant or valiant, intelligent, wealthy and strong; and when the benefiçs are posited in even Signs and in the Moon's Horā, he becomes lustrous, tender, attractive, enjoyer of luxuries, and wise.[104]

262. Malefics occupying even houses and the Horā of the Sun, will produce moderate results, while benefics occupying odd Rāśis and the Sun's Horā, will not yield the results expected of them (i.e. mentioned above).[105]

263. If the Moon at a birth occupies a decanate (Drekkāṇa) owned by a friendly planet, the native becomes handsome, and virtuous while in any other decanate, he gets the qualities and form appropriate to the owner of the decanate.

264-265. When the planets are posited in decanates that are designated as (1) Serpent, (2) Weapon, (3) Quadruped, and (4) Aquatic, the native becomes in order: (1) Cruel, murderous, cohabiting with revered women and wanderer; (2) thief, gluttonous, wealthy, intelligent, a king, impotent and destroyer of enemies; (3) a slave and one labouring under somebody without payment; and sinful, murderous and foolish.[105a]

266-267. The effects of Vargottama Dvādaśāṁśas in the Signs, Meṣa etc. are the same as for the Rāśis themselves. When Mars occupies his own Triṁśāṁśa, the native will have wife, strength, ornaments, prowess, daring spirit, and brilliance, or will be hostile to his wife and attached to other women.[106]

268-268½. When Saturn occupies his own Triṁśāṁśa, the person becomes miserable, untidy and endowed with followers. When Jupiter occupies his own Triṁśāṁśa, one gets happiness, intelligence, wealth, fame, brilliance, respect of the people, enjoyments, horses and elephants (?).[107]

269-270½. When Mercury occupies his own Triṁśāṁśa, one will be blessed with a highly developed intelligence, proficiency in fine arts, poetry, architecture and disputations; he will also be deceitful and well-versed in the Śāstras and be clever in adventurous deeds. When Venus occupies his own Triṁśāṁśa, one will have many children, happiness, health, enjoyments, an attractive personality and riches; he will have a tender body and uncontrolled senses.[108]

271-271½. When the luminaries are conjoined with Mars and other planets, the following effects are produced: (1) Heroic and obdurate; (2) Abnormal and a killer; (3) virtuous; (4) Happy and Learned; and (5) Attractive in action and body.

272-273. Planets that are posited in Kendras identical with their own house, Mūlatrikoṇa or Exaltation, are considered to be Mutual Kārakas (Significators), especially the one that is in the 10th house. A birth is highly auspicious, if the ascendant is in Vargottamāṁśa and if there are planets in the Veśi house (2nd house from the Sun).[109]

274. When Kendras (Quadrants) as well as the houses of the Kārakas (Significators) are not vacant, Jupiter and the lords of the ascendant and the lunar Sign, posited in kendras, confer beneficial results in the middle of their periods.

275. Planets posited in Rāśis that rise with their hind part foremost, in those that rise both ways—and in those that rise with their head first produce effects at the end and in the middle and in the beginning of their periods respectively. The Sun and Mars confer their results at the beginning, while Jupiter and Venus in the middle.[110]

275½. The Sun and the Moon yield their results at the end, while Mercury does it always.

276-276½. If the 5th and the 7th houses counted from the ascendant or the Moon, be aspected or joined by their own lords or by benefics, there would be all-round progress and prosperity for the two Bhāvas (i.e. issue and wife or husband); otherwise their progress would be hindered.[111]

277-278. If the Sun be posited in Mina, Saturn in the 7th therefrom would destroy the wife; while Mars in the 5th from the Sun would kill the issue. Malefics in the 12th and 2nd houses or in the 4th and 8th houses from Venus would destroy the wife with fire, provided he is neither conjoined with nor aspected by benefics.[112]

279-280. [In addition to the yoga mentioned in the previous verse], if the Moon and the Sun occupy the 12th and 8th houses (or 6th ?), the man too will die along with his wife. The nature of the wife is determined from the planets occupying the 7th house. When the luminaries are situated in the 7th or 9th or 5th house, the wife would be a handicapped person. When the Sun and Venus are together in Koṇa or in the Lagna, or when Venus is in Sandhi either in the 7th or 12th house, the native's wife would be barren.[113]

281. If the 5th house is not occupied by benefics, if the ascendant, 7th and 12th houses are occupied by malefics, and if the weak Moon be in the 5th house, the native will have neither wife nor children.[114]

282. If Saturn be in the 10th house and aspects Venus posited in the 7th house, the person would be committing adultery. Should the two viz. Venus and Saturn, be combined with the Moon, the man would be adulterous along with his wife.

283. When the Moon and Venus are in the 7th house, the man, his wife or at least his son will have undeveloped organs. This defect will not arise, if they are aspected by benefics.

284. One becomes the destroyer of one's family (lineage), if the Moon, Venus and a malefic occupy the 10th, 7th and 4th house respectively. One will become an artist (artisan or architect), if the rising decanate is occupied by Mercury and aspected by Saturn occupying a kendra.[115]

285. One should be said to be born of a slave woman, if the decanate be owned by Saturn, and if Venus be in the 12th house, being debilitated. The result would follow, if both the luminaries be in the 7th house and be aspected by Saturn.[116]

286. Mars and Saturn occupying the 7th house and being aspected by another malefic, produce rheumatism; while a malefic occupying the Aṁśa of Karka or Vṛścika in a kendra, would cause venereal disease.

287. One is afflicted with leprosy, if the Lagna and the Moon are hemmed in between malefics, and the Sun is posited in the 7th house. One would be of defective limbs, if the Moon be in the 10th house, Mars in the 7th, and Saturn in the 2nd house from the Sun.

288-289½. If the Sun and Moon are posited in mutual Rāśis or Aṁśas, one will suffer from colic; and if the luminaries are combined, one will be lean in body. If the Sun, Moon, Mars and Saturn are posited in the 8th, 6th, 2nd and 12th house respectively, one is deprived of one's eye-sight by the affliction caused by a wandering spirit known as Bālagraha (which attacks children). Malefics in the 5th house, unaspected by benefics, make one deaf; while the same in the 7th house cause bad (ugly) teeth.[117]

290-291. When the ascendant is occupied by Jupiter and the 7th house by Saturn, the native will be afflicted by rheumatism. One becomes mad, if Mars occupies the 4th or 7th house and Jupiter or Saturn, the ascendant; or if Mars occupies the 5th house, Mercury the 7th and the Moon, the 12th house.[118]

292. Malefics occupying the 2nd, 5th, 9th and 12th houses cause bondage corresponding to the type of decanate occupied by them. When the decanates happen to be Serpent, Fetters and Noose and are aspected by strong malefics, a person suffers bondage.[119]

293-293½. When the Moon and Saturn are together and aspected by Mars, the native will be afflicted with epilepsy, be foul-mouthed and consumptive. When the Sun, Mars and Saturn occupy the 10th house, are aspected by benefics and are of bright orbs, natives become servants of the highest, moderate and low order, according to the strength of the planets.

294-295. Whatever effects have been declared for male births should be applied to female births, as far as they are applicable to them; and such effects should be declared in the case of their husbands; and in the case of death, it should be taken to apply to their husbands. Their physical features should be read from the Moon and ascendant; and paramours from the malefics occupying the 7th house.[120]

296. If both the ascendant and the Moon occupy even houses, the woman concerned will be of normal conduct; and if they are aspected by benefics, she will be of excellent character and will possess many ornaments (or will be charming).

297. If the two (Lagna and the Moon) be in Odd Signs, the woman would be masculine in physical features and mental disposition. If the two be aspected by malefics, they would be wicked (sinful) and devoid of all virtues.

298. When Mars, Saturn, Jupiter, Mercury and Venus are posited in a Sign belonging to Mars in a girl's horoscope, she will be in order (1) spoiled in girlhood, (2) a slave, (3) virtuous, (4) cunning, and (5) immoral.

299. When the Lagna and the Moon are in odd Signs, the girl will have the character and physical features corresponding to those of the planet owning the Sign, or be wicked. She will be sinful and devoid of virtues, when these two are aspected by malefics.[121]

300. When the five planets mentioned above (viz. Mars, Saturn, Jupiter, Mercury and Venus) are posited in a Rāśi owned by Venus, the respective effects would be (1) foul-tongued, (2) one remarried, (3) virtuous, (4) a scholar and (5) famous. In a house owned by Mercury the effects are : (1) deceitful, (2) impotent, (3) a devout wife, (4) virtuous, and (5) of wandering habit or fickle-minded.[122]

301. When these planets are in Gemini (Mithuna), she will be (1) a harlot, (2) killer of her husband, (3) virtuous, (4) artisan (artiste) and (5)ignoble. In Siṁha the effects are : (1) talkative, (2) a concubine, (3) passionate, (4) of masculine disposition, and (5) ugly ? (or unapproachable ?).[123]

302. In a house of Jupiter they are : (1) very virtuous, (2) having very little Sex life, (3) appreciator of merits, (4) learned, and (5) devout wife. In a house of Saturn the effects are : (1) a slave, (2) attached to a low-born person, (3) virtuous or devoted wife, (4) wicked, and (5) barren.

303-304. The above-mentioned effects for the Signs of the five planets are also applicable to the Triṁśāṁśas or decanate of the stronger of the two viz. Lagna and the Moon, happening to be that of one of the five planets viz. Mars, Saturn, Jupiter, Mercury and Saturn. It Venus and Saturn should occupy each other's Navāṁśa or if Venus be in Kumbha Navāṁśa, the woman concerned would get highly inflamed by sexual passion and have sexual congress with members of her own sex. If the 7th house be vacant and weak, the husband would be a despicable person; and if Mercury and Saturn, without receiving any benefic aspect, be posited there, he would be a eunuch. If the 7th house be a movable Sign (and its lord in a movable Sign), the husband would always be in a foreign country.

305-306. If Sun be in the 7th house, she would be deserted by her husband; if Mars, a virgin widow; if Saturn, aspected by a malefic, she remains a spinster throughout her life; if powerful malefics, a widow; and if both malefics and benefics, a widow who is remarried.[124]

307. When a weak malefic occupies the 7th house, the woman is abandoned by her husband, unless the malefic is aspected by benefics. When Venus and Mars occupy each other's Aṁśas, the woman becomes another's mistress.[125]

308-309. When the Moon (also) is in the 7th house (in addition to Mars and Venus), she goes astray with the approval of her husband. If the Lagna be a Sign owned by Saturn or Mars and be occupied by the Moon and Venus, she would be a harlot. If in this yoga there is also malefic aspect on the Lagna, she goes astray along with her mother. If the Aṁśa of the 7th house is owned by Mars and aspected by Saturn, her genital organ will be diseased. On the other hand, if the Aṁśa belongs to a benefic, she would be loved by her husband.[126]

310-311. If the 7th house or its Aṁśa is owned by Saturn, the husband will be a foolish old fellow; if by Mars, he will be hot-tempered and libidinous; if by Mercury, learned and skilful; if by Jupiter, virtuous and self-controlled; if by the Moon, lustful and tender; if by Venus, attractive and charming; and if by the Sun, one doing very gentle deeds.[127]

312. When Venus and the Moon occupy the Lagna, she becomes happy but envious; and when Mercury and the Moon, proficient in fine arts, happy and virtuous.

313. If Venus and Mercury should occupy the ascendant, the woman would be exceedingly charming, attractive and skilled in fine arts. When there are three benefics in the Lagna, she will command immense wealth and happiness as well as virtues.

314. A woman would be widowed during the Daśā (major period) of the malefic planet occupying the 8th house or of the planet occupying the Aṁśa of the lord of the 8th house. Still she herself will predecease her husband, in case there are benefics in the second house.

315-317. A woman will have few children, if at her birth the Moon occupies Kanyā, Vṛścika, Siṁha or Vṛṣabha identical with the 5th house. A woman becomes ugly, if the Lagna is an odd Rāśi, Saturn moderately strong, the Moon, Mercury and Venus weak, and the rest strong. She becomes famous. learned in many Śāstras and a philosopher, when the Lagna is an even Sign and Jupiter, Mars, Venus and Mercury strong. She takes to asceticism of the type corresponding to the planet posited in the house, when there is a malefic in the 7th house.

318-319. All these things (mentioned above regarding a girl's horoscope) should be considered before marriage or electing a partner or at a query regarding the same. (Now about the cause of death of a person), death should be declared to be caused by the vitiation of the paticular physical constituents belonging to the strongest of the planets aspecting the 8th house. If the seven planets beginning with the Sun are posited in strength in the 8th house, the causes of death are in order : (1) Fire, (2) Water, (3) Wound caused by a weapon, (4) Fever, (5) Disease, (6) Excessive thirst and (7) Inordinate hunger.[128]

320-321. If the 8th house (as well as its lord) be in a movable, fixed or dual house, the end occurs in a far-off place from one's own house, or on the way, as the case may be. When the Sun and Mars occupy the 2nd and 4th house respectively, the death is caused by a fall from the top of a mountain, and when Saturn, the Moon and Mars are in the 4th, 7th and 10th houses in order, by a fall into a well.[129]

322. One dies at the hands of one's own kinsmen, if the two luminaries occupy Virgo (Kanyā) and receive malefic aspect. A person gets a watery grave, if the luminaries occupy the ascendant that is a dual Sign.[130]

323. If the Moon occupying a Sign owned by Mars is hemmed in between malefics, death is by fire or weapon; and if she be in Makara and Saturn in Karka , by dropsy.

324. If the Moon be in Kanyā under the above mentioned condition, death would be through vitiation of blood or swelling in the body; and if it be Saturn, it is due to fire, hanging or a fall. If there be malefics both in the 5th and 9th houses without receiving any benefic aspect, death would take place in captivity.[131]

325-327. If the decanate of the 8th house happens to be Noose, Serpent or Fetters, death will be in prison. If the Moon along with malefics be in Virgo (Kanyā) which is the 7th house, Venus in Meṣa and the Sun in the ascendant, death would take place at home as a result of womens' intrigues. If the Sun or Mars be in the 4th house, Saturn in the 10th and the weak Moon conjoined with malefics in the Lagna, 5th or 9th house, death would be through impalement(?). Death would be in the battle-field, if the Sun be in the 4th and Mars in the 10th aspected by the weak Moon. One will be beaten to death with clubs, if the 1st, 10th, 8th and 4th are occupied by the weak Moon, Mars, Saturn and the Sun respectively.[132]

328. If the above four planets viz. weak Moon, Mars, Saturn and the Sun be posited in the 10th, 9th, 1st and 5th house, death is due to suffocation by smoke, fire, imprisonment or beating[133].

329. When the 4th, 7th and 10th houses are occupied by Mars, the Sun and Saturn respectively, death is due to weapons, fire or king's displeasure. When Saturn, the Moon and Mars are in the 2nd, 4th and 10th houses respectively, it is due to wounds or worms or a fall from a tree.[134]

330. If the Sun be in the 2nd house and Mars in the 4th, death is due to a fall from a vehicle; if, in the above yoga, Mars be in the 7th house along with the weak Moon, it is by the destruction of a machine.[135]

331. When Mars, Saturn and the Moon are in Libra, Aries and a sign belonging to Saturn respectively, or when the weak Moon, the Sun and Mars are in the 10th, 7th and 4th house respectively, it is in the midst of filth and night-soil.

332. If the weak Moon be aspected by the powerful Mars, and Saturn be in the 8th house, the cause of death will be some disease of the privities, worms (basilli), weapons, fire or wood.

333. When Saturn is in the 7th, the Sun in the 8th, and the weak Moon conjoined with Mars in a house of Saturn; or when the Sun, Mars, Saturn, and the Moon are posited in the 1st, 5th, 11th, and 7th respectively, the native will die as a result of a fall from the top of a mountain or tree.[136]

334-335. Death will be caused by the stronger of the two planets viz. the lord of the 22nd decanate and the lord of the 8th house, through, his characteristic disease or agency. Death of a person will take place in a place corresponding to the lord of the Aṁśa occupied by the ascendant, this being influenced by the aspect and conjunction of other planets.[137]

336. The period of unconsciousness of the dying person will correspond to the Aṁśas of the Lagna that have not yet risen. If it (Lagna) is aspected by its lord, the period in to be doubled; if by a benefic, to be trebled; and if by more benefics, it should be increased proportionately through one's intelligence.[138]

337. If the decanate of the 8th house be Fiery, the dead body would be burnt to ashes; if Aquatic, thrown to the waters, and if Serpent, dried by being exposed to the Sun and wind. These results are to be read from the 8th house counted from the Moon as well.[139]

338. If Jupiter be in the 8th house, the departed soul would go to the world of Gods; if the Moon or Venus, to the world of the Manes; if the Sun or Mars, to that of mortals (?); and if Saturn or Mercury, to the infernal regions.[140]

339. The previous world of a soul can be read from the lord of the decanate occupied by the stronger of the two viz. the Sun and the Moon. The world must have been very high or exalted, if the concerned luminary is in its exaltation; moderate, if in its own house; and low, if in debilitation.[141]

340. If the lord of the decanate of the 6th or 8th house occupies the 7th house, or if Jupiter occupies the 6th, a kendra or 8th house, or if he is in his exaltation, identical with the Lagna or the 12th house or in a benefic Aṁśa, possessed of strength, the soul attains emancipation.[142]

341. When neither the time of impregnation nor that of birth is known, the life of querists has to be predicted from the ascendant at the query. The solstices of birth has to be deduced from the two halves or Horās of the ascendant, the first standing for the winter solstice, and the second for the summer one.[143]

342. The age of the person (who asks for a Naṣṭajātaka as a result of his not knowing his date and time of birth) should be read from the ages of the lords of the Trines counted from the Lagna, or from the (lord of) Aṁśa (or decanate) occupied by Jupiter. The season of birth would be summer, if the Sun be in the Lagna. Similarly, the presence of other planets in it would indicate other seasons. Or it may be read from the Sign occupied by the Sun.[144]

343. The Moon, Mercury and Jupiter are to be interchanged with Venus, Mars and Saturn respectively, if necessary. If the decanate of the planet concerned that determines the season is the initial one of the Sign, the month of the season (Ṛtu) should be the first. The lunar day should be found out proportionately.[145]

344. If the Lagna of query be a nocturnal Sign, the ascendant at birth must be a diurnal one, and vice versa; and the time elapsed from sunrise or sunset should be read from the degrees elapsed. If the lord of the Lagna be in a Trikoṇa or be possessed of great strength, the Lagna of birth would correspond to the star ruling at the time of query (?).[146]

345-347. Subtract the longitude of the Moon from the position of the ascendant at query. The natal ascendant would be so far removed from the Moon at query as is represented by the balance. Multiply Vṛṣabha and Siṁha by 10; Mithuna and Vṛścika by 8; Meṣa and Tulā by 7; Makara and Kanyā by 5; and the remaining Rāśis viz. Karka, Dhanus, Kumbha and Mina by their respective numbers. Jupiter, Mars, Venus and Mercury are to be increased (?) by 3, 1, 11 and 11 respectively. The calculation of the lunar mansion (Nityanakṣatra) as well as of the Ahargaṇa (the total number of days elapsed), is done by multiplying it by 7 and dividing by 27. The remainder will give the Nakṣatra in question.[147]

348. By adding to or subtracting from the above shown result, 9, double the figure. You get the year, season and month. The fortnight and lunar day are got by multiplying it by 8. The same being multiplied by 7 will yield the day, night and asterism; and being multiplied by 5, the degree of the ascendant as well as the time of birth in Ghaṭis.[148]

349. The following are the characteristics of the first, second and third decanates of Meṣa (Aries): (1) It is a man holding an axe, dark in complexion, with red eyes, and capable of protecting others. (2) A woman who has been burnt (?), holding iron, and having ornaments, valuable things or pots and dirty things. (3) A man full of treasures or pots, with hairy ears, dark in complexion, wearing a crown, and holding fruits and machines in his hands.[156]

364-365. The decanates of Aquarius (Kumbha) are the following:—(1) A man seated in boat, with his hands adorned with all kinds of gems, who is anxious for collecting ornaments and decorative articles; (2) a woman sailing in a boat towards the shore, whose face is like the Campaka flower (in colour), and who is followed by her retinue; and (3) a naked man coiled by a serpent sitting in a cavern and weeping, as he is troubled by robbers and fire. These are the 36 decanates that have been delineated in proper sequence.[157]

366. O great Sage, in this manner horoscopy has been expounded to you succinctly. Now you will know the branch of astrology known as Saṁhitā-Skandha (a compilation of all useful thinking which is highly beneficial for worldly activities.

CHAPTER FIFTYFIVE

1. In Sanskrit the word Kāla is used in many senses. It means time, the God of Death, the Cosmic Being, the Supreme Lord etc. It is derived thus: संकलयति कालयति इति कालः', 'स सूक्ष्मामपि कलां न लीयते इति कालः' कालशब्दात्ककाराकारौ लीधातोश्च लकारमादाय कालशब्दनिष्पत्तिः ।' 'कलनात्सवधातूनां स कालः परिकीर्तितः । सुख-दुःखाभ्यां भूतानि योजयतीति कालः । कालयति संक्षिपतीति वा कालः । मृत्युसमीपं नयतीति वा कालः ।' The Bhāgavata has the following to say : 'कालो बलीयान् बलिनां भगवानीश्वरोऽव्ययः । प्रजाः कालयते क्रीडन् पशुपालो यथा पशून् ।' "Time is called Kāla, because it controls the life and death of all beings; it does not leave even the minutest part of time, Kalā; it seizes or gathers together all beings; it drives beings; it invests all beings with weal and woe; it contracts their span of life; or it leads them to abode of Death.

Varāhamihira too says : "कालाङ्गानि वराङ्गमाननम्....." "The use of Greek words such as Kriya and Āsphujit, indicates that the chapters bearing on astrology are not very ancient. They may even be post-Varāhamihira. The printed text reads 'कोडान्त बस्तिव्यञ्जसोनखः," which is palpably wrong. It should be 'क्रोडान्त्रवस्तिव्यञ्जनोरवः'.

2. There was a dispute about the origin of the word Horā. Burgess first thought that it was borrowed from the Greeks, but later he changed his view. However, the word Drekkāṇa or Dreṣkāṇa is evidently a Greek word. In each Sign there are two Horās and three decanates. In Meṣa, Mithuna, Siṁha and other odd Rāśis the first half or 15 degree portion is presided over by the Sun, while the next half by the Moon. In the even Signs i.e. Vṛṣabha, Karkaṭaka, Kanyā etc. they are ruled by the Moon and the Sun respectively. There are three decanates in each Sign, the dimension of each being 10 degrees. In each Rāśi the first part or decanate is owned by the same Rāśi and its lord; the second by the Rāśi that is 5th from it; and the third by the Rāśi that is 9th from the original. For example, take Sign Cancer. Its three decanates are called respectively Cancer, Scorpio and Pisces. Their lords too are in order the Moon, Mars and Jupiter.

3. Triṁśāṁśa is 1/30 of a Rāśi which consists of 30 degrees. So one Triṁśāṁśa means one degree. But in Hindu astrology each degree is not given a ruler. On the other hand these 30 degrees are distributed among the non-luminaries. In the odd Signs, Meṣa, Mithuna etc., Mars, Saturn, Jupiter, Mercury and Venus own in order 5°, 5°, 8°, 7° and 5°. In the even Signs, Taurus, Cancer etc. This order is reversed. In other words, the first 5° are ruled by Venus, the next 7° by Mercury, the next 8° by Jupiter 'the next 5° by Saturn and the last 5° by Mars.

4. There are two printing mistakes in the text viz. क्रियण for क्रियेण, and षडर्गं for षड्वर्गं. The Navāṁśas, (3°-20' portions of a Rāśi) of each Sign bear the names of nine Signs and are owned by their lords.

The first Navāṁśa of Aries is owned by Aries itself and its lord is that of Aries viz. Mars; the second by Taurus whose lord is Venus; the third by Gemini ruled by Mercury; the fourth by Cancer and the Moon; the 5th by Leo and the Sun; the sixth by Virgo and Mercury; the 7th by Libra and Venus; the 8th by Scorpio and Mars; and lastly the 9th by Sagittarius and Jupiter. This method should be followed in the case of Leo and Sagittarius also. So it will be seen that for Meṣa, Siṁha and Dhanus the first Navāṁśa is Meṣa and the last one Dhanus. Similarly in the case of Vṛṣabha, Kanyā and Makara the first Navāṁśa is Makara itself and the last one Kanyā. In the case of Mithuna, Tulā and Kumbha the first and last ones are Tulā and Mithuna respectively. In respect of the last group of Karkaṭaka, Vṛścika and Mīna, They are Karkaṭaka and Mīna respectively. Here it can be seen that every Rāśi participates in the Navāṁśa scheme in one way or other. In every triad of Signs the first owns the first Navāṁśa, the second the middle one, and the third the last Navāṁśa. Thus Taurus, Leo, Scorpio and Aquarius own their middle or fifth Navāṁśas; and Gemini, Virgo, Sagittarius and Pisces own their last Navāṁśas. If a planet is posited in one and the same Rāśi and Navāṁśa it is said to be in Vargottamāṁśa.

5. The first quarter of the verse is wrongly printed and should read 'गोजाश्वकर्कयुग्मैणाः'. The statement made here to the effect that Sign Mithuna is Pṛṣṭhodaya (rising with its back first) is not corroborated by ancient authorities. On the other hand it rises bothways, because the male and female face each other. (See 'Fundamentals of Astrology', Page 9). Śīrṣodaya or those that rise with their heads foremost are Siṁha, Kanyā, Tulā, Vṛścika and Kumbha.

6. In this verse the 12 Rāśis are distinguished on the basis of their sex, nature, quarters they own and their habitats. For the first two 3 Rāśis are taken at a time and the process repeated. Thus we get four signs under each : Meṣa, Karkaṭaka, Tulā, and Makara are Male and Movable; Vṛṣabha, Siṁha, Vṛścika and Kumbha, Female and Fixed; and lastly Mithuna, Kanyā, Dhanus and Mīna, Eunuch and Dual. Next four Signs are taken together at a time to represent the four cardinal points. For showing eight quarters we have to consider Meṣa and Vṛṣabha—as forming the East and Mithuna the South-East and so on. For knowing the habitats of the Signs one has to understand, their forms. For example, Aries is represented by a Ram, Taurus by a Bull, Gemini by a human couple, and so on. So the habitats of the 12 Signs are in order (1) Forest or Plateau, (2) Field or Meadow, (3) Bed chamber or village, (4) Pond, (5) Mountain cave, (6) Land with water and vegetation, (7) Market-place, (8) Hole, (9)Battle-field, (10) Forest with plenty of water, (11) Place of potters, and (2) Water.

7. The extant reading उच्चानि द्विति... gives the 2nd degree as the Sun's highest exaltation point in Aries, which is definitely wrong. It is well known that that point is the 10th degree. It is possible that the manuscript was illegible here.

8. The Vargottama Aṁśas have already been explained under verse 5 supra. The Debilitation Signs of the planets are Libra, Scorpio, Cancer, Pisces, Capricorn, Virgo and Aries. Here the readings चरादेषु, भावा द्वादश and मूर्तिमान् require emendation as चरादेषु, भावा द्वादश and मूर्तित: Here Mūrti should connote the ascendant (Lagna).

9. The reading 'सिंहोक्षाविस्त्रश्च...' should be corrected as 'सिंहोक्षाविस्तयश्च...' The words Mūlatrikoṇa and Trikoṇa are to be distinguished. The former are certain Signs where the planets find special kinship and strength, while the latter are those reckoned from a particular Rāśi or Lagna.

10. The word त्रिक here stands for the three untoward houses : 'षष्ठं द्वादशमष्टमं च मुनयो भावाननिष्टान्विदु:' । It is to be remembered that many of the words such as Kendra, Paṇaphara, Āpoklima, Rippha etc., are of foreign origin. Kendra means right angle i.e. the four kendras at a distance of 90° from one another. Mithuna, Kanyā, Tulā, the first half of Dhanus, and Kumbha are termed human Signs; Signs Karkaṭaka, Vṛścika, Makara and Mīna, Watery; Karkaṭaka, Vṛścika and Mīna, Reptile; and Meṣa, Vṛṣabha, Simha, the letter half of Dhanus and the first half of Makara Quadruped. Human signs are strong when they occupy the ascendant (Lagna); Watery ones, the 4th house; Reptile ones, the 7th house; and the Quadruped ones, the 10th house.

The reading 'नृपाद: कीट....' should be corrected as 'नृपाय: कीट....'

11. The readings of the text in the second line are hopelessly corrupt. Hence the meanings given above regarding the presiding Deities of the Sun, Moon, Mars and Saturn are only tentative. For another list of deities please refer to fundamentals of Astrology, page 14.

12. The reading in the text, 'शिखिभूमिपयोवारिवाज्ञिनो भूसुतादय:' is wrong. It may be read as : शिखिभूखपयोवायुवासिनो etc.

13. According to Varāhamihira and others both Jupiter and Venus rule over the Brāhmaṇa class; the Sun and Mars over the Kṣatriyas. The reading वेदोज्ञो should be read as वेदेज्ञा.

14. The reading 'मद्यदं तथा makes no sense. It must be मृदु (soft) दृढं (strong) तथा'. There is no word for the raiments of Venus in this verse. स्थलं is a misprint for स्थूलं. Similarly 'ताम्रपुनिस्तथा' is wrong. It should be 'ताम्रं तथा त्रपु'

15. Here bitter and salt tastes are assigned to the Moon and Mars respectively. It should have been salt and bitter respectively.

16. According to the rule enunciated here the Sun must have Jupiter, who owns the 5th and 8th houses from his Mūlatrikoṇa, Mars owning 4th and 9th; and the Moon owning the 12th house, as his friends. However, the author gives only Jupiter. Similarly, for the Moon, the Sun and Mercury become friends. For Mars they are the Sun, Moon and Jupiter; for Mercury, the Sun and Venus; for Jupiter, the Sun, Moon and Mars; for Venus, Mercury and Saturn; and for Saturn, Mercury and Venus. The reading 'सुखक्षोपप:' should be emended as 'सुखस्वाधिप:' and सान्त्यधा as सान्त्यधी.

17. The reading in the first half is woefully corrupt and hence it is impossible to correct. The author's intention has been explained in the translation. In the second line मत्काल should be read as तत्काल Just as natural friends are determined by the rule given in the previous verse, even so the following rule will help us to find out the natural enemies of the planets. Here too the calculation is to be done from the planet's Mūlatrikoṇa Rāśi. The lords of the 3rd, 6th, 7th, 10th and 11th houses counted from the Mūlatrikoṇa of the planet concerned, are his natural enemies, provided they come twice in this reckoning (in the case of those owning 2 houses). There is an exception to this rule : A planet, though a natural enemy of another, according to this rule, becomes only a neutral, if his exaltation house is owned by that planet. For example, for Mars, Saturn becomes a natural enemy, since the latter owns 2 houses viz. 10th and 11th from his Mūlatrikona, Meṣa. Still he is only a neutral, as the exaltation sign of Mars, Makara, is owned by Saturn.

18. The reading गेहा प्र should be corrected as गहस्व. The directional strength is otherwise stated thus : Jupiter and Mercury are strong in the Lagna; the Sun and Mars in the 10th house; Saturn in the 7th house; and Venus and the Moon in the 4th house.

19. Planets' strength is measured in respect of six things viz. Kāla, Ceṣṭā, ucca, Dik, Ayana and Sthāna (i.e. time, motion, exaltation, direction, declination and position). Here the word conjunction is used by the author in the sense of War. The Summer Solstice or Dakṣiṇāyana gives strength to Mercury, Saturn and the Moon, while the rest get strength in the winter Solstice. The non-luminaries get strength when they are retrograde. The reading in the text, खादृतूदगनेन्ये is corrupt. It may be read as : स्वतूंदगयने-ऽप्यन्ये.

20. In astrological works Venus is said to be strong at night.

21. The reading विवक्षा must be changed to विवशा and तदूशनाद to तदीक्षणाद्.

22. 'इष्टं रेखां should be read as 'पृष्ठरेखाः'.

23. The reading बलाग्नगे should be read as विलग्नेशे; वांशे may have to be changed to अंशैः; सौरेर्द्रीक्षा is to be read as सौरेन्द्रीक्षा. The last decanate of Taurus is called Vihaga or Bird. The first of Siṁha and Kumbha and the middle of Tulā are called Grdhrāsya or Vulture-faced.

24. The part of this verse relating to menses reminds us of a similar verse by Varāhamihira : कुजेन्दुहेतु प्रतिमासमार्तवं गते तु पीडर्क्षमनुष्णदीधितौ ।

25. The first half of this verse is rather unintelligible. It is felt that it is nothing but a paraphrase of the second half of the verse quoted above.

26. ईज्य चाङ्ग should be read as ईज्ये चाङ्ग Trikoṇa or trines are the Lagna, 5th and 9th houses.

27. अस्तेऽर्केन्दो should be read as अस्तेऽर्केन्द्वोः and व्ययखगो as व्ययस्वगौ.

28. The reading वा पद्मेजि is utterly corrupt. It may be corrected as वा तावोजे.

29. The reading, मृत्युमेत्य गता should be corrected as मृत्युमेत्यऽगना

30. Pregnancy lasts for 10 months based on the sidereal calendar. Each of the months is ruled by a planet. The condition of the foetus will depend on the strength etc. of the planet ruling the month. The following are the rulers of the 10 months in order : Venus, Mars, Jupiter, the Sun, Moon, Saturn, Mercury, the planet that owns the Lagna at impregnation, the Moon, and lastly the Sun.

31. In the text we find the reading सुखी गर्भो रवीक्षित: which cannot be accepted as genuine. The original reading must have been सुखी गर्भो न वीक्षित:, which means that the foetus would be happy, if the malefics do not aspect the Lagna or the Moon.

32. In astrology the strength of Navāṁśas and their lords plays an important role. In this verse two criteria are mentioned for determining the sex of the child. These rules can be applied to a nativity, query or impregnation chart.

33. The second half looks like a copy of Varāhamihira's line : "विहाय लग्नं विषमर्क्षसंस्थ: सौरोऽपि पुञ्जन्मकरो विलग्नात् Here the counting is done not from Meṣa, but from the Lagna which is first house. It is not clear as to what is meant by the word स्वपक्षे. It may also mean, in their respective Aṁśas.

34. In verse 54 'समगं रवि:' is wrong for समगं रविम्. Similarly, the reading ओजे जशौ should be rectified as ओजेऽज्जशौ. In verse 56 'द्व्यङ्गांशान् stands for द्व्यङ्गांशान्.

35. The reading बहवोगिन: should be read as बहवोऽङ्गिन:. There is a difference between this work and others on astrology regarding the lordship of the last two months.

36. The word 'weak' here includes the condition of eclipse. The reading अह्निकपान्वित: should be corrected as अर्कघ्निकरान्वित: ।

37. The reading अवागावाटावशुभै: should be corrected as अवागपादो ह्यशुभै: । The second half is utterly unintelligible owing to its gumbled words.

38. The last line being corrupt does not make construction easy. The reading is क्षीनयोदपगैस्त्र्यंशै: पापास्ते रसिरोह्रदा: । It may be read as : क्षीनवोदयगैस्त्र्यंशै: पापैस्तैरशिरोऽपद:. The meaning given above for this portion is tentative. Elsewhere the conditions are given thus: When the rising decanate is occupied by Mars (the other conditions being the same for dwarfness), it will be headless, armless or devoid of feet, according as the decanate is the first, second or third (See "Fundamentals of Astrology" page 118).

39. There appears to be some mistake in the reading नेष्टा योगा, whose sense is against astrological conventions. Hence we may have to change the reading as इष्टयोगा:

40. 'सुतावपि' should be changed to 'सूतावपि'.

40a. In verse 66 the word पापा: makes no sense. It must be याता: according to the context. Let us say that the Moon at conception occupies Vṛṣabha and her longitude is 15-25°-46'. The Dvādaśāṁśa of the Moon is the 11th counted from Vṛṣabha. So the Moon's Dvādaśāṁśa Rāśi happens to be Mina. Now counting will have to be made from this Rāśi i.e. Mina. 11 Rāśis should be counted from Mina, which comes to Makara. So we must say that delivery is likely to occur when the Moon passes through Makara Rāśi.

41. From verse 65 to 68 only single lines i.e. 2 quarters, are taken as full verses without any rhyme or reason. There is a metrical flaw too in the second line. The reading नारिजन्म वै makes no sense. It may be corrected as चारिजन्मगे. Similarly जनने should be read as जनके.

42. The reading साक्यारिसिंहोज्ञाजांसे is wrong. It should be आर्क्यारौ सिंहे ज्ञाब्जांशे.

43. The reading 'सपापगोऽर्को जायो' should be read as 'सपापगोऽर्कोऽब्जातो' It is suspected that the word गो in this reading may mean Vṛṣabha. In the second line the substantive of the dual, पापभस्थौ, is missing. The author must have the two malefics, Mars and Saturn, in mind. The reading, सूर्यार्धानत्रिकोणगौ is wrong. It must be read as सूर्यस्थानत्रिकोणगौ. 'पितावृद्धः' should be read as पिता बद्धः.

44. 'यातेंगना नारी प्रसूयते' should be as 'यानेऽङ्गना नीरे प्रसूयते'. The reading, अब्धांगमन्भगः पूर्णे ज्यो वा' may have to be corrected as युग्माङ्कनाभगः पूर्णोऽब्जो वा.

45. The reading गुप्तां should be corrected as गुप्त्यां and अज as अब्ज.

46. 'कर्कीति' should be read as कर्कीलि. It is strange that the author gives 'barren ground' as the effect of the Moon's aspect. It ought to be a good place of decoration or recreation.

47. The reading भासमाने सरे is unintelligible. It should be read as भसमाने चरे. Here too the word अब्ज in for गेऽब्ज is wrongly spelt as गेज

48. The meaning given here is tentative. The word भवे may mean, at birth, in the Lagna, in the 11th house or the 5th So we can translate it thus as well: 'When Mars and Saturn occupy the 11th and when the ascendant is (or these two planets are) aspected by a benefic....' The reading द्यतायुः....मासः सार्यैः should be emended as गतायु.....मासैः सार्धैः. The plural usage here is archaic.

49. The reading न वा should be emended as नवं; and दृढे रम्ये as दृढं रम्मं.

50. In the Zodiac one half is above the horizon and the other below it. So they are called Dṛśyārdha (visible half) and Adṛśyārdha (invisible half). The 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th. and the portion of the Lagna that has risen come under the Visible Half. The 7th is called the Astarāśi or Setting Sign. Even in this Sign there are two parts as in the Lagna.

51. According to Varāhamihira the colour or complexion corresponds to, चन्द्रसमेतनवांशपवर्णः, that of the lord of the Moon's Navāṁśa Rāśi. It is possible that this author too means the same thing.

52. Suppose the first decanate of Meṣa rises. Then the first ones of the 12 houses will represent in order the head, the right eye, right ear, right nostril, right cheek, right jaw, mouth, left jaw, left cheek, left nostril, left ear and the left eye.

53. The reading तद्युते should be rectified as सद्युते. Similarly भुज needs to be changed to भूजो and जेतु: into जन्तो:.

54. The reading तिलकृन्मसकृदष्ट should be corrected into तिलकृन्म शकृददृष्ट:. Here मश means मशक a mole-like thing. Cf. बृहत्संहिता LII.10.

55. The reading पिंगके श्लक्षणो should be emended as पिङ्गकेशेक्षणो.

56. The reading चन्द्र: क्रूरयुतै: शुभै: should be read as चन्द्र: क्रूरयुत: शुभै:.

57. The reading केन्द्राद्याहस्तसन्खेटै: is corrupt and may be corrected as केन्द्राद्यारूढसत्खेटै: Here केन्द्रादि should be taken to mean केन्द्र, own house or exaltation.

58. The reading षष्ठेमेन्जे should be emended as षष्ठेऽष्टमेऽब्जे.

59. The reading त्रिकोणोपस्तै: should be corrected as त्रिकोणोपगतै:.

60. The reading सृज्यवात्मजयो: makes no sense. It should be emended as जनन्यात्मजयो:

60a. The reader should bear in mind the fact that all the 7 planets cannot be exalted at the same time. For, when the Sun is exalted in Meṣa, Mercury cannot be so. A planet is said to be in Vargottama when it occupies the same Sign both in the Rāśi chart and the Aṁśaka Chart.

61. सवीर्ये सत्सु is grammatically wrong. The author intends probably to convey the idea :सवीर्येषु असत्सु.

62. The printed text gives 'जिता:' which can mean only 'defeated'. It may be some other word standing for some number. It must be जिना. which would give the number 24. The word भाब्द may yield the number 27 which is the number of stars, or 12 which is the number of Rāśis.

63. After subtracting the planet's longitude from its highest exaltation, see if the result is less than 6 Rāśis. If so, subtract it from 12 Rāśis and reduce the result to minutes and multiply it by the planet's years. Then divide the product by 21,600. The quotient represents years etc. contributed by that planet. The reading नो ग्रह: should be read /as यो ग्रह:.

64. The reading षड्रात्यं is a mistake for षड् भाल्प.

64a. According to the plan given in/the previous verses for putting benefic lines in the Aṣṭakavarga chart for each planet, we have to view the different houses containing benefic dots from the point of the planet concerned. For example, the Sun is good in transit in the 3rd, 6th, 10th, and 11th from one's natal Moon (Rāśi). If these also happen to contain more than 4 benefic lines, the effect of the Sun's transit through these houses will be excellent.

65. The translation of the second half is tentative.

66. The text invariably gives अज (Moon) for अब्ज The reading अर्यकांश is corrupt and has been corrected as अर्यङ्घ्राय.

67. The reading एवे षांग्रेंकंपपासृज: is utterly corrupt. It should be read somewhat as वृषेऽङ्गेऽर्कंयमासृज:

68. The reading लग्नगै: सौरेजाब्जर्क्षहृय: सया:। कविक्षौ is corrupt. It may be corrected as लग्नगे सौरेऽजेऽब्जेऽर्को हरिसंस्थित:। कवीज्यौ...।

69. The reading त्रिलग्नभवगै: would mean the 3rd, ascendant and the 11th house.

70. 'भवे करैं' should be read as भवे परे; 'सुखास्तु' as सुखास्त.

71. As usual the readings are corrupt : Instead of putting गदाब्य: the editor of the Purāṇa has given us the reading वर्गदाब्य:. Similarly धिगौगस्थै: should be read as धीगोऽङ्गस्थै:.

72. वर्जोङ्गेस्थे should be read as वज्र ोऽङ्गेऽस्ते; and वाया as वापी.

73. शक्ति र्दऽ should be read as शक्तिर्दण्ड.

74. नुर्यत: should be read as तुर्यत:; and स्वभाद्यायो as खभाच्चापो.

75. षह्य् is unintelligible. राजयोग: should be read as रज्जुयोग:

76. The reading व्यंगा स्थिरा लो.. may have to be read as व्यङ्ग: शिरालो.

76a. According to other authorities Pāśayoga does not lead to good character.

77. अर्द्धचंपात् should be read as अर्द्धचन्द्रोत्थ:.

78. The reading तौज: सकीर्ति: possibly stands अब्जे सकीर्ति: Here अब्ज means Lotus.

79. Here too the readings are very bad : The expression शाजोको must be corrected as साब्जोऽर्को; 'भौमपुष्करुर्तेष्वग:' should be read as 'भौमग्रहयुतोऽष्वगम्'. सुज्ञ stands for सज्ञ:. सेन्यो is to be read as सेज्यो.

80. The सज्योऽस्थिरवयं is to be changed to सेज्योऽस्थिरहृदं, ससितोसुकवेत्तारं to ससित: सुखवेत्तारं; and सार्किपोनभवं to सार्कि: पौनर्भव.

81. 'स मन्दमन्दाक्षा व वनिश्चय:...' should be read as 'समन्दे मन्दाक्षो वनिताश्रय...'

82. The expression मंदकागणे may have to be read as मन्दार्काङ्कपे. In the last condition we can also add the condition viz. when the Moon, being posited in the Aṁśa of Mars or the Sun, is aspected

83. पत्रे should be read as पित्र्ये.

84. मद्यो आठनो should be read as मैत्रे चाटनो.

85. It is strange that the author has omitted Sign Mina (Pisces) while giving the effects of the various natal Signs.

86. नियरत्य: is to be changed to नियमस्थ:, सपुत्रस्त्रीसर्ण: to सपुत्र: स्त्रीस्वर्ण: and द्रक्षमैक्ष्य: is दक्षमित्र:

87. The reading घनाघवान् may stand for घनौघवान्. In that case under 4 we have to take the meaning as "lot of wealth."

88. The reading, व्यंगजार्थो खप्रसूको विधिमित्रो सुखत्रय: makes no sense. So it has to be read as व्यङ्गजोऽर्थी ह्यप्रसूको बहुमित्रोऽसुखत्रय:. The असुखत्रय or triad of troubles consists of आधिभौतिक, आध्यात्मिक and आधिदैविक. The reading ग्रामे शोकादिभेर्कजे should be read as ग्रामेशोऽर्कादिभेऽर्कजे.

89. 'नु खलु' should be taken as नखलु and नृपेज्याज्ञादि as नृपेशादि.

90. The reading नैपुण्यवतिताशया: should be changed to नैपुण्यवनिपेश्वरा:.

91. जनयाश्चाये should be read as जनपाश्चापे, सद्भिर्दर्मी to सद्धीर्दम्भी.

92. The meanings given under Kumbha and Mīna are tentative. मण्डित should be read as पण्डित; भूयान्यदारिकौ as भूपान्यदारकौ; and सद्भि: as सद्धी:.

93. आरक्षेको....क्षितिजांशस्थे should be read as आरक्षिको.....क्षितिजांशस्थे.

94. सख should be emended as सस्व:.

95. विद्योधा should be read as विद्यो वा, and दु:खितो खो as दु:खितोऽस्वो.

96. नीचोधोस्व: should be read as नीचोऽध्यास्व:, and उद्बुदाक्ष: as बुद्बुदाक्ष:.

97. अपत्योक्तितो is to be read as अपत्योज्झितो. The expression शत्रुजित: would mean, vanquished by enemies, but the author means the opposite of that and had to resort to this expression for the sake of metre.

CHAPTER FIFTYSIX

Natural Astrology

Sanandana said:

1-2a. Lord of the year etc. (In one year), the Sun transits into (the twelve) rāśis (or signs of the Zodiac) Aries (Meṣa) etc.[1] during the (twelve) months beginning with Caitra etc.[2] The King of the year is (the lord of) the week-day of the first day of the bright fortnight of the month of Caitra. The Commander of the year is (the lord of the week-day on which) the Sun transits into the sign of Aries and the Lord of Vegetation is (the lord of the week-day) on which the Sun transits into the sign Cancer, Kaṭaka.

2b-3. As the Lord of the year, the Sun is of middling benefit while the Moon would be extremely beneficial. Mars is not beneficial but Mercury, Jupiter and Venus are highly beneficial. Saturn is least beneficial of all. In due consideration of the strength or otherwise of these (planets) should be indicated the general benefice of the year.

SUN: RAVICĀRA

4. Significance of snn-spots. Spots on the Sun of the shapes of a rod, corpse, crow and pillar, respectively, portend, (to the king), disease, turbulance, (trouble from) thieves and loss of wealth.

5. (Sun-spots of the shape of) the umbrella, chaurie, banner, rain-cloud, smoke and sparks, portend the destruction of the land.

6. O sage: If these spots are, respectively, white, red, yellow or black in colour they will afflict the four castes Brahmins, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras. If they appear in two or three of these colours, they will afflict the royalty.

7. Significance of the Sun's beams. If the (upward) beams emanating from the top of the Sun's disc are reddish, the commander of the army will die, if the beams be yellow, the prince, if white, the chief priest, and if variegated the people.

8a. If the downward beams are dark, they foretell disaster to the king and if reddish yellow, to the clouds (indicating rainlessness).

8b-9. The Sun's hue. The Sun is auspicious in śiśira, the cool season, if copper-red, in spring if saffron-hued, in summer if greyish, in the rainy season if variegated, in autumn if lotus-red, and in winter if crimson-coloured.

10. If the Sun be yellowish, bright-white and crimson, respectively, in winter, rainy season and summer, it portends, O sage: diseases, drought and calamities.

11. A sun appearing in a rainbow causes a fight between kings. And, if the Sun appears with hue of the hare's blood, there will ensue shortly a world war.

12. If the Sun appears with the hue of the peacock's feather, there will be no rains for twelve years. A moon-like Sun will cause the replacement of the king of the land.

13. If the Sun is darkish, there would be fear from locusts and, if greyish like ash, there would be contrywide distress. When a hole is seen in the Sun's disc an emperor will die.

14. Orb of the Sun. (The Sun's orb) appearing like a pot will cause famine (in the country); if like an arch it will cause the destruction of the capital; and, if like an umbrella, the destruction of the country. A split Sun will cause the death of the monarch.

15. If at sunrise or at sunset, there occur (against the sun's disc) lightning, meteor and thunder, then, one can fortell the death of the king or fight between kings.

16. If for a fortnight or half a fortnight, the Sun and the Moon appear with a halo around (pariveṣa), both day and night, it will cause the replacement of the king, which will happen, also if they appear crimson at rising and setting (during the said period).

17. If the Sun is obscured at sunrise and at sunset by clouds having the shape of weapons, there will be war; and, (if those clouds have the shape of) sinful animals like the camel, the war would be terrible.

THE MOON: CANDRACĀRA

18. In the signs Pisces and Aries, the crescent Moon with the southern horn higher (than the northern horn) is beneficent, while in the signs Gemini and Capricorn, the Moon with the northern horn higher is auspicious.

19-20a. In the signs Aquarius and Taurus, the Moon is auspicious if the horns are equal, and in Cancer and Sagittarius, if they look like arrows. In the signs Scorpio and Leo (the Moon) is auspicious, if it has the shape of a bow, and in the signs Libra and Virgo, if it has the shape of a javelin. In the reverse positions, the Moon causes famine and war.

20b-21a. When the Moon courses south of the asterisms[3] Pūrvāṣāḍha, Uttarāṣāḍha, Mūla and Jyeṣṭha there will occur fires, drought and the destruction of forests and (the appearance of) snakes.

21b-22a. (The time when) Moon courses south of the asterisms Viśākhā and Anurādhā is inauspicious; and its coursing north of the asterisms Maghā (pitṛdaivatya) and Viśākhā (dvidaiva), is medially beneficial.

22b-23a. With reference to auspicious Moon, the six asterisms from Revatī (Pauṣṇya) are (called) 'Conjunction to be' (aprāpya-yoga), the twelve asterisms from Ārdrā (Rudra) as 'In conjunction' (Madhya-yoga) and the nine asterisms Jyeṣṭhā (Vāsava) are called 'Past conjunction' (Atita-yoga).

23b-24a. The 'half-asterisms' (Ardha-tārakas) are Bharaṇī (Yama)Jyeṣṭhā (Indra), Āśleṣā (Ahiśa), Śatabhiṣak (Toyeśa) and Svātī (Marut); the 'more-than-half asterisms' (Adhyardha-tārakas) are: Dhruva, Punarvasu (Aditi) and Viśākhā (Dvideva); the remaining asterisms are 'full' (Sama).

24b-25a. The Moon with its south horn higher (than the north horn) is extremely beneficial and that with the north horn higher is generally auspicious. The illuminated portion decreases and increases alternatively.[4]

25b-26a. The Moon with a broad orb is a harbinger of plenitude, while that with a narrow orb would cause loss of wealth. If it appears to hang with face down, there will be a threat from weapons and if (elongated) like a rod, there would be disputes.

26b-27a. If its horns or orb are crossed by Mars and other planets, effects such as destruction of welfare, wealth, rains, kings and people, will follow.

MARS : KUJACĀRA

27b-28a. When, (after retrogression), Mars has risen in an asterism, which thus forms its 'rising asterism', (udaya-nakṣatra) if it again goes into retrogression in the 7th, 8th or 9th asterism counted from its 'rising asterism', such a retrogression is called Uṣṇa, then will occur distress to people and damage by fire.

28b-29a. The retrogression at the 10th, 11th and 12th asterism is called Aśrumukha. It keeps off rains and destroys crops.

29b-30a. When the retrogression of Mars is in the 13th or 14th asterism, it is called Vyālavakra. Therein will occur the destruction of vegetation and of the rains.

30b-31a. The retrogression on the 15th or 10th asterism is Rudhirānana. Mars will then cause famine, starvation and diseases.

31b-32a. In the 17th and the 18th, the retrogression is called Musala. It will be attended with famine and will be terrible on account of heavy loss of wealth and grains.

32b-33a. If Mars rises in the asterisms of Pūrva or Uttara Phalgunī and retrogrades in Uttarāṣāḍha (Vaiśvadeva) and sets in Rohiṇī (Caturāsyārkṣa), it destroys three worlds.

33b-34a. Mars which rises in Śravaṇa and retrogrades in Puṣya is inauspicious to kings in general and will threaten (especially) the kings of that direction in which Mars rises.

34b-35a. If Mars courses through the (four) stars of the Maghā constellation and retrogrades in the same constellation, it will cause fear from drought and weapons and destroy the Pāṇḍya king.

35b-36a. If Mars crosses the asterisms Mahā (pitṛ), Viśākhā (Dvidaiva) and Rohiṇī (Dhātṛ), it will then cause famine, death and disease.

36b-37a. If Mars courses through the three Uttaras, (viz., Uttaraphalguni, Uttara-āṣāḍha and Uttara-bhādrapada), Rohiṇī, Mūla (Nairṛta), Śravaṇa and Jyeṣṭhā (Indrabhā) or courses south of Rohiṇī, it will cause drought.

37b-38a. Mars coursing north of any constellation will be auspicious; while coursing south thereof, it will be inauspicious and cause dissentions amongst the people.

MERCURY : BUDHACĀRA

38b-39a. If Mercury rises, being afflicted by a portent (utpāta), it will cause drought, fear from fires, calamities and war between kings.

39b-40a. If Mercury courses across the asterisms Dhaniṣṭhā (Vasu), Śravaṇa (Vaiṣṇava), Uttarāṣāḍha (Vaiśva), Mṛgaśīrṣa (Indu) and Rohiṇī (Dhātṛ) it will threaten with distress and drought.

40b-41a. If Mercury is seen among (five) constellations from Ārdrā to Maghā, it will then threaten with famine, war, disease and drought.

41b-42a. Mercury traversing across the six constellations beginning with Hasta will cause welfare, prosperity, health and destruction of diseases.

42b-43a. Mercury coursing across the constellations Uttara-bhādrapada (Ahirbudhnya), Uttara-phalguni (Aryama), Kṛttikā (Āgnaya) and Bharaṇī (Yama) will bring distress to physicians and sea trade.

43b-44a. If Mercury crosses the three constellations beginning with Pūrva-, (viz., Pūrva-phalgunī, Pūrva-āṣāḍha and Pūrva-bhādrapada, it will then threaten people with starvation, weapons, fire and robbers.

44b. The motion of Mercury in the constellations Bharaṇī (Yāmya), Kṛttikā (Agni), Rohiṇī (Dhātṛ) and Svāti (Vāyavya) is said to be Prākṛta (natural).

45. In the constellations Ārdrā (Raudra), Mṛgaśiras (Indu), Āśleṣā (Sarpa) and Maghā (Pitrya), its motion is called Miśra (mixed) and in the constellations Pūrva-phalgunī (Bhāgya) Uttara-phalgunī (Aryamā), Puṣya (Ijya) and Punarvasu (Aditi), its motion is termed Saṅkṣipta (concise).

46. The motion amongst the constellations Pūrva-bhādrapada (Aja-caraṇa), Uttara-bhādrapada (Ahirbudhnya) is called Tīkṣṇa (Sharp). Yogānta is the term for the motion of Mercury in the constellations Uttarāṣāḍha (Viśva), Pūrvāṣāḍha (Ambu) and Mūla.

47. Its motion is called Ghora (Cruel) in the constellations Śravaṇa (Hari), Citrā (Tvāṣṭra), Śraviṣṭhā (Vasu) an Śatabhiṣak (Varuṇa). Pāpa (sinful) is the name of its motion through the constellations Viśākhā (Indrāgni), Anurādhā (Mitra) and Hasta (Mārtaṇḍa).

48. Mercury which has risen with one or the other of the motions Prākṛta etc. will be visible for as many days as it will be invisible (later).

49. Mercury (completes the motions Prākṛta etc.), in order, in the following number of days : (Prākṛta) 45 (Miśra) 30, (Saṅkṣipta) 22, (Tikṣṇa) 20, (Yogānta) 9, (Ghora) 15 and (Pāpa) 11.

50. Mercury, in its Prākṛta motion, brings welfare, health and prosperity. During the motions Miśra and Saṅkṣipta, it is of mixed benefit, and, during the other (motions), it produces rain.

51. If Mercury remains visible during the months Vaiśākha. Śrāvaṇa, Pauṣa and Āṣāḍha it will bring distress to the world; during the other (months) it is beneficial.

52. However, if it is visible during the months of Āśvina (Iṣa) and Kārttikā (Ūrja), there will be fear from weapons, famine and fire. If Mercury rises with the brilliance of silver and crystal, it will be most auspicious.

JUPITER : GURUCĀRA

53. (In the case of Jupiter), two constellations make up the months Kārttika (Ūrja) etc.; however, three constellations make up the fifth, twelfth and eleventh months. The year should be named by the constellation in which Jupiter rises.[5]

54. The years Kārttika and Mārgaśīrṣa (i.e., the Jovian years in which Jupiter rises in the constellations Kṛttikā and Mṛgaśira, respectively) are inauspicious to people, the years Pauṣa and Māgha are auspicious, and, the years Phālguna and Madhu (Caitra) would be of medium benefit.

55-56a. The year Mādhava (Vaiśākha) is auspicious while Jyeṣṭha is of medium benefit. The year Śuci (Āṣāḍha) is, again, of medium benefit but Nabhas (Śrāvaṇa) is extremely beneficial, while Bhādrapada is so at some places and for some people. The year Iṣa (Āśvina) is most auspicious. Thus has been stated the effect of the different months.

56b-57a. Jupiter traversing to the north of the asterisms is productive of welfare, health and prosperity. If otherwise (i.e., traversing south) it will have the opposite effect. If it traverses through (the asterisms), it will have mixed effect.

57b-58a. Jupiter having the hues—yellow, fire-bright, dark, green and red, will threaten creatures respectively with disease, arson, loot, weapons and missiles.

58b-59a. Jupiter, if smoke-hued, will cause drought. If it is sighted during day, it will cause the death of the king or the destruction of the country.

59b-60a. The constellations Rohiṇī and Kṛttikā are said to be the 'body' of the year. The two Āṣāḍhās, (viz., Pūrva and Uttara) form its 'nipple'. Ārdrā is its 'heart' and Maghā, its 'flower'.

60b-61. If the 'body' (of the year) comes into conjunction with a 'cruel' planet, there will be fear from famine, fire and wind; if the 'nipple' (is attacked), there will be fear from starvation; if the 'flower', roots and fruits will be destroyed; and if the 'heart', destruction of crops will follow. On the other hand, if the conjunction is with auspicious (planets), the results also will be auspicious.

62-64. (The following are the effects, in order, when) Jupiter traverses the 27 asterisms commencing with Maghā: Increase in crops; Health of the people; War; Food; Drought; Calamities; Distress to brahmins; Great happiness to cows, to kings; and to women. Quiet rain; Rain of snakes; Welfare; Rejoicing; Great Wealth; Prosperity; Destruction of the country; Torrential rains; Friendliness; Disease; Freedom from fear; Threatened disease; Vegetation, Rain; Disease; Grain; and Invisibility of the skies.

VENUS : ŚUKRACĀRA

65. Three lanes (vithi) each of Venus have to be conceived, situated, respectively, north, middle and south (of the Sun's path). The lanes have to be reckoned from the asterism Aśvinī (dasrabhā), at the rate of three asterisms each.

66. Thus will be formed nine lanes (vithis) which are termed, respectively, (i) Nāga, (ii) Ibha, (iii) Airāvata, (iv) Vṛṣabha, (v) Go, (vi) Jaradgava, (vii) Mṛga, (viii) Aja, (ix) Dahana.

67. Venus, traversing the three northern lanes produces the plenitude of grains, wealth, rains and vegetation.

68a. In the three middle lanes, (it causes medium effects in these (matters) and in the three southern lanes)[6] the effects in all cases are completely adverse.

68b-69. Jupiter traversing across the five asterisms beginning with Maghā (Pitṛ) produces rain, and so does it in the western direction while traversing the three asterisms beginning with Svāti. Conversely, drought results. However, if it is in conjunction with Mercury, there will be rain.

70. If Venus rises or sets on the eighth or fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, or on the full moon day the land will be flooded.

71. If both Jupiter and Venus be in the seventh sign (Libra) and later pass on to the eastern lane, they will cause drought, famine and war.

72. If Mars, Mercury, Jupiter and Saturn, precede Venus, they will cause, respectively, war, whirlwind, famine and drought.

73. Venus is productive of plenty while traversing the asterisms Pūrvāṣāḍha (Jala), Anurādhā (Mitra), Uttaraphālguni (Aryamā), Āśleṣā (Ahi) and Jyeṣṭha (Indra). In Mūla, it threatens with hunger, weapons and drought, and in Uttarabhādrapada (Ahirbudhnya) and Revatī it produces fear.

SATURN : ŚANICĀRA

74. Saturn coursing amongst the asterisms Śravaṇa, Svāti (Anila) Hasta, Ārdrā, Bharaṇī and Pūrvaphalguni (Bhāgya) produces for people plenitude, health and vegetation.

75-77. (In the asterismal conception) reckoned from the asterism in which Saturn rises: One in the head: (the next) three in the face; two in the vital parts,[7] two in the eyes, five stars in the heart; four in the left hand; three in the left leg and three stars in the right leg, and four stars in the right arm, the occurrence of Saturn (in the said nine limbs) will produce, respectively: Disease, profits, misfortune, profits, peace, imprisonment, difficulties, exalted pilgrimage, and acquirement of wealth, in order.

78. When Saturn is retrograde, the effects are also retrograde. That is, the effects are in order for the right motion (of the planet) and when it is fast (in retrograde motion), the effects are in the reverse order.

SHADOW OR DRAGON'S HEAD : RĀHUCCHĀYĀ

79. The slow-moving (Rāhu), is the demon's head which had been cut off by Viṣṇu's discus, but which attained immortality on account of its having tasted ambrosia and so was raised to planethood.

80. Through the power of a boon conferred on him by the Creator, Rāhu eclipses, at the syzygies, the Sun and the Moon, on account of latitude (vikṣepa) and declination (avanati).

81-82a. Once in six months the possibility of eclipses should be checked. There are seven Lords of the syzygies, who have been functioning from the commencement of the aeon (kalpa). They are Brahmā, Indu, Indra, Kubera, Varuṇa, Agni and Yama.

82b-83. (If an eclipse occurs) in the syzygy, of which Brahmā is the lord, there will be prosperity for cattle, vegetation and the twiceborn. Similar is the effect besides trouble to brahmins, when Indu (Soma) is the overlord of the syzygy. When Indra is the lord, there will be enmity between kings, calamity and destruction of vegetation.

84. During the lordship of Kubera, there will be loss of wealth to the wealthy; there will also be increase in grains. During Varuṇa's lordship, there will be distress for the kings, but peace for others.

194. Prices are reduced to half during the asterisms Aśvinī, Kṛttikā (Agni), Puṣya (Ijya), Mūla (Nairṛtya), Citrā Tvāṣṭra), Uttaraphalgunī, Uttarāṣāḍha and Uttarabhādrapada.

195-96a. Kula-asterisms and victory in battle : The Kula-asterisms are Maghā (pitṛ), Viśākhā (Dvidaivatya) and Dhaniṣṭhā (Vasu). The Akula-asterisms are: Rohiṇī (Dhātṛ), Jyeṣṭhā, Punarvasu (Aditi), Svāti, Revatī (Pauṣṇa), Hasta (Arka), Śravaṇa (Hari), Pūrvabhādrapada (Aja), Bharaṇī (Antaka) and Āśleṣā (Bhaujaṅga). The remaining stars are Kulākula.

166b-98a. From among these, if kings set out for battle during the Kula-asterisms, they will suffer defeat, while in Akula-asterisms, assuredly, they will win. During the Kulākula-asterisms there would be equality (of results) and peace will follow.

198b-199a. Puṣkara, the inauspicious combination. If an odd quarter of the (Pūrva)-bhādrapada falls on a Sunday, Saturday or Tuesday, (the inauspicious yoga of) Tripuṣkara occurs and will have the (destructive) effect of three Puṣkaras. If the combination is with an even quarter of the asterism (it will be Dvipuṣkara) having double the (destructive) effect.

199b-200a. In order to destroy the evil effect of the former, gift away three cows or their value in money; in the case of the Dvipuṣkara, gift away two (cows). The inauspicious effect of the asterism would then be obviated.

200b-201a. Effect of Puṣya. The asterism Puṣya aspected by a cruel (planet) or in combination with it, is always beneficial in all auspicious rites except in marriage.

201b-103. Number of prominent stars in the asterisms. The number of bright stars called Yogatārās, in the asterism-groups beginning with Aśvanī (Dasra) are in order: (Aśvinī) 3, (Bharaṇī) 3, (Kṛttikā) 6, (Rohiṇī) 5, (Mṛga-Śiras) 3, (Ārdrā) 1, (Punarvasu) 4, (Puṣya) 3, (Āśleṣā) 5, (Maghā) 5, (Pūrvaphālgunī) 2, Uttaraphālgunī) 2, (Hasta) 5, (Citrā) 1, (Svāti) 1, (Viśākhā) 2, (Anurādhā) 4, (Jyeṣṭhā) 3, (Mūla) 11, (Pūrvāṣāḍha) 4, (Uttarāṣāḍha) 2, (Śravaṇa) 4, (Dhaniṣṭhā) 3, (Śatabhiṣak) 100, (Pūrvabhādrapada) 2, (Uttarabhādrapada) 2, (Revatī) 32.

204-10. Favourite trees of the asterisms. The trees favourite to the different asterisms are : Aśvinī: Vṛṣa-vṛkṣa; Bharaṇī : Yamakara; Kṛttikā: Udumbara; Rohiṇī: Jambuka; Mṛgaśiras: Khadira; Ārdrā: Kṛṣṇaplakṣa; Punarvasu: Vaṁśa (bamboo); Puṣya: Pippala (Peepul); Āśleṣā: Nāga; Maghā: Vaṭa (banyan); Pūrvaphalgunī: Palāśa; Uttaraphalgunī: Akṣa: Hasta: Ariṣṭā; Citrā: Śrivṛkṣa (Vilva); Svāti: Arjuna; Viśākhā: Vikaṅkaṭa; Anurādhā: Bakula; Jyeṣṭhā: Viṣṭi: Mūla: Sarja; Pūrvāṣāḍhā: Vañjula; Uttarāṣāḍhā: Panasa (Jack tree); Śravaṇa: Arka; Dhaniṣṭhā: Śami; Śatabhiṣak: Kadamba; Pūrvabhādrapada: Cūta (mango); Uttarabhādrapada: Picumandaka; and Revatī: Madhu.

211a. One (born in a particular asterism) should endeavour to worship the relevant tree when Saturn is in the particular asterism.

YOGA

212b. Effects of the yogas. The yogas, vaidhṛti and vyatipāta are always highly catastrophic.

213-15a. The first half of Parigha is abhorred for all rites. In Viṣkambha and Vajra, the first three nāḍikās, in Gaṇḍa and Atigaṇḍa six, in Vyāghāta nine, and in Śūla five nāḍikās are to be rejected.

215b-16a. Kharjūrikā diagram. The asterisms Punarvasu (Aditi), Mṛgaśiras (Indu), Maghā, Āśleṣā (Ahi), Aśvinī, Mūla, Hasta (Maitreya) Puṣya (Ijya), with their diagrams have to be understood as the Head-asterisms (mūrdha-bhā), in order.

216b-18a. Draw a vertical line and 13 lines across it. In that diagram called Kharjūrikā-cakra, place the Head-asterism. Between the Sun and the Moon marked on the vertical line, mark the (26) asterisms, leaving out Abhijit (the 28th nakṣatra). (The pair of asterisms) on each cross line (Ekārgala) aspect each other.

218b-19a. Duration of a yoga. A yoga extends to two nāḍikās and 12 vināḍikās, and the yogas are 27 in number, in order (in a lunar day).

The lords of the 11 half-tithis (Karaṇas) are : (1. Bava): Indra; (2. Bālava): Prajāpati; (3. Kaulava): Mitra; (4. Taitila), Aryamā; (5. Gara): Bhuḥ (Earth); (6. Vaṇij): Lakṣmī (Haripriyā): (7. Viṣṭi): Kīnāśa; (8. Śakuni): Kali; (9. Nāga); Rudra: (10. Catuṣpada): Ahi, (11. Kiṁstughna): Marut.

220b-21a. The six karaṇas from Bava to Vaṇij are auspicious. However, Viṣṭi, either in the beginning or in the end, is not desirable for any auspicious rite.

221b-22a. Karaṇa diagram. (In the diagrammatic representation of the Karaṇas), five would be in the face, one in the neck, eleven in the chest, four in the navel, six at the waist and three in the tail, in terms of nāḍikās.

222b-13a. Those in the face indicate obstruction to one's acts; in the neck, death; in the chest, penury; in the waist, madness; in the navel, loss; but in the tail sure success.

223b. Of the (24 karaṇas), the sthira-karaṇas, (viz., Śakuni, Nāga, Catuṣpāda and Kiṁstughna) are of medium effect; and, of them too, the middle ones, Nāga and Catuṣpāda.

224b-25a. Lords of the muhūrtas. The muhūrtas of day-time are lorded over by fifteen (deities, as under): Rudra, Ahi, Mitra, Pitṛs, Vasu, Varuṇa (Udaka), Viśvedevas, Vidhātā, Brahmā, Indra, Indrāgnī, Vasu, Varuṇa, (Toyapa), Aryamā and Bhaga.

225b-26a. (The lords of the muhūrtas of the night are): Īśa, Aja-Ekapād, Ahirbudhnya, Pūṣā, Aśvins, Yama, Agni, Dhātṛ, Indra, Aditi, Ijya (Bṛhaspati), Viṣṇu, Arka, Tvaṣṭṛ and Vāyu.

226b-27a. The measure of a muhūrta is one fifteenth part of the day-time and so also night-time (i.e., 2 nāḍikā) with their lords as stated above.

227b-228. Muhūrtas to be avoided. On the (seven) week-days beginning with Sunday, (the undermentioned seven sets of Muhūrtas) should be rejected for all auspicious rites: (1. Sunday): Uttaraphalgunī (Aryamā); (2. Monday): Mūla (Rākṣasa) and Rohiṇī (Brahmā); (3. Tuesday): Maghā (Pitṛ) and Kṛttikā (Āgneya); (4. Wednesday): Abhijit; (5. Thursday): Mūla (Rākṣasa); (6. UPAGRAHA (SECONDARY ATMOSPHERIC PHENOMENA)

230-33a. Portentuous natural phenomena. Earthquake in the seventh asterism from Hasta (Sūryabham), lightning in the fifth; Śūla in the eighth, thunder in the tenth, comet in the eighteenth, Daṇḍa in the fifteenth, meter in the nineteenth, thunder-strike in the fourteenth, fall of thunderbolt in the fourteenth, and atmospheric haze (moha), thunder, earthquake, thunderbolt and halo (round the moon) respectively in the twentyfirst and further asterisms (are inauspicious) and no auspicious rite should be performed in the asterisms in which the above occur along with the Moon.

233b-35a. Other inauspicious combinations (Yogas). The Moon occurring in the asterisms Āśleṣā (Sarpa), Maghā (Pitrya), Citrā (Tvāṣṭra) Anurādhā (Mitra) and Revatī (Antya), causes an inauspicious yoga to occur in the asterism as much removed from Aśvinī as each of these are removed from Hasta (Sūryabha), So also in Śravaṇa (Viṣṇubha).

235b. The said two yogas are called respectively Caṇḍiśa and Caṇḍāyudha. No auspicious rite should be performed then.

236a. Krakaca-yoga. A krakaca-yoga 'cutting saw combination' will occur when the sum of lunar day and week-day is 13. This is to be rejected for any auspicious rite.

236b-37a. Saṁvartayoga. When Sunday falls on the seventh lunar day or Monday on the first lunar day, a saṁvarta-yoga ('dissolution combination') will occur. This is all-destructive.

237b-40a. The twenty-eight asterismal yogas.[18] The following eight yogas produce effect, as per their meanings; Ānanda (pleasure), Kāladaṇḍa (Death's rod), Dhūmra (Smoky), Dhātṛ (protective), Sudhākara (ambrosial), Dhvāṅkṣa (crow) Dhvaja (flag), Śrivatsa (Viṣṇu's gem), Vajra (thunderbolt), Mudgara (spade), Chatraka (umbrella), Mitra (friend), Mānasa (heart), Padma (lotus), Lumbaka (cutting), Utpāta (calamitous), Mṛtyu (death), Kāṇa (blind), Siddhi (achievement), Śubha (auspicious), Amṛtyu (deathlessness), Musala (pestle), Antaka (death), Kuñjara (elephant), Rākṣasa (demoniac), Cara (moving), Sthairya (firm) and Vardhamāṇa (increasing).

240b-41. These yogas are to be reckoned, in order, from Aśvinī (Dasrabha) on Sundays; from Mṛgaśiras (Indubha) on Mondays; from Āśleṣā (Sarpa) on Tuesdays; from Hasta on Wednesdays; from Anurādhā (Maitrabha) on Thursdays; from Uttarāṣāḍha (Vaiśvadeva) on Fridays and from Śatabhiṣak (Varuṇa) on Saturdays.[19]

242-43a. Siddhiyogas for the week-days. Hasta on Sunday, Mṛgaśiras (candrabha) on Monday, Aśvinī (Dasrabha) on Tuesday, Anurâdhā (Mitrabha) on Wednesday, Revatī on Thursday, Puṣya (Tiṣya) on Friday and Rohiṇī on Saturday; these are called as Siddhi-yogas (combinations for achievement).

243b-44a. Effect of tithis classified as Nandā, Bhadrā etc.[20] It is not auspicious to have Nandā on Sunday and Tuesday, Bhadrā on Friday and Monday, Jayā on Wednesday, Riktā on Thursday and Pūrṇā on Saturday.

244b-45a. (On the other hand), Nandā on Friday, Bhadrā on Wednesday, Jayā on Tuesday, Riktā on Saturday and Pūrṇā on Thursday are termed siddha, (indicating achievement).

245b-46. Dagdhayoga. Monday on the eleventh lunar day, Sunday on the twelfth, Thursday on the sixth, Wednesday on the third, Friday on the eighth, Saturday on the ninth and Tuesday on the fifth are declared as dagdhayogas (destructive combinations).

247-48a. Some destructive Yogas. Bharaṇī on Sunday, Citrā on Monday, Uttarāṣāḍhā (Viśvabha) on Tuesday, Śraviṣṭhā on Wednesday, Uttaraphalgunī (Aryamābha) on Thursday, Jyeṣṭhā on Friday and Revatī on Saturday are destructive to one born in the respective asterisms.

248b-49a. Viśākha, Āśleṣā (Ahi) and Caturvarga are declared as the three asiddhi-yogas, Utpāta, Mṛtyu and Kāṇa, in order, for the days beginning from Sunday.

249b-50a. In other lands like Hūṇa, Vaṅga aud Khasa, the Yogas calculated on the basis of the lunar day cum week-day are not to be applied, but those calculated on the basis of week-day cum asterisms are auspicious.

SAṄKRĀNTI (SUN'S TRANSIT INTO A SIGN)

250b-51a. Week-days and Saṅkrānti. The Sun's transits (Saṅkrāntis) on the several week-days commencing from Sunday are called, respectively, Ghorā, Dhvāṅkṣi, Mahodari, Mandā, Mandākini, Miśrā and Rākṣasikā.

251b-52a. These transits will bring happiness, respectively, to the Śūdra, thief, vaiśya, brāhmaṇa, king, cow and all the beings not included above.

252b-54a. Time of the transits. The Sun's transit occurring during the forenoon is harmful to the kings, to the brāhmaṇas at noon, to the vaiśyas in the afternoon, to the śūdras at sunset, to the ghosts, at dusk, the demons in the night, the actors after midnight, the cowherds at sunrise and the religious students at dawn.

254b-55a. Effects of the Sun's transit into Aries. Meṣasaṅkrānti (Sun's tratsit into Aries, and, so, the beginning of the year), occurring during day-time is productive of calamity and quarrel; if it occurs during night, there would be sumptuous plenitude; and if it occurs during the twilights, rains will be ruined.

255b-58a. Personification of the Saṅkrāntis. The personification of the Saṅkrāntis when they fall in one or the other of the eleven karaṇas, from Bava, are endowed with the following mounts: Lion, tiger, bear, ass, elephant, buffalo, horse, dog, goat, ox and cock. Weapons carried in their hands are Bhuśuṇḍi, mace, sword, rod, bow, javelin, pike, rope, hook, missile and arrow, respectively. The food offerings prescribed for them are, respectively, rice, rice cooked in milk, rice obtained by begging, cake, milk, curd, sweet rice, molasses, wine, ghee and sugar.

258b-60a. State of the personifications while in the Karaṇas. The Sun's personification is deemed to be 'sitting' if the transit occurs in Vaṇij, Bālava, and Gara; it is said to be 'erect' (i.e., standing) in Kaulava, Śākuna and Kiṁstughna; the Sun is supposed to make the transit 'sleeping' if it occurs during Catuṣpada, Taitila and Nāga. (The effect of the said three states) in the matter of the performance of ordained duties, longevity and rains would be medium, excellent and depletion, respectively.

260b-61a. The above-said weapons, mounts and food if adopted by the people will also be beneficial to them, as also their condition as sleeping, sitting or standing (at the time of saṅkrānti).

261b-62a. Classification of the asterisms. The asterisms are also classified into four types, designated, respectively, as Andhaka Manda, Madhya and Sulocana, as counted from Rohiṇī.

262b. Viṣṇupada. The transit of the Sun into the 'firm' asterisms, (viz., Uttaraphalgunī, Uttarāṣāḍhā and Uttarabhādrapada and Rohiṇī, is called Viṣṇupada.

263. Ṣaḍaśītimukha and Viṣuvat. The transit of the Sun into the double-natured signs,[21] (viz., Mithuna, Kanyā, Dhanu and Mina) is called Ṣaḍaśītimukha, while the transit into the signs Tulā and Meṣa is called Viṣuvai (Equinox).

264a. During the southward course of the Sun (Yāmyāyana) the former, (viz., the double natured signs) are firm (sthira in relation to the Moon and the asterisms, and Cara ('moving') in the northward course of the Sun (saumye).

264b-265. Holy time at equinox (Puṇyakāla). At the Equinoxes, sixteen nāḍikās (before it and 16 after it, making a total of 32 nāḍikās are said to be holy nāḍikās, suitable for meritorious rites. Dusk (sandhyā) extends through three nāḍikās before the rising of the centre of the Sun's orb (in the morning) and after the setting thereof, in the evening. If (the Saṅkrānti, i.e. Sun's transit, occurs) before or after midnight, the holy time, (one half of which is of 15 nāḍikās), extends through (the afternoon of) the previous day and (the forenoon of) the next day.

266. (By performing meritorious rites at the time of saṅkrānti) one reaps results corresponding to the nature of the Sun and the Moon in the relevant sign, according as the Sun or the Moon is benevolent or otherwise.

267. Expiation for Unholy time at Saṅkrama. Take the degrees that the Sun, after making a transit (into Meṣa or Tulā), has to go to reach the transit into the ayana; if at one's birth asterism occurs within that period on either side of the transit into the sign, the two are not auspicious for fasts and marriages. In order to counteract the evil, spread out sesame and draw on it a circle, trident and a triangle, place a bit of gold on it and gift it away.

268-70. Power of Saṅkrama. The Moon is strong on account of the strength of the asterisms and the Sun at transit is strong on account of the Moon. In the same manner, the planets are also strong (at the time of the Sun's transit).

GOCARA (CURRENT MOTION OF THE PLANETS)

271. Effect of the planets occupying the different signs.[2] O sage ! the Sun is benefic when it occupies the 3rd, 11th, 10th or 6th sign counted from the birth-sign (of the person under consideration), if it is not affected[23] by planets other than Saturn[24] occupying the 9th 5th, 4th, (ambu)12th (rippha).

272. The Moon is benefic if it occupies the 7th (dyūna) 1st, 11th, 6th (ari) 10th or 3rd sign from the birth-sign, if it is not affected by planets other than Mercury in the 5th, 8th, 12th, 4th and 9th (dharma) signs.

273. Mars is benefic if it occupies the 3rd, 11th or 6th sign from the birth-sign if it is not affected by Saturn, Mercury or Sun occupying, respectively, the 12th (vyaya), 5th and 9th signs.

274. Mercury is benefic if it occupies the 4th, 6th, 8th 10th or 11th sign from the birth-sign if it is not affected by planets other than the Moon in the 5th (dhi), 3rd, 9th, 1st, 8th and 12th signs.

275. O great sage ! Jupiter is benefic in the 11th, 9th 4th or 7th sign from the birth-sign, if it is not affected by the planets in the 12th, 8th, 10th, 4th and 3rd signs.

276. Venus is benefic in the 1st to 5th (āsuta), 8th, 9th 12th or 11th signs from the birth-sign, if it is not affected by planets in the 8th, 7th, 1st, 10th, 5th, 11th, 6th and 3rd signs.

277. No planet will be benefic if its current position is affected (by another planet). Hence good and bad results shall be predicted only after duly considering planetary affectation.

278. A planet which has turned malefic on account of being adversely affected (by a planet) can still be benefic if aspected by a beneficent planet, while even a beneficent planet might be productive of evil effects if aspected by an evil planet.

279a. Two (inimical) planets will not produce their individual effects if they aspect one another.

279b-80a. A planet occupying the sign of an evil planet or the house of an enemy planet, or if it has already set will not produce its good or bad effects.

280b-81a. When planets occupy malefic places, one should take steps to perform propitiatory rites, for one's progress and regress are dependent upon the planets, for which reason they are worthy of worship.

281b-82. Precious Stones. Towards the propitiation of the planets Sun etc., one should wear, in order, the precious stones: (Sun) pearl, (Moon) coral, (Mars) emereld, (Mercury) Topaz (Jupiter) diamond, (Venus) Sapphire and (Saturn) Opal.

(CANDRA-TĀRĀBALA: STRENGTH OF THE MOON AND PLANETS)

283. Nature of the Moou. One to whom the moon is benefic on the first day of the bright fortnight, to him it will be beneficent throughout that fortnight; on the contrary, in the dark fortnight it would be malefic.

284. In the bright fortnight, the Moon is benefic on the second, ninth and fifth days. It would be benefic also on the 12th, 9th and 4th days if it is not affected by other planets.

285. Birth asterisms. Birth, wealth, danger, welfare enemy, benefactor, death, friend and intimate companion have always to be ascertained from the birth asterism.

286-87a. The birth-asterism and the 3rd, 5th and 7th therefrom do not yield benefits. In order to ward off the evil effects (of these four), one should gift to brahmins (the four objects) vegetables, molasses, salt, and gold with sesame, in that order.

287b. The asterisms are particularly potent during the dark fortnight and the Moon is similarly potent during the bright fortnight.

287c-88a. States of the Moon. The Moon has twelve states (avasthās) in the (twelve) signs. And, these states will have effects in accordance with their nomenclatures, (given below, in verse 289), with regard to pilgrimage, marriage etc. undertaken at those times.

288b-c. (In order to calculate the state of the Moon at any time), multiply the number of the current asterism (reckoned from Aśvinī) by 60, add the number of nāḍikās elapsed at the desired time (in the current asterism), multiply the result by 4 and divide by 45 (iṣu-veda). Divide the quotient by 12 (bhānu). (The result would be the current state of the Moon).

289. The (twelve avasthās are Pravāsa (exile), Naṣṭa (loss), Mṛta (death), Jaya (victory), Hāsya (laughter), Rati (pleasure), Muda (joy), Supti (sleep), Bhukti (feast), Jvara (fever), Kampa (tremour) and Susthiti (firm establishment). Their effect is in consonace with their nomenclatures.

(SARVALAGNA : RISING OF THE SIGNS)

290. Rise of Aries (Meṣa-lagna). When the sign of Aries is rising (the undermentioned acts) will be successful: Royal coronation, marching of the army, peace, war, making of ornaments, extraction of minerals from mines and wars.

291. Rise of Taurus (Vṛṣabha-lagna). When the signTaurus is rising, will be successful: Auspicious rites, firm actions, digging of wells for water, construction of houses agriculture, trade, raising of cattle, etc.

292. Rise of Gemini (Mithuna-lagna), When the sign Gemini is rising should be done: Engagement in art and architecture, acceptance of ornaments, invitation, for sacrifice, dealings relating to elephants, marriage and consecration.

293. Rise of Cancer (Karkaṭa-lagna). When the sign Cancer is rising, should be performed: Work relating to the collection and release of water in tanks, wells and lakes, physical nourishment and writing and literary activities.

294. Rise of Leo (Siṁha-lagna). When the sign Leo is rising will be successful the following: work relating to the cultivation of sugarcane and grains, trade and adventurous onslaughts by kings, etc.

295. Rise of Virgo (Kanyā-lagna). When the sign Virgo is rising, should be performed acts relating to: Study, architecture, medicine, ornaments, middling matters which are both firm and otherwise, physical nourishment and all auspicious acts.

296. Rise of Libra (Tulā-lagna). When the sign Libra is rising, should be done acts pertaining to agriculture, trade, travel, cattle, marriage, fasts and tulābhāra (religious weighing of oneself in a balance).

297. Rise of Scorpio (Vṛścika-lagna). When the sign Scorpio is rising, should be taken action on all matters which are of a firm, permanent (sthira) nature as also service to the royalty, consecration and burglary.

298. Rise of Sagittarius (Dhanu-lagna). When the sine sagittarious is rising, should be performed the following: Religious fasts, marriage, travel, matters relating to horses and elephants, arts, and actions relating to matters which are of a miscellaneous and quasi-permanent nature.

299. Rise of Capricorn (Makara-lagna). When the sign Capricorn is rising should be performed: Stringing of bows and shooting of arrows, cultivation, matters relating to cattle and horses, setting out on a journey, tending of cows, servitude etc.

300. Rising of Aquarius (Kumbha-lagna). When the sign Aquarius is rising should one engage himself in agriculture, trade rearing of cattle, digging for water, architecture, the fine arts, voyage, practice of missiles and weapons, etc.

301. Rising of Pisces (Mina-lagna). When the sign Pisces is rising, are auspicious acts relating to religious fasts, marriages, consecration, inauguration of water reservoirs and housing colonies, wearing of ornaments and using of water vessels.

302. Potency of the rising signs. Success in actions, as stated above, would accrue in respect of the rising of the signs which are clear i.e., vacant (or occupied by beneficent planets). However, if the signs are aspected by malefic planets or occupied by terrible planets, the results will also be terrible.

303. The Seven signs, viz., Aries, Taurus, Cancer, Virgo, Pisces, Libra and Sagittarius are beneficent (by nature) since they are occupied by beneficent asterisms; the other signs are evil-natured.

304. (Over and above this), the signs attain their (ultimate) strength from the combination of planets occupying them and by the aspecting of other planets on them. If neither of the above is applicable, the signs will exhibit only their primary nature.

305. Towards the beginning (of their rise) all the signs will have their full strength, in the midd'e medium strength and towards the end little strength.

306. First determine the rising sign (at the desired time) and then the strength of the Moon. If the Moon is strong, the planets in the seventh sign will also be strong.

307. The strength of the Moon is the base, (as the sustainer, and supporter), and that of the other planets is only secondary (contained, supported). It is obvious that the supported is held by the snpporter.

308. If Moon is benefic, all the other planets will also be benefic and if Moon is malefic, (all the others) would also be rendered malefic, except the Sun.

309. The planet occupying those degrees of a sign which have risen, gets the strength of the first part of the sign and the one coming after, that of the second part.

310. The strengths of the planets in the other sections are also to be reckoned in this same manner. By this procedure one can select a rising sign endowed with all qualities.

311.12a. All men always wish for the minimum of bad effects and the maximum of good effects. Bad effects are inherent in time and even the creator is incapable of eradicating them completely. Hence it is necessary to look for the minimum of bad effects and the maximum of good effects.

316b-17. To ward off all evil the effects of prathamārtava on malignant occupation and undesirable asterisms and week-days, the wise should offer oblations of sesame, ghee and dūrvā grass, repeat the gāyatrī mantra a hundred times and gift away gold, cows and sesame.

ĀDHĀNA (CONCEPTION)

318a. For conception, the first four nights (of menstruation) are to be avoided; the further days are permissible.

318b-19. One who had been endowed with the sacred thread, if he desires for a male issue should resort to a woman when the Moon occupies an odd sign, the then rising sign aspecting a male planet[28], the lunar day being even, the asterisms being not one of Revatī (Pauṣṇa), Mūla, Viśākhā (Ahi) and Maghā (Pitrya); and the sacrificial fire having not been fed by him (that day).

PUṂSAVANA: RITE FOR THE BIRTH OF A MALE CHILD

320a. Puṁsavana.[29] When conception has been confirmed, in the first third or second month, the Puṁsavana ceremony has to be performed.

320b-21. Simantonnayana (Parting of the hair). The Simanta ceremony should be performed in the fourth, sixth or eighth month (of pregnancy) when the lord (of the month is strong,[30] (the other conditions being that) the Moon and the asterisms relating to the couple are strong;

322. The lunar day not being riktā (viz., 4th, 9th, 14th), new moon or full moon; the week-day being Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday, (being the 'male' days); the asterism being male, but omitting the tikṣṇa (sharp) one's (viz. Mūla, Ārdrā, Jyeṣṭhā, and Āśleṣā), the miśra (mixed) ones, (viz., Kṛttikā and Viśākhā) and the ugra (violent) ones, (viz., Pūrvaphalgunī, Pūrvāṣāḍha and Pūrvabhādrapada, Bharaṇī and Maghā); the Moon being in a male asterism;[31]

323. The 8th house (indicating death) from the birthhouse being clear, the rising signs of the couples being not the eighth being aspected by beneficent planets and not aspected by malefic planets;

324. Beneficent planets occupying the 3rd (dhi), 9th dharma), and Kendra and malefic planets occupying the three evil houses, the Moon being not in the 12th (antya, loss) or 6th (ari).

325. If any of the cruel planets which is strong, occupies the 12th, 5th (ātmaja) or the 8th place, assuredly it will kill the pregnant lady, whose simanta is being performed or the child in the womb.

JĀTAKARMA AND NĀMAKARAṆA (BIRTH RITE AND NAMING CEREMONY)

326. The birth rite (jātakarma) of the child should be performed on the muhūrta of birth or at the end of the birth-pollution and should be preceded by the worship of the manes.

327. When the birth-pollution has ended, the naming ceremony should be performed according to family practices. The name given shall be ancient, renowned and composed in auspicious syllables.

328-30a. If due to the exigencies of place, time, invasion etc., there had been delay, the father of the child should perform the above two ceremonies when the planets Jupiter and Venus have not set, in the asterism Puṣya, during the northward course of the Sun, in an asterism belonging to the groups cara, sthira, mṛdu or kṣipra,[32] in an auspicious week-day, the day being endowed with potency in consideration both of the Moon and the asterisms, during the rising of an auspicious sign and in an auspicious division thereof, and when the 8th house (indicating death) is clear.

ANNAPRĀŚANA (THE FIRST FEEDING)

330b-31a. It is auspicious to perform the First feeding ceremony of male children in the sixth or eighth month, and of female children in the fifth or the seventh month (after birth).

331b-32a. It is ordained to be performed on an auspicious week-day, on any lunar day except riktā (4th, 9th and 14th), the omitted lunar day,[33] nandā (1st, 6th and 11th) and 12th and 8th.

332b-34. The first feeding ceremony would be auspicious in the asterisms of the cara, sthira, mṛdu and kṣipra classes, the eighth house (indicating death) being vacant, the 10th house also being vacant, during the rise of an auspicious sign and in an auspicious division thereof, in the forenoon, when (the rising sign is) occupied or aspected by beneficent planets, when the 3rd, 6th and 11th (lābha) houses are occupied by evil planets while the kendra, 3rd (dhi) and 9th (dharma) are occupied by beneficent planets, and the Moon is in the 12th (vyaya), 6th (ari), or the 8th (nidhana).

CAULA (TONSURE)

335. The tonsure of boys should be performed in the third or the fifth year, in accordance with the family practice and as ordained by the Gṛhya-sūtra which one follows.[34]

336. The tonsure ceremony should be performed in the northward transit of the Sun, when the Jupiter and Venus have not set, on a lunar day other than the full moon and new moon days and the riktā days (viz., 4th, 9th and 14th), on a Friday, Thursday, Wednesday or Monday.

337. For the tonsure ceremony, the asterisms Aśvinī, Punarvasu, Puṣya, Mṛgaśiras, Jyeṣṭhā, Revatī, three from Hasta, (viz., Hasta, Citrā and Svātī), three from Śravaṇa, (viz., Śravaṇa, Śraviṣṭhā and Śatabhiṣak) are auspicious.

338. One's birth asterism is auspicious for coronation, tonsure, first feeding and educational initiation into (Vedic) study and wearing the sacred thread), but not in other ceremonies.

339. (Tonsure should be performed) when the 8th house is clear, during the rise of an auspicious sign and in an auspicious division thereof; when the Moon does not occupy the 8th house from the birth-house, and avoiding the sixth, eighth and twelfth houses.

340. When the second (dhana), trikoṇa-s and (1st, 5th and 9th houses) and kendras (1st, 4th, 7th, and 10th houses) and occupied by beneficent planets and the 3rd, 11th and 6th houses by the other planets.

340b-41a. (Tonsure should not be performed) after an oilbath, at dawn or dusk, on Tuesdays and Saturdays (āra), at night, after meals, in battle, when one is angry, wearing ornaments, riding in a vehicle or on the ninth lunar day.

341b-42a. Trimming of the moustaches is recommended for kings regularly every fifth day; it o be done on the asterisms recommended for tonsure (but if the fifth day does not tally with the asterisms it may be done) at the time of rise of such an asterism (inconsiderate of other factors).

342b-43a. Tonsure is productive of beneficial results if done on the direction of kings and brahmins, on the occasion of sacrifice, death, release from bond, marriage and on (the ordained) week-days, asterisms and lunar days.

AṄKURĀRPAṆA : AUSPICIOUS SOWING

343b. At the beginning of all auspicious rites, aṅkurārpaṇa, 'sowing of the seed', should be done with a view to gain auspiciousness (for the rite).

344-45. On the ninth, seventh, fifth, or third lunar day, on an asterism recommended for sowing,[35] on an auspicious weekday, when an auspicious sign is rising, the houses should be well decorated by awnings, banners and arches, and auspicious words of blessing should be caused to be uttered by auspicious ladies (i.e., those who are not widows).

346-47. Then (the master of the rite), preceded by the playing of musical instruments, dancing etc., should proceed in the north-easterly direction and collect from there sand and soft mud. Returning to the house, he should fill earthen or bamboo vessels (with the sand and mud brought) and pour over it water into which different seeds and flowers have been put.

MAUÑJĪBANDHANA AND UPANAYANA : TYING THE MAUÑJĪ BELT AND COMMENCING STUDIES

348. Mauñjibandhana (lit. 'tying the belt made of mauñji grass)[36] is recommended on the eighth year after conception for brahmins, on the eleventh year for kṣatriyas and on the twelfth year for vaiśyas .

349. Upanayana could be performed even, at the fifth year, since the boy endowed with the sacred thread done could become well versed in the Vedas and Śāstras and be endowed with prosperity.

350. To the boy, even a week Venus or Jupiter would be beneficent. Upanayana should be performed only at the years ordained therefore and not at other times.

351. (Upanayana should be performed) when Jupiter, Venus and the lord of the (relevant) Veda are visible. The lords of the (four) Vedas are, in order: (Ṛgveda) Jupiter; (Yajurveda), Venus; (Sāmaveda:) Mars and (Atharvaveda:) Mercury.

352. The appropriate seasons for the Upanayana of the three classes of twice-borns are, Autumn (Śarat), Hot season (Gṛiṣma) and Spring (Vasanta), taken in the reverse order. In general, the time ordained for them are the five months beginning with Māgha (Tapas).

353. (One who wears the sacred thread) in the months of Māgha and Phālguna will become well versed in the hereditory practices of his family; if in the month of Caitra he would become a knower of ordained duties, wealthy and an expert in the Vedas and Vedāṅgas.[37]

354. One who wears the sacred thread in the month of Vaiśākha would become wealthy, an expert in the Vedas, Śāstras and the sciences, and physically strong; if in the month of Jyeṣṭha, he would be a knower of ordained rules.

355. For Upanayana, the most auspicious days are : In the bright fortnight, the 13th, 10th, 7th, 11th, 6th and the 12th, the other days are of middling benefit. In the dark fortnight, the 2nd, 3rd and 5th days are of middling effect and the rest are extremely bad.

356-57. The asterisms favourable for upanayana are : Hasta, Citrā and Svātī (arka-traya), Revatī, Puṣya (Ijya), Ārdrā (Rudra), Punarvasu (Aditi), Uttaraphālgunī, Uttarāṣāḍha and Uttarabhādrapada, Śravaṇa Dhaniṣṭhā, Śatabhiṣak (Viṣṇutraya), Aśvinī, Anurādhā (Mitra) and Rohiṇī (Abjayoni).

358-59a. The tenth asterism from the birth-asterism is called Karma, the sixteenth Saṅghāta, the eighteenth Sāmudāya, the twenty-third Vināśana, and the twenty-fifth Mānasa. No auspicious rite should be performed in these asterisms.

359b-60a. The week-days pertaining to Ācārya, Saumya and Kāvya, (viz., Thursday, Friday and Wednesday) are auspicious, the days pertaining to the Moon and the Sun are middling and the remaining two are detestable for commencing religious studentship (vrata).

360b-61a. Divide daytime into three. During the first part one should perform acts relating to the gods, during the second part, acts relating to men, and during the third part acts relating to the manes. (Upanayana, which comes under the first category, should therefore be performed only in the first part of the day.)

361b-62a. If Jupiter, Venus or the lord of one's Veda or their divisions are in debilitation (nica), or are situated in enemy asterisms or divisions the student will lose his family status and his character.

362b-363a, Again, Jupiter, Venus or the lord of one's Veda[38] occupies an inimical house or its division, the student will be the perpetrator of great sins.

363b-64. If, however, Jupiter, Venus or the lord of one's Veda or their divisions are in exultation (ucca) or occupy their own houses or their rāśigaṇas, or the quadrant (kendra) or trine (trikoṇa), the boy will be extremely wealthy and well versed in the Vedas and the Vedāṅgas.

365. If Jupiter, Venus or the lord of one's Veda is in high exaltation and the eighth house is clear, the boy will be well versed in the Vedas and Śâstras.

366. If Jupiter, Venus or the lord of one's Vedas or their divisions are in friendly houses or in their divisions or are in exaltation he will be endowed with knowledge and wealth.

367. It is rare that in the case of boy all the three, viz., the week-day of the lord of one's Veda, the strength of the lord of one's Veda and the rising sign of the lord of one's Veda occur simultaneously.

368. Thus, when the Moon is in the division of the lord of the Veda, the student would become learned, but if in the division of an evil sign or in a division of his own sign, he would be poor and constantly distressed.

369. When the asterisms Śravaṇa or Punarvasu (Aditi) (prevail and the Moon is in a division of Cancer, the student would be endowed with the knowledge of the Vedas and the sciences and with wealth and foodgrains.

370-72. All the signs are commendable (if the time for the studentship ceremony is fixed) in an auspicious lagna, in an auspicious division thereof, when the eighth house is clear, the lagna, which is not in the eighth house is occupied or aspected by beneficent planets or by the five planets Jupiter, Sun, Moon, etc., when they are friendly and strong or by four auspicious planets fully endowed with strength of position etc. or aspected by them, and devoid of the twentyone great blemishes (possible in a day)[39].

373. However, only the auspicious divisions of the ninefold division (navāṁśa) of the said signs are to be selected. But the division of Cancer should never be selected even if it is aspected by a beneficent planet.

374. The divisions of Vṛṣabha and Mithuna, and Libra and Virgo are also auspicious. Studentship ceremony is to be performed only in a navāṁśa selected in the above manner.

375-76. If evil planets occupy the 3rd, 6th and 11th (āya) houses, beneficent planets are not to be found in the 6th, 8th and 12th houses, and if the Moon does not occupy the 6th, 8th or the 12th house from the lagna, the boy who takes the vow of studentship will be pennyless and always consumptive even if the Moon is in exaltation in its own house.

377. If the Sun is exalted in the quadrants, the student's parents will die. A lagna which does not have any of the above five faults is productive of auspicious results in upanayana.

378. The studentship ceremony should not be performed other than in spring, nor in the galagraha days, the days of non-study,[40] the 6th nor in (the karaṇa called) Viṣṭi[41].

379. The eight galagraha (lit. 'gripping the throat') days. viz., the four days from the 13th, the three days from the 7th and the 4th (of the dark fortnight) are declared to be inauspicious.

KṢURIKĀBANDHANA—(GIRDING THE SWORD)

380a. Now, shall I set out kṣurikābandhana 'the girding of the sword', a ceremony (ordained) for kṣatriyas, before their marriage.

380b-83. The Kṣurikābandhana ceremony should be performed after worshipping the gods and the manes, in the month recommended for marriage, in the bright fortnight, when Jupiter, Venus and Mars have not set, on days prescribed for Mauñji-bandhana ('tying the belt of mauñji grass'),[42] on a week-day other than Tuesday, a day endowed with the strength of the Moon and the asterisms, in a navāṁśaka except the 8th, of the performer, the 8th house being clear, the Moon being in the lagna leaving out the 6th, 8th and 12th houses, and with beneficent planets occupying the 2nd (dhana) house, the trines (trikoṇa) and the quadrants (kendra), while the others occupy the 3rd, 11th (āya) and 6th (ari) houses.

384. First the sword should be duly worshipped, placing it in front of the deities. Later, in an auspicious lagna, the sword endowed with proper form and proportions should be tied to the performer's waist.

385-386. Prognostication by Āya. Divide half the length of the sword by the breadth of the blade. The remainders are called āya.[43] (Remainder 1, called) Dhvaja-āya, foretells destruction of foes; (Rem. 2) Dhanur-āya foretells death; (Rem. 3) Siṁha, Victory; (Rem. 4) Śvāna, ill health; (Rem. 5) Vṛṣa, gain of wealth; (Rem. 6), Gardabha, sorrow;

387a. (If the Rem. is 7, it is) Gaja-āya when there would be great happiness, and (if the Rem. is 8) it is Dhvāṅkṣa (Kāka) when there would be loss of wealth.

387b-89. Prognostication through scars. Multiply the length of the sword, measured in one's own aṅgulis (two-finger breadths) by the length of the dagger (khaḍgaputrikā) and divide by 11. (If a scar or flaw occurs in the sword at distances from the handles indicated by) the several remainders, the effect would be, in order : (1) birth of a son, (2) death of the enemy, (3) acquisition of a wife, (4) travel, (5) auspiciousness, (6) loss of wealth, (7) gain of wealth, (8) satisfaction, (9) attainment (of desires), (10) victory and (11) praise.

390-91a. A scar in the first part (of the aṅgula is inauspicious in the Dhvaja and Vṛṣa āyas. It is inauspicious if it occurs in the middle of the Siṁha and Gaja-āyas prevail. It is so towards the end, if the Śvāna and Kāka āyas prevail. In the Dhūmra and Gardabha āyas, a scar will not bring prosperity if it is at the very end (of the aṅgula).

SAMĀVARTANA-(RETURN FROM STUDIES)

391b-94a. The 'tonsure after return' (Samāvartana-muṇḍana)[44] should be performed on the twice-borns when they return from their teachers' homes after exerting themselves (in their studies).

(The ceremony is to be conducted) during the north-ward course of the Sun; when Jupiter and Venus are visible; in the asterisms Citrā, Uttaraphalgunī, Uttarāṣādhā, Uttarabhādrapada, Puṣya (Ijya), Revatī (Antya), Śravaṇa (Hari), Anurādhā (Mitra) and Rohiṇī (Vidhātā); on the week-days of Sun, Moon, Mercury, Jupiter and Venus, and in their (auspicious) lagnas and divisions thereof and leaving out the 1st (pratipat), 4th, 9th and 14th (riktā)[45], new moon 8th and the 'omitted day' (dinakṣaya)[46]

VIVĀHAPRAŚNA : (SOLICITATION FOR MARRIAGE)

394b-95a. Ascertainment of auspicious time : O great brahmin ! Of all the stages of life, that of the householder is the most exalted. There, too, happiness depends on the wife being of good character.

395b-96a. Her acquiring commendable character depends upon the beneficent lagna (at the time of wedlock). Hence I shall set out below the ascertainment of the purity of the lagna, taking into cognizance what has been stated on the subject by Brahmā.

396b-97. On an auspicious day, (the enquirer) taking with him betel leaves, fruits, flowers etc., should approach, with folded hands, a well-qualified astrologer, who is comfortably seated and is having a clear mind (at the moment), and consult him, with attention, as if to a deity. (He should then convey to the astrologer the birth-sign, birth-asterism etc. of the proposed couple.)[47]

398. If (at the time of the enquiry), the planet in the lagna is cruel and there is Mars in the seventh (house therefrom), the death of the couple should be predicted within eight years.

399. If the Moon occupies the lagna and Mars is in the seventh house, the wise should anticipate the death of the husband within eight years.

400. If there be a malefic planet in the fifth house from the lagna, who is aspected by an enemy planet and is in debilitation, the girl will, without doubt, have her son still-born or will turn unchaste.

401. The Moon, occupying the 3rd, 5th, 7th, 11th (āya) or 10th (karma) house from the lagna, if aspected by Jupiter, will bring about the union of the (proposed) couple.

402. If the sections in the lagna relating to Libra, Taurus and Cancer are occupied or aspected by Venus or Moon, then the people who solicit for the bride will get her.

403. If the drekkāṇa or navāṁśa is female[48] and the lagna even and aspected by the Moon or Venus, then also the bride who is solicited for will be obtained.

404. In the same manner, the bride will secure the solicited bridegroom if the lagna or navāṁśaka of the solicitor (i.e., at the time of the enquiry) is male or is aspected by male planets.[49]

405. If the query is made in the dark fortnight, when the Moon occupies an even sign from the lagna or is aspected by an evil planet or is in the 8th house (randhra), the marriage (solicited) will not take place.

406. If, at the time of enquiry, auspicious indications and omens are seen, they tend to the welfare of the couple, and if these be inauspicious, they tend to undesirable consequences.

407-409a. Kanyāvaraṇa, solicitation for the bride. On a day which is pure in respect of the five constituents (of the almanac)[50], endowed with the strength of the Moon and the asterisms, at the rise of the marital asterism, the solicitation for the bride (Kanyā-varaṇa) should be made with the utterance of the praṇava (syllable Om) by the bridegroom, through his elders, at the bride's house, to which place he should go with flowers, betel leaves, fruits, fragrant unguents and sanctified grain (akṣata) and white garments, (the procession being) accompanied by music, musical instruments and words of benediction, warding off obstacles.

409b. The bride's father should, then, offer him the bride with pleasure.

410. To the bridegroom endowed with family status, character, youth, handsomeness, wealth and learning, should be offered the bride, beautiful and young.

411-13. The bride should then worship Goddess Śacī, who is the source of all good qualities, the most beautiful in the three worlds, is adorned with divinely fragrant unguents, garlands and garments, is endowed with all auspicious marks, wears all ornaments and illuminates all the directions by means of her superior gemset chains, is attended day and night, by thousands of beauteous maids, and pray to the Goddess thus:

414. "O Goddess Indrāṇi, the dear consort of God Indra ! bestow on me, at my marriage, fortune, health and male offspring."

MARRIAGE

415. It is desirable to conduct the marriage of girls in the even years of their birth, and that of boys in the odd years (of their birth). Otherwise, it would be destructive of both.

416. The months of Māgha, Phālguna, Vaiśākha and Jyeṣṭha are auspicious; Kārttika and Mārgaśīrṣa are middling; the rest are censurable.

417. Never should marriage, installation of deities and upanayana be performed in ten asterisms from the time that the Sun enters the asterism Ārdrā.

418. Marriage should not be performed when Jupiter or Venus have set or when they are in the stages of childhood and old age (i.e., just after they have risen or when they are about to set). Neither when Jupiter is in the sign Leo or in a Leo-part (in any other sign).

419. For thirteen days after its rise in the west or in the east[51] Venus would be in the 'child's stage' and for five days before setting, in the stage of 'old age'. In the case of Jupiter both stages would be of 15 days duration.

420. So long as God Viṣṇu (Hṛṣīkeśa) is asleep, it is not auspicious. There is nothing more auspicious than the festival day of Viṣṇu (Vâsudeva).

421. The marriage of the firstborn, whether boy or girl, should not be conducted in the month of their birth, nor in the asterisms of their birth, nor in the week-day of their birth.

422. In the month of Jyeṣṭha the marriage of both the Jyeṣṭhaputrī and Jyeṣṭhaputra (eldest daughter and the eldest son) should not be performed. It is best to have one 'Jyeṣṭha' at a time, not otherwise.[52]

423. A marriage should not be performed for a week after a natural visitation (utpāta) (like the appearance of a comet, earthquake etc.) nor a complete eclipse. If the eclipse is partial (the prohibition is) for three days. (Similarly, prohibited are the intercalary lunar day) which touches three civil days (tridyuspṛk) and the expunged lunar day.[53]

424. (In the case of planetary obscuration), three days after their setting and three days before their rise should be eschewed. So far as their dusks are concerned, three days before setting and seven days before rising should be eschewed. (?)

425. Five days towards the close of the (lunar) month should be eschewed. So also the 8th and the riktā days, (viz., 4th, 9th and 14th). The yogas Vyatipāta and Vaidhṛti, in their entirety, and half of Parigha are also to be eschewed.[54]

426. Marriage is recommended in the following asterisms: Revatī (Pauṣṇa), Uttaraphalgunī, Uttarāṣāḍha and Uttarbhādrapada (tryuttara), Anurādhā (Maitra), Svātī (Marut). Mṛgaśīrṣa (Candra) Hasta (Arka), Maghā (Pitrya) and Mūla, when these are not in vedha, i.e., not mutually afflicted.[54a]

427. If, in a marriage, the potencies of Jupiter and the Sun[55] are required for the couple, effort should be made to worship those two weak planets.

428. The strengths of gocara[56], vedha[57] and aṣṭavarga[58] reckoned in rūpa[59] are higher in the ascending order. The strength gocara is of a general nature (compared to the others).

429-30a. The potencies of the Moon and the asterisms should be considered and then the strength of the five constituents of the pañcāṅga. (Of the latter, if) the strength of the tithi is one, that of the weekday is two-fold, that of the asterism is threefold, that of yoga is fourfold and that of karaṇa (tithyardha) is fivefold.

430b-31. The (prognostication as reckoned in the) muhūrta is more strong and lagna is still stronger. Horā[60] is stronger and Drekkāṇa[61] is still more so. Navāṁśa[62] is more strong and Dvādaśāṁśa[63] stronger than that.

432. Triṁśāṁśa[64] is stronger than the previous, The combined strength of the above has to be duly considered. All the signs which are beneficently aspected are commended in fixing a marriage.

433-34a. The signs occupied by the five planets Moon, Sun, Jupiter, (Mercury and Venus) are acceptable. That is an auspicious lagna where all the four (Moon, Mercury, Jupiter and Venus) are in strength and which is devoid of the blemish of Jāmitra[65] or the twentyone great faults (mentioned below).

434b-35a. Twentyone Major blemishes (Ekaviṁśatimahādoṣa). O Nārada ! Listen now, to the names and effects of the twenty-one 'Major blemishes', being set out below.

435b-36. (i). Pañcāṅgaśuddhi-rāhitya is declared as the first blemish. (ii) The second is Udayāstaśuddhi-hīna-Sūryasaṅkrama, (iii) The third is Pāpaṣaḍvarga. (Then follow) : (iv) Bhṛgu-ṣaṣṭha (v) Kujāṣṭama;

437-39a. (vi) Gaṇḍānta; (vii) Kartari, (viii-ix) Rippha-ṣaḍaṣṭendu, (x) Sagraha, (xi-xii) Aṣṭama-lagna and Aṣṭamarāśi of the couple, (xiii) Viṣaghaṭi, (xiv) Muhūrtadoṣa (Durmuhūrta), (xv) Vāradoṣa, (xvi) Ekārgala (Kharjūrikā-samāṅghribha), (xvii) Grahaṇotpātabha, (xviii) Krūraviddharkṣa, (xix) Krūrasaṁyutarkṣa (xx) Kuṇavāṁśa, and (xxi) Mahāpāta-Vaidhṛti.[66]

439b-440 (i). Nonpurity of Pañcāṅga. Pañcāṅga is constituted by Tithi, Vāra, Nakṣatra, Yoga and Karaṇa. The purity (of the five items) constitutes the purity of pañcāṅga. When there is a blemish in the pañcāṅga, mere merit in lagna would not bring the desired result.

441a. Discard Pañceṣika ('Five arrows', iṣikā-bāṇa)[67] as if it is milk mixed with poison.

441b-42. If (at the selected moment, muhūrta) the lagna and lagnāṁśaka are not aspected by or are together with their respective lords or by their mutual lords or auspicious friends, (such a muhūrta should be rejected). If the lagna be the 7th or the 7th section, the bridegroom will meet with death.

443a. If they (the lagna and the lagnāṁśaka) are not aspected or are together, as indicated above, the death of the bride will result at the time of the marriage.

443b-44a. (ii). Saṅkrama. In marriage etc. sixteen *nāḍikā*s each have to be eschewed before and after the transit of the Sun into a sign.

444b. (iii). Pāpa-Ṣaḍvarga.[68] In fixing a marriage etc. the auspicious (findings as read off from) Ṣaḍvarga are greatly commended (and, so, the inauspicious times as reckoned by the ṣaḍvarga reckonings should be avoided.

445. (iv). Venus in the sixth house. The blemish of Bhṛgu.

ṣaṣṭha occurs when Venus occupies the sixth house. Even if Venus is in exaltation and occupies the lagna with an auspicious planet, such a lagna should always be rejected.

446. (v). Mars in the eighth house. The great blemish Kujāṣṭama will occur when Mars occupies the eighth house from the lagna. Reject the lagna even if it is occupied by three benefic planets if there is alongside Mars in exaltation.

447. (vi). Gaṇḍānta. Gaṇḍānta (relating to tithi or lunar days) occurs for two nāḍikās each at the junctures of the (three) Pūrṇā tithis with the (three) Nandā tithis, (i e., between the 5th and the 6th, 10th and 11th, and 15th and 1st).[69] This time is deadly in the matter of birth, travel, marriage etc.

448. Gaṇḍānta (relating to lagna) occurs for half a nāḍikā each at the junctures of Cancer and Leo, Scorpio and Sagittarius and Pisces and Aries; this time is deadly.

449. Gaṇḍānta relating to asterisms occurs at the junctures of the ending sixteen nāḍikās of the three asterisms Āśleṣā (Sarpa), Indra (Jyeṣṭha) and Revatī (Pauṣṇa) with the first quarters of the respective succeeding asterisms (viz., Maghā, Mūla and Aśvinī).

450a. The said three tapes of junctures form three different types of Gaṇḍāntas, which are all highly harmful.

450b-51a. (vii). Kartari. The crossing, (in their motion), of two evil planets, one in regular motion and the other in retrograde motion, while facing the lagna, is known as Kartari; it will cut the throats of couple (like a pair of scissors).

451b-52a. Discard the lagna which is tainted by the blemish of Kartari even if it be occupied by auspicious planets endowed with all good qualities.

452b. (viii-ix). Rippha,ṣaḍaṣṭendu. When Moon occupies the 6th, 8th and 12th (Rippha) houses, the blemish of that name is caused.

453-54a. Discard, even with effort, the abovesaid lagna, even if it be occupied by Jupiter and Venus. For a lagna within an enemy house even if occupied by friendly planets, either in exaltation or debilitation, and even if invested with all qualities, is deathly to couples.

454b-55a. (x) Sagraha. When the Moon is in conjunction with some other planets, the 'blemish' by name Sagraha occurs. Do not perform marriages (at a muhūrta) when the said blemish prevails.

455b-57. When Sun is in conjunction with the Moon, to be sure, poverty will result; with Mars, disease; with Mercury, childlessness; with Jupiter, misfortune; with Venus, having a co-wife; with Saturn, turning a recluse; with Rāhu, destruction of family base; and if the Moon is in conjunction with Ketu continued suffering and poverty will result.

458-59a. If the Moon is in conjunction with evil planets the death of the couple will result. However, if the Moon, in exaltation, is in conjunction with beneficent planets in friendly signs, the lagna does not turn evil but always tends to their welfare.

459b-60a. On the other hand, Moon, in exaltation or in its asterism or in a friendly house, if it is in conjunction with an evil planet will cause their death.

460b-61a. (xi-xii). Aṣṭama-lagna and Aṣṭama rāśi. The eighth lagna or the eighth sign (of birth) of the couple, if it occupies the lagna (of the time of the marriage) that too would cause the death of the couple.

461b-62a. Even if the said sign or the lagna is occupied by a benevolent planet, discard that lagna, and its divisions and also other houses governed by the lords (of the eighth houses of the couple).

462b-63a. The twelfth lagna or sign (of birth of the couple, occupying the lagna (of the marriage) will result in their loss of wealth. Hence discard the lord of that division of the lagna.

463b-64a. The rise of the birth sign and the rise of the birth lagna are auspicious. If the lagna (of the muhūrta) is in the upacaya-s[70] of the above two, it is extremely auspicious.

464b-68. (xiii). Viṣaghaṭi. Four ghaṭikās each in continuation of the undermentioned ghaṭikās, respectively, in the twentyseven asterisms are called Viṣaghaṭikās. They should be eschewed in fixing times of marriages etc., even if endowed with other qualities. They are, in order from the asterism Aśvinī: (1. Aśvinī) : 50, (2. Bharaṇī) : 24; (3. Kṛttikā) : 30; (4. Rohiṇī) : 40; (5. Mṛgaśiras) : 13; (6. Ārdrā) : 21; (7. Punarvasu) : 30; (8. Puṣya); 20; 9. Āśleṣā); 32; (10. Maghā) : 30; (11. Purva-phalgunī): 20; (12 Uttaraphālgunī): 18; (13. Hasta): 20; (14. Citrā 20; (15. Svātī); 14; (16. Viśākhā): 14; (17. Anurādhā): 10; (18. Jyeṣṭhā): 14; (19. Mūla): 56; (20. Pūrvāṣāḍha); 24; (21. Uttarāṣāḍha): 20; (22. Śravaṇa): 10; (23. Śraviṣṭhā): 10; (24. Śatabhiṣak): 18; (25. Pūrvabhādrapadā); 16; (26. Uttarabhādrapadā): 24; (27. Revatī): 30.

469 (xiv). Muhūrtadoṣa. Such muhūrtas in the week-day from Sunday, as are censured (for other auspicious rites) are to be censured also for marriage etc., even if invested with good qualities.[71]

470 (xv). Vāradoṣa. Such days of the week for which blemishes have been indicated, in order, beginning with Sunday, are to be eschewed also for (marriage, which is) the most auspicious rite, even if the days are endowed with all qualifications.[72]

471. (xvi). Ekārgala. Discard a lagna which encompasses even a fourth part of (an asterism having) the blemish of Ekārgala, as if it is milk mixed with poison, even if (the lagna is) occupied by Venus and Bṛhaspati.[73]

472. (xvii). Grahaṇotpātabha. (In an auspicious rite, like marriage), the asterism in which an eclipse or an Utpāta (like the fall of a meteor or occurrence of an earthquake) occurs should be discarded for three succeeding seasons (i.e. six months), thereafter as charred firewood, except when they are occupied by the moon and left (bhuktvā muktam bham).

473. (xviii-xix). Krūraviddharkṣa and Krūrasaṁyuta. In auspicious rites (like marriage) discard all asterisms which are afflicted (viddha)[74] or in conjunction with violent planets, as pañcagavya[75] to which a drop of wine has been added.

474. If the asterism in question had been afflicted only by its fourth part and that, too, by benefic planets, the whole asterism is not rendered inauspicious. However, if the affliction or being in conjunction is by cruel planets, the whole asterism has to be discarded.

475-77a. (xx). Kunavāṁśaka. The navāṁśas Libra, Gemini and Virgo and the Second half of Sagittarius are auspicious except the ending in each. The ending will also be auspicious if they are of the vargottama category.[76] The other navāṁśakas are not to be selected since they are Kunavāṁśakas ('Evil navāṁśakas'). A lagna in which there is a Kunavāṁśaka is to be rejected even if endowed with all other qualifications.

477b-78a. (xxi). Mahāpāta Vaidhṛti.[77] The day on which the mahāpāta Vaidhṛti occurs should be eschewed in auspicious rites (like marriage), even if endowed with all qualities, for it would cause the death of the couple.

478b-79. Minor blemishes (Svalpadoṣa). Minor blemishes, not mentioned (above) also exist, like for instance, lightning and hailstorm; mock-sun, halo round the Sun and the Moon, rainbow, and thunder of clouds: Lattā; minor tremours etc., lunar days called 'burnt month' (dagdhamāsa).

479. Dagdha-lagna (burnt lagna), and the lagnas with the appellation 'blind', 'deaf' and 'lame'. Now, the explanation of these is given below.

480. Lightning and hailstorm. Lightning and hailstorm, which occur at unexpected times, will indeed, be injurious to auspicious rites, though, in course of time, they will become noninjurious.

481. There is, however, no doubt that anyone of Jupiter, Venus or Mercury will obviate the effect of these groups of blemishes if it is in a quadrant (kendra)[78].

482-84a. Vedha (Piercing Affliction). (Draw a diagram with) five vertical lines, five across, and two each diagonally. Mark the asterism Kṛttikā (Agnidhiṣṇya) at the end of the second diagonal in the north-east and the other asterisms, including Abhijit (in order, in a clockwise direction). The mutually 'pierced' asterisms are those at the ends of the lines.[79]

484b-85a. Lattā. The Sun and other planets affect, for a day, an asterism, ahead of or behind it, (alternately). Thus, the Sun affects the 12th asterism (ahead of it); Moon, the 22nd (behind it); Mars, the 3rd (ahead of it); Mercury, the 7th (behind it); Jupiter, the 6th (ahead of it); Venus, the 5th (behind it); Saturn the 8th (ahead of it); and Rāhu, the 9th behind it. (These days are to be scrupulously avoided in fixing muhūrtas.)

485b-86a. Pātabha (Malignant asterism). Count from Hasta (Sūryabha) the asterism Āśleṣā (Sarpa), Maghā (Pitrya), Revatī (Antyā), Citra (Tvāṣṭra), Anurādhā (Mitra) and Śravaṇa

(Viṣṇubha) and count off those numbers from Aśvinī. The asterisms got would be malignant asterisms (pātabha) (?)

486b. In Saurāṣṭra and the Sālva country the blemish of Lattā is not taken note of.

487. Pātita (Minor tremour) is not considered auspicious in Kaliṅga (Orissa) and Vaṅga (Bengal) countries. In Bālhīka, Kuru country and certain other regions, however, it is not a blemish at all.

488. Dagdha-tithi and Dagdha-lagna. The 'burnt' lunar days and the 'burnt' lagnas are eschewed in Madhyadeśa (Madhya Pradesh) but not considered inauspicious in other areas.

489. The 'lame', 'blind' and 'deaf' lagnas[80] and the signs which do not contain the ending of a lunar month are rejected in the Gauḍa and Mālava regions, but not censured in other areas.

490. Every moment is infested with some blemish or other, and it would be impossible even for the creator to wipe off the blemishes completely. Hence one should opt for the maximum of auspiciousness and the minimum of blemishes.

491a. Marriage altar. In an auspicious lagna, (decided upon) in consideration of the above, should be arranged the mutual viewing of one another by the couple.

491b-95. The couple should then be made to ascend an auspicious altar on which holy fire is kept—an altar which is one cubit high, a square of four cubits on all sides; supported by four polished pillars; slightly slanting to the left; with a pavilion around, beautified by steps on the four sides; elongated on the east and the north; beautified by the planting of plantain trunks; ornamented by (replicas of) swans and parrots, painted pots, and shoots placed on the arches; decked with heaps of love-inciting flowers and colours; sanctified by the benedictions of brāhmaṇas and pleasing with auspicious and divinely beautiful ladies; and making the heart merry with musical instruments, dance and songs.

496. Mutual horoscopical agreement of the couple[81]. Eight are the mutual compatabilities which conduce to sons and grandsons: (i) Rāśi, (ii) Stridūra, (iii) Gaṇa, (iv) Rāśiśa, (v) Yoni (vi) Varṇa, (vii) Rajju and (viii) Vaśya.

497-98a. Agreement of Rāśi. Different asterism for the couple in the same rāśi is excellent. Middling is to have different rāśis, but the same asterism. The marriage of a couple born in the same asterism in the same rāśi results in death.

498b-99a. Stridūra. A distance within the first nine asterisms for the male horoscope from the asterism of the female is highly inauspicious, the second nine is middling and the third nine is excellent.

499b-500a. Agreement in Gaṇa[82]. The asterisms in the human group (martya-gaṇa) are : The three pūrvas and uttaras, (viz., Pūrvaphalgunī, Pūrvāṣāḍha, Purvabhādrapada, Uttaraphalgunī, Uttarāṣāḍha and Uttarabhādrapada), Rohiṇī (Dhātṛ), Bharaṇī (Yāmya), Ārdrā (Maheśa).

500. Those of the divine group are : Śravaṇa (Hari), Vasu (Āditya), Hasta (Arka), Svātī (Vāyu), Revatī (Antya), Anurādhā (Mitra), Aśvinī, Puṣya (Ijya) and Mṛgaśīrṣa (Indu).

501. Asterisms of the demonic gaṇa (Rakṣo-gaṇa) are : Maghā (Pitṛ), Citrā (Tvāṣṭra), Viśākhā (Dvidaivatya), Kṛttikā (Agni), Jyeṣṭhā (Indra), Dhaniṣṭhā (Vasu) Śatabhiṣak (Vāriśa), Mūla, and Āśleṣā (Ahi).

502. If the birth-asterism of the couple is the same, it would be pleasing in many ways. It is middling if one is human and the other divine. Death will result (if the human and the divine are united) with the demonic.

503. Agreement between the lords of the rāśi : If the lords of the rāśis of the couple are one in the 6th house and the other in the 8th, death will result. If it be fifth and ninth, there would be childlessness. Second and twelfth houses, too, are not desirable. In the others, there will be excellent mutual attraction between the couple.

504. If the said lords are identical or friendly, the marriage will be happy. It might be so even in the case of two and twelve and the trines (trikoṇā), but never in the case of six and eight.

505-6. Agreement of Yoni.[83] The animals relating to the asterisms Aśvinī etc. are in order: (1. Aśvinī) : Horse; (2. Bharaṇī): Elephant; (3. Kṛttikā): Goat; (4. Rohiṇī) : Serpent; (5. Mṛgaśiras) : Snake; (6. Ārdrā): Dog; (7. Punar-vasu): Cat; (8. Puṣya): Goat; (9. Āśleṣà): Cat; (10. Maghā): Rat; (11. Pūrvaphalgunī) : Mouse; (12. Uttaraphalgunī): Cow; (13. Hasta): Buffalo; (14. Citrā) : Tiger; (15. Svātī): Buffalo; (16. Viśākhā) : Tiger; (17. Anurādhā) : Deer; (18. Jyeṣṭhā) : Deer; (19. Mūla) : Dog; (20. Pūrvāṣāḍha): Monkey; (21. Uttarāṣāḍha): Ox; (22. Śravaṇa): Monkey; (23. Śraviṣṭhā) ; Lion; (24. Śatabhiṣak) : Horse; (25. Pūrvabhādrapadā) : Lion; (26. Uttarabhādrapadā) : Cow; (27. Revatī) : Elephant.

507. The pairs Dog and deer, Mongoose and serpent, Goat and monkey, Lion and elephant, Cow and tiger, Rat and cat, and Buffalo and horse are inimical.

508. Varṇa (caste)[84]. Pisces, Scorpio and Cancer are brāhmaṇas; the further ones belong to the other castes.[85] If the male's rāśi is lower than that of the female in caste, it is inauspicious[86].

509-10a. Rajju or Nāḍi. (The 27 asterisms are in the form of a zigzag rope, each loop carrying 3 asterisms, thus forming three columns (nāḍis) of 9 asterisms each, (If the asterisms of the boy and the girl fall) in the same column, it indicates death and not so in adjacent columns.)[87]

510b-11a. Different types of marriages. (The three types of marriages) Prājāpatya, Brāhma and Daiva are approved by the sage, and if performed at the said (auspicious) times, would be extremely beneficial.

511b. (The Āsura marriage is achieved through the payment of money and Paiśāca by kidnapping the bride. The Rākṣasa marriage is done by winning over the bride in battle and Gāndharva is made by mutual understanding.)[88]

512-13a. Abhijit and Godhūlikā.[89] The fourth lagna from the lagna at sunrise is called Abhijit and the seventh is called Godhūlikā. Both these are auspicious for marriage and (will bless the couple) with sons and grandsons. For the Easterners (belonging to Bengal, Assam etc.) and the people of Kaliṅga (Orissa), Godhūlikā is important.

513b-14. Abhijit is considered as important in all regions as a destroyer of blemishes. The muhūrta (of two nāḍikās) when the Sun is at the zenith is called Abhijit. It wipes off all blemishes as the Pināka-bowed (Śiva) wiped out the Tripuras.[90]

515. Prohibitions in marriages. A daughter's marriage should not be conducted for three seasons after a son's marriage, neither should be performed the sacrament (for the change to married life, vrata). When there has been an auspicious event, there shall not be another auspicious event closely following.

516. If the marriages of two sisters are conducted within six months of each other, one of them will surely become a widow within three years.

517. Mutual marriages should not be performed nor should two daughters be married to the same groom, nor two daughters born of the same parents to two brothers born of the same parents.

518a. Nor should two marriages be conducted at the same time, nor two tonsures.

518b-19a. If a marriage is performed during Gaṇḍa[91], the child if born during day-time will kill his father, if during night, his mother, and if during the (morning and evening) twilights, himself. There is no exception to Gaṇḍa.

519b. A son and a daughter born in the asterism Mūla will positively kill the father-in-law, but not one born in the ending quarter of that asterism.

520a-20b. A boy, but not the girl, born in the first quarter of Āśleṣā and the latter two quarters of Jyeṣṭhā will also (kill the father-in-law).

521. A girl born in Mūla or Pūrvāṣāḍha will not harm the father or the mother, but the one born in Jyeṣṭhā will kill the elder brother of the husband, and one born in Viśākhā (Dvidaiva) the younger brother.

521-23. Vadhūpraveśa. For the auspicious entry of the bride into her husband's household, the sixth, eighth, tenth or seventh day counted from the day of marriage is recommended. (If it is delayed), the marriage journey should be made leaving out the second (and other even) years and eschewing the bride's birth asterism, birth-lagna, and birth-day, and also avoiding position to Venus.[92]

INSTALLATION OF DEITIES

524a. The installation of any deity during the northward course of the Sun will conduce to prosperity.

524b-25. The installation would be auspicious if made at a time when both Mercury and Venus are visible, in the five months from Māgha, but omitting Citrā; in the bright fortnight and, if in the dark fortnight, in the first eight days, the lunar day being selected in accordance with the day patronised by the particular deity;

526-527a. On the two lunar days beginning with the second, the three days beginning with the fifth, the four days beginning with the 10th, especially on full moon day;

527b-28a. On the asterisms, the three Uttarās (viz., Uttara-phālgunī, Uttarāṣāḍhā and Uttarabhādrapadā), Mṛgaśiras, Revatī, Hasta, Citrā, Svātī and Puṣya; and also on Aśvinī, Rohiṇī, Pūrvāṣāḍhā, Śravaṇa, Anurādhā, and Dhaniṣṭhā; 528b-29. On week-days excepting Tuesday, when the Sun is strong with regards to the master (of the installation), when the potencies of the Moon and the asterisms are forthcoming; in the forenoon of that auspicious day, when the lagna and the division thereof are auspicious, and when no (asterism) deadly to the master is rising.

530. Nature of the signs and houses. All the signs are auspicious if occupied or aspected by benefic planets, the Pañcaka (Five sources of energy)[93] being auspicious and the 8th house, indicating death, is vacant.

531. The Moon, Mars, Sun, Node, Tail and Saturn would bc harmful to the master if they occupy the lagna, while the other planets would bestow wealth, grain and happiness.

532a. In the second house, the evil planets will not bestow any desired fruit, while the benefics and the Moon will bestow wealth.

532b. In the third house, all the planets bestow sons, grandsons and happiness.

533a. In the fourth house, the benefic planets bestow happiness, while the violent planets bestow unhappiness.

533b. In the fifth house, the violent planets produce distress, while the benefic planets bestow sons and happiness.

534a. In the sixth house the benefic planets become enemies, while the evil planets would destroy one's enemies.

534b. In the seventh house, the evil planets cause disease, while the benefic planets bestow auspicious fruits.

535a. In the eighth house, all planets occupying it cause the death of the master.

535b. In the ninth house which indicates dharma, the evil planets cause distress, but the benefic planets are auspicious and bestow happiness.

536a. In the tenth house which indicates Karma, the evil planets give trouble but the benefic planets and the Moon bring glory.

536b. In the eleventh house, indicative of profit, all planets tend to bestow the maximum income (profit) (to the master).

537a. All the planets occupying the twelfth house indicating expenditure will make (the master) spend incessantly.

537b-38a. The images of deities, installed, if not endowed with wealth, will harm the master, and harm the priest if not properly invoked with sacred chants. If not sculptured according to specifications, they will injure the master's wife. Indeed, there is no act so inimical (as an installation (which has not been properly performed).

538b-39a. If the installation is done during a lagna highly endowed with auspicious qualities, and if the blemishes are very little, the installation of deities would bestow upon the master all his desires.

(VĀSTULAKṢAṆA: CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES)

539b-400a. Testing of the ground. Towards the construction of a town, village, house etc, first examine the ground for its qualities of smell, colour and taste.

540b-41. For brāhmaṇas, (kṣatriyas, vaiśyas and śūdras), it is auspicious if the earth has, respectively, the smell of honey, flower, sour fruit and flesh; has, respectively, the colours white, red, green and dark; and has, respectively, the tastes sweet, hot, bitter and astringent.

542. It is beneficial for all people if the ground slopes towards north-east, east or north. Slopes towards the other directions would always be highly harmful to them.

543. Dig a (cubical) pit of the depth of one cubit and fill it (with the excavated earth). It would be extremely beneficial if there is earth to spare, if less, it is inauspicious and if just enough (to fill the pit), it is middling.

544. Dig a similar pit at dusk and fill it with water. When examined in the morning, if there is water still, the place would be prosperous, if there is just slush, it would be middling, and if it is dry, it is inferior.

545. Orientation (East-west determination). When a ground with good characteristics as above has been selected, prepare a level surface in its middle and draw a circle thereon, for determining the east-west line.

546a. Fix a 12-inch gnomon at its centre and with its help, determine the directions.[94]

546b-47a. Construction of the building. In the ground measured out as a rectangle and tested through the sixfold divisions (Ṣaḍvarga),[95] a beautiful edifice should be erected, along the lines drawn.

547b-48. Windows in the outer walls of the residential enclosure. Along the directions on the four sides, reckoned from the east, eight gates each should be put up. In the clockwise order they will have the undermentioned effects:

549. East: (i) Misfortune, (ii) Loss of wealth, (iii) gain of wealth, (iv) propitiation of the king, (v) great wealth, (vi) big theft, (vii) rage and (viii) fear.

550. South: (i) Death, (ii) imprisonment, (iii) fear, (iv) attainment of riches, (v) increase in wealth, (vi) freedom from doubts (vii) fear from diseases, and (viii) destruction of creatures.

551. West: (i) Loss of a son, (ii) prosperity to the enemy, (iii) attainment of riches, (iv) receipt of wealth, (v) happiness, (vi) extreme misfortune, (vii) unhappiness, and (viii) distress.

552. North: (i) Loss of one's wife: (ii) destruction of creatures, (iii) Misfortune, (iv) attainment of grains and wealth, (v) wealth, (vi) prosperity, (vii) intense fear, and (viii) hunger.

553. Doorways. The main doorway to the house is to be in the west or the south, its height being twice its breadth.

554. 81-division concept.[96] Divide the ground inside the boundary walls into 81 squares (by dividing the sides into nine equal divisions). Nine squares in the centre form the Brahmasthāna ('place of Brahmā'), which is highly inauspicious (for residential quarters).

555-56a. The thirytwo squares close to the outer wall, (i.e., the border squares, all round) pertain to the ghosts. Residential construction in the ghost region will result in unhappiness, distress and fear.

The other squares (are auspicious and) tend to bless one with sons, grandsons and wealth for one's constructing the house.

556b-58a. The east-west and north-south lines in the construction form its bloodvessels. The Brahmā squares, the ghost squares and the intersecting points of the bloodvessels are to be understood as the vital junctures of the construction. The vital junctures are not commended for residential use.[97]

558b-59a. Time for building construction. The months Mārgaśiras (Saumya), Phālguna, Vaiśākha, Māgha, Śrāvaṇa and Kārttika conduce to sons, health and wealth (to one who builds a house during these months).

559b-60. Digvargayoni. The (eight) groups (vargas) beginning with a (viz., (1) the vowels a etc., (2) ka-varga, (3) ca-varga, (4) ṭa-varga, (5) ta-varga, (6) pa-varga, (7) ya-ra-la-va and (8) śa-ṣa-sa-ha) are placed, in order, against the (eight) directions beginning with the east. (The eight animals and birds, viz.) (1) eagle, (2) cat, (3) lion, (4) dog, (5) serpent, (6) rat, (7) elephant and (8) deer are the yoni-s (animal-births) of the (eight) said direction-groups. Of these the fifth counted from its group is its enemy.[98]

561. Auspiciousness based on Varga-cakra. (In order to determine whether the selected spot would be beneficial for the owner's residence), the varga of the sādhya (here, the village) and that of the sādhaka (owner) are separately (calculated) and each divided by 8. If the remainder got from the Varga of the sādhaka is greater, the land is good for him, otherwise, it will destroy him.[99]

562. Or, count the asterisms from the asterisms of the sādhaka (owner) to that of the sādhya (village), multiply that number by 4 and divide by 7. The greater the remainder, the owner will fare better in that land.[100]

563. Auspiciousness based on area. The product of length and breadth forms the area of a house. From it is calculated, in order, the numbers indicating (the nature of) its positiveness, negativeness, income, asterism, week-day and navāṁśa.[101]

564. Positiveness conduces to prosperity, while negative-ness is inauspicious. An odd number indicating income points to auspiciousness while an even number indicates penury.

565. Auspiciousness based on asterisms. The third asterism (of the house) from that of the master of the house indicates depletion of wealth, the fifth asterism indicates depletion of prestige, and the seventh asterism foretells death.

566. Auspiciousness based on the signs. The second and twelfth sign conduces to poverty and triangular sign conduces to sonlessness. The sixth and eighth signs indicate death. The other signs are auspicious.

567. Auspiciousness on the basis of week-days. Sundays and Tuesdays conduce to fear of fire. The days pertaining to the other planets conduce to the fulfilment of all desires.

568-69a. Deity of the dwelling and entrance to the house. The Deity of the dwelling (Vāstu-pumān) would be lying prostrate on the house-site with his head towards the east during the three months beginning with Nabhasya (i.e., Bhādrapada, Āśvina and Kārttika). This pot-bellied deity, called also Cara 'the moving' shifts its position anticlockwise every three months, (thus remaining with his head towards north during Mārgaśīrṣa, Pauṣa and Māgha, west during Phālguna. Caitra and Vaiśākha, and south during Jyeṣṭha, Āṣāḍha and Śrāvaṇa).

569b-70. The main entrance to the house should be in the direction in which the head of the Deity of the dwelling is (at the time when construction is started). A house with its entrance turned opposite to the said direction will bring disease and distress (to the master of the house). This drawback will not affect a house which has entrances on all sides.

571. Commencement of construction. A mud pot, with gold, gems, grain and lotus seeds should be placed in a pit of the depth of a cubit in the centre of the house (-site) as a deposit).

572a. The middle point of the longer side of the house-site is termed (nābhi) (navel) and an area of three digits around it is its belly.

572b-74. At the navel a gnomon adorned with gold, clothes, etc., and conducive of sons and grandsons, has to be fixed. The measure of the gnomon for (the houses of) Brāhmaṇas, (Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdrās) are, respectively, 24, 23, 16 and 12 digits. The gnomon should be constructed from the wood of khadira, arjuna, sāla and pūga or from red sandal, palāśa, raktasāla or visāla.

575. Divide the gnomon into three, construct a square around it, then an octogon and then an unbroken circle (?) (anasram rjum āvaraṇam).

576-78. Fix the gnomon prepared as above at the appropriate place duly marked with a string used to mark off the quadrants, signs etc. (ṣadvargaśuddhisūtreṇa),[102] on an auspicious day, the prevailing asterism being one of the mṛdu, dhruva or kṣipra classes[103] the lunar day being not newmoon or one of the riktā 'empty' days (viz., the 4th, 9th and 14th tithis), the day being not Sunday nor Tuesday, the lagna and the eighth house being not occupied by evil planets, the eighth house being vacant, the lagna being auspicious, and so also the navāṁśaka division thereof, and the lagna being occupied or aspected by beneficent planets.

579-80a. The fixing of the gnomon should be accompanied by the utterance of sacred hymns and the sounds of musical instruments played by the most auspicious ladies. The kendra and trikoṇa houses (quadrants and trines) should be occupied by beneficent planets, the third and the eleventh (āya) and sixth houses being occupied by the other planets, and the Moon occupying the sixth house from lagna.

580b-82. Classification of dwellings. There are six types of dwellings having, respectively, one, two, three, four, seven and ten halls; each of these are of sixteen types, which carry the appellations: Dhruva, Dhanya, Jaya, Nanda, Svara, Kānta, Manorama, Sumukha, Durmukha, Krūra, Śatru, Svarṇaprada, Kṣaya, Ākranda, Vipula and Vijaya.

583-84a. The possible types of dwellings can be calculated by the method of permutation and combination (as is done in metrics, where, in order to find the number of possible forms of a metre, the following procedure is adopted): Place the short syllable below the long syllable; and further, too, place the syllables, progressively. Thus fill the set entirely with long syllables and then add one with all short.[104]

584b-85a. Verandah. Construct narrow verandahs (alinda) round the building, starting from the entrance. Considering the verandahs from the east, there can be sixteen types of houses.

585b-87a. Location of the rooms. The bathroom shall be to the east and the kitchen to the south-east. The room for sleeping shall be to the south and the armoury to the southwest. To the west shall be the dining room and the granary to the northwest. The room for worship is to be in the north and the room for the storing of milk, curds etc. to the north-east.

587b-89a. Rooms for (1) bed, (2) urine, blood and faeces; (3) food, (4) auspicious things, (5) grain, (6) enjoyment with women, (7) wealth, and (8) ornaments, are to be located (in between the eight rooms mentioned above) beginning with the north east-east. Construction of residences in this manner is auspicious.[105]

589b-90a. Birds, beasts etc. of the direction. Flag, smoke, lion, dog, cow, ass, elephant, and crow—these eight are ascribed, in order, to the directions beginning with the east.[106]

590b-91. Inauspicious trees around the house. Plakṣa, udumbara, cūta. snuhi, nimba, vibhitaka, thorny trees, milktrees, vaṭa, aśvattha, kapitthaka, agasti, sindhuvāla and tintiḍika are not recommended (for being planted around a residence).

592a. An elder brother's house to the south or west (of one's own) (is recommended) as that of one's own father. (?)

592b. The foundations of a house are to be commended if they are level and the pillars equal (in height), not otherwise.

593. The walls should not be too high nor too low, the height being fixed as one likes it. So also, the storeys, one over the other. In all such cases, the above shall be the consideration.

594-95. Drains and gagoyles. Drains in houses are of eight types (as obtaining in different regions). They are, in order: Pāñcāla, Vaideha, Kaurava, Kaujanyaka, Māgadha, Śūrasena, Gāndhāra and Āvantika. In all these the breadth is one fourth of the height.

596. The Pāñcāla type is the smallest and the others, Vaideha etc., are larger, in that order.

597-98. The Pāñcāla measure is applicable to all. However, for the residences, in two or three storeys, of brāhmaṇas etc., drains of special suitability are those of the Avanti measure to Brāhmaṇas, Gāndhāra measure to Kṣatriyas and Kaujaneya measure to Vaiśyas.

599-600a. Stables. Stables for camels and elephants should have their heights with accord with the dhvaja or gaja measures. However, for cattle and horses, the height of the tables shall accord with the dhvaja or vṛṣa measures. The entrance, place for penning and place for feeding should accord respectively, with the dhvaja, siṁha and vṛṣa measures.[107]

600b. Vāstupūjā. I shall now set out the procedure for the worship of the building before it is occupied.

601. On husked rice spread in the centre of the house, draw ten lines, (west to) east, a cubit in the length, and ten lines (across south to) north, thus forming 81 squares.

602. Mark the 45 deities mentioned below (in the appropriate squares), 32 of them in the border squares and 13 inside.

603. Now, shall I state their names and places, in order. Here are the 32 deities (to be marked) from the northeast.

604-5a. (1) Śiva, (2) Parjanya, (3) Jayanta, (4) Indra, (5) Sūrya, (6) Candra, (7) Bhṛśa, (8) Ākāśa (Antarikṣaka), (9) Vāyu, (10) Pūṣā, (11) Nirṛti, (12) Gṛhākṣata, (13) Yama (Daṇḍadhara), (14) Gandharva, (15) Bhṛṅgarāja (Bhṛgurāja), (16) Mṛga, (17) Pitṛgaṇādhīśa (18) Dauvārika, (19) Sugrīva, (20) Puṣpadanta, (21) Varuṇa (Jalādhīśa), (22) Asura, (23) Śeṣa (? Śoṣa), (24) Pāpa (Rājayakṣmā), (25) Roga, (26) Nāga (Bhogi), (27) Mukhya, (28) Niśākara (? Bhallāṭa), (29) Soma, (30) Śūnya (? Sarpa), (31) Aditi, and (32) Diti. These are the 32 deities.

605b-7a. (As has already been noted, Brahmā occupies the nine squares at the centre). Outside (this Brahmapada), are the four deities, Āpaḥ, Sāvitra, Jaya and Rudra in the corners, beginning from northeast.

607b-9a. Again, in the alternate squares around Brahmapada, beginning from the east, are the eight deities Aryamā, Savitā, Vivasvān, Indra (vibudhādhipaḥ), Mitra, Rājayakṣmā, Pṛthvīdhara and Āpavatsa. These are the 55 deities (to be marked in the squares)[108].

609b-11. Classification of the deities. Āpas, Āpavatsa, Parjanya, Agni and Diti—these deities, form in order, (five) square-groups in all the corners. From among the deites, twenty are always two-square deities. Aryamā, Vivasvān, Mitra, Pṛthvīdhara who are on the four sides of Brahmā are three-square deities.

612. Worship of the deities. The knower of house construction should worship Brahmā and the two-square and three-square deities with the hymn of house-building and with dūrvā-grass, curds and rice grains.

613. With the chanting of the Brahmā-hymn shall be offered two white pieces of cloth. In due order shall be performed the invocation of the deity and the bestowing of honours.

614. Offering of three types of cooked rice shall be made, as musical instruments are played, (after which) betel shall be offered. Then shall the master of the house pray (as follows):

615. "O lord ! Deity of the dwelling ! Obeisance to you, who are intent on lying on the ground ! May you make my dwelling always rich in cash and grains."

616. Having prayed thus, he should pay the priest dakṣiṇā according to his mite and later feed the brāhmaṇas in consonance with his capability.

617. One who performs properly the worship of the dwelling in this manner, will attain health, birth of a son, wealth and grains.

618. On the contrary, one who enters (and dwells) in the residence without performing the worship of the dwelling, will have to endure disease, all kinds of difficulties and every calamity.

619. Enter not a house which is either doorless or roofless, or for which neither sacrifice has been made nor people fed, for such a house is a source of danger.

TRAVEL: YĀTRĀ

620. I shall now set down the dictums for travel for kings and all others whose time of birth is correctly known.

621. In the case of those whose time of birth is not known the attainment of the predicted result would be by chance, like letters carved out by a worm.[109] However, in their case also correct results can be predicted through (such methods of astrology as) Praśna and Nimitta.[110]

622. Inauspicious days for travel. Travel on sixth, eighth and twelfth (lunar days), 'empty' days (viz., fourth, ninth and fourteenth), full moon and first of the bright fortnight will tend to penury and distress.

623. Auspicious asterisms for travel. Travel during the asterisms Anurādhā (Maitra), Punarvasu, (Aditi), Mṛgaśiras (Indu), Hasta (Arka), Revatī (Antya), Śravaṇa (Hari), Tiṣya (Puṣya) and Dhaniṣṭhā (Vasu) and also those other than the seventh, fifth, third and first, will yield one's desires.

624. Śūla (Spear) on Week-days. Travel not towards the east on Saturday and Monday, not southwards on Thursday, not westwards on Friday and Sunday, and not northwards on Wednesday and Tuesday.

625a. Śūla on asterisms. (Travel is inauspicious on account of) Śūla towards the four directions, from east, in order, on the asterisms: (east): Jyeṣṭhā; (south): Pūrva-Bhādrapadā; (West): Rohiṇī; and (north): Uttara-phālgunī.

625b. Auspicious asterisms for all directions. The (four) asterisms, Anurādhā (Mitra), Hasta (Arka), Puṣya (Ijya) and Aśvinī are prescribed for (travel) in all directions (sarvadvāra).

626-27a. Blemish of Parigha-daṇḍa. Seven asterisms each, counted from Kṛttikā (Agnidhiṣṇya) are prescribed for free (travel) in (the four) specific directions (dig-dvāra) (reckoned from east). The (diagonal) line from south-east to north-west is called Parigha-daṇḍa, ('cross-bar') which should not be crossed (in travel as above).[111] However on night travel south-east in the asterisms specified for the east, the same rule is applicable in the case of the other directions also (i.e., southern asterisms for southwest etc.).

627b. The rāśis of the directions (dig-rāśi) are Meṣa etc. counted in continuation 'in order' (from the east).[112] (One can cut the parigha-daṇḍa in travel if the dig-rāśi is favourable).

628a. Lalāṭikā-yoga.[113] (The lords of the directions are, in order: East: Sun; SE: Venus; South: Mars; SW: Rāhu; West: Saturn; NW: Moon; North: Mercury, and NE: Jupiter.)[114] When the lord of the direction (towards which one travels) is in the lalāṭa yoga, the traveller will not return home.

628b. The Sun in the lagna would be lalāṭaga (i.e., in the lalāṭa yoga) for one travelling east.

629. Venus in the 12th and 11th houses would be lalāṭaga in the south-east. Mars in the 10th house would be lalāṭaga in the south.

630. Rāhu in the 9th and 8th houses would be lalāṭaga in the southwest. Saturn in the 7th house from lagna would be lalāṭaga in the west.

631. The Moon in the 6th and the 5th houses would be lalāṭaga in the north-west. Mercury in the 4th house would be lalāṭaga in the north.

632. Jupiter in the 2nd and 3rd houses would be lalāṭaga in the north-east. One who loves his life would keep away from lalāṭa-yoga.

633. Effect of retrograde planets. If the planet in the lagna at the commencement of the journey is retrograde, that will cause the defeat of the king; so also the vargas of those planets, if in retrograde motion.

634. Effect of Ayana. Travel in the direction of the (northward or southward) course of the Sun and the Moon is beneficial (if both move in the same direction). If otherwise (i.e., if the Sun and the Moon move in opposite directions), the journey should be begun during the day (if the journey is in the direction of the Sun's motion) and during night (if the journey is in the direction of the Moon's motion).[115]

635. Effect of Venus. (Journey undertaken) when Venus has set will not be successful, while that against the course of Venus would end in failure. The adverse effect of going against Venus cannot be counteracted by other planets (even if they be in favourable positions).

636. However, persons belonging to the five gotras, Vasiṣṭha, Kāśyapa, Ātreya, Bhāradvāja and Gautama, will not be affected by travelling against (the course) of Venus.

637. Neither travel against Venus will affect their journeys within the same village, in famine, during wars between kings, and agitation against brahmins or kings.

638. Venus will defeat the purpose of the traveller if it is in debilitation (nica), is in enemy planets' house, in retrogression or in defeat. On the other hand, if it is in exaltation, it will bring success.

639. Prognostication based on one's janma-lagna. (If travel is commenced) in the 8th house as reckoned from one's janma-lagna, or in the 8th rāśi, or in the 8th lagna or rāśi of one's enemy or in the rāśi of the lords of the above, no doubt, the traveller will meet with his death.

640. However, if the lord of one's janmalagna and that of the 8th lagna are friendly, the blemishes resulting from the janmarāśi and 8th house will be counteracted.

641. Houses aspected or occupied by violent planets (viz., Sun, Saturn and Mars) and those of a double nature (viz., Gemini, Virgo, Sagittarius and Pisces) will bring about failure. Travel is not recommended during the rising of the 'firm' (sthira) asterisms (viz., Uttaraphalgunī, Uttarāṣāḍha, Uttarabhādrapadā and Rohiṇī). On the other hand, houses aspected or occupied by benefic planets are good for travel.

642. During the five asterisms (actually four and a half) from Dhaniṣṭhā (Vasu) to the middle of Revatī (antyārdha), should not be done the following five things; (Dhaniṣṭhā): cutting grass, (Śatabhiṣak): collecting firewood; (Pūrvabhādrapadā): travel south; (Uttarabhādrapadā): constructing cots; and (Revatī): repairing houses.

643. (Of a king) who starts (for war) when the then lagna is his janma-lagna on janma-rāśi, or the lords of these two are in the then lagna, or the then lagna is the 3rd, 11th (āya), 6th (ari) or 10th house as reckoned from the above two, viz., janmalagna and janmarāśi, the enemy will perish.

644. If a śīrṣodaya-rāśi (sign rising with head)[116] is rising, the dig-lagna is in the lagna, or a beneficent varga is in the lagna, (at the start of the journey) then, too, the enemy will perish.

645. (If the journey is commenced by the king) at the enemy's janmalagna, janmarāśi or death-lagna (i.e., 8th house), or in the signs occupied by the lords of the above, then, also, the enemy will perish.

646. (If a king starts) when Pisces is rising (Mīna-lagna) or in the Pisces-division of another sign, his journey will be tortuous (and unsuccessful). Similarly, the sign Aquarius or its section (in any other sign) is not recommended for any type of journey.

647a. For (starting) a naval expedition or travel over the waters, the rising of 'watery' signs(jala-rāśi)[117] or the sections thereof in other signs, is auspicious.

647b-48. The twelve Bhāvas (Houses). The twelve houses (relating to any time) are designated as follows, commencing from the then rising sign (udaya-lagna: (1) Mūrti (Body), (2) Kośa (Treasury), (3) Dhanvin (Archer), (4) Vāhana (Vehicle), (5) Mantra (Counsel), (6) Śatru (Enemy), (7) Mārga (Way), (8) Āyus (Age), (9) Manas (Mind), (10) Vyāpāra (Occupation), (11) Prāpti (Attainment) and (12) Aprāpti (Non-attainment).[118]

649. The violent planets (viz., Sun, Mars and Saturn), are destructive in all the houses except the 3rd and the 11th (āpti). Sun and Jupiter do not harm the 10th house (Vyāpāra). The benefic planets (viz., Jupiter, Venus, Moon and Mercury) make all houses except the 6th (Ari) flourish.

650a. Venus, when set, does not benefit any house and the Moon does not benefit the 1st (Mūrti) and the 8th (Mṛtyu) houses.

650b-51. Effect of Abhijit. To travellers in all directions except to the south, the asterism Abhijit will fulfil all desires. This asterism is effectively beneficial even on a day which is not pure in relation to its five aspects (Pañcāṅgaśuddhi).[119]

652a. Combination benefic for travel. Multifarious are the combinations for travel (yātrā-yoga). I shall, therefore, set forth those combinations.

652b-53a. A combination would be effective, in the case of a brahmin, in view of the lagna; in the case of a kṣatriya in view of the asterisms and in view of the auspicious moment (muhūrta) in the case of others. So far as a thief is concerned, the omens count most.

653b-654a. In the kendras (quadrants, viz., 1st, 4th, 7th and 10th houses) and trikoṇas (trines, viz., 1st, 5th and 9th houses) a (benefic) yoga would be constituted by any one of Venus, Mercury and Sun. A double yoga (adhi-yoga) would be constituted by two of them, and by three a super yoga (yogādhi-yoga).

654b-55a. A yoga would afford protection (kṣema) and in an adhiyoga one would be successful. And, in Yogādhiyoga, protection, success and prosperity would result.

655b-56a. The Moon, Saturn and Sun occupying, respectively, the 10th (Vyāpāra), 6th (Śatru) and 1st (Mūrti), houses, will ensure the victory of the king who is setting out for war.

656b-57a. The enemy's forces will melt like lac in fire before a king who has marched when the planets Venus, Sun, Mercury, Saturn and Mars were occupying, respectively, the 1st (lagna), 7th (Mārga), 11th (Āya), 3rd and 6th (Śatru) houses.

657b-58a. The enemy's army will be transported to the abode of Death by a king who had set out when Venus occupied the 1st house (lagna) and the other planets, the 2nd (Dhana) and the 11th (Āya) houses.

658b-59a. A king who sets out when Venus is in the lagna, the Sun in the 11th (Lābha), and the Moon in the 2nd (Bandhu), will destroy the horde of enemies just as a lion would destroy a herd of elephants.

659b-60a. One who sets out when Venus is in exaltation, (the lord) of the lagna is also in exaltation and the Moon is in the 11th house would have all miseries destroyed as Keśava destroyed Pūtanā.[120]

660b-61a. If the kendra and trikoṇa houses are occupied by the benefic planets and the cruel planets occupy the 3rd, 11th and 6th houses, misfortune will seek out the traveller as a wanton woman (abhisārikā) (would go out in search of her lover).

661b-62a. In front of a king who sets out when Venus, Sun and Moon occupy, respectively, 1st, 6th and 12th (randhra) houses, the enemy would not stand firm, as (the instable) friendship between evil persons.

662b-63a. The enemy's land would be within the grasp of a king who sets out for battle when Saturn and Mars are strong in the 3rd (trikhaḍa) and 11th (Āya) houses.

663b-64a. If a king sets out when Venus, which is in exaltation, occupies the lagna and the Moon is in the 11th house (lābhagata), he will destroy his enemies, as Lord Śiva, with his bow Pināka, destroyed the Tripura demons.[121]

664b-65a. A king who sets out (for war) when Venus, which is in exaltation, occupies the lagna, and Jupiter occupies the 11th house (lābhaga) will kill his enemies just as God Kumāra killed the demon Tāraka.[122]

665b-66a. A king who marches (for battle) when Jupiter occupies the lagna, kendra or trikoṇa, will consume his enemies just as fire burns out the forest.

666b-67a. Kings (who go for battle) when Mercury occupies the lagna, a benefic planet in the kendra and Venus (Dhiṣṇya) is in a (favourable) division (upakula), will dry up the enemies just as the rays of the Sun dry up the lake during summer.

667b-68a. A king going out when a benefic planet occupies a trikoṇa or kendra and the Sun or the Moon the 11th house (Lābha) will drive away the enemies just like the Sun drives out darkness.

668b-69a. A king will destroy his enemies just as fire burns cotton if benefic planets occupy their own houses, the kendra, trikoṇas and the 11th house (Āya) when he sets out.

669b-70a. A king who goes out (for war) when Moon occupies its own house, Jupiter is in a kendra and Śukra (Mantri) is in the 7th house, will destroy all his enemies like the sacred Pañcākṣara destroys all sin.[123]

670b-71a. A king who sets out when Venus, which is in the lagna, occupies also the vargottama division in it,[124] will destroy the horde of enemies just as the remembrance of Hari (Harismṛti) would destroy all accumulated sin.[125]

671b-72a. (A king starting on an expedition) when the kendra is occupied by a benefic planet and the Moon in the trikoṇa is also in the vargottama section, will crush his enemies along with their clan just as Indra crushed the (flying) mountains.[126]

672b-73a. A king will kill his enemies just as the kite kills serpents, (if he starts for battle) when Jupiter occupies a friendly house and Venus occupies the kendra or trikoṇa.

673b-74a. (If a king) sets out when a benefic planet occupying the kendra or the trikoṇa is also in the vargottama division (of the navāṁśa), he will wash away his enemies just as (the sacred river) Ganges (Bhāgīrathī) washes off sins.[127]

674b-75a. Those kings who set out to conquer their enemies in the above yogas called 'Royal yogas' (nṛpāhvaya) (will be victorious and) their fire of anger would be put out by the tears of the enemy queens (who would be weeping on their fresh widowhood).

675b-76a. The tenth day of the bright fortnight of the month of Āśvina is called Vijaya. For those who go out to fight that day there might be truce, but never defeat.

676b-77a. For omens and portents the mental attitude is most important. Hence it is up to all serious-minded people to cultivate the mental attitude.

677b-78. One who desires to continue alive should not undertake a journey when a festival, the ceremonies of bestowing the sacred thread, marriage and installation of a deity, and pollution due to death or child birth (which is in force) has not been duly completed.

678b-79a. A king should not set out when there is going on a buffalo fight or a goat fight, a quarrel between his queens or they are in their monthly course, clothes have been soiled, and when angry words have been uttered.

679b-80a. Food before setting out. A king will conquer his enemies if he starts towards the (four) directions beginning with east after a repast, in order, of rice with ghee, cooked sesame balls, dish of fish, and rice cooked in milk with ghee added.

680b-81a. On the week-days beginning from Sunday, (he should set out) after taking a food of (1) majjaka, (2) rice cooked in rice, (3) kañjika, (4) water, (5) curd, (6) milk and (7) cooked sesame.

681b-84. A king will conquer his enemies if he sets out on the 27 asterisms beginning with Aśvinī, accompanied by his army consisting of elephants, chariots, horses and infantry, after having his repast on : (1) Kulmāṣa, (2) cooked sesame, (3) curd, (4) milk, (5) wine, (6) ghee, (7) water, (8) venison, (9) blood from the preceding, (10) rice cooked in milk, (11) bird's flesh, (12) Venison, (13) hare's flesh, (14) rice, (15) priyaṅgu (mustard), (16) rice cakes cooked in oil, (17) variegated egg, (18) fruits, (19) flesh of tortoise, (20) of śvāvid (21) of godhā, (22) of śalyaka, (23) sanctified food (haviṣya), (24) cooked rice-sesame mixture (kṛśarānna), (25) cooked gram, (26) balls of cooked yava flour, (27) dish of fish, (28) variegated cooked rice, and (29) curd rice.[128]

685-86a. Procedure for the march. The king should first offer oblations of sesame in the (sacred) fire and then worship the lord of direction (in which he is to proceed). He should then pay obeisance to the deities and brāhmaṇas and start after receiving their blessings. (The worship of the respective deities) should be according to the prescribed specifications of complexion, dress, unguents etc. and with the chanting of their mantras.

686b-87a. Indra should be worshipped as mounted on (his white elephant) Airāvata, resplendent with (his consort) Śacī, as holding the thunderbolt in his hand, as of golden complexion and as adorned with divine ornaments.

687b-88a. Agni should be worshipped (in an idol having seven hands, seven tongues, six faces, seated on a goat, with his consort Svāhā, red-complexioned, and holding the palāśa twig and sacrificial ladle as weapons.

688b-89a. Yama should be worshipped as holding the rod as a weapon, with red eyes, mounted on a buffalo, seated with his consort Śyāmalā, red-complexioned, looking up and beneficent.

689b-90a. Nirṛti should be worshipped as holding the sword and shield, blue-complexioned, mounted on a man as his vehicle, with raised hair, odd-eyed, with a high neck and lordly.

690b-91a. Varuṇa should be worshipped as holding the serpent-rope, yellow-complexioned, seated on a whale, with his consort Kālikā and adorned with gem-set ornaments.

691b-92a. Vāyu should be worshipped as the life of living beings, two-armed, holding a rod and riding a black antelope with his consort Añjanī.

692b-93a. Kubera should be worshipped as riding a horse, holding a pitcher in his hand, two-armed, golden-head, accompanied by his consort Citralekhā and lording over the (semidivine) Yakṣas and Gandharvas.

693b-94a. (Īśāna) should be worshipped as holding the bow Pināka in his hand, seated on the bull, with his consort Gaurī, as the best of all, fair-complexioned with the crescent moon on his crest and with his sacred thread formed by a serpent.

694b-95a. Procedure when march is delayed. In case a king cannot move off immediately for some reason or other, he should (still) make a start along with his flag, weapons, missiles and vehicles (exactly at the auspicious time determined as above).

695b-96a. The place up to which he should march (before stopping) shall be two hundred daṇḍa-measures, or forty or even twelve, (as convenient).

696b-97a. The king should not stay for more than seven days at one place and the others five days. In case of a longer delay (the ceremony of) starting should be made at another (auspicious) lagna (to be determined as before).

697b-98a. If there is untimely rain accompanied by lightning and thunder, or the three types of (major) natural calamities, the king should not move forward for three days.

698b-99. Omens at the time of march. The sounds of ratnakuḍya, she-jackal, crow and pigeon and of ruru, parrot etc. (if heard from) the left and of potaki and the bird bharadvāja from the right (are auspicious).

700. The forest-crow is inauspicious, while four-legged animals on the right are auspicious. And, so is being stared at by a chameleon, but not by one of black colour.

701. Hearing the boar, hare, godhā, cat and serpent being spoken about is auspicious but the sound made by them or seeing them is not auspicious. It is the contrary in the case of the monkey and the bear (which can be seen and heard but not spoken about).

702. The peacock, deer, mongoose, wild, crow and pigeon are auspicious at being seen at the commencement of a journey; the reverse is the case when one returns (home).

703. A corpse, without any mourning, if seen (at the commencement of a journey), will fulfil the objective of the journey. On the other hand, a corpse, accompanied by mourning, seen on the return, will turn one into a corpse.

704-6a. The following, if seen at the time of setting out, will destroy the aim (of the journey) : An outcaste, eunuch, bearded, drunk, vomit, medicine, one bathed in oil, fat, bone, skin, charcoal, diseased, molasses, cotton, salt, threat from an enemy, thirst, serpent, sterile woman, dwarf, saffron-clothed, clean shaven, hungry and the naked.

706b-9. On the other hand, the following seen/heard (at the start of a journey) will fulfil its aim : Blazing fire, horse, throne, brāhmaṇas, unguents, flowers, sanctified rice grain, umbrella, chowrie, swing, king, foodstuff, sugercane, fruits, bengal gram, cooked rice, honey, ghee, curd, cow, bull, fish, flesh, wine, white cloth, sound of conch, flags, courtesans, filled pitchers of water, gem, gold vessel, mirror, the sound of cattle drums, mṛdaṅgas, paṭahas, bells and lutes, and the auspicious chant of the Vedas.

710. If one sees an adverse omen for once, he might remember his personal deity (and proceed); if he sees it for a second time he might worship the brahmins (and proceed); if he sees it for the third) he must return home.

711. Sneezing heard from any side is inauspicious and the sneezing of cows is deadly. However, it is harmless if done by children, old men, diseased persons and persons suffering from cold.

712. Binding on the conqueror. The conqueror who has taken the enemy's capital should not touch another's woman, nor the wealth of brahmins and gods, nor the elephants, and horses, nor the distressed and the disarmed.[129]

RETURN TO THE CAPITAL

713. Occupation of a new residence. The first occupation of a newly built house should be done during the northward course of the Sun and after worshipping and offering oblations to the Building, the previous day.

714. (Occupying the house) during the months of Māgha, Phālguna, Vaiśākha and Jyeṣṭha is auspicious, while it is middling in the months of Mārgaśīrṣa (Saumya) and Kārttika:

715. Occupation (of the house) is auspicious in the asterisms of Mṛgaśiras (Śaśi), Puṣya (Ijya), Revatī, Śatabhiṣak (Varuṇa), Citra (Tvāṣṭra), Anurādhā (Mitra) and the fixed asterisms, (viz., Uttaraphalguni, Uttarāsāḍhā, Uttarabhādrapada and Rohiṇī), (care being taken to see that) Jupiter and Venus are visible (i.e., not set).

716. Occupation is auspicious both during day and night, on week-days other than Sundays and Tuesdays, and tithis other than the empty lunar days (riktā, viz., the 4th, 9th and 14th) and new moon.

717. Thus, at an auspicious time, on an auspicious day, in the forenoon, when both the Moon and the asterisms are strong,[130] in a fixed lagna (i.e., when the 'fixed' signs, Taurus, Leo, Scorpio and Aquarius, are rising), and in a 'fixed' division of that lagna, not affected by deadly indications, characterised by blemishlessness.

718. When the benefic planets occupy the trikoṇas and the kendras, while the others occupy the 3rd, 11th and 6th houses, when the Moon occupies a house other than the 6th and the 8th from lagna.

719. In the birth asterism or birth-sign of the master or when they are in exaltation, the occupation will result in prosperity, otherwise misery and penury will result.

720. The wise man shall enter the charming and attractive house, accompanied by variegated and auspicious sounds (of music and instrumentation), with the Sun on the left and with a pot of water carried in front.

PROGNOSTICATION OF RAIN

721-22a. If (when the possibility of rains is considered) it is the advent of the rainy season, the Moon being in a 'watery sign' (Jala-rāśi)[131], in the kendra if it is the bright fortnight and is aspected by benefic planets, there would be heavy rains. On the other hand, if the aspection (of the Moon) is by malefic planets and if it is summer, there would only be a little rain.

722b. The same will occur also when Venus is characterised by the different things mentioned for the Moon.

723. If in the rainy season, the Moon occupies the seventh house from Venus and is aspected by benefic planets, or in the trikoṇa or 7th house from Saturn, there would be (immediate) rain.

724. Venus will produce immediate rain if it is near Mercury. If, however, the Sun occurs between the two, there would be no rain.

725. Venus in the five asterisms beginning with Maghā (i.e., Maghā, Pūrvaphalgunī, Uttaraphalgunī, Hasta and Citrā) will cause rain, if the three asterisms Svāti, Viśākhā and Anurādhā follow (i.e., in the regular motion of the planet). If otherwise (i.e., in the retrograde motion of the planet), there would be no rains.

726. Planets near the Sun cause rains when they are just before or behind the Sun (in their regular motion), but not in their retrograde motion.

727. Venus coursing on the left will bring about rains if it is moving south. There would be rains in the morning and in the evening as the Sun enters the asterism Ārdrā.

728. There would be increase in vegetation during the twilights (due to rains falling at these times) and there would be prosperity on all counts for people during nights. Light rains will then reduce prices and no rains will increase crops.

729. If there is a division in the rising of Ārdrā, there will, no doubt, be a calamity. If, however, the Moon, Jupiter or Venus is in a kendra, the calamity will not occur.

730. The Sun occupying the asterism Pūrvāṣāḍhā and surrounded by clouds, will cause noticeable rains on all days from Ārdrā to Mūla.

731-32a. If there had been rains on Revatī (Pauṣṇabha), there would be no rains for ten days. If Siṁha is divided, how can there be rains and if Karkaṭa is divided, how can there be no rains. If the rise of Kanyā is divided there would always be plenty of rains.

732b-33a. (Rains in) Uttarabhādrapada are indicative of vegetation in the beginning and Revatī of vegetation in the end. Rains in Bharaṇī are indicative of vegetation throughout, while Aśvinī is indicative of destruction of all vegetation.

733b-34a. When Venus is in the 7th sign ahead of Jupiter, there would be heavy rains, especially if the rainy season is at its height.

734b-35a. If a halo (pariveṣa) occurs around the Moon, extending to seven asterisms (from it), there would be rains, heavily interspersed with lightning and accompanied by the croaking of frogs.

735b-36a. If the clouds in the centre of the sky are inclined towards the west or towards the south, there would be rains shortly.

736b-37a. Cats pawing the ground, encrustations occurring on metal and children building bunds on the pathways are indicative of rains.

737b-38a. Moving rows of ants, profusion of glow-worms, serpents climbing up trees are indicative of (immediate rains).

738b-39a. The Sun and the Moon, at rising or setting, appearing dull or coloured like honey and if there be severe wind at that time, heavy showers would follow, immediately.

(KŪRMAVIBHĀGA : DIVISION OF THE GLOBE)

739b-40a. This land (of India) has been laid out as if divided into nine sections (maṇḍala) and set in a clockwise direction on nine parts (of the body)of a tortoise facing east.

740b-41. The (central) navel region consists of Antarveda and Pāñcāla. The face-region, in the east, is formed by the region forming Magadha and Lāṭa. The (right) fore-leg is formed by Strī-(rājya), Kaliṅga and Kirāta.

742. The (right) flank region consists of Avanti, Drāviḍa and Bhilla. The (right) hind leg region is constituted of by the countries of Gauḍa, Koṅkaṇa, Sālva, Āndhra, and Pauṇḍra.

743. The tail-region is formed by Sindhu, Kāśī, Mahārāṣṭra and Saurāṣṭra. The (left) foot-region consists of Pulinda, Cīna, Yavana and Gūrjara.

744. The (left) flank region is made up of Kuru, Kaśmīra, Mādreya and Matsya. The (left) foreleg region is constituted of by Khasa, Aṅga, Vaṅga, Vālhīka and Kāmboja.[132]

745. In the nine parts commencing with the navel place three asterisms each, beginning with Kṛttikā. When any of these stars is aspected by malefic planets, there would be misery (for the region represented by it), and when aspected by benefic planets, (there would be happiness for the region).

(UTPĀTA : PORTENTUOUS PHENOMENA)

746. (Portentuous phenomena are said to present themselves) when (idols of) deities (in temples) frequently dance, fall and burn; weep, sing, sweat and laugh;

747. Vomit fire, fumes, oil, blood and water; stand upside down and move from place to place.

748. Such freak occurrences seen in the idols of deities (constitute portentuous phenomena). So also are mansions in the air (gandharva-nagara), asterisms becoming visible during day;

749. The fall of a mighty meteor and the raining of twigs, grass and blood, atmospheric smoke in mansions in the air, and earthquake during day or night;

750. Sparks without fire and flames without fuel, rainbow during night, maṇḍūkaśikhara, and white crow;

751. Sparks of fire emanating from cows, elephants, horses and camels, two-headed and three-headed animals being born from unnatural wombs.

752-53a. Mock-suns in the four directions along with the (real) Sun; jackals inhabiting villages; and the appearance of comets; and agitated flock of crows, in the night and pigeons during the day.

753b-54a. So also trees flowering out of time and seen bearing fruits likewise; they should first be cut down by the wise and then rites for averting the evil foretold should be performed.

754b-55a. Many are such portentuous phenomena which are destructive in the different regions. Some bring about death and some others fear from enemies.

755b-56a. An anthill covered with honey (at the nine places, viz.,) the top (and the eight directions from the east) is indicative, respectively, of fear, fame, death, depletion, reputation, happiness, misery, prosperity and loss of wealth.

756b-57a. O great brahmin ! at the occurrence of all such portentuous phenomena, (if of an inauspicious nature), rites for averting evil should be performed with care as specified by the ritual texts.

757b-58. O brahmin ! Thus has been narrated to you the discipline of Jyotiṣa in all its aspects. I shall now set out the exquisite science of metrics.

CHAPTER FIFTYSIX

1. he twelve rāśis or signs, of 30° each, which make up the zodiac (360°) are: (1) Meṣa (Aries); (2) Vṛṣabha (Taurus); (3) Mithuna (Gemini); (4) Karkaṭaka (Cancer); (5) Siṁha (Leo); (6) Kaṇyā (Virgo); (7) Tulā (Libra); (8) Vṛścika (Scorpis); (9) Dhanus (Sagittarius); (10) Makara (Capricorn); (11) Kumbha (Aquarius) and (12) Mīna (Pisces).

2. The twelve months are : (1) Caitra, (2) Vaiśākha, (3) Jyeṣṭha, (4) Āṣāḍha, (5) Śrāvaṇa, (6) Bhādrapada, (7) Āśvina, (8) Kārttika, (9) Mārgaśīrṣa, (10) Pauṣa, (11) Māgha and (12) Phālguna.

3. Very often the asterisms are referred to in the Purāṇa not by their proper names, but by names of the presiding deities of the relevant asterisms. The following table gives the asterisms with the presiding deities noted against each.

Asterisms and their deities

1. Aśvinī—Aśvins	2. Bharaṇī—Yama
3. Kṛttikā—Agni	4. Rohiṇī—Prajāpati
5. Mṛgaśiras—Soma	6. Ārdrā—Rudra
7. Punarvasu—Aditi	8. Puṣya—Bṛhaspati, Ijya or Tiṣya.
9. Āśleṣā—Sarpa, Ahi	10. Maghā—Pitṛs.
11. Pūrva-phalgunī—Bhaga	12. Uttara-phalguni—Aryamā
13. Hasta—Savitā	14. Citrā—Tvaṣṭā
15. Svāti—Vāyu	16. Viśākhā—Indrāgni, Dvideva
17. Anurādhā—Mitra	18. Jyeṣṭhā—Indra
19. Mūla—Nirṛti	20. Pūrva-āṣāḍha—Āpaḥ.
21. Uttara-āṣāḍha—Viśvedevāḥ	22. Śravaṇa—Viṣṇu
23. Dhaniṣṭhā or Śraviṣṭhā—Vasus.	24. Śatabhiṣak—Varuṇa
25. Pūrva-bhādrapada—Aja Ekapād	26. Uttara-bhādrapada—Ahirbudhnya
	27. Revati—Pūṣā.

4. The lines which are corrupt in the Purāṇa are translated according to the parallel texts in the Nāradīya-Saṁhitā, 2. 27-8 (edn. Varanasi, 1905).

5. The conception here is as follows: In the 60-year cycle of Jupiter, let the several years be given the names of the 12 lunar months reckoned from Kārttika. Then, the first four months, Kārttika, Mārgaśīrṣa, Pauṣa and Māgha, will have two constellations each, the fifth month, Phālguna, will have three constellations, the next five months two constellations each and the eleventh and the twelfth months, Śrāvaṇa, Bhādrapada, Āśvina, will have three constellations each, thus completing the circle of 27 constellations. The names of the years mentioned in the following verses refer to the above special connotation.

6. Some portion omitted here by haplography, in the Venkatesvara Press edn. of the Purāṇa is rendered and inserted here from the parallel passage occurring in the Nāradīya Saṁhitā, (edn. Banares, 1905), 2.7.4.

7. The Venk. Press edn. has: "One in the face, two in the anus, three on the head". The emendation is from the parallal passage in the Nāradīya-Saṁhitā (edn. Banares, 1905), 2.8.3.

8. Thus, Nanda days are : I, 6, 11; Bhadrā : 2, 7, 12; Jayā : 3, 8, 13, Riktā : 4, 9, 14 and Pūrṇā : 5, 10, 15.

9-9a. On Vyatipāta and Vaidhṛta see above, ch. 54, verses 174ff.

10. That is, water in which āmalaka (myrobalan) fruit has been boiled, in view of its medical properties.

11. This occurs for the reason that civil days and lunar days are of variable lengths and do not coincide. Thus, when a civil day is $24\frac{1}{2}$ hrs. and the relevant lunar day is 24 hrs. and commences 15 minutes after the civil day, that civil day will contain, in it, three lunar days, the first for the first 15 minutes, the second for 24 hrs. and the third for the last 15 minutes. And, to correlate the lunar days with the civil days, one tithi will have to be expunged. The converse is the case when the lunar day happens to be longer than the civil day, which latter commences a little after the lunar day has commenced.

12. This happens because the lunar day and civil day can commence at different times. A lunar day which has commenced much later than the previous sunset will, naturally, extend to beyond sunset of the relevant civil day and a lunar day which has commenced earlier than the previous sunset will fall short of the next sunset.

13. Laṅkā (not modern Ceylon) is a hypothetical city conceived to be situated on the equator at the zero meridian of Indian astronomy. The time of sunrise at Laṅkā is taken as mean and local time calculated therefrom. On Laṅkā see above ch. 54, Verses 85-87.

14. For a detailed elucidation of the calculation of the lords of the hour and the rationale of the calculation thereof, see Muhūrtacintāmaṇi of Rāma-Daivajña, 1. 55-56, and the com. Pīyūṣadhārā by Govinda Jyotirvid (edn. N. S. Press, Bombay, 1945, pp. 49-50).

14a. For the asterisms comprising these groups, see above, under verses 177-79.

15. On the Lāṅgala-cakra or Halacakra and the citation of authorities in the matter, including the verses of Nārada translated here, see Com. Pīyūṣadhārā by Govinda Jyotirvid on the Muhūrtacintāmaṇi of Rāmadaivajña, (edn. N. S. Press, Bombay, 1945, pp. 73-74). Lāṅgalacakras, with 28 asterisms, including Abhijit, have also been conceived. For the description of such a Cakra, see Narapatijayacaryā, (Kashi Skt. Ser. 205, Varanasi, 1971), pp. 201-02.

16. For details about this serpent diagram and for further authorities in the matter, see the com. Pīyūṣadhārā by Govinda on the Muhūrtacintāmaṇi of Rāmadaivajña, 2. 29 (edn., N. I. Press, Bombay, 1945, pp. 72-73) and Narapatijayacaryā, op. cit., pp. 202-03.

17. The Yoga as noted earlier (see fn. to Ch. 65, verse 124), is a period of variable length, during which the joint motion in longitude of the Sun and the Moon amounts to the span of an asterism in the zodiac, viz., 13° 20'. The 27 yogas contained in 360° are wholly of astrological significance, not astronomical. Being one of the five items (pañcāṅga) the yoga for each day would be specified in the Hindu almanacs.

18. Since 28 yogas are mentioned here, the asterism Abhijit has also to be reckoned along with the accepted 27 asterisms.

19. The reckoning is made thus: Consider the asterism prevailing on the relevant day. Count its number from Aśvinī on Sunday. Mrgaśiras on Monday, etc. The yoga of that number (counted from Ānanda) will be prevailing on that day.

20. The fifteen lunar days are divided into five classes : 1. Nandā : 1, 6, 11; Bhadrā 2, 7,, 12; Jayā 3, 8, 13; Riktā : 4, 9, 14, Pūrṇā: 5, 10, 15. They have effects according to the meanings of the different terms. See above, vv, 136-37.

21. The twelve signs of the zodiac are classified into three: Cara or 'moving', being Meṣa, Karka, Tulā and Makara, sthira or 'fixed', being Vṛṣa, Siṁha, Vṛścika and Kumbha, and dvisvabhāva or double-natured', being Mithuna, Kanyā, Dhanu and Mina.

22. The sign of the Zodiac (which corresponds also to the 'house' and 'mansion' in a horoscopic diagram) which the Moon occupies at the time of one's brith is termed the 'Birth-sign' (janma-rāśi) of the individual concerned. Other signs are counted taking the 'birth-sign', as the first.

23. If a planet is 'affected' (Viddha, 'pierced', i.e., under Vedha) it might turn into a malignant sign even if it had been primarily benefic.

24. The presence of Saturn in the prohibited signs 9, 5, 4 and 12 is tolerated because, being the son of Sun, it would not turn malefic against its own father. The rule is that neither will a son be malignant towards his father nor a father towards his son. The rule is applicable in the cases also of Moon and Mercury, below.

25. The fifteen lunar days (tithis) are classified into five, being Nandā: 1, 6, 11; Bhadrā: 2, 7, 12, Jayā: 3, 8, 13 ; Riktā: 4, 9, 14; and Pūrṇā: 5, 10, 15 each possessing effects according to their nomenclature. See above, vv. 136-37.

26. Parigha is the 19th of the 27 yogas enumerated and described earlier (see ch. 54, verse 124).

27. Viṣṭi is one of the Karaṇa divisions of time, each of the duration of half a lunar day, enumerated and described above (ch. 56, verses 219b-220a.)

28. The planets are classified as Male: Sun, Mars, and Jupiter; Female: Moon and Venus; and Neuter: Mercury and Saturn.

29. Puṁ-savana ('Male production rite') and Sīmantonnayana (parting of the hair) are two Vedic rites performed so that the child born is male and the delivery be safe.

30. The lords of the months of pregnancy are : 1st month: Venus; 2nd, Mars; 3rd Jupiter; 4th, Sun; 5th Moon; 6th Saturn; 7th Mercury; 8th, the lord of the rising sign at the time of conception; 9th Moon; and 10th Sun. Cf., Muhūrtacintāmaṇi of Rāma, 5.9.

31. The male asterisms are: Aśvinī, Bharaṇī, Puṣya, Āśleṣā, Maghā, Uttaraphalguni, Svāti, Viśākhā, Jyeṣṭhā, Mūla, Pūrvāṣāḍha, Uttarāṣāḍha, Śravaṇa and Pūrvabhādrapada.

32. That is, excluding the three further groups, viz., tīkṣṇa ('sharp') ugra ('violent') and miśra ('mixed'). On the classification of the asterisms into seven groups having qualities indicated by their nomenclature, see above, under verses 177-79.

33. Dinakṣaya (Tithikṣaya, 'omitted lunar day', lit. loss of a lunar day) refers to the lunar day which is completely contained within a civil day (the lunar day being shorter than the civil day) and, so, is left out of count. On this, see above, ch. 54, verse 71 and ch. 56 verses 153b-54a and the notes thereon.

34. The Gṛhyasūtras are auxiliary texts appertaining to the different Vedas, prescribing the gṛhya 'household' rituals of an orthodox Hindu, like the five daily sacrifices (mahāyajñas), the sixteen sacraments (ṣoḍaśasaṁskāras) like conception, birth rites, tonsure, upanayana, marriage etc. Each Veda has its own Gṛhyasūtra, which the followers of the different Vedas adopt in performing their rituals.

35. For the asterisms recommended for sowing, see above Verse 186. The asterisms recommended are those of the mṛdu, sthira and kṣipra groups and Maghā, Svāti, Dhaniṣṭhā and Mūla.

36. For this a triple cord is plaited out of the mauñjī or darbha grass and is ceremonially used in three loops round the waist of the boy who is invested with the sacred thread (yajñopavīta) and initiated into Vedic study (upanayana).

37. The Vedāṅgas are auxiliary texts which instruct in the correct recitation and right understanding of the Vedas and prescribe the exact performance and punctual observation of Vedic ritual. Each Veda has its own auxiliary texts which fall into six categories (ṣaḍvedāṅgas dealing respectively with : (1) Śikṣā (Phonetics), (2) Vyākaraṇa (Grammar), (3) Nirukta (Etymology), (4) Chandas (Metrics), (5) Jyotiṣa (Astronomy) and (6) Kalpa (Ritual), divided into three—Gṛhya 'household ritual', Śrauta, sacrificial ritual' and Śulba 'construction of altars'.

38. The lords of the Vedas are: Ṛgveda. : Jupiter, Yajurveda: Venus; Sāmaveda : Mars, and Atharvaveda: Mercury: See above, verse 351.

39. These blemishes are listed in the following verse :

Ulko-pīcalan-oparāga-gulikāḥ ṣaṣṭhā-ṣṭam-āntyendv-asaddiṣṭārūḍhavimuktarāśi-sitadṛk-sāyāhnasandhyādayaḥ / gaṇḍānt-oṣṇa-viṣaṁ sthiraṁ ca karaṇaṁ riktā-ṣṭamī-viṣṭayo lāṭaikārgala-vaidhṛtāhiśirasaḥ sarvatra varjyā amī //

Muhūrtapadavī of Māthūr Nampūtiri (Ed. Panchangam Press, Kunnamakulam (Kerala), 1955), Verse 1.

The days on which these 'blemishes of day' (nityadoṣa) occur should be rejected in fixing the date for any auspicious rite and if they cannot be avoided, due expiation prescribed for obviating the evil effect of each of these blemishes has to be duly performed before commencing the auspicious rite.

These 'blemishes of the day' are: The four blemishes on account of portentuous natural phenomena (utpāta), being : (1) Ulkā (meteor), (2) Urvīcalana (earthquake), (3) Uparāga (eclipse), (4) Gulika; the five blemishes due to the positions of the planets, being (5) Moon in the 6th house, (6) in the 8th house and (7) in the 12th house, (8) Asad-dṛṣṭārūḍhavi-mukta-rāśi (the house which has been aspected, occupied or left by the evil planets viz., Sun, Mars, Saturn and Rāhu, (9) Aspecting by Venus (Sitadṛk); one blemish due to the time of the day, being (10) Sāyāhnasandhyā (dusk); three blemishes due to asterisms, being (11) Gaṇḍānta, (12) Uṣṇa-(śikhā), (13) Viṣa; four blemishes of lunar days (tithi), being (14) Sthira-karaṇa, (15) Riktā, (16) Aṣṭamī and (17) Viṣṭi-(karaṇa); and four blemishes due to the positions of the Sun and the Moon, being (18) Lāṭa, (19) Ekārgala, and (20) Vaidhṛta, and (21) Ahiśiras.

40. The anadhyāya or non-study days are: 1st, 8th, 14th and 15th days of the dark and bright fortnights; 2nd day of Jyeṣṭha, 10th of Āsādha, 4th and 12th of Māgha, all in the bright fortnight; and the days of saṅkrānti, when the Sun transits from one sign to another.

41. Viṣṭi is one of the half-tithi durations of astrological importance into which the lunar month is divided, on which see above, ch. 54, vv. 126-27 and the notes thereon.

42. On Mauñjī-bandhana, an auxiliary ceremony of Upanayana, see above, vv. 348 ff.

43. Prognostication by āya is more commonly made in the case of buildings where the length of the bulding is multiplied by its breadth and the product divided by 8, and the remainders are called āya, on the basis of which future is foretold. Thus, Remainder 1. called Dhvaja foretells, for the master of the house, fame; 2. called Dhūma, sorrow; 3. Siṁha, victory, 4. Śvā, enmity, 5. Vṛṣa, wealth; 6. Gardabha, penury; 7. Gaja, happiness, and 8. Dhvāṅkṣa, illness.

44. Samāvartana means literally 'return', here, 'return of the Vedic student to his own house from his teacher's house after successfully completing his studies. At the ceremony conducted on the occasion, the grass-belt (mauñji) that he would be wearing throughout his studentship is removed and he is given a ritual tonsure (muṇḍana), called generally, go-dāna (go—hair, dāna—cutting), and, thus, prepared for his entering the next stage of life, namely, that of the householder.

45. For the riktā days, see above under verses 126—37a and the notes thereon.

46. On dinakṣaya ('omitted day'), see above vv. 153b—54a and ch. 64, verse 71, and the notes thereon.

47. This half verse which is needed in the context, but which is not to be found in the Venkateswara Press edn. of the Purāṇa, has been restored from the corresponding section of the Nāradīya-Saṁhitā, 27. 4.

48. The odd numbers are considered males and the even numbers female.

49. Of the seven planets, Sun, Mars and Jupiter are males, Moon and Venus are females, and Mercury and Saturn eunuchs.

50. The 'five constituents' (pañca-aṅga) of a day, on the basis of which the nature of the day is determined in Indian astrology, are nakṣatra (asterism), tithi (lunar day in the bright or dark fortnight) vāra (week-day), yoga and karaṇa. Since Indian almanacs mention these five constituents for every day of the year, these almanacs are, by extension, called Pañcāṅgas.

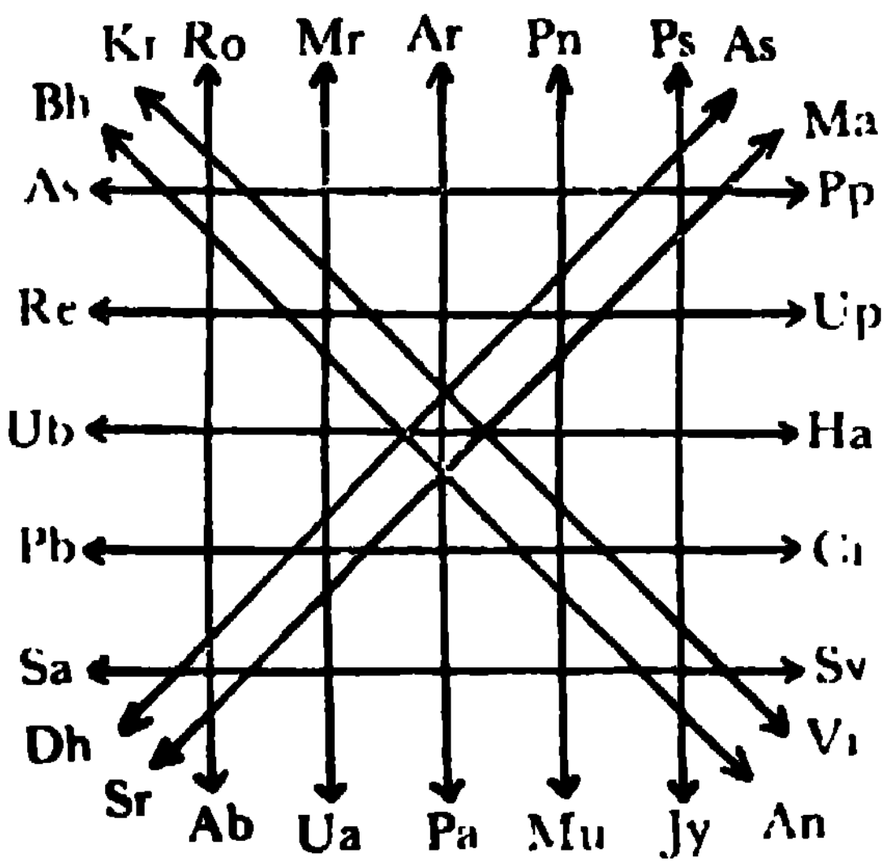
51. It may be noted that Venus rises in the west after its invisibility in its right motion (krama-maudhya) and in the east after its invisibility in its retrograde motion (vakra-maudhya). It may also be noted that since Jupiter moves outside the orbit of the Earth, it becomes invisible only in its right motion, and not in its retrograde motion.

52. The idea is this : The grouping of the Jyeṣṭha month, Jyeṣṭha daughter and Jyeṣṭha son (jyeṣṭha-trayam), is not auspicious in marriage. To marry off a jyeṣṭha daughter or a jyeṣṭha son in the jyeṣṭha month, in which case a group of two jyeṣṭhas is formed, is middling. What is auspicious is to have only one jyeṣṭha at a time. In other words, it would be auspicious to marry off the eldest daughter and an eldest son separately and in months other than Jyeṣṭha.

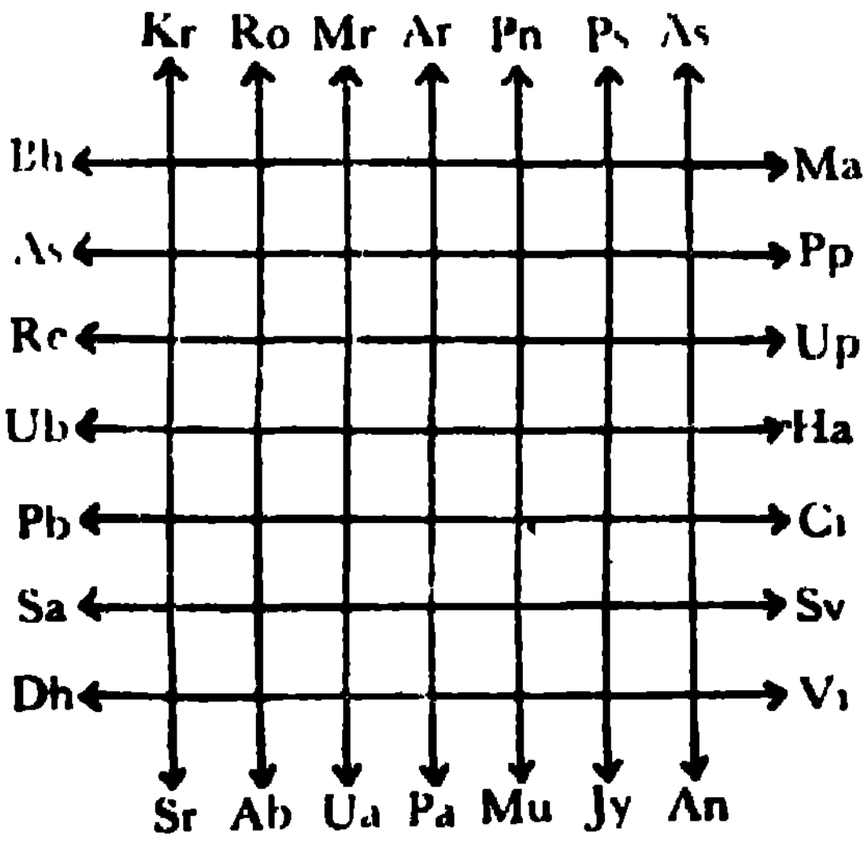
53. On these days, see above verses 153b-54a and the notes thereon.

54. On Vyatīpāta and Vaidhṛti and Parigha, being the 17th, 19th and 23rd of the 27 yogas, see above, ch. 54 verse 124.

54a. Vedha (lit. 'piercing', viddha 'pierced') refers to the mutual affliction between pairs of asterisms that happen to be at the ends of the lines in the Pañca-śalākā-cakra (five-spike-diagram) and Sapta-śalākā-cakra ('seven-spike-diagram') which might be represented as follows:—



Pañca-Śalākā-Vedha-Cakra



Sapta-Śalākā-Vedha-Cakra

In the first diagram, asterisms such as Aśvini and Pūrvāṣāḍhā and Bharaṇī and Anurādhā, and in the second diagram Bharaṇī and Maghā, and Kṛttikā, and Śravaṇa are mutually afflicted. The former 'affliction' is to be considered for the entrance of the bride into the groom's house, offer and acceptance of the bride and marriage, and the latter for other allied rituals.

55. The planets, on account of certain positions in the heavens, and the 'houses' (bhāvas) on account of their being occupied or aspected by certain planets acquire certain sources of strength and weakness, called graha-bala 'planetary potency' and bhāva-bala, 'potency of the house'.

56. Gocara See above, under vv. 271-82. for prediction based on Gocara see Ch. 34, 'Gocara or Results of transits' in B. V. Raman, Hindu Predictive Astrology, Bangalore, 7th edn., 1054.

57. Vedha, see above, verse 426.

58. Aṣṭavarga or Aṣṭakavarga refers to the eight sources of energy which each of the seven planets and the ascendent (lagna) as the eighth attain as a result of its own transit from rāśi to rāśi and its being aspected by the other seven. For details see Ch. 18. The Aṣṭakavarga system: Strength for transiting planets, in B. V. Raman, Hindu Predictive Astrology, (Bangalore, 7th edn., 1959).

59. Rūpa forms the unit of measuring the potency of planets and houses.

60. By Horā is meant the strength of the 'planetary hour'. Each hour of a week-day is governed by a different planet in a certain order, the first hour being governed by the lord of the day. On 'Planetary hours' and a table thereof, see B. V. Raman, Muhūrta or Electional Astrology, Bangalore, 2nd edn , 1954, pp. 215-16.

61. Drekkāṇa (decanate)). The zodiac of 360° is divided into 36 drekkāṇas, each extending the 10°. Thus, each sign will contain three drekkāṇas. On this see Ch. 36. 'Drekkāṇas and stellar influences', in B. V. Raman, Hindu Predictive Astrology. Bangalore, 7th edn. 1959.

62. Navāṁśa is the division of the sign (30°) into 9 parts, each extending to 31/3°. This corresponds to one-fourth of an asterism (13 1/2°). Thus the total number of navāṁśas in the zodiac or 27 asterisms, would be 108.

63. When a sign (30°) is divided into 12 parts, each part is called a dvādaśāṁśa ś(2 1/2°).

64. Triṁśāṁśa is the division of the sign when it is divided by thirty, each division being 1°.

56. The Jāmitra-doṣa occurs when the seventh house from lagna or the Moon is occupied by any planet. For marriage the house should be vacant.

66. For an account of these blemishes, see B. V. Raman, Muhūrta or Electional Astrology, (Bangalore, 2nd Edn , 1954) Ch. 5 'Special adverse Yogas and their neutralisation'.

67. The reference is to the Pañcaka, being five sources of energy pertaining to a particular moment, known as Agni, Roga, Cora, Mṛtyu and Rāja. The numbers of the tithi, vāra, nakṣatra and lagna prevailing at the moment under consideration are added up and divided by 9. If the remainder is 1, it is Mṛtyu-Pañcaka, indicative of danger; if 2. Agni, indicative of risk of fire; if 4. Rāja, bad results; if 6. Cora, evil happenings; and if 8. disease. Remainders 0, 3, 5 and 7 are niṣpañcakas, free from the blemish of Pañcaka, and so such moments are auspicious.

68. The Ṣaḍvarga is a group of six independent divisions of the zodiac and the day, each being used differently to read the future. The six vargas are : Rāśi, Horā, Drekkāṇa, Navāṁśa, Dvādaśāṁśa and Triṁśāṁśa, the second being a division of the day and the others of the Zodiac, prognostications being made in a different way for each. (For details, see B. V. Raman, Hindu Predictive Astrology, op. cit., pp. 92-97).

69. On the classification of the lunar days into Nandā, Bhadrā, Jayā, Riktā and Pūrṇā, see above, under verse 136.

70. Upacaya is a term for the 3rd, 6th, 10th and 11th signs from the lagna.

71. The muhūrta referred to here is the time-measure of 2 nāḍikās (48 minutes.). The muhūrtas to be rejected in the seven week-days are: On Sunday, the 14th; Monday 8th and 12th; Tuesday, 4th and 11th; Wednesday (the muhūrta called Abhijit); Thursday, 12th and 13th; Friday, 4th and 8th and Saturday, 1st and 2nd, as reckoned from sunrise on the several days.

72. Tuesdays and Saturdays are to be invariably avoided for marriages.

73. On Ekārgala see above, under verses 214b-218a.

74. On Vedha 'Affliction' add viddha 'afflicted', in relation to asterism, see above, note under verse 426.

75. Pañcagavya (a mixture of five products of the cow, being milk, curd, ghee, urine and dung), is used as a holy liquid for the religious bathing of idols during worship.

76. Vargottama-navāṁśakas. Of the navāṁśakas, the first navāṁśaka in a sthira-rāśi, the fifth in a cara-rāśi and the ninth in a dvisvabhāva-rāśi are especially benefic and so are called vargottama-navāṁśakas. On navāṁśaka, see above note under verse 430 and on the division of the rāśis as sthira etc., see above under verse 430b.

77. On Vaidhṛti, see above, under ch. 64, verses 174 ff.

78. The kendra (quadrant) positions in a 12-member chart are the 1st, 4th, 7th and 10th.

79. For the diagram, see above, under verse 426.

80. 'Lame' : Kumbha (Aquarius) during day time and Mina (Pisces) during night.

'Blind' : Siṁha (Leo), Aja (Aries) and Vṛṣa (Taurus) during daytime and Kanyā (Virgo), Mithuna (Gemini) and Karkaṭa (Cancer) during night. 'Deaf' : Tulā (Libra) and Vṛścika (Scorpio) during day and Makara (Capricorn) and Dhanus (Sagittarius) during night.

81. These are called kūṭa-s.

82. The 27 asterisms are divided into three gaṇas (groups), called respectively, Daiva (divine), Mānuṣa (human) and Rākṣasa (demoniac), the persons born on the different asterisms possessing the innate qualities expressed by these terms. The agreement in gaṇa indicates compatability in temperament between the couple.

83. Yoni-kūṭa indicates sexual compatibility.

84. Varṇa (caste) is indicative of the spiritual and egoistic development in a person.

85. This would mean that, Aries, Leo and Sagittarius are Kṣatriyas, Taurus, Virgo and Capricorn are Vaiśyas, and Gemini, Libra and Aquarius are Śūdras.

86. Conversely if the caste of male's rāśi is the same or higher than that of the female's rāśi, it is auspicious.

87. The translation here does not follow the textual verses. Rajju or Nāḍī Kūṭa is extremely important in matching horoscopes, for it indicates the compatibility in physiological and hereditory temperaments. the three columns, shown below, represent the three humours (nāḍī-s), Vāta, Pitta and Kapha :

Vāta	Pitta	Kapha
Aśvinī	Bharani	Kṛttikā
Ardrā	Mrgaśiras	Rohiṇī
Punarvasu	Puṣya	Āśleṣā
Uttaraphal.	Pūrva-phal.	Maghā
Hasta	Citrā	Svāti
Jyeṣṭhā	Anurādhā	Viśākhā
Mūla	Pūrva-āṣā.	Uttara-āṣā.
Satabhiṣak.	Dhaniṣṭhā	Śravaṇa
Pūrvabhādra	Uttarabhādra:	Revati

Persons of the same humour (nāḍī) would not be mutually compatible, especially those under the Pitta humour.

88. Three lines are left out in the Venk. Press edn. of the NP. Their rendering is added here from the corresponding verses in the Nārada-Saṁhitā, 27. 141-42.

89. This muhūrta is called Godhūlikā because it occurs at dusk when cows return home from pasture, happy and expectant, running and raising a cloud of dust.

90. The reference is to the complete uprooting by Śiva of the three demoniac cities (Tripura) with a single shot of His arrow. For the story and references, see Puranic Encyclopaedia, pp. 793-94.

91. Gaṇḍa, Lit. 'neck' which is the junction of the head and the body, is of different kinds, e.g., the junction of the asterisms, tithis, lagna, yogas, karaṇas, years, ayanas, seasons, months, fortnights, days and nights. Some of these, specified in astrological texts, are extremely inauspicious and it is these that are referred to here. On Gaṇḍa see also above, verses 448-50a.

92. Atiśukra (Pratiśukra) or 'journey opposed to Venus' will occur if Venus appears in the sky opposite or to the south of the direction in which the bridal party has to travel.

93. On Pañcaka, see above under verse 441.

94. For the method to determine the directions, see above ch. 64, vv. 128-31.

95. The ṣaḍvarga is primarily the divisions of the circle, viz., Rāśi, Horā, Drekkāṇa, Navāṁśa, Dvādaśāṁśa and Triṁśāṁśa. See note under verse 430b, above.

96. On this see Bṛhatsaṁhitā, of Varāhamihira, 53. 42 ff.

97. On the bloodvessels (śirā) and vital points (marmasandhī). see Bṛhatsaṁhitā, op. cit., 53. 63-65.

98. Thus, (1, 5) eagle and serpent, (2, 6) cat and rat, (3, 7) lion and elephant, (4, 8) dog and deer are enemies by nature.

It is stated elsewhere that these vargas have the values, called śaras ('arrows') respectively, as (1) 8, (2) 5, (3) 6, (4) 4, (5) 7, (6) 1, (7) 3 and (8) 2 (Narapati-jayacaryā - Svarodaya by Narapati (Kashi Skt. Ser., No. 205, Varanasi, 1971, p. 271). These numbers are used as the basis for different types of computations for the prognostication of different matters. These numbers have been used for the calculations in the next two verses of the Purāṇa.

pa-varga 1 Rat	ya-varga 3 Elephant	śa-varga 4 Deer
ta-varja 7 Serpent		a-varga 8 Eagle
ṭa-varja 4 Dog	ca-varga 6 Lion	ka-varga 5 Cat

99. The Varga of the village and that of the owner are found by adding up the values of the individual consonants and the vowels in their names. Thus, if Gokula is the name of the village, its varga would be 5+8—5—8—3—8=37. For an owner by name Rāma, the varga would be 3—8—1+8=20. The respective remainders, on dividing the vargas are 5 and 4. Since 5 is greater than 4, Gokula will not be suitable for Rāma to construct his residence.

100. For a further reading on the basis of these varga-numbers, see below, verses 589b-60a, and the notes thereon.

101. Different calculations the adopted in this behalf. For some of these, see Muhūrtacintāmaṇi, op. cit, 12. 3-4 (pp. 415-17) 12. 11-12 (pp. 422-24).

102. On ṣaḍvarga, see above, under verse 430b.

103. On the classification of the asterisms, see above, verses 177-79.

104. This method, called Chandaḥ-prastāra or Chandaś-citi, has been set out both in mathematical texts like Bhāskara's Līlāvatī, Gaṇitapāśavyavahāra, 261-66, Edn. K. V. Sarma, op. cit., pp. 459-64 and Kedārabhaṭṭa's Vṛttaratnākara (6. 1-8). Thus, the prastāra for the 6-lettered foot of the Gāyatrī metre would be given by the arrangement of the syllables as 6/1, 5/2, 4/3, 3/4, 2/5, 1/6, giving the results 6, 15, 20, 15, 6, 1, respectively, when one long syllable, two long syllables etc. occur, making a total of 63. When the single case with all short syllables is added, the total possible number of arrangements of the letters would be 64.

105. The allocation of the rooms in the sixteen directions differs, to some extent, in the different texts. For the different authorities on the subject, see Muhūrtacintāmaṇi, op cit., 12. 21, pp. 432-33.

106. This verse which does not have any significance here, should actually come after verse 562, being a continuation of the subject of Digvarga-yoni, making use of the Varga-numbers. For this continuity, see Narapati-jayacaryāsvarodaya, op. cit., pp. 271-73, where readings are made on the basis of these birds, beasts, etc. in the Āyacakra.

107. Dhvaja, gaja, vṛṣa, etc. are comparative measures derived by dividing the area of a building by eight. The divisions are used for various other purposes. On this see Muhūrtacintāmaṇi, op, cit, 12. 4-5, pp. 417-18.

108. The distribution of the deities in the 81-square diagram (Vāstu-cakra) might be represented thus :

109. The reference is to the ghuṇākṣara-nyāya, the instance of the mark of gnawing of a worm on a piece of wood resembling a letter, by chance.

110. These are branches of astrology for the prediction of future events on the basis of Praśna or questions articulated by an enquirer, and the time, manner and circumstances under which they are put. Nimitta or omenology relates to prognostication based on natural and other phenomena at the time under consideration.

111. This travel diagram (Yātrā-cakra) could be represented as follows:

112. The dig-rāśis reckoned in this manner would be : East: Meṣa, Siṁha and Dhanu; South : Vṛṣabha, Kanyā and Makara; West : Mithuna, Tulā and Kumbha; and North : Karka, Vṛścika and Mina.

113. A lalāṭikā-yoga would occur if the lord of the direction which a traveller takes, occupies certain specified house in relation to the lagna at the time at which the journey is commenced.

114. This information which is necessary here, but is omitted in the Nārada Purāṇa is taken from elsewhere.

115. Since the motions(ayana)of the Sun and the Moon are only towards the north and the South of the Zodiac, while the cardinal directions include also east and west, it is explained in astrological texts that 'north' takes in also east, and 'south' takes in also west.

116. The twelve signs (rāśis)are classified into three types in consideration of the posture presented by the figures of the animals etc. in which they appear, as upright, inverted etc. Thus, the Śīrṣoday-rāśis (signs rising with the head up, i.e. upright) are : Leo, Virgo, Libra, Scorpio and Aquarius. The Pṛṣṭhodaya-rāśis(signs rising with their hind parts, i.e., inverted) are : Aries, Taurus, Cancer, sagittarius and Capricorn. The Ubhayodaya-rāśis (signs of a combined nature)are Pisces and Gemini.

117. In the classification of the signs on diverse bases, the 'watery' signs are Cancer, the latter half of Capricorn and Pisces.

118. The twelve 'houses' are given below under their better-known designations, with those aspects of man's life to which they are related:

1. Tanu-bhāva (Body, build, appearance).
2. Dhana-bhāva (Wealth, property, family, vision, relatives).
3. Bhrāṭṛ-bhāva (Brothers, intelligence, strength, help, army).
4. Sukha-Bhāva (Happiness, vehicles, education, friends, residence).
5. Putra-bhāva (Children, fame, pregnancy).
6. Śatru-bhāva (Enemy, debts, disease, misery).
7. Kalatra-bhāva (Wife or husband, death, gambling).
8. Āyur-bhāva (Longevity, gifts, intrigues, war, victory and defeat).
9. Dharma-bhāva (Piety, god, teacher, father, travels, fortune).
10. Karma-bhāva (Occupation, Philosophical bent, activity).
11. Āya-Bhāva (Income, profits, gains).
12. Vyaya-Bhāva (Expenditure, loss, salvation).

119. These five aspects of a day are its tithi (lunar day), vāra (week day), nakṣatra (asterism), yoga and karaṇa (see above notes on cha. 54, vv 124-27). A day is declared as pañcāṅga-śuddha (pure in relation to its five aspects). When these, individually, are in combination, are blemishless.

120. The reference is to the episode in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa (Skandha 10) describing how Lord Kṛṣṇa (Keśava) residing in Gokula during his childhood, destroyed the demoness Pūtanā who had been sent out by king Kaṁsa to kill him.

121. The episode of god Śiva destroying three demonic cities, Tripuras, and the three demons occupying them, with the shooting of a single arrow from his bow, forms the basis of a lengthy episode described in the Padma-Purāṇa, chs. 13-14, and 33-34, Bhāgavata, Sk. 7, chs. 31-34.

122. For a detailed account of the devastation of the world by the demon Tāraka and the destruction of that demon by Kumāra (God Skanda) born of the union of God Śiva and goddess Pārvatī, daughter of Himavān, see Skanda Purāṇa, Sambhava-Khaṇḍa, Mahābhārata, Vanaparva, ch. 223 Anuśāsana-parva, ch. 85, Vālmīki-Rām, Bāla. ch. 36. The episode forms the basis of Kumārasambhava, a long poem in Sanskrit by Kālidāsa.

123. On the efficacy of this five-syllabled mantra, na-maś-śi-vā-ya, 'obeisance to Lord Śiva', see the section on Pañcākṣaramāhātmya, in the Śivapurāṇa, Vāyavīya-saṁhitā, Chs. 82-84.

124. The Vargottamāṁśa-s, being the most effective section in the navāṁśa-division of the rāśis are the following : (1) The first navāṁśa in the case of the 'Moveable signs' (cara-rāśis), viz., Aries, Cancer, Libra and Capricorn; (2) the fifth navāṁśa in the case of the 'Fixed signs' (sthira-rāśis), viz., Taurus, Leo, Scorpio and Aquarius, and (3) the ninth navāṁśa in the case of the 'Double-natured signs' Dvisvabhāva rāśis), viz., Gemini, Virgo, Sagittarius and Pisces.

125. There are several episodes in the Purāṇas to vindicate the efficacy of uttering the name of Hari (Viṣṇu). For example, see the story of Ajāmila, the depraved brāhmaṇa who gained salvation at the utterance of the name of Viṣṇu (Bhāgavata P. Sk. 8, Ch. 1).

226. On Indra's cutting of the wings of the destructive flying mountains cf., the episode narrated by Mt. Maināka to Hanumān, Vālmīki-Rāmāyaṇa, Sundarakāṇḍa, ch. 1.

127. On the episode of Bhagīratha, king of the solar dynasty, bringing the divine Ganges down to the earth to resurrect his ancestors and the river getting the appellation Bhāgīrathī on that account, see Mahābhārata, Vanaparva, ch. 108; Vālmīki-Rāmāyaṇa, Bāla. Canto 42; Brahmāṇḍa P. ch. 91; Padma P. Pt. 4, Ch. 21.

128. It may be noted that the prescription is for the 28-cycle of asterisms, including Abhijit, it being number 22 in the list.

129. It is worth while to note the ideals of chivalry and non-injury advocated by the Purāṇa in this verse which restricts a conquerer from indulging in pillage, plunder and insult. More explicit is the injunction of the Varāha-Purāṇa which says: "The distressed, the frightened, the disarmed, the fleeing and those who have surrendered with grass in their mouths, those with broken arms and those who have got down from their horses and elephants—these should not be killed nor tortured. The lone heir to the family, those who have surrendered, with folded hands, saying. "I am yours', should not be attacked and those (like sages), children, and those protected by women should not be killed nor tortured."

CHAPTER FIFTYSEVEN

The Description of Prosody

Sanandana said :

1. Metres are of two varieties: (1) those of the Vedas (2) those of secular or classical literature. Again metres can be divided into two classes: Mātrā-Vṛtta—a metre regulated by the number of prosodial instants in it and (2) a metre regulated by number of syllables it contains.

2. MA and YA (standing for Magaṇa and Yagaṇa. These and others are explained in later verses,) RA and SA, TA and JA, BHA and NA, the GURU (i.e. long) and the LAGHU (short), O Brāhmaṇa, these are said to be the basis in prosody as explained by experts in the science of Prosody.

3. Magaṇa is that set of three syllables where all are long ones (— — — Mollosus). Yagaṇa is that set of three syllables where the first syllable is short (v — — Bacchius). The Ragaṇa is that set of three syllables), in which the middle one is short (— v — Amphimacer), and the Sagaṇa is that set of three syllables in which the last one is long (vv—Anapestus).

4. The Tagaṇa is that set in which the last one is short (— — v Antibacchius). The Jagaṇa is that set of three syllables in which the middle one is long (v—v Amphibrachys) and the Bhagaṇa is that set of three syllables in which the first one is long (—v v Dactylus.) The Nagaṇa is said to consist of three short syllables (v v v Tribrachys). O sage, the Gaṇas or sets of syllables contain three in each.

5-6. Five Gaṇas are mentioned with four short syllables. They are admitted in the Āryā and other metres. If a conjunct consonant, the aspirate Visarga or the Anusvāra comes after a short syllable that short syllable is considered to be prosodially long. The abbreviated term for a long syllable is GU and that for a short syllable is LA. A fourth of a verse is called a Pāda (foot). A break in the middle is called a Yati (Caesura).

7. O Nārada. a Vṛtta (metre) is classified into three : Sama, Ardhasama and Viṣama. If all the four feet have the same characteristics, the metre is called Sama.

8. If the first and the third feet have one set of characteristics (i.e. combination and arrangement of the Gaṇas) and the second and the fourth feet have another set of characteristics, the metre is called Ardhasama. If all the four feet have different characteristics it is called Viṣama.

9. There are verses with one syllable in each foot. This number is increased one by one upto twentysix syllables. Each one thus constitutes a separate metre.

10. Beyond that the metres evolved are called Daṇḍakas the first of which is Caṇḍavṛṣṭi Prapāta. If each verse consists of three feet or six feet it is called a Gāthā. Now listen to the names of the metres in order.

11-13.

Name of the metre	No. of syllables in each foot
Uktā	One
Atyuktā	Two
Madhyā	Three
Pratiṣṭhā	Four
Supratiṣṭhā	Five
Gāyatri	Six
Uṣṇik	Seven
Anuṣṭubh	Eight
Bṛhati	Nine
Paṅkti	Ten
Triṣṭubh	Eleven
Jagati	Twelve
Atijagati	Thirteen
Śakvari	Fourteen
Atiśakvari	Fifteen
Aṣṭi	Sixteen
Atyaṣṭi	Seventeen
Dhṛti	Eighteen
Vidhṛti (? Atidhṛti)	Nineteen
Kṛti	Twenty
Prakṛti	Twentyone
Ākṛti	Twentytwo
Vikṛti	Twentythree

Saṁkṛti (? Saṁskṛti)	Twentyfour
Atikṛti	Twentyfive
Utkṛti	Twentysix

14-15. These are the names of the different metres. By means of Prastāra[1] they may have many combinations. In the Prastāra for each metre, first take one foot with all long syllables. Beneath the first long syllable put a short syllable. All the remaining syllables must be as they are above. In the next line do like-wise until all of them become short.

16-20. (These verses form a group requiring arithmetical calculations. An explanatory translation with illustrations is necessary in stead of a literal one. Here Prastāra, Naṣṭa, Uddiṣṭa, Ekadvyādi-la-ga-kriyā, Saṅkhyāna and Adhva-yoga are the technical terms in Sk. Prosody.[2] These are retained as the explanation of these terms will be more useful than their word-to-word rendering.)

Prastāra means "A representation or enumeration of all the possible combinations of certain given numbers or of short or long syllables in a metre". If a Prastāra is Naṣṭa (lost) and needs ascertainment of the 'lost' Vṛtta, the procedure is called Naṣṭa-prtayaya. The variety (Bheda) of Prastāra is determined in the following way:

If the Naṣṭa number be even, one should record a Laghu (v) for it. The number is to be halved and if it be still even, one is to record another Laghu (v) for it. If the Naṣṭa number is odd (not divisible by 2), record a Guru (—) for it. Add one to that odd number and divide it half. If that number be uneven, record a Guru (—) for it. This should be continued till the number of syllables in that foot is completed.[3]

If the type or Bheda of a Prastāra is known but not the number of its variety Uddiṣṭāṅka), it is ascertained as follows:

In the Uddiṣṭa, there are signs of Laghu and Guru (in a certain arrangement). One should write the number 1 over the head of the first syllable and go on doubling the numbers over the heads of the subsequent syllables. One should add number 1 to the number above the Laghu (v) syllable and that is the number of the Uddiṣṭa or variety of that Prastāra.

(For example: We want to know the number of a variety of a four-syllabled metre with the following distribution of Laghu-Guru syllables in its metrical foot:

1	2	4	8
Guru	Guru	Guru	Laghu/

As the number 8 is above the head of Laghu, we should add 1 to it. And 8 + 1 = 9 is the Uddiṣṭāṅka of the variety of the metre.)

The next two processes are a bit complicated. But briefly they are as follows:)

Eka-dvyādi-la-ga-kriyā is the method of ascertaining the complete number of Prastāras of a particular Chanda. It is called calculation or Saṅkhyāna. We hereby know the number of Laghus and Gurus in a Prastāra. Thus in a Prastāra of a metre with four-syllabled foot, there will be the following varieties:

	No.
(1) All the four syllables Laghu . . .	1
(2) One Guru + three Laghu syllables . . .	4
(3) Two Gurus + Two Laghus . . .	6
(4) Three Gurus + One Laghu . . .	4
(5) All four Guru Syllables . . .	1
Total : 16 Vṛttas

Thus 16 is the total number of Prastāras according to the Saṅkhyāna.

This total can be arrived at by adding one to the Uddiṣṭāṅka. As noted above the numbers of Uddiṣṭas are: 1+2+4+8 = 15 + 1 = 16

By deducting one from doubling the number of Prastāra is also called Adhva by the wise people.[4]

21. O sage ! I have lightly indicated to you the characteristics of Chandas Śāstra (the Science of Prosody). The details of subtle varieties of Prastāras are infinite.

CHAPTER FIFTYSEVEN

1. Prastāra—A tabular representation of the long (Dīrgha) and short (Laghu) syllables of a metre with all possible varieties.

2. Prastāro naṣṭam uddiṣṭam eka-dvyādi-la-ga-kriyāḥ /
Saṅkhyānam adhva-yogaś ca ṣaḍ ete pratyuyāḥ smṛtāḥ //
—Vṛtta-Ratnākara VI-I.

3. For example : The 6th type of a four-syllabled (footed) metre will give us the arrangement of the syllables in its foot as follows:

Now the number 6 is even, so it is to be marked as Laghu (v). Its half: 6/2=3, an odd number and hence is to be marked as Guru (–). No. 3 being an odd number 1 is to be added and the total is to be divided by 2. It is $\frac{3\times1}{2}$= 2. This being an even number is to be noted as a Laghu (v). Further this 2/2=1 which is an odd number and should be marked as a Guru (–).

Thus this 6th variety of a four-syllabled metrical foot will be : Laghu-Guru-Laghu-Guru as the arrangement of syllables per foot.

4. These last 5 verses of this Chapter of the NP. are the same as those in Kedāra Bhaṭṭa's Vṛtta Ratnākara. It appears that both NP. and Kedāra Bhaṭṭa used a common source. For the interpretation of above verses, I have used the Comm. Vṛtta-ratnākara-pañcikā on Vṛtta Ratnākara by the Simhali scholar Śilaskandha Mahā Sthavira (Nirnaya Sagar Edt., 1908).

CHAPTER FIFTYEIGHT

*Śuka's Temptation

Nārada submitted:

1. When there was a reference to the term Anūcāna (well-versedness in Vedas) all the Vedāṅgas (ancillaries to the Vedas) were heard (by me) from your lotus-like mouth (as they were being explained) partially in brief and partially in details.

2a. Narrate to me in details the (story of) the birth of Śuka, O highly intelligent sage.

Sanandana narrated:

2b-3. It is reported that formerly, on one occasion, on the peak of mount Meru, in an extensive forest of Karṇikāra trees, Lord Mahādeva accompanied by multitudes of terrible goblins sported himself. The daughter of the Lord of mountains, goddess Pārvatī, was also there with them.

4-5a. The holy sage Vyāsa (Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana) performed a divine penance there. He was devoted to the practice of Yoga. By dint of his yogic power, he entered (withdrew) in the soul and performed Dhāraṇā. That excellent-most sage performed those austerities for the sake of a son.

5b-7a. "May my son have the virility of Fire, Earth, Wind and Ether all round†". With this solemn vow of performance of penance, he practised severe austerities and sought after the Lord of gods who is impossible to be attained by persons who are not self-possessed.

7b-8a. It is reported that the powerful sage stood for one hundred years, subsisting on the air only, and pro-

† For abhitaḥ of the NP. aṁbhasaḥ would be a better reading as the puissance of five Mahābhūtas is desired. The Mbh. also includes 'water' in the list of Mahābhūtas whose strength is requested.

pitiated the multi-formed great god (Mahādeva), the consort of Umā.

8b-12a. There were (in attendance) all Brāhmanical sages, heavenly sages, guardians of the worlds, demigods like Sādhyas, along with eight (twelve) Ādityas, Rudras, the Sun god and the Moon god, Gandharva (king) Viśvāvasu, Siddhas, bevis of divine damsels. There the great god Rudra, wearing an auspicious garland of Karṇikāra flowers, shone like the Moon in the autumn.

12b-13a. It was surprisingly mysterious to all the three worlds that his (Vyāsa's) complexion did not fade nor exhaustion overcame him.

13b-14a. As he, of immeasurable splendour, was absorbed in Yoga, the locks of his matted hair due to his splendour appeared to glisten like the blazing flames of fire.

14b-15. O Nārada ! Pleased at heart with this type of penance and such devotion of the sage, the great god Mahādeva made up his mind (to bestow favour on him) and the three-eyed Lord spoke to him smilingly.

16. "Your son shall be as pure as the Fire, as the Wind, as the Earth, as the Water and as the Sky.

17. He will be the partaker of consciousness of himself being the Brahman; his intelligence and mind shall be concentrated on the Brahman; he shall be permanently established in the Brahman. By dint of his (Brahmanic) splendour, he will be renowned all over the three worlds."

18. After having obtained that excellent boon from the Lord, Vyāsa, the son of Satyavatī, was one day engaged in churning the sacrificial sticks, with the desire of making a fire (for sacrificial purpose).

19. At that time, the illustrious sage happened to see a heavenly damsel called Ghṛtācī who, in consequence of her brilliant splendour, possessed excellent beauty.

20. Seeing that celestial damsel, in that forest, the great sage Vyāsa became instantly passionately enamoured of her.

21. After making Vyāsa deeply agitated with passion, the most beautiful Ghṛtācī, transforming herself into a she-parrot, approached him.

22. Even after seeing the celestial lady disguised in another form, he was overcome with cupid (passionate love) who spread in every part of his body.

23. With great (moral) courage, the sage tried to restrain his passion. But his mind being extremely agitated, Vyāsa was unable to control it.

24-25. Due to the inevitability of Destiny (lit. what was to happen) the heart of the sage was fascinated by the (beautiful) form (of Ghṛtācī). With the desire to do this (viz. the kindling of fire) while he was suppressing his passion with special efforts, all of a sudden his semen fell on the churning sticks. It was thus that the great ascetic Śuka was born, while Vyāsa continued the churning of sacrificial sticks.

26-27. The foremost of sages, the great Yogī, was (thus) born of (lit. from the womb of) two (sacrificial) churning sticks. Just as a blazing sacrificial fire after being fed with oblations of ghee, sheds his effulgence all around, in the same way Śuka was born as if blazing with his brilliance, assuming a wonderfully beautiful form and excellent, unsurpassable complexion, O, foremost of Brāhmaṇas.

28.* The Gaṅgā, the greatest of all rivers, assumed her (godly) form and coming to the top of the Meru bathed Śuka (with her own waters after his birth), O Nārada.

29. There fell from the sky to the ground a deer-skin garment for Śuka (to wear it). The Gandharvas constantly performed their musical concerts and the various groups of celestial nymphs indulged in dances.

30-31a. High sounding heavenly kettle-drums began to beat lustily. Gandharva Viśvāvasu, Nārada and Tumburu, and the pair of Gandharvas Hāhā and Hūhū eulogised the nativity of Śuka.

31b-33a. There arrived the regents of different worlds of whom Indra was the leader, and gods, heavenly sages and Brahmanical sages as well. And the wind-god showered all varieties of heavenly flowers. (In this manner) all the world, the mobile and immobile, became highly delighted.

33b-34a. The highly resplendent, noble-souled god Mahādeva along with the goddess Umā performed with due formalities the ceremony of investiture of thread of the sage's son (i.e. Śuka) as soon as he was born.

34b-36a. To him gifted Indra, the Lord of gods, a wonderful-looking heavenly water-pot (Kamaṇḍalu) out of love and gods gave him clothes. Thousands of swans, peacocks, cranes, parrots and blue jays hovered around him clockwise, O Nārada.

36b-37a. The highly intelligent great sage, having obtained his divine nativity from the two sacrificial sticks, stayed there, observing his holy vows with great attention.

37b-38a. As soon as he was born, the Vedas with all their esoteric secrets and all their abstracts, approached him for dwelling in him even as they approached his father.

38b-39a. Although he was conversant with Vedas, Vedāṅgas (accessories of the Vedas) together with their commentaries he remembering that it was his duty (to have a guru, as per ancient religious practice), selected Bṛhaspati as his preceptor, O prominent Brāhmaṇa.

39b-40. Having studied all the Vedas along with their mysteries and abstracts as well as Itihāsa (History, like the Mahābhārata) and all the sciences and scriptural texts based on the Vedas, the great sage paid his tuition-fees to his preceptor and performed the rite of Samāvartana (the formal conclusion of the life as a religious student).

41-42a. Observing the vow of celibacy, he, with great concentration, began to perform severe austerities. Even though he was a child, the great ascetic became worthy of being honoured and consulted due to his knowledge and penance.

42b-43. The mind (intelligence) of Śuka who was the observer of the path leading to Emancipation (from the cycle of Saṁsāra did not take interest in the three Āśramas (stages of life) depending on the house-holder's stage of life.*

44-45a. Desirous as he was of the highest beatitude and endowed with humility as he was, he bowed down to him and requested him: 'You are an expert in the religious path that leads to Emancipation from Saṁsāra. May you be pleased to elucidate that to me, so that I may be blessed with Supreme tranquility of mind."

---

* Here ends chapter 324 of the Mbh. Śānti.

45b-46a. Hearing the words of his son, the great sage advised him, "Do you learn the scripture pertaining to Mokṣa as well as all other different religious duties."

46b-47a. At the behest of his father, Śuka, the excellent-most among the knowers of the Brahman (or Vedas) learnt the entire Yoga-Śāstra and the (Sāṅkhya) philosophy of Kapila completely.

47b-49a. Seeing his son resplendent with the splendour of the Vedas* and endowed with the glory of Brahman and thoroughly conversant with Mokṣa-Śāstra, he directed him then "Go to Janaka, the king of Mithilā. That king will explain to you everything about the meaning of the Mokṣa-Śāstra.

49b-50a. At the behest of his father, Śuka went (was about to go) to Janaka, the king of Mithilā, in order to enquire about the definite knowledge (niṣṭhā) about duties leading to Mokṣa and the nature of that ultimate goal.

50b-54. (As he was about to depart) he was instructed (by his father). "You go by the way traversed by ordinary mortals." Śuka was not surprised (at this instruction). He was further advised : "You should not go through the sky by your Yogic power. You should proceed there with simplicity and straightforwardness and not for seeking pleasure. Specialities (friendship etc.) should not be seen (formed) by you, as those specialities (or contacts) become binding. Even though the king is adopted by us as one on whose behalf sacrifices are to be performed by us, you should not entertain any pride about it. You should stay in his premises. He will dispel all your doubts as the king is proficient in Dharma (religious duties) as well as scriptures regarding (the path to) Mokṣa. You should abide unhesitatingly by whatever he asks you to do."

Being thus instructed, the righteous-souled sage Śuka proceeded to Mithilā.

55. Though he had the capability of traversing through the sky the whole of the earth alongwith the oceans, he crossed on foot the mountains and reached the sub-continent called Bhārata.

---

* NP. reads : Śataṁ brāhyā Śriyā yuktam. But Śataṁ brāhyā is meaningless and an obvious miscopying of Sa taṁ brāhmyā of the Mbh. Śānti. 325.5a.

56. The great sage passed through different prosperous and rich countries. At last reaching the country (known as) Videha, he approached Janaka.

57. When he arrived at the gate of (Janaka's) palace, he was stopped by the door-keepers. The great Yogin stood there unaffected by hunger or thirst.

58-60a. O Nārada, even in the heat of the sun, he was not distressed by exhaustion or dejection and was absorbed in meditation. One of the porters who was posted there saw Śuka standing, blazing like the mid-day sun. He worshipped Śuka with due formalities and paying obeisance to him with his palms joined, led him to the second apartment of the king's palace.

60b-61. Near the harem, there was a beautiful garden like Caitraratha park (of Kubera). It abounded in trees in full blossom and had separate swimming pools and playgrounds. Showing him that garden, the porter made him sit and humbly reported (his arrival) to the king.

62. Having heard that Śuka had arrived, the king appointed courtesans for his service as well as to gauge the disposition and the inclinations of his mind.

63. All those damsels were young, beautful-looking with fine tresses of hair, possessing excellent hips, clad in red clothes of fine texture and decked with ornaments of burnished gold.

64-65a. All of them were experts in agreeable conversation, competent to read the minds of man and skilled in all (amorous) acts. They were more than fifty. They arranged for his reception with water for washing feet etc. They gratified him with such articles of food as were agreeable in the season.

65b-66a. When he had eaten his food, they showed him beautiful parks in the town one by one, O Nārada.

66b-67a. Sporting, giggling and singing, those ladies, conversant with male psychology, entertained that noble-souled sage.

67b-68. The pure-souled ascetic, born of sacrificial fire-sticks, had conquered his anger and had subdued his sense-organs. He was always absorbed in meditation. He was neither delighted nor angry at these.

68b-69a. Śuka washed his feet and after completing his Sandhyā prayer, seated himself on a holy seat meditating on that object for which he had come there.

69b-70a. In the earlier part of the night, he became absorbed in meditating upon Nārāyaṇa. In the middle part of the night he duly went to sleep.

70b-71a. Getting up early in the morning and after performing the necessary rites of bodily purification and ablution, the highly intelligent sage, though he was surrounded by women, was once again absorbed in meditation.

71b-72. It is in this manner that he spent the remaining part of the day and that night in the palace of the king, O Nārada.*

Here ends ch. 325 in the Mbh. Śānti.

CHAPTER FIFTYNINE

*The dialogue between Śuka and Janaka

Sanandana continued:

1-3a. The next morning, O excellent Brāhmaṇa, with the family priest at the head (of the procession), the king accompanied by his ministers and all the members of his harem, approached the preceptor's son (Śuka). He carried the articles of worship (arghya) on his head and took with him a highly valuable seat bedecked with all (kinds) of precious stones. He offered that extremely suitable seat to Śuka, the son of his preceptor.

3b-4a. When Śuka, the son of Kṛṣṇa-(Dvaipāyana Vyāsa) occupied the seat, the king worshipped him according to the prescribed rites. At first he offered him water to wash his feet. He then presented him a cow alongwith articles of worship.

4b-5a. The excellent Brāhmaṇa accepted the worship offered in accompaniment of the prescribed Mantras. The highly resplendent ascetic enquired after king's unfailing welfare and prosperity.

5b-6a. The noble-minded monarch with his entourage of noble men and officers duly reported about his welfare to the son of his preceptor. With his permission, he sat on the ground.

6b-7a. Conversant with etiquettes and proper procedure as he was, the king enquired of Śuka, the son of Vyāsa after his welfare and asked him the object of his visit.

Śuka replied:

7b-8. Prosperity be unto you ! My father has informed me that "the King of Videhas known all over the world as Janaka, is my first[1] (disciple ?), is well-versed in the virtuous path leading to Mokṣa, you therefore go to him quickly. If you have any doubt in your heart regarding the religion of Pravṛtti (sacrifices and such other ritualistic matter) or about the religious path of renunciation (Nivṛtti), he will definitely dispel them all."

* This chapter consists of ch. 326 and of a few more verses from ch. 327 of the Mbh. Śānti.

9. At the command of my father, I have therefore, come here to you to discuss with you (these matters). Hence, it behoves you, O foremost among the upholders of dharma to instruct me precisely.

10. What should be done by a Brāhmaṇa here? What is the essence of those religious duties which are conducive to Liberation ? How is the Liberation (from Saṁsāra) to be achieved ? Is it obtainable by (spiritual) knowledge or by penance.

Janaka replied:

11. Listen to me, dear child, what are the duties of a Brāhmaṇa since his birth. After the investiture of the sacred thread, he should devote himself to the study of the Vedas.

12. By performing penance, services to his preceptor and observance of celibacy and by remaining devoid of greed and jealousy, he should do his duties to Devas and Pitṛs.

13. Having studied the Vedas regularly and controlled his senses, and after paying off the tuition-fee of his preceptor, and after taking the permission of his teacher he should formally conclude his stage of religious studentship (by performance of Samāvartana ceremony).

14. After completion of the Samāvartana, he should betake himself to the householder's stage of life. (After marriage) he should live in the company of his spouse, devoid of malice and jealousy, and he should duly and continuously maintain domestic (sacrificial) fire.[2]

15. After procreating sons and grandsons, he should retire as a hermit to a forest and continue to worship the same (domestic) sacrificial fires and receive lovingly guests with due hospitality.

16. Thereafter, the knower of Dharma should establish all (sacrificial) fires within his soul and rising above the pair of opposites, and banishing all passionate attachment from his soul, he should pass his life in the stage of life called Brahmāśrama (or Sannyāsa).

Śuka enquired:

17. (It may be true that) when perfect spiritual knowledge dawns and the eternal entity (the Brahman) is realised directly, (Mokṣa) is automatically attained). But they say that attainment of (true spiritual) knowledge is not possible without direct association with and personal stay with the spiritual preceptor.

18. Is it necessary for a person to go through the three stages of life (studenthood, the life of a householder and that of a forest-hermit)? This is what I ask you. It behoves you to explain this.

Janaka explained:

19. Attainment of Liberation from Saṁsāra is not possible till one accomplishes knowledge (understanding the nature of Brahman etc. theoretically from the scriptural studies) and the true conception of Reality. But the knowledge (or the nature of Brahman) is not possible without association with the (spiritual) preceptor.[3]

20. The preceptor is the pilot or helmsman, while spiritual knowledge is the boat. After attaining knowledge and crossing the ocean of Saṁsāra, one may abandon both.

21. In order to prevent the annihilation of worlds and for forestalling the destruction of acts (on which the existence of the world depends), a person performs both auspicious and inauspicious deeds. It is only after that, that the Liberation is achieved.

22. When (through performance of penanee) one becomes perfectly purified in one's soul, by means of purificatory causes[4] in the course of many births in the world, he attains Liberation from Saṁsāra even in the first (Brahmacarya) stage of life.

23. What paramount desirable object is to be achieved by going through the three stages of life by a person who has attained Liberation from Saṁsāra, or by a learned person who has seen the Reality.

24. One should always cast off defects or faults caused by the attributes Rajas and Tamas. Adhering to the path characterised by Sattva, he should behold the Supreme soul, by means of (or within) his own individual soul.

25. Realizing his own soul in all created beings and beholding all creatures within his soul, he should behave (without being attached to anything in the Saṁsāra) like an aquatic animal which does not become wet though moving through waters.

26. Transcending the pairs of opposite attributes and associated with auspiciousness, he becomes completely liberated (from Saṁsāra) after casting off the physical body and attains Infinity in the next world like a bird, soaring up high in the sky above (the currents of) the wind.

27. In this context, listen to the Gāthās sung in ancient times by King Yayāti. They are remembered in their hearts by all twice-borns who are experts in the philosophy of Liberation.

28. The resplendent lustre (i.e. the Supreme soul) is in one's soul. It is a jewel[5] there itself. It is possible to be observed by oneself, but only with concentrated mind.

29. He who behaves in such a way that others are not afraid of him and when a person is not inspired with fear at the sight of another person, he who neither covets nor hates anything, attains to the Brahman.

30-31. When a person does not entertain evil thoughts about any of the living beings, when one abides by the path of virtue (or religious duty) called Caturāśrama Dharma (A Dharma constituted of four stages of life) which has been practised by one's ancestors, when according to the serial order of these Āśramas (stages of life) he performs (for many births) good actions physically, mentally and verbally, he attains (realizes) the Brahman.

32. If a person, eschewing malice that deludes people and having cast off passion and greed (from the mind), unites his soul with penance, he attains the state of (being one with) Brahman.

33. When one is equally disposed to all beings whether visible or audible, and supersedes the (reactions at) naturally opposite pairs (like pleasure and pain), one gets to the Brahman.

34-35. When one looks upon with an equal eye (without feeling attraction of repulsion), to naturally opposite pairs (Dvandvas) like praise and blame, a piece of gold and iron, pleasure and pain, cold and heat, attainment of worldly prosperity and adversity, pleasing and displeasing, life and death—then one attains to the Brahman.

36. Just as a tortoise spreads out its limbs and withdraws again (within itself), in the same way, the sense-organs are to be restrained by the recluse through his mind.

37. Just as one's place of residence plunged in darkness is seen with (the light emanating from) a lamp, in the same manner it is possible to visualize the Ātman with the brilliant light of intelligence.

38. I, however, can clearly see that you are endowed with all these (within you), O prominent one among the intelligents. If there be anything else to be known, your worship will know it fundamentally (and correctly).

39. O Brahmanical sage, you are already famous as one who have transcended (lit. gone to the other end of) worldly objects of sense through the grace of your spiritual preceptor as well as through your personal discipline (i.e. disciplined way of life).

40. It is through the grace of that great sage that the refulgent divine knowledge has revealed itself to you. You are known to me on account of that (spiritual knowledge).

41. Your knowledge about Mokṣa is more profound; your understanding is deeper, your spiritual glory is so immense that you don't realize it yourself.

42. Maybe due to immaturity or due to doubts or fears caused by delusion. some people do not attain that spiritual goal (Mokṣa) even though knowledge leading to Mokṣa is dawned in them.

43. When all the doubts have been dispelled by persons like me, they, by dint of their pure determined efforts, cut the knots (of doubt) in their heart and do not fall a victim to distress (i.e. are not distressed).

44. Your honour is a person in whom perfect knowledge has been generated and is steady in intellect and are free from covetousness. One, however, cannot attain that goal (of Mokṣa) without determined efforts.

45. You entertain no differentiation between pleasure and pain and attach no importance to objects of senses. You have no curiosity and attraction for dancing and music. Nor does any passion overpower you.

46. You feel no bonds to your kinsmen. You are not inspired with fear at fearful objects. I find that to you censure and praise are all equal.

47. I see that you are a person among other wise persons who have taken to the highest imperishable path devoid of ailments.

48. O Brāhmaṇa you are already existing in that state (called Mokṣa) which is the fruit attained by a Brāhmaṇa and it is not a particular region. What else do you (want to) ask me about ?"

Sanandana said:

49.* Having heard this exhortation (of Janaka), Śuka who was self-controlled and had determined (to see the Ātman), began to abide in his soul mentally (by withdrawing himself from worldly objects) and he realized the (Universal) soul with-in his individual Ātman.

50-51a. Having accomplished his object, he was filled with bliss and (mental) tranquillity. He silently proceeded to the north. On reaching the Śaiśira (the Himālaya) mountain, he espied Vyāsa, the son of Parāśara who was teaching his disciples like Paila and others, the compilations of the Vedas.

51b-52. Śuka (the sage born of Araṇī) of extremely pure mind (soul) and brilliant like the sun-god, respectfully clasped his father's feet and felt delighted at heart. The noble-minded Śuka reported everything to his father.

53-54. Having heard the dialogue between Śuka and king Janaka on the means of getting Moksa (liberation from Saṁsāra), Vyāsa, the author (arranger) of the Vedas, embraced his son with a heart full of ecstatic delight and seated him by his side.

55. Thereafter, the Brāhmaṇas like Paila and others completed their course of Vedic study under Vyāsa. They came down to the earth from the mountain-summit and engaged themselves in teaching the Vedas and performing sacrifices.

CHAPTER FIFTYNINE

1. NP reads ādyaḥ 'first' but the substantive qualified by it being absent I proposed "disciple". But Mbh. ibid 10b reads yājyaḥ i.e. 'for whom we perform sacrifices' 'our Yajamāna.'

2. For āhitāgnir anādṛte of the NP. Mbh. (ibid) v. 17 reads āhitāgnis tathaiva ca.

3. vide. 'naiṣā tarkeṇa matirāpaneyā' etc.—Kaṭha. 12. 9. tad vijñānārthaṁ sa gurum evābhigacchet—Muṇḍaka I. 2. 12.

4. Mbh. (ibid) v. 26a reads bhāvitaiḥ karaṇaiḥ in stead of Kāraṇaiḥ of the NP. The Mbh. verse means "through penance performed in many births, a man is able to have pure, cleansed sense-organs (of which mind is the eleventh one) and the soul" etc.

5. NP reads ratnaṁ tattraiva caiva tat but Mbh. (ibid) v. 32 reads sarva-jantuṣu tat samam / 'It (the soul) exists in all beings.'

CHAPTER SIXTY

The Dialogue between Śuka and Sanatkumāra

1. When the Brāhmaṇas (disciples of Vyāsa) descended (from the height of Vyāsa's hermitage) or departed, the intelligent Vyāsa with only his son (Śuka) as the companion, remained silently absorbed in meditation in the hermitage.

2. An incorporeal voice[2] addressed Vyāsa along with his son : "O great sage : O descendant of Vasiṣṭha : (How is it that) there is no chanting sound of the Vedas (in your hermitage) ?

3. Why are you sitting thus silent and absorbed in meditation, as if you are (anxiously) brooding over something? This mountain devoid of the vibrant echoes (of Vedas) does not appear splendid.

4. O venerable Sir, with a delighted heart, recite the Vedas along with your intelligent son who is well-versed in the Vedas."

5. On hearing that speech addressed to him by the ethereal voice, Vyāsa began to chant the Vedas along with his son Śuka.

6. While both of them were chanting the Vedas for a pretty long time, there arose, O excellent Brāhmaṇa, a violent wind which was as if driven by the gales that break out on the seas.

7-8. Then Vyāsa prohibited his son from continuing the Vedic study, as it was not the time suitable for studies (and hence a holiday). As soon as he was so bidden (to suspend Vedic recitation), Śuka, out of curiosity asked his father : "whence is the wind blowing ? It behoves you to explain to me all the activities of the wind."

9. Vyāsa was extremely surprised to hear these words of Śuka. He replied to Śuka that it was an ill omen which indicated the suspension of the recitation of the Vedas.

10. "You are blest with the spiritual vision. Your steady mind has been at ease; you are free from the attributes of Rajas and Tamas. You are well established in the Truth.

11. Hence realising the Vedas in your own self do you reflect and meditate : the path pertaining to the Supreme soul is known as the path of gods (Deva-yāna). The path that is made of Tamas is called the path of Pitṛs (Pitṛ-yāna).

12a. Both of these have come to be realized[3]—one as leading to the heaven and the other to the world below since the winds blow over the world and high up in the atmosphere.

12b-13a. The winds go on blowing both on the surface of earth as well as in the sky. They blow in seven courses. Listen and understand as I recount them one after another.

13b-14a. The (physical) body is endowed with senses which are domineered over by the (semi-divine beings called) Sādhyas and many (other) great powerful beings. They brought forth an unconquerable son called Samāna.[4]

14b-15a. From Samāna was born a son called Udāna; from Udāna sprang Vyāna; from whom was created Apāna. From Apāna arose lastly the vital air called Prāṇa.

15b-16a. The invincible tormentor of enemies, the Prāṇa was issueless (as had no further function of such production) I shall now recount to you the different functions of these vital winds (as they are factually observed).

16b-17a. The vital wind causes all the various functions of all living beings and because living creatures are made to be pleased[5] (NP) (are enabled to live—Mbh—ibid v. 35).

17b-18. The wind mentioned first (in the above list) and which is known by the epithet Pravaha (or Samāna) impels the masses of clouds born of smoke and heat, to go by the first track. Moving through the sky and coming in contact with the water contained in the clouds, the wind manifests itself in its brilliance among the flashes of lightning.

19-20a. The second wind known as Āvaha goes on blowing with a loud noise. It is due to (the power of) this wind that Soma and other luminaries rise and appear (our body is a replica in miniature of the cosmos). Within the body this wind is known as Udāna by the learned and the wise.

20b-21a. The wind holds (within itself) the waters from the four oceans and having taken up the water gives it to the clouds for the sake of Protection.[6]

21b-22a. The winds having equipped (filled) the clouds with waters, presents it to the presiding deity of rains. It is the mighty wind, third in the above enumeration and is famous as Udvaha.

22b-23a. The wind carries the blue big clouds and divides them into various portions, which it makes them shower rain and the clouds become solidified.

23b-24a. It is that wind which carries the celestial cars of gods. It is that fourth wind (in the list) called Saṁvaha which is capable of subduing mountains.

The fifth wind called Vivaha is full of great might and speed. By that hard blowing wind, the internal juices of trees are made sick or dry.

24b-25a. It holds up (supports from below) all the heavenly waters in the sky and prevents them from falling down. Supporting up the sacred waters of the celestial Gaṅgā, the wind blows to prevent them from flowing downwards. And the holy river water stays on (high up in the sky).

25b-26a. The Sun is the source of thousands of rays and it throws (a flood of) light on the earth. But it is through the obstruction of this.

26b-28a.* Through the action of that wind, the Moon, after waning, waxes again till he shows his full disc. That wind is known as Parivaha and it is the excellent among the living beings[7] and from it Soma, the divine store of nectar, is obtained.

28b-29a. That wind takes away the life of all living creatures at the time of death. His Law is abided by Death and god Yama, the son of the sun-god.

29b-30a. That Law becomes the source of immortality which is attained by Yogins of quiescent mind (intellect) who are ever engaged in Yogic meditation.

30b-31a. By resorting to this wind, thousands of Dakṣa's grandsons through his (Dakṣa's) ten sons quickly and with speed attained the limits of the universe (broke through them to reach Mokṣa).

*NP reads yāti vasundharāni—'goes to the earth.' Mbh. (ibid) v. 47 reads bhāti vasundharām 'enlightens or sheds light on the earth'. I prefer the Mbh. reading.

31b-32a. It is the wind called Parivaha which is irresistible by anybody[8] overwhelmed with whose showers he does not revert (?)

32b-33a. In this way all these wind-gods, the sons of Aditi, are extremely miraculous. They blow about (without being attached to anybody) everywhere. They have access everywhere and are the end of everything.[9]

33b-34a. It was indeed a great miracle that this excellent mountain was suddenly shaken by the blowing of that wind.

34b-35. This wind is the exhalation from (the nose of) Viṣṇu. When it blows forcibly, O child, the whole world gets agitated. Hence when a stormy wind blows violently persons well-versed in the Veda do not recite it.

36-37a. The Vedas are a form of the wind. If uttered with force and loudly (at this time) the external wind gets pained." (Hence one should not recite the Vedas when stormy winds blow).[10]

After addressing these words to his son, the spiritually powerful son of Parāśara asked his son to resume the recitation of the Vedas (when the storm subsides). He then left to take his ablutions in the heavenly Gaṅgā.

37b-38a. Thereafter when Vyāsa departed to take his bath, Śuka, the foremost among the knowers of the Vedas and the master of the Vedas and accessories to Vedas (like Śikṣā, Kalpa etc.) resumed his self-study (and recitation) of the Vedas.

38b-39. Then Venerable Sanatkumāra[11] approached Śuka, the son of Vyāsa who was engaged in the recitation of the Vedas in solitude, O sage. Śuka, the son of Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana got up and the son of god Brahmā (Sanatkumāra) was received by him.

40. O excellent Brāhmaṇa ! Then Sanatkumāra who was prominent among the knowers of the Veda enquired, "O highly fortunate son of Vyāsa, O highly brilliant sage ! What are you doing (now)?"

Śuka said :

41. O son of Brahmā, I am now engaged in the self study of the Vedas. It is a (great) holy merit of mine whereby I have been able to see you.

42. I wish to ask you something about the principle that is conducive to the attainment of salvation. Please recount it, O highly blessed one, so that I may attain that perfect knowledge.

Sanatkumāra said :

43. There is no (other) vision on a par with learning, there is no (other penance on a par with learning. There is no (other misery on a par with sensuous attachment. There is no other happiness on a par with renunciation.

44. Refraining from sinful activities, being continuously engaged in meritorious activities, good behaviour and adherence to conventional duties – these are the most excellent things contributing to welfare.

45. Having obtained the birth as a human being (the life in) which is fraught with sorrow he who becomes attached to it becomes stupefied; such a man is incapable of being emancipated from sorrow. Attachment (to worldly objects) is an indication of misery.

46. The intellect of one attached to the worldly affairs heightens one's vicious snare of delusion. One ensnared by delusion attains misery here and hereafter.

47. Restraint of lust and fury by all means must be pursued by one who seeks welfare. These two are conducive to the destruction of (spiritual) welfare (the moment) they crop up.

48. One must continuously guard one's penance against fury; one must save one's splendour and glory from (indecent) rivalry; one must save one's learning from being over-honoured and disrespected; one must save oneself from blunders.

49. Absence of cruelty is the greatest Dharma, forbearance is the greatest strength; knowledge of the Ātman is the greatest knowledge and truthfulness is the greatest of benefits.

50. He is an erudite scholar who renounces everything. He moves about the objects of the sense-organs by means of those sense-organs that are fully submissive to himself.

51-52a. He who is not getting entangled; he whose soul is quiescent; he who is without aberration; he who has concentration; he who does not identify himself with those beings that do not become one with the Ātman, that is, he who is with them and without them, becomes liberated and ere long attains the greatest welfare.

52b-53a. One who never sees others, never touches others, never talks with others, soon accomplishes his summum bonum. O sage.

53b-55. No one shall injure any living being; one shall move on friendly terms with all the living beings. After attaining this birth no one shall be inimical to anyone. Voluntary indigence, perfect contentment, indifference and absence of fickle-mindedness—these, they say are conducive to the welfare of one who is the knower of the Ātman, of one who has conquered the Ātman.

56-57a. Disengaging oneself from all attachment, O child, you subjugate all your senses and by that means attain the state of sorrowlessness, both here and hereafter. Those who have no desire do not feel aggrieved. One shall avoid and eschew all types of desire within the Ātman.

O gentle one, by abandoning all desires you will be released from hosts of miseries.

57b-58a. You must be permanently engaged in austerities and silent self-control. You must restrain yourself. You must be desirous of conquering what is not conquered, viz. the Brahman. You must not be entangled in any close attachment.

58b-59a. A Brāhmaṇa (one who is engrossed in the meditation of (Brahman) uninvolved in the close intimacies due to the Guṇas and always engaged in the only activity (of meditation), ere long attains the excellent happiness.

59b-60a. It is the unfortunate and wretched sage who takes delight in the pairs of Dvandvas (mutually clashing opposites). He is satisfied with a little knowledge. But he who is satisfied with perfect knowledge does not feel aggrieved.*

---

*This verse in the NP is a bit obscure; the corresponding verse No. 24 in the Mbh. Śānti ch. 329 is as follows :

dvandvārāmeṣu bhūteṣu ya eko ramate muniḥ / viddhi prajñānatṛptaṁ taṁ jñāna-tṛpto na śocati //

60b-61a. It is the auspicious acts that enable the individual to attain Devahood, while the mixture of auspicious and inauspicious activities enables one to attain human birth. Through inauspicious karmas one attains the birth as lower animals. Due to his karmas, he is helpless and cannot avoid it.

61b-62a. The worldly existence is always tormented by death, old age and other miseries. Every creature realises it.* Why don't you get enlightened?

62b-63a. You have given the term Hita (beneficent) to what is Ahita (non-beneficent). You regard a thing as Dhruva (permanent) to what is Adhruva (transitory). You have given the term Artha (Meaningful) to what is Anartha (harmful). Why don't you get enlightened?

63b-64a. Just as the silkworm in the cocoon entwines itself by means of the threads originating from itself, you are also entwined. Why don't you awake to the correct apprehension of these ?

54b-65a. Enough of attachment to objects of this world, for attachment to worldly objects engenders evils. The silk-worm which weaves a cocoon round itself is at last bound down by his own acceptance of ties.

65b-66. All beings passionately attached to one's sons, wives and families become the victims of destruction at last, even as wild elephants sunk in the mire of a lake become gradually weakened (and meet death). Have a look at extremely miserable creatures who are dragged by the vicious net of delusion.

67. The family, sons and wives, the physical body, the mass of accumulated wealth—all belong to others. They are unstable. What is that which one can call one's own ? The merits and the sins (committed by oneself).

That person who leads a self-contented happy life in the midst of people who take pleasures in sexual intercourse, should be known as a person whose thirst has been satiated by knowledge. And (it is known to all that) a person whose thirst or covetiousness is satisfied by perfect (spiritual) knowledge, never feels any misery.

*v. 1. Saṁsāre pacyate (Mbh. ibid). 26.
A living being is cooked (in the cauldron of) Saṁsāra.

68. When one has to leave everything under duress and go, helplessly to the next world, why are you getting involved in a wrong and harmful activity ? You don't pursue your own interest (your real, durable wealth).

69. How will you by yourself traverse the pathway enveloped in darkness, without rest, without a support, without food and drink to be partaken of, and without a guide?

70. No one will follow you behiiid, as you set off from here. But the merit and the sin shall follow you (wherever) you go.

71. One seeks* one's objectives by means of learning, acts of bravery ('purity' in the Mbh. original) and great knowledge. When that objective is achieved one becomes liberated from Saṁsāra.

72. The (social) desire that one feels for living in the midst of human neighbourhoods (or habitations) is a rope-like bondage. People possessing merits succeed to cut it asunder and liberate themselves. Sinful persons are incapable of breaking it.

73. You find men of your own age and caste and having the same comely features taken away by the (god of) Death. You don't feel dejected and depressed even nominally. Indeed your heart is (made) of steel.

74-75. The river (called the world or life) has personal beauty or form as its banks, the mind, the speed of its current, (the sense of) touch, an island (in it), taste, its stream or current, smell, the mud, sound its waters. The special part leading towards heaven is full of grave difficulties. In this boat called intelligence, forgiveness is the oar for propulsion. Truth is the material forming the boat (Satya-mayim) and practice of dharma is the stabilising ballast. Renunciation is the wind that propels (the mast of) the boat. Driven with speed it is with this boat (of intelligence) that one should cross the river.

76-77a. After eschewing both Dharma and Adharma, eschew both truthfulness and falsehood. Eschew Dharma by means of non-conception (A-Saṁkalpa) and Adharma by means of non-violence. With the aid of intelligence eschew both truth and falsehood and at last cast off understanding itself by the Supreme knowledge.

77b-79a. Do you throw away this physical body having bones for its pillars, sinews for its binding cords, flesh and blood as its plaster, the skin (NP reading is 'Dharma') for its outer binding (packing ?); full of urine and faeces and hence emitting putrid smell; exposed to the attacks of sorrow and senility; the very seat of diseases and unsteady; dominated by the attribute of Rajas and impermanent—a temporary habitation for the being.

79b-80a. This whole universe which is both mobile and immobile, consists of the great elements and hence is material (full of atoms).

80b-82. Five sense-organs, the three attributes—Tamas, Sattva and Rajas. These (together with others mentioned above) constitute a group of seventeen and are called Avyakta (unmanifest). These with all those which are Vyakta (manifest) viz. the five objects of senses, consciousness, Intelligence, form and the group of twentyfive manifest and unmanifest ones.

When endowed with all these, it is (still) called the impermanent.*

83-85. He who knows the Trivarga (i.e. virtue, wealth, and love) happiness and misery, life and death perfectly well undertands the origins and dissolution. Whatever is perceived by means of the sense organ is called Vyakta. That should be known as Avyakta which is beyond the scope of the sense organs, that which can be grasped only through signs and symptoms. By means of the perfectly controlled sense organs, the embodied being is propitiated as if by means of continuous downpours. He sees the Ātman pervading the world and also the world fixed in the Ātman.

86. Being rooted in spiritual knowledge, the spiritual power is never lost* to a man who perceives the Supreme Soul in his own soul—the man who always sees all creatures in all conditions in his soul.

* The NP reads Samāyuktam anityam abhidhīyate. But the reading is not satisfactory, though I have accepted it for translation. Mbh. (ibid) v. 47a reads Samāyuktaḥ pumān etc. and means "When endowed with (the above mentioned twentyfour possessions) he is called Pumān (Man). The Mbh. reading is better.

87-88. He who has become one with Brahman (transcends) by his spiritual knowledge all errors or miseries) never contacts any evil by contact with all creatures. Such a man never finds fault with practices or course of conduct prevailing in the world. A person who knows Liberation well, says that the Lord (or the Supreme Soul) is without beginning and end. It abides as a witness in all beings and is imperishable.

89. He (the soul) is inactive, non-stupefied (Mbh.—formless); only the being meets with grief as a result of his misdeeds.

90. For the purpose of counteracting his grief, he kills numerous creatures. As a result of these sacrifices, the performer has to undergo rebirth and perform (innumerable) new Karmas.

91. Such a person regards that what is really a source of misery as happiness. And he continuously becomes unhappy like an ailing person who eats unwholesome food not permissible in that sickness.

92. By his terrible acts, such a person is bound, pressed and tormented. Freed from them, he being bound by his karmas, obtains rebirth and thus rotates like a wheel in Saṁsāra without an axle.

93-94. Receding therefrom and being released from his own bondage, he wanders in the wide world as a result of the uprising of the activities. He revolves like a wheel without its axle (?) Many have attained Siddhis that gave rise to happiness and that had not been hindered. (That was possible for them) thanks to self-control, refraining from contacts and to the power of penance.

* The NP reads : Parāvara-dṛṣaḥ śaktir Jñānavelāṁ na paśyati /
The statement does not stand to reason. Hence the original reading from the Mbh. (ibid) v. 51 which is logical is accepted. The translation above is of the following :

Parāvara-dṛśaḥ Śaktir Jñāna-mūlā na naśyati /

CHAPTER SIXTY

1. Vv 1-36 in this chapter are mainly taken from Mbh. Śānti ch. 328 vv. 10-57.

2. In the Mbh. it is Nārada who advises Vyāsa to recite the Vedas.

3. NP. reads: dvāvetau pratyayaṁ yātau But the second line 12b becomes unconnected with 12a. Mbh. (ibid) v. 30 dvāvetau pretya panthānau etc. is better. It means: 'these are the two paths in the worlds hereafter.'

4. The term denotes the common tendencies of sense-organs or the common factors of Sādhyas and other beings.

5. v. 1 Prāṇanāt—(all are) enabled to live (Mbh. ibid v. 35)

6. The NP. reads : yo...dadate cāpo jīmūtebhyovanenilaḥ I took avane for vane, for this process is not limited to the forests : Mbh. (ibid) 39 reads: ambarenilaḥ 'in the sky'. The reading in Mbh. is worth considering.

7. v. 1. Jayatāṁ varaḥ : the foremost of all in energy.

8. This is the probable interpretation of the text of the NP. yena vṛṣṭyā parābhūtās toyānyena nivartate / The Mbh (ibid) v. 52a reads : yena spṛṣṭaḥ parābhūto yātyeva na nivartate. Being touched by which he is so overwhelmed that he goes away permanently (i.e. liberated from Saṁsāra) and never returns (gets Mokṣa).

9. Thus reads NP : anāramantā sarvāntā sarvagāḥ sarva-cāriṇaḥ. But the sentence has no predicate. The Mbh. (ibid) reads : anāratam te saṁvānti sarvagāḥ sarvadhāriṇaḥ They blow incessantly, have access everywhere and uphold everything.

10. Here ends chapter 328 in the Mbh. Śānti. It is significant that NK gives a secondary—Yogic—explanation to all these verses. But he, however, concludes with the mundane common sense remark : Hence one should not recite the Veda while a stormy wind blows."

11. In Mbh (Śānti) ch. 329, it is Nārada who approached Śuka.

CHAPTER SIXTYONE

The greatness of Nivṛtti[1] Dharma

Sanatkumāra[1] said :

1. Having heard such scriptural texts as are auspicious, dispelling sorrow, conducive to mental peace and happiness, one attains pure intelligence, whereby one attains really happy state.

2. Every day, thousands of incidents causing delight (sorrow-Mbh.) and hundreds of happenings causing sorrow affect a person devoid of wisdom, but not a person endowed with understanding and learning.

3. Persons of little intelligence and understanding become overwhelmed with mental sorrow of every kind due to advent of, and association with what is undesirable and severance from what is agreeable.

4. One should not nostalgically brood over the merits of the articles which one possessed in the past. One who does not think of them with reverent affection, becomes free from the bondage of love.

5. One should try to detect faults in things to which one feels attached. He should attribute undesirability to them. Then alone he becomes resplendent[2] immediately.

6. A person bewails for what is past (and lost permanently), does not acquire either wealth or religious merits or fame. He should reconcile himself with their loss. But that returns to him (?)[3]

7. Living beings sometimes gain and sometimes lose worldly objects. It should not be the cause of sorrow, to a person.

8. He who bewails the past, that which is dead or lost, attains miseries through miseries. He incurs greater loss and injury.

9. When a calamity causing physical or mental grief visits and cannot be warded off, one should not brood over it.

10. This is the antidote against misery that it should not be brooded over. On being mused over, it does not decrease. Nay, it increases again.

11. One shall dispel mental misery by means of intellect and remove the physical pain by means of medicines. This is the power of knowledge; one should not behave like commoners in such matters.

12. No learned and sensible man shall yearn for these evanescent things viz.—the life, (comely) features, youth, hoarded wealth, health and association with beloved persons.

13. Misery is born of ignorance alone. It does not behove any one to bewail over it. Without bewailing, one shall try to remedy it, if one finds out its source.

14. In this life, undoubtedly misery is more pleasing* than happiness; (for) one will (try to) uplift the beloved Ātman from the miseries of old age and death.

15. Like the sharp-pointed arrows discharged by a good archer, physical and mental ailments affect the bodies deeply.

16-19. In order to destroy the ailment of a patient, who is afraid and who yearns for life, the body is being dragged about by means of treatments. The ducts of the body continue to flow. Like the current of the rivers they do not turn back. (The sun) takes away the life of men by day and by night again and again, during the two fortnights dark and bright; he makes the born man become old; he never tarries even for a moment. Himself free from old age, he takes away the lives of men overwhelmed by happiness and misery. Again and again, the sun sets, again and again he rises.

20. Taking with them the good and evil incidents that befall men according to their destiny and hence are not expected by them, the nights too pass away ceaselessly.

21. Whatever one may desire, one shall attain, provided the fruit of actions of men does not depend on other factors.

---

* Mbh. reads bahutaram "the amount of sorrow and pain is greater than that of pleasure in this world."

 matam in the NP is not relevant. Hence Astam from Mbh. Śānti 331.1 (the corresponding verse of the NP) is accepted. In the NP v. 20 above iṣṭāniṣṭā manuṣyāṇām matam gacchanti rātrayaḥ |
matam seems to be a misprint for mastam.

22-23. Clever, intelligent men of unrestrained senses if destitute of efforts (or karmas), never succeed in earning any fruits. Other persons though destitute of intelligence and without any accomplishments and who are useles[4] and really the basest of men, are seen prompted by desires, and are seen indulging in all desires.

24. Another man attempts always to inflict violence on all living beings. He becomes old in deceiving but blessed with happiness throughout his life.

25. Fortune blesses someone who never stirs out but who sits (idle). Some one does everything but never obtains desired objects.

26. In order to recount the faults of men, the semen created in oneself at the sight of another, goes to still another person.[5]

27. When the semen is absorbed in the womb, it becomes a human foetus.[6] The recession (of semen or failure of conception) resembles a mango tree which blossoms fully without producing a single fruit.

28. To some persons who desire sons, who wish to perpetuate their lines and who (by worshipping deities etc.), strive for its achievement, not even an egg (an embryo in the womb) is born.

29. Some persons who dread the birth of an embryo as one fears a furious serpent, a long-lived son is born. How verily he is like his departed father! (who has as if returned after departing from this life—Mbh. ibid. v. 17)

30. Some persons dejected due to sonlessness and with a burning desire for sons, at last get a son after performing penance and offering sacrifices to gods. The sons, duly borne for ten months (in the wombs by their wives) are born to be the banes and disgrace to their families.

31. Thanks to these blessed rites and observations, others inherit the hoarded wealth and grains and other diverse sources of enjoyment earned and stored by their forefathers.

32. When a man and a woman come in contact with each other, in the act of sexual intercourse, the embryo is formed in the womb like a calamity visiting the woman.

33-34. Due to excessive attachment to objects of senses and due to delusion, death becomes unpleasant. A person who gives up both (the concepts of) pleasure and pain transcends (these) and goes to Brahman and enjoys the highest bliss.

It is with great difficulty that wealth (or objects of senses) are renounced. Nor it is pleasant or easy to retain them.

35-36a. One should not be worried on hearing about the destruction of riches or when they are not obtained. Some Men of peculiar nature become dissatisfied and are doomed on attaining adverse monetary conditions. But learned men are contented.

36b-38a. All things are hoarded only to be destroyed in the end. All ascents end in downfall; all contacts and unions end in separation; life ends in death; there is no end to the thirst (desire to get more and more); satisfaction alone is the greatest happiness. Hence, learned men praise satisfaction alone as the real wealth or an asset.

38b-39a. (Defective) When he does not stand even for a moment after acquiring (the body), what should he ever (constantly) brood over when the bodies (themselves) are impermanent and momentary.

39b-40a. Comprehending the real state of (created) beings, those who through the dint of their intelligence have traversed the path beyond darkness, do not come to grief but see the highest goal.

40b-41a. Like a tiger pouncing on an animal, the god of death picks out and snatches away a person whose desires are not satiated.

42b-43a. Whether in the case of a rich man or a destitute there is nothing more higher than merely the enjoyment of objects of senses such as sound, touch, taste, colour and smell.

43b-44a. Not that there is no misery without ailment to creatures by employment of speech. It is neither through speech nor learning (or knowledge) that all are separated (from life?)

44b-45a. Restraining one's affection or attachment to things praised and others (not so praised), he who wanders freely (without the bonds of attachment) is really happy and learned.

45b-46a. Completely absorbed in spiritual pursuits with no expectations and free from desires or lustful enjoyments (nirāmiṣa), he who moves about with his self as his help-mate, becomes (really) happy.

46b-47. When an interchange or reversal of pleasure and pain takes place, neither his intellectual faculty nor manliness protect him from him. He must naturally exert himself. And a person who goes on doing efforts, is not lost or ruined.

48-49a. The embryo takes birth in the womb like an undesirable calamity. Those previous bodies (envelop) the soul who is eternal. After the suspension of the vital breaths of creatures (i.e. after the death of the body in the previous birth) he is invested with another (physical body) constituted of flesh and phlegm (according to his karmas).

49b-50a. When the previous body is destroyed, by another body which is as weak or strong[7] as the previous one is kept reserved for the transmigration of the creature whose previous body is burnt, like one boat is taking to another boat kept stationary and ready for the transfer of passengers.

50b-51a. (I enquire of you :) By whose efforts you see that the foetus continues to be alive (in the womb) when in the act of sexual intercourse a drop of inanimate semen is deposited in the womb.

51b-52a. The food stuffs taken in and beverages imbibed become digested in the stomach. Why then does not the foetus too become digested like the food ?

52b-53a. It is Nature which has ordained the stay (of the jiva) in the urine and ordure in the womb. The jiva which is to take birth is helpless and he is not the agent (nor has any choice) in the matter of residence or escape from the womb.

53b-54a. Some come out from the womb alive; others die there (before birth) as their death is inevitable due to the arrival of others (their future bodies ordained by their previous Karma).

54b-55a* The person who in the course of sexual inter-

* The verse in NP is obscure.

course sprays out (sows) the seed, obtains from it some issue. The child thus brought forth indulges in the act of copulation in due course.

55b-56a. (It is not the soul but) the gross elements (constituting the physical body) at the close of one hundred years attain this type of seventh stage* (i.e. old age) and then cease to exist.

56b-57a. There is no doubt that when persons are afflicted by diseases, they lose the power of getting up or moving about like petty animals attacked by tigers.

57b-58. Despite their best possible efforts, physicians are not able to alleviate the pains of patients.

59. Even those various physicians though experts and equipped with medicines are themselves dragged (attacked) by diseases like beasts assailed by tigers.

60. Even though they imbibe many astringent and different kinds of medicated ghees, they are seen broken down by old age like big trees (naga) by elephants.

61. Who administers medicines to ailing animals, birds, beasts of prey and poverty-striken people? These are not generally seen to be suffering from diseases.

62. A disease attacks and captures even terrible unassailable kings of ferocious energy, just as Caṇḍālas or roasters of beasts do to beasts.

63. In this way, people gagged and unable even to groan, submerged in delusion and sorrow are (seen to be) carried away in the big powerful current in which they are thrown.

---

etasmād yoni-sambandhād yo jīvan parimucyate |
Pūjāṁ na labhate kāñcit punar dvandveṣu majjati ||

"He who, while alive, is liberated through this sexual intercourse does not get any worship or honour but sinks in dvandvas. This is obviously strange. The original Mbh. verse has :

yo bījam parimucyate | prajāṁ ca labhate kāṁcit sajjati ||

The Mbh. verse is translated above.

*The comm. NK states the following 10 stages of human life : (1) stay in the womb (2) birth (3) infancy upto 5 years (4) childhood upto 12 years (5) Pauganḍa (6) youth (7) old age (8) decrepitude (9) suspension of breath and death. The Mbh (ibid) v. 28 reads gatāyuṣaḥ for śatāyuṣaḥ in the NP and the body is said to attain the 7th or the 9th stage out of the above 10 stages.

_nāga_ in the NP is a misprint.

64. Neither by wealth nor by power of austere penance can embodied beings seeking to conquer nature, overcome it.

65. All persons desire to attain gradually to the top of the world. They strive to the best of their ability. But the result does not tally with their cherished desire.

66. If people were to obtain the fruit of their attempt (or cherished objective), they would never die, would never grow decrepit and would never have to experience anything unpleasant.

67. Persons who are careful as well as crooked, cruel and brave pay homage to men inebriated with the flush of affluence and puffed up with arrogance (Mbh. reads: those intoxicated with spirituous liquors).

68. In the case of some, griefs or sorrows recede even before they are glimpsed (by the prospective sufferer) while others who possess nothing of their own overstep[8] them.

69. A great disparity is seen in the fruition of the conjunctions of acts. Some bear a palanquine on their shoulders while others ride in them.

70. All persons aspire after affluence or prosperity. Out of them a few have chariots ahead of them in processions. Some men have no wealth (v.l. in the MBh. 'are wifeless') while others have hundreds of wives.

71. The opposite pairs—pleasure and pain—exist side by side. People have either one or the other. Have a look at this or that. You should not succumb to delusion.

72. Eschew both Dharma as well as Adharma, cast off (the dualistic concept of) truth and falsehood. After eschewing all the notions, be established in your own Self, be happy and free from all ailments.

73. O excellent sage I have recounted to you in details that secret and mysterious teaching. It is due to such knowledge that the gods (who were formerly human beings) could transcend the earth and go to settle in the heaven."

Sanandana said:

74. Having addressed thus Śuka, the son of Vyāsa, and bidding good-bye to him, the great sage Sanatkumāra who was worshipped by Śuka with deep reverence, went his way.

75. After understanding the whole philosophic position, Śuka, the greatest of the Yogins, became eager to explore the region of the Brahman and went to his father.

76. Thereafter, after meeting his father and bowing him down, the great sage Śuka circumambulated him (clockwise) and proceeded to mount Kailāsa.

77. Vyāsa, being overcome with filial affection (for his son and pained at separation from him and grieved at heart, cried out, "O son, wait at least for a moment."

78. Śuka who was above all expectations, became freed from affection and bondage. He thought only of Liberation (from Sāṁsāra) and attained the highest region.

CHAPTER SIXTYONE

1. This chapter is compiled from the Mbh. Śānti chapters 330 ff., the only difference is that here the interlocutor is Sanatkumāra while in the Mbh., it is Nārada.

2. Mbh. (ibid) v. 6. reads : virajyate 'gets disgusted with them'.

3. NP reads : taccāsya tu nivartate, 'tu' in the NP makes this a confused statement. The Mbh. reads na nivartate never returns to him and this is a better reading.

4. niṣphalāḥ but Mbh. (ibid) v. 11 reads bāliśāḥ.

5. These two lines in the NP seem independent or unrelated. In the Mbh. (ibid) v. 14a reads : "you should ascribe the above to the faults of man."

6. The Mbh. (ibid) v.15 reads vā na vā for NP mānavāḥ. The Mbh. means : "When at the sight of some other person semen is created but is actually imparted to another women, there may or may not be any conception."

7. This verse is the same as Mbh. (ibid) v. 22 with the following change : calâcalam for balābalam in the NP and nāvam ivā'hitām for nāvam ivā' calām in the NP.

8. The reading adhigacchati in its original in the Mbh. (Śānti 331.40) has na kiñcid adhigamyate 'through possessing no wealth are free from miseries of every type.'

CHAPTER SIXTYTWO

The exposition of Mokṣa-dharma

Sūta said:

1. On hearing these words, the holy sage Nārada asked the Brahmanical sage once again about Śuka's departure.

Nārada said:

2. O holy lord, everything has been recounted by you with a very sympathetic heart. On hearing it, my mind has attained the most perfect quiescence.

3. O great sage, impart again unto me the philosophy of liberation. The thirst is never quenched by the ocean of the attributes of Kṛṣṇa.

4. In what region do those persons who are liberated from Saṁsāra and who are expert in the philosophy of Mokṣa, abide? This is my great doubt.

5a. O highly fortunate one! Do dispel that doubt as there is no other person (superior to you) amongst the knowers (of Mokṣa-Śāstra).

Sanandana said:

5b-6a. In accordance with the injunctions laid down in the Śāstras, Śuka who was conversant with Krama-Yoga (the order of the successive process of Yoga) fixed his soul (performed Dhāraṇā) in due course from his feet (upwards).

6b-7a. When it dawned (lit. the world became lighted with the light of the sun before its rise) that learned sage Śuka sat with his face eastward with his hands properly folded in an attitude of humility.

7b-8a. The place wherein the son of Vyāsa started to proceed by the path of Yoga was free from any flock of birds or sounds or any disturbing sight.

8b-9a. He then beheld his own soul liberated from all bonds of attachment. When he saw the (disc of the) sun, he gave out a loud laughter (in ecstasy).

9b-10. With a view to attain the path of liberation, he again set himself up for Yoga. Becoming the master of the great yoga, he transcended the sky (or the element called the sky or space). The glorious son of Vyāsa became definitely the traverser of the path in the sky.

11. All beings gazed (agape) at the incessantly speeding prominent-most Brāhmaṇa with the effulgence of Garuḍa traversing through the sky with the velocity of the wind or the speed of the mind.

12. According to their ability and with due formalities they worshipped him. The residents of heavens rained showers of heavenly flowers on him.

13. All the bevies of celestial damsels and tribes of Gandharvas became filled with amazement at his sight. The sages as well as the Siddhas (or sages who have mastered Siddhis) were wonderstruck as to who was the person who had attained such a Siddhi.

14. Then that highly resplendent Śuka, being full of (spiritual) joy told those sages his name, O Nārada.

15. "If my father follows after me crying out "O Śuka", you should respond to him (promptly and) with attention.

16. When he was assured by them positively in the matter, he gave up the four worlds.* He then shed off the eight varieties of the attribute Tamas and five kinds of the attribute Rajas (which tempts men to five kinds of objects of senses.)

17. Thereafter, the intelligent Śuka cast off the attribute Sattva and it was a wonderful miracle. Śuka settled in himself that eternal position, devoid of attributes where the Liṅga was being worshipped.

18-19 He then (espied) two unparalleled peaks similar to the mountains Himalayas and Meru, in close contacts. They were made of gold and silver and hence were yellow and white in colour. Those auspicious peaks were a hundred Yojanas in height. With a fearless heart Śuka alighted there.

20. Though the peaks were very closely united, they were seen suddenly torn asunder into two (at Śuka's impact). It was such a wonderful miracle, O excellent Brāhmaṇa.

---

*Mbh Santi ch. 333.1 records the v. l. Yogān which NK. explains as (1) Vitarka (2) Vicāra (3) Ānanda (4) Asmitā.

vide v. 27 p. 909.

21. Thereafter, he suddenly broke through* and soared away from the two peaks of the mountain and that excellent mountain could not obstruct his passage.

22. Coursing from above, the pious-souled Śuka beheld the river  Mandākinī (the 5th stage in the spiritual progress in the (Vāyu-Vidyā-NK) and a forest full of blossoming trees.

23. In the waters of the Mandākinī, a bevy of celestial damsels were indulging in sports while bathing. Those naked ladies of good form saw the formless sage.

24. Knowing that Śuka was traversing (towards Brahma) the father, overwhelmed with affection followed him closely from behind taking to that excellent course.

25. But Śuka directed his course far above the aerial region of the wind (i.e. above the sūtrātman—NK) and having thus shown his Yogic prowess, became all-pervading (identical with the Brahman).

26. Vyāsa, the performer of a great, austere penance, adopted the path of Yoga and within the twinkling of the eye reached the spot where Śuka alighted (with a dash).

27. He saw there the mountain peak split in two and the passage through which Śuka passed. The Siddhas and sages praised the (yogic) passage and achievement of his son.

28. Thereafter, crying out loudly upon the name of Śuka it was lamented so loudly by the father (Vyāsa) that the three worlds resounded with the cry.

29. The pious-souled Śuka who had access everywhere (as he became one with the Brahman), was the soul of all and hence with faces all round responded by uttering vibrantly the word Bhoḥ (as if in an echo).

30. Thereupon, echoing the mono-syllabic sound Bhoḥ (O Sire !), the whole world consisting of the mobiles and immobiles responded loudly to the reply of Śuka.

31. Since then, even to this day, when sounds are uttered in mountain caves or plateaus they still echo them as if in answer to Śuka.

---

*See v. 27 below.

In the Mbh. (ibid) ch. 333.17 this is the adj. of Mandākini. In view of the next verse, the Mbh. is correct though I have followed the NP.

32. Having thus displayed his latent prowess, Śuka cast off all attributes beginning with Sattva and attained the highest position (Mokṣa).

33. Having witnessed the great (Yogic) prowess of his son of unlimited brilliance, Vyāsa was consoled by Lord, Rudra O Nārada.

34. "Why are you so much distressed (in mind) and are so much agitated for your son, O sage ? Don't you see O Brāhmaṇa, your son who has become identical with the Brahman coming near you ?"

35. Thus consoled, the sage Vyāsa again returned to his hermitage while Śuka being one with the Brahman moved about in various worlds.

36. Thereafter, on another occasion, O Brāhmaṇa, Vyāsa, the son of Satyavatī, went to the hermitage of Badarikāśrama in order to see Nara and Nārāyaṇa.

37. On seeing those two lords performing great penance there, he himself began the practice of penance with the memory of Śuka still fresh in his mind.

38. O dear one, while Vyāsa stayed there, Śuka the knower of the great Yoga, went to Śvetadīpa where you have already gone formerly.

39. The glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa, the God of gods, Janārdana is sought after by the Vedas and his prowess was witnessed (by Śuka).

40-41. O Nārada, the lord was eulogised by Śuka of divine nature. He became pleased and said :

Śri Bhagavān said

O leading Yogin, I, who am stationed in the mysterious secret of all Devas (Vedas), have been seen by you. O Vāḍava (Brāhmaṇa) become a Siddha by means of the Yoga imparted by Sanatkumāra. Stationed in the path of Sadāgati (i. e. the wind god), see the worlds as you wish.

42. Thus advised by Vāsudeva, the sage born of the Araṇī, O Brāhmaṇa, went to Vaikuṇṭha the region bowed to by all the worlds.

43. It was resorted to by Devas moving about in aerial chariots. It was surrounded by the (river?) Virajā, O

Nārada, as this world shines so too the other worlds (by its reflection).

44. The tanks there, are bedecked in diverse ways by means of gold and jewels; the steps are studded with corals: They (tanks)are fully covered with blue lotuses; they are agitated by the sports of celestial women.

45. The tanks reverberate loudly, thanks to the divine flocks of swans; the clear water is always full. The gatekeepers have four hands (each) and are bedecked in different kinds of ornaments.

46-50a. He was not prevented by the gate-keepers, followers of Viṣṇu, the Siddhas like Kumuda and others, from entering within. After entering, Śuka perceived the four-armed lord of Devas, the slayer of Madhu. He was quiescent. His face beamed with pleasure. He was clad in yellow silken garments. He was served by Śaṅkha, Cakra, Gadā and Padma (lotus) in their bodily form. He shone with the Kaustubha jewel on his chest. His (consort) Lakṣmī too shone on his chest. He was adorned with a girdle, a sacred thread, bangles and bracelets. His armlets and coronet as well as the gemset anklets shone (brilliantly). He was being served day and night by the groups of Siddhas. On seeing him, Śuka, overwhelmed with devotion eulogised Him thus:

Śuka said:

50b. (Śuka's prayer)–

Obeisance unto you, the son of Vasudeva, to the cosmic witness of all the worlds.

51. Bow to one who is in the form of the seed of the universe; to the perfect one; to the silent Ātman; (obeisance) to Hari the resident of Śvetadvīpa; to one who is resting on Vāsuki.

52. Hail to Haṁsa (the supreme being); to one of the form of the fish; to one who had assumed the body of the Boar; (obeisance) to the man-lion; to the one adored by Dhruva; to the master of Sāṅkhya and Yoga (systems of philosophy).

53. (Obeisance) to Catussena (one with four armies); to Kūrma (the divine tortoise); to Pṛthu (the big being); to one of the nature of happiness; to Nābheya (the Paramount lord);

54. Obeisance to the leading scion of the family of Bhṛgu (i.e. Paraśurāma); to Rāma, the descendant of Raghu; to the great one; (obeisance) to Kṛṣṇa, the originator of the Vedas; (obeisance) to one, of the form of Buddha and Kalki.

55. Hail to Caturvyūha (having four manifestations): to Vedya (one who should be known); to Dhyeya one who should be meditated upon); to the Supreme Ātman; to one called Nara and Nārāyaṇa; to Śipiviṣṭa (one pervaded by rays of light), to Viṣṇu.

56. Bow to Ṛtadhāman (with the majestic splendour of Ṛta); to Vidhāman (one devoid of abode); to Suparṇa (of good wings); to Svarociṣ (self-luminous); to Ṛbhu (Divinity) to one of good rites and lustre; to Sudhāman (one of good abode); to Ajita (the unconquered).

57. Obeisance to one of universal form; to one identical with the universe; to the cause of creation, sustenance and annihilation (obeisance) to the Yajña and the enjoyer of the Yajñas; (obeisance) to the biggest one, to the minute one and to the Arthin (the suppliant).

58. Obeisance to one whose eyes are the sun and the moon; to one who possesses power, virility and lustre; to one worthy of being worshipped; to the witness; to the unborn; to one who has many heads, legs and arms.

59. (Obeisance) to the lord of Śrī, to Śrīnivāsa, to one who is subservient to the devotees, to Śārṅgin (the wielder of the bow Śārṅga); to the overlord of the eight Prakṛtis; to Brahman of infinite power.

60. Bow to one who is comprehensible (only) through Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad; to Hṛṣīkeśa; to Vedhas; to one whose eyes resemble the lotus; the Kṣetrajña (individual soul); to the luminous one.

61. (Obeisance) to Govinda, the creator of the universe; to the lord of the universe; to the truth; true to promise; to Vaikuṇṭha, to Acyuta.

62. Hail to Adhokṣaja, to Dharma, to Vāmana; to one having three Dhātus; to one who holds lustre; to Viṣṇu; to you the infinite one, to Kapila.

63. Obeisance to Viriñci (creator); to Trikakud (one who has three ensigns of Royalty); to one who has the forms of Ṛk, Yaju and Sāman; obeisance to Ekaśṛnga (one with a single supremacy); to one of pure fame; to Śāstrayoni (the source of origin of the scripture).

64. (Obeisance) to Vṛṣākapi, to the prosperous one, to the lord, to one of universal activities; to one of the form of Bhūḥ, Bhuvaḥ and Svaḥ, to the slayer of Daityas; to one devoid of attributes.

65. Bow to the unsullied one; to the permanent one; to the unchanging one; to the imperishable one; obeisance to you, O Lord favourably disposed to those who seek refuge, Save me.

66. On being eulogised thus, the lord, the wielder of Śaṅkha, Cakra and Gadā, very favourably disposed to those who bow down, spoke thus to the sage born of the Araṇi (viz. Śuka).

Śri Bhagavān said :

67. O son of Vyāsa, O highly blessed one of good rites, I am delighted with you. Attain learning and devotion; you are a perfectly wise one adopting many forms.

68. O Brāhmaṇa, this is the same form of mine formerly seen by you in the Śvetadvīpa. I am stationed here in the same form for my incarnation, in the form of the pervader of the Universe.

69. O blessed one, by (constant) thought over Mokṣa-dharma (virtue leading to liberation) you have become a Siddha. (Attain) excellent worlds such as those of Vāyu, firmament and the sun (?)

70. You are permanently liberated (from Saṁsāra). You are worshipped by gods and men. Devotion unto me who am gracious unto all is very difficult to obtain.

71. Once you have attained that devotion, nothing remains to be attained. The sages Nara and Nārāyaṇa are engrossed in penance, till the end of the Kalpa.

72. At their behest, Vyāsa, your father of holy rites, will be composing the scripture called the Bhāgavata. Learn it. Go down to the Earth.

73. He is now performing a penance on the mountain

Gandhamādana. He is much dispirited in his mind due to separation from you. Make him pacified. He is dear unto me."

74. O Brāhmaṇa, thus advised, Śuka bowed to the four-armed deity. Returning by the way he had gone, he came back to his father.

75. Thereafter, on seeing his son near him, the valorous son of Parāśara became delighted much in his mind. He desisted from his penance.

76. After bowing to Nārāyaṇa as well as to Nara, the most excellent among men, he returned to his own hermitage accompanied by his son born of the Araṇī.

77. O leading sage, at the behest of Nārāyaṇa through you he composed the divine compendium that consists of many anecdotes. (viz. the Bhāgavata).

78. He taught his son Śuka engaged in renunciation, the compendium of the Bhāgavata which is on a par with the Vedas and which increases devotion to Hari.

79. Śuka, the holy son of Vyāsa, took utmost delight in the Ātman. Yet he learned every day that compendium which is a favourite scripture of Viṣṇu's devotees.

80. Thus O sinless one, these Mokṣadharmas (virtues leading to liberation) have been related to you. They cause devotion to Hari of those who read and listen to it attentively.

PĀDA THREE

CHAPTER SIXTYTHREE

Principles of Pāśupata Philosophy

Śaunaka said

1. O good-natured Sūta, experts in all scriptures, be long-lived, as, O scholarly one, we have been made to drink the nectar of Kṛṣṇa's stories by you.

2. What did Nārada, the favourite of the lord, ask him after listening to the Mokṣadharmas directly from the mouth of Sanandana ?

3. The great sages with Śaunaka as the first, the mind-born sons of Brahmā having perfect achievements and busy with uplifting the beings, roam in the worlds.

4. O blessed one, Nārada too is ever devoted to Kṛṣṇa, What auspicious discourse that sanctifies the world took place when they all assembled ?

Sūta said :

5. O highly blessed one, You have asked very aptly, you, who help the common people. I shall recount everything that had been asked by sage Nārada.

6. After listening to the eternal Mokṣadharmas uttered by Sanandana, O excellent one among the scions of the family of Bhṛgu, Nārada asked those sages again.

Nārada said :

7. Viṣṇu, the lord of all gods has been glorified in the Vedas and in the Tantra texts. He alone is to be propitiated by all those who seek anything (in the world).

8. O leading sages, what are those mantras whereby lord Viṣṇu is to be propitiated ? Who are the different gods to be worshipped by those people who consider Viṣṇu's feet as the ultimate resort.

9. O brahmins, Instruct us on the Tantra (special religious and philosophical doctrines and rituals) of Lord Viṣṇu which would be useful to the preceptor and the disciples along with the mode of initiation and the daily morning duties.

10. O bestowers of honour, tell us about those holy monthly rites, oblations (homas) etc. and the japas (mantras worthy of being repeatedly chanted), whereby the great Lord would be pleased.

Sūta said :

11. On hearing these words of the noble-souled Nārada, Sanatkumāra, the holy sage, resplendent like the sun, spoke :

Sanatkumāra said :

12. Listen, O Nārada, I shall tell you the Tantra of the Lord knowing which one may, by means of pure devotion, attain to the unchanging Viṣṇu free from impurities.

13. They say that the great Tantra consists of three Padārthas (categories) and four Pādas (sections). The Pādas are called (1) Bhoga (enjoyment), (2) Mokṣa (liberation), (3) Kriyā (holy rites) and (4) Caryā (ritualistic observance).[1]

14. The Padārthas are but three : (1) Paśupati, (2) Paśu and (3) Pāśa.[2] The individual souls are all called Paśus while Paśupati (Lord of the Paśus) is Śiva alone.

1. According to Śaiva Siddhānta the subjects of discussion are three viz Paśu, Pati and Pāśa. The system comprised of four divisions which are known to be bhoga, mokṣa, kriyā and caryā.

2. Here Pati means Śiva. His essential nature is cit (sentiency) and kriyā (action). Śiva is one, all-pervading, free, eternal. He has been described in the Tattvaprakāśa of Bhoja in the following manner. Cidghana eko vyāpī nityaḥ satatoditaḥ prabhuśśāntaḥ / jayati jagadekabijam sarvānugrahakaḥ śambhuḥ // After liberation jīva also becomes Śiva but in order to differentiate both, the liberated soul is termed as Muktaśiva. While Pati who is Śiva himself is ever liberated and ever free. He is the sole agent of five functions.

Paśus are the jīvas who are under three kinds of fetters called pāśas. As pāśas are three, namely mala, māyā and karma, the classes of Paśus are of

15. O Nārada, so long as there remains the contact of delusion with the characteristic loss of consciousness regarding their true nature, look to them as it were dualistic.

16-17. Pāśas are fivefold with different characteristics and separate names. The Paśus are of three kinds : Vijñānakala, Pralayakala and Sakala. Of them the first is attached with Mala and the others are attached with mala and Karma.

18. The third is known to be subjected to Mala, Māyā and Karma. But the first is of two kinds. viz., Samāpta Kaluṣa and Asamāpta Kaluṣa (the completion of stains has occurred in the one and in the other the stain is yet to be removed).

19. The second whose stain is yet to be removed is again known to be Pakvamala and Apakvamala (the impurity has ripened in the one and not ripened in the other).

20. (a) The two Vijñāna and Pralayakala are located in the pure path; while Sakala being subjected to Kalā (impurities) wanders about in different bodies (Bhuvanas) in accordance with its Karmans.

three kinds. They are known as Vijñākalas Pralayakalas and Sakalas. The first kind of Paśus are bound by the single pāśa called mala while the second kind are bound by two kinds of pāśa called mala and māyā, while the sakalas are bound by three kinds of pāśa, namely mala, māyā and karma.

The Sakalas have bodies and sense organs. They experience different kinds of bhoga due to previous karma (deeds). So long as karma lasts they have to pass through innumerable births. Not only that, they are fettered by three pāśas.

The Pralayakala souls become free from the burden of the body and sense organs during pralaya, great dissolution and remain there as if in deep slumber, but even then these Paśus remain fettered with two pāśas namely mala and karma. They are named so because they remain in the state of liberation during Pralaya and are free from kalā in Pralaya.

The Vijñānakala souls have got the ripening of malas but as this ripening has comparatively grown more in some and less in others they are placed in different positions as regards to their prerogative rights. Though free from malas they have not been given Śivahood because they have the little trace of adhikārimala i.e. they have still the tendency of enjoying the hierarchical rights. The Vijñānakala, whose mala is in a high state of ripening, are placed as vidyeśvaras. They are eight in number.

21-22. (b) The Pāśas are of five kinds.[1] The first two are born of mala and Karma. The others are born of Māyā, Tirodhānaśakti and of Bindu. Although mala is a single entity, it has diverse powers consisting of hiding Dṛkśakti (the power of knowledge) and Kriyāśakti (the power of action).

23. It is like the husk of rice to serve as the cause of bodies of Ātmans in the world. Karma is of the nature of merit and demerit and is the giver of diverse forms of results and experiences.

24. It is abiding in the analogy of sprout and seed permanently in a continuous flow. These are the natures of the former two. O brāhmaṇa, listen to the others beginning with Māyīya.

25. The greatest Ātman is eternal with the property of Sat, Cit and Ānanda (Being, consciousness and bliss). He is Pati of all, is victorious and all-pervading and is the only seed.

26. The excellent splendour of Śambhu never disappears nor does it rise. It confers bliss and assumes the form of knowledge (dṛk) and action (kriyā).[2]

27. The Śakti, by possessing which, Śiva is able to give enjoyment and liberation to the paśus, is verily described as the first, the single and of the nature of cit.

28. Being impelled by Śakti bindu comes about, the nature of which is knowledge and action and is known as Śiva, the cause of all categories and is all-pervading and immutable.

---

1. Pāśas are fetters by which paśus are enticed. Their number is five, namely those which are born of mala, karma, māyā, tirodhāna śakti and bindu. They are also known as the group of five objects (arthapañcakam). It is said :

Malaṁ karma ca māyā ca māyārthamakhilaṁ jagat /
Tirodhānakari śaktirarthapañcakamucyate //

Some read "adhvapañcakam" in place of ardhapañcakam. In support of their view they hold that all the thirtysix categories come under six adhvas, namely varṇa, mantra, pada, kalā, tattva, and bhuvana which in their turn come under five kalās, namely nivṛti, pratiṣṭhā, vidyā, śānti and śāntyatita. Hence they say

Malādijāḥ ṣaḍadhvānaḥ tattvādyāste ca pañcadhā /
Nivṛtyādivibhāgena taduktaṁ hyadhvapañcakam //

2. In Tattvaprakāśa the verse reads :

Nodayati yanna naśyati nirvāti nirvṛtim prayacchati ca /
jñānakriyāsvabhāvaṁ tattejah Śāmbhavaṁ jayati //

29. The Śaktis beginning with icchā taking their resort here perform their respective functions. Hence, O sage, he is known as all-graceful.

30. When it (Bindu) is desirous of creating the universe in order to show grace to the sentient and insentient the first stir evolves in the form of nāda and the world beginning with Śānti etc.

31-35. O greatest of brāhmaṇas, that is the Śakti category which has been mentioned along with its limbs. From it the evolute Sadāśiva category comes about where the power of knowledge is neither predominant nor the power of action is subordinated. When the power of knowledge has lost dominance and the power of action comes to prominence, the category īśvara, which is the agent of every object comes about. When Kriyā (action) is subordinated and Jñāna (knowledge) becomes prominent the Tattva then is Vidyā the nature of which is knowledge and enlightening of all. Nāda and bindu are called sakala and are located in the sādākhyā-tattva, while videśa in the Īśvara tattva and mantra in the vidyā tattva. These categories are described as śuddha adhvan (pure path).

36. Here, the direct cause is Īśa and the material cause is the lord of bindus. It is certain that as these five are devoid of time, there is no sequential order in them.

37-39. Because of the functions he is imagined to be such. In fact, there is only a single tattva which is named Śiva possessed of diverse Śaktis. Because of the employment of śaktis the differentiation of them has truly been formulated. For the purpose of showing grace to the sentient and the insentient the Great Lord has assumed forms and confers grace to those sentient beings obstructed by the primordial mala. The all-merciful Śiva gives them enjoyment of fruits and release as well as makes them capable of doing their respective functions to the groups of insentient beings.

40-42. But release being identity with Śiva and the grace of cit is not possible, because Karmans are without beginning and hence without experiencing them individually, the immutable Lord Śambhu for experiencing them instantly creates bodies, subtle instruments and worlds, for without an agent, from the material and instruments no effect is seen to come about.

43. Here the instruments are Śaktis, while māyā is the material. She is eternal, one and inherently united with Śiva and a being without beginning and end.

44. She is the common cause of all Puruṣas as well as of the world. She is the mother of delusion by nature and consists of Karmnas of all beings.

45-48. The Lord of Vidyā by means of śaktis after causing disturbance in this all-pervading subtle māyā, the highest, and after having taken consideration of Karmans, creates different bodies and their instruments for the sake of experience of Jīvas. Māyā which is made of various śaktis, at first creates the category of Kalā, which, in its turn, creates the world of the future, past and present. Then this māyā gives birth to śakti with the characteristic of restraint.

49-50. As she controls everything, she is known as niyati, then, māyā, the eternal and the cause of delusion to the universe, gives birth also to Kalātattva which has no beginning and no end. She does this by making a unity of all malas and throwing them as if in one corner of the Jīvas manifests the power of agenthood in them. For this reason she is known as Kalā.

51-54. She does her functions upto bhū (the earth) after being subordinated by Kalā and niyati. This very Kalā again, in order to show the objects of experience to puruṣa, gives birth to the category called vidyā which is of the nature of light. She after piercing the vigil of knowledge, shows to the souls the objects of knowledge. Truly, for this reason, she is the instrument. The ātman makes all things object of experience by this excellent means.

55-60. The manifestation of consciousness regarding its object is said to be the experience of pleasure and pain (bhoga) of the experiencer bhoktā. Briefly, the intellect that assumes the form of object as pleasurable, is the object of experience and is related to the experiencer itself. The instrument is called vidyā. If the intellect were self-manifest like the sun, but this is not possible because it becomes the object, hence it depends on some other instrument (Karaṇa), but for vidyā it is possible for it to present the object before ātman. Because of its relation with the instrument and others, it is possible to make itself intent on having the experience of enjoyment and fruits in accordance of its effort—and hence its agenthood is established. If it is accepted as being devoid of agenthood, the term bhoktṛ becomes meaningless. Moreover, the behaviour of Pradhāna towards ātman, if it had not been accepted as the causal agent of the instrument, would have been useless and the enjoyment of fruit would have been impossible. Hence it is ātman who by means of vidyā is the employer of all instruments to be accepted.

61-64. Then Kalā gives birth to rāga as the limbs of vidyā for serving the purpose of enjoyment to the Puruṣa which again is urged to move to work, for this reason it is named as rāga. When being limited by all these tattvas during its state of being the enjoyer, the eternal ātman obtains its name puruṣa. This very Kalā gives birth to avyakta for the purpose of its (Puruṣa's) enjoyment. It is the cause of guṇatattva which is the source of seven knots. The guṇas in their support do not undergo differentiation like the one in the earthly state.

65-70. The substratum belonging to them is called avyakta. Possession of three attributes (guṇas) is possible because of avyakta. They are sattva, rajas and tamas, with light, movement and obscuration or obstruction as their respective characteristics. From guṇa emerges intellect which has the nature (adhyavasāya), determination as regards object of knowledge. Qualitatively it is three-formed and also in accordance with their functions it is said to be so. From mahat evolves ahaṁkāra which has the function of egoism. On account of differentiation in it daily transactions with objects become possible. It, again, becomes three because of the difference of three guṇas like sattva, rajas and tamas which again take the name of taijasa, rājasa and tāmasa. From the taijasa our sense organs of knowledge along with mind evolve. As they have contact with light they serve for the purpose of enlightening. The organs of action originate from rājasa, the cause of activity.

71-73. Tanmātrās, (five subtle elements), the source of the physical elements (bhūtas), are born of tāmasa. The mind has the nature of willing and its function is resolution. The citta has dual functions—effecting the state of the experiencer (bhoktṛ) and delivering the object of experience (before it), for it remains ever engaged as an instrument functioning externally in accordance with its suitability. By means of resolution abiding within itself it facilitates the sense organs to function, and then again brings them within. Hence the mind is called internal instrument (antaḥkaraṇa).

74-77. These internal sense organs are of three kinds, viz. manas, ahaṁkāra, buddhi, volition, energy (saṁrambha) and awareness (bodha) are their modifications respectively.

The instruments of knowledge are the ears, skin, eyes, tongue and nose. Sound, touch, colour, taste, and smell should be known as their objects of knowledge. The organs of speech, hands, feet, organs of evacuation and generation are the instrument of action. They are engaged in the action of speaking, receiving, moving about, excretion and enjoying. There is no activity without the instruments (Karaṇas).

78. After taking hold of the thing to be done by means of ten instruments, activities are performed and exertion is made in it, for he the soul is all-pervading but the instruments are not so.

79. The five subtle elements are the ether, air, fire, water and earth. Out of them the bhūtas that are born are said to possess a single specific quality each.

80. Hence, in all the five there is sound, and touch is found only in other four, colour in three, taste in two, smell in the earth.

81-83. The functions of each are giving space, assembling (vyūhana), enripening (pāka), collecting (saṁgrahaṇa), holding up (dhāraṇā) respectively. The earth and air possess the quality of neither cold nor heat, in the water and there are cold and heat respectively. The colour of the fire is shining but white in the water. The earth possesses white and various other colours. In the three bhūtas there is colour. Sweet taste is found in the water only but six kinds of tastes are found in the earth. The smell in the earth is called fragrant and non-fragrant.

84-85. The elements are endowed with qualities and nourished by tanmātrās. The bhūtas (elements) have these special qualities but they are devoid of any special quality.

These five bhūtas are placed everywhere. The entire movable and immovable world is made of five elements.

86. Now it is being reviewed how they are located in the body. The bones, flesh, hair, skin, nails and teeth are earthly ones.

87. Water is present in urine, blood, phlegm, sweat and semen etc. Fire is present in the heart, in digestion, in eyes and in the bile, because its functional attributes are found there.

88-89 Kalâ is the employer, from its beginning to the end of the earth—these are to serve the purpose of the soul (aṇu). The entire categories are planned for giving distinctive enjoyment of each individual soul.

90. Thus the tattvas beginning with kalā are distinctly associated with each individual puruṣa. They wander about in all bodies on account of their past karmans.

91. The bond (Pāśa) called māyīya envelopes the universe. From the earth to Kalā it is known as the impure path (aśuddha adhvâ).

92. Whatever is there in the sphere of the earth is of movable and immovable character. The immovable are the hills and trees and the movable are of three kinds.

93. They are svedaja (sweat-born), aṇḍaja (egg-born) and jarāyuja (womb-born). There are eightyfour thousand hundred of yonis (wombs).

94. Wandering about in them the jīva once obtains the human body as a result of its previous deeds. This body fulfils all sorts of desired objects.

95. It is very rare that one is born in the higher families of brahmins due to meritorious deeds of higher order and specially in the region of Bhārata.

96-100. The birth occurs by the union of the male and female and by the mingling of semen and blood. A drop containing both enters the womb. If the blood content is more the child becomes a female. If the semen content is higher the child will be male. When an ātman is encompassed by mala and karman, it is known as Sakala. It remains then in the womb, is nourished by food and drink consumed by its mother. The body goes on increasing by fortnights, months and the period of time. The soul is afflicted with pains and suffering and the body remains enveloped with the embryo. Thus stationed in the womb it remembers the meritorious and non-meritorious deeds of previous lives. He remains dejected and afflicted.

101. In course of time the child causing pain to its mother and being afflicted itself descends down-faced from the womb-machine.

102. It remains still for some moments, then wishes to cry. Then gradually it grows up day after day.

103. It attains youth after passing through childhood and pauganḍa stages (a boy, one from his 5th the to 9th year). In this way the body of the embodied soul comes about.

104. After the attainment of rare human body which is beneficial to all, one who makes no effort to get released is the most sinful of all.

105. The general characteristics of animal beings are said to be taking of food, sleep, fear and sexual intercourse.

106. One who is attached to these four is a stupid and the killer of his own soul. The great virtue of man is cutting off his own bond.

107. The removal of the bond in the form of a pāśa (cord) comes about by means of dīkṣā (initiation). Hence, for the removal of the bond one should get initiation by means of a mantra.

108. By means of śakti as knowledge in the form of initiation one gets the removal of bondage and attains nirvāṇa known to be the pure ātmatattva.

109. He sees Śiva with the vision which has the character of śakti and meditates in that way. He offers oblations with Śivamantra for the good of his own self and for the good of others.

110. The cit (consciousness) as sight, sees Śiva, Śakti and also his own self freed from veils. The sight has been made capable of seeing them by Śiva, the sun and śakti as his rays.

111. The knowledge which is the modulation of the inner organ (antaḥkaraṇa) is not able to manifest Śiva because this is a bond like fetters.

112. It is only initiation which is the excellent means of cutting off the bond. Hence according to scriptural method one should receive initiation with a mantra.

113. One who has been initiated in the Tāntrika form should be devoted to discipline and conduct of one's caste and should perform obligatory and occasional rites.

114-115. One should not transgress even by mind the rites enjoined to one's caste and āśrama. The man who has received his initiation in a particular āśrama should continue to stay in that āśrama and follow the discipline of that. Even the deeds performed shall not be conducive to bondage.

116-118. The only fruitful rite is the one which originates from the practice of mantras. Whatever enjoyment does the initiated person desire of worldly and other-worldly nature, he enjoys due to the efficacy of propitiation of mantras. Having enjoyed them (in a proper way) he attains liberation. After getting initiated, if a man does not perform obligatory and occasional rites, he attains the state of piśāca for some time and attains release. Hence, the initiated person should perform nitya and naimittika rites.

119-120. It is inferred that the performance of rites is to be observed by those who have received initiation. The man who performs obligatory and occasional rites attains instantaneous release because no deficiency in initiation has occurred in him. Even then, the final destination is attained by the one who is devoted to his guru, teacher, but not otherwise.

121-124. Śiva, the all-benefactor, is established in the image of the Guru, and he does this by means of initiation. But devotion to Guru is thought to be artificial if it is shown to him only because of his bestowing the temporal good. His devotion to him would be futile and he should have to perform atonement of sins at every step.

One who is loyally devoted to his guru physically, mentally and verbally need not perform any expitiatory rite. He attains siddhi at every step. Should the teacher impart mantras falsely to the one who is endowed with devotion and who has dedicated his all, to the teacher, the teacher should do atonement of sins.

CHAPTER SIXTYFOUR

Procedure of Initiation

Sanatkumāra said :

1. I shall tell you about the procedure of initiation for the removal of bond (pāśa), the accomplisher of desire and also let you know the potency of the mantra.

2. Since it bestows the divine state and dispels sins, it is called dīkṣā by all exponents well-versed in the Āgamas.

3. Mananam (deliberation) means intuitive understanding of everything, trāṇam means rescuing the worldly people by showing grace to them. It is called mantra because it is endowed with intuitive knowledge and the quality of rescuing others.

4. The mantras are of three kinds, viz., the feminine, masculine, neuter. The mantras of the feminine kind have dviṭha = svāhā at the end and those ending with hūm and phaṭ are masculine.

5. The neuters have namaḥ in the end. These are known to be the species of mantras. It is to be known that the mantras have male superintending deities, while vidyās have female deities.

6. These mantras are considered good in ṣaṭkarmans. They are again of three kinds viz. with tāra = oṁ, those with repha = ra in the end, and those with svāhā are known to be āgneya = referring to fire.

7. But, O sage, the saumyas (born of the moon) are said to be those which are endowed with Bhṛgu = sa and pīyūṣa = va, seed letters = am. In this way the mantras of agniṣoma kind are to be known by the learned people.

8. The mantras of āgneya nature are awakend when breathing flows through the piṅgalā channel. When the air flows through the left hand path the saumya mantras are awakened.

9. The mantras are awakened when they flow along both the nāḍīs. When the mantras remain asleep it gives adverse results if repeated then.

10. Uttering every letter of the mantra beginning with a and ending in la. While doing this in the descending order (anuloma) there should be bindu and in the ascending order (viloma) visarga should be added.

11. When the mantra is uttered in this way, the deity becomes awakened and yields the result quickly. Even an evil mantra becomes fruitful when it is repeated with a rosary.

12. In a cruel deed the āgneya mantras are efficacious, while in an agreeable deed saumyas are beneficial. Even the raudra mantra becomes pacifying when it is added with the mantra-seeds belonging to the śānti species.

13. Even the śānta becomes cruel when hūm, phaṭ are added to it. Those which are stained with the fault like cchinna etc. are not able to protect the aspirant (sādhaka).

14-19.[1] Cchinna (broken), ruddha (checked), devoid of power (śaktihīna), then again with the face turned back (parāṅmukha) (karṇahīna) deaf, blind, barred, obstructed (stambhita), dagdha (burnt), trasta (frightened), bhīta (afraid), malina (dirty), tiraskṛta, bhedita, suṣupta (sleeping) madonmatta, mūrchita, hatavīrya, bhrānta, pradhvasta, bālaka, kumāra, yuvā, prauḍha and nistriṁśaka, nirbīja, devoid of siddhi, manda, Kūṭa, niraṁśaka, devoid of sattva, kekara, devoid of bīja, dhūmita, āliṅgita, mohita, kṣudhārta (hungry), highly bright atidīpta, devoid of limbs aṅgahīna. manda (highly enraged), atikruddha, highly cruel, atikrūra, brīḍita (bashful), praśāṇtamānasa, sthānabhraṣṭa vikala (very old), ativṛddha, nisneha (merciless), pīḍita (afflicted). The account of all faults has been given. Now I shall give their definitions.

20. The mantras either, joined or not joined with other letters or united with long vowels thrice, four times and five times are called cchinna (broken).

21-22. The mantra in the beginning of which there is the fire bīja = ram placed four or five times is cchinna. The mantra in the beginning, middle and the end of which there are bhubīja inserted twice (bhū = lam) is called ruddha mantra which gives siddhi with much trouble.

1. The verses 14-59 give an account of mantras which are considered to be defective because of the presence or absence of some syllables and show the method how the defects can be removed. In Kṛṣṇānanda's Tantrasāra they have been quoted from Viśvasāra Tantra. In Śāradā Tilaka we find the same verses, pp. 82-94.

23. The mantra which is without māyā = hrīm, tritattva = hūm, lakṣmībīja = śrīm, rāva = phrem, is known to be devoid of power and is fruitful after a long period of time.

24. The mantra in the beginning of which there is no kāmabīja = klīm, in the end there is neither māyā = hrīm or aṁkuśa = kroṁ is called parāṅmukha (face turned back). Those who are devoted to such a mantra will get siddhi late.

25. If sakāra is seen in the beginning, in the middle and in the end, that kind of mantra is said to be badhira (dumb) and offers a very little fruit even after a strenuous effort.

26. If a five-syllabled mantra is devoid of repha = ra, arka = ha. indu = sa, it is to be known as netrahīna (devoid of eyes), even after strain it does not give any siddhi.

27. That is to be known as kīlita (barred) in which in the beginning, in the middle, or in the end there is no haṁsaḥ, prāsāda = haum, vāgbhava = aim, haṁsendu = ham, sakāra = sa, phaṭkāra = phaṭ, varma = hūm, māyā = hrīm, namāmi.

28-29. When astra = phaṭ or la in the middle and in the end both these astra and lakāra exist that mantra is said to be stambhita (benumbed) and it causes obstruction in the way of siddhi, when agni = ram with vāyu = yam is seen in the end of a mantra seven times, that mantra is said to be dagdha (burnt).

30-31. If the astra = phaṭ is seen with a two, three, six and eight syllabled mantra, that mantra is to be known as trasta (frightened) and also it is to be known as trasta if there is no tāra = om in the beginning of it. It is called bhīta (afraid) mantra if there is neither Śiva = ha nor Śakti = sa in the beginning.

32. The mantra which contains four mas in the beginning, the middle and the end, is to be known as malina (defiled) and it gives siddhi after a great strain.

33-34. If there are two bhyas (dative plural) in the end, vaṣaṭ and vauṣaṭ in the middle the mantra is bhedita. It should be eschewed. It is beneficial only with a great strain.

35-36. The mantra that has three syllables and is devoid of haṁsa is said to be suṣupta (slumbering). If either the vidyā or the mantra has seventeen syllables and contains five phaṭ etc in the beginning it is known as madonmatta (furiously intoxicated). While if astra = phaṭ exists in the middle that mantra is said to be mūrcchita (unconscious).

37. The mantra in the end of which there is astra = phaṭ is called hatavīrya (the virility of which is destroyed).

38-40. If the mantra in the beginning, the middle and the end has four phaṭkāras, it is called bhrānta (gone astray). The mantra consisting of eighteen syllables or again of twenty syllables, or endowed with smara = klīm, hṛllekha = hrīm, aṁkuśabīja = krom is called pradhvasta (annihilated). The mantra consisting of seven letters is bāla (boy), of eight letters is kumāra, of sixteen letters is yuvā (youth) : of thirty, sixty-four and hundred syllables is prauḍha.

41. A mantra consisting of four hundred syllables is vṛddha (old). A mantra with nine syllables is called nistriṁśa = killer.

42-44. If at the end of mantra the hṛdaya = namaḥ, the śirasmantra = svāhā in the middle, in the end śikha = vaṣat, varma = hūm, astra = phaṭ are seen and is devoid of śiva = ha and śakti = sa, that mantra is called nirbīja. If a mantra has in the beginning, in the end, in the middle six phaṭkāras it is siddhihīna (devoid of Siddhi). The (mantra made of five syllables is called manda (slow) so also the mantra of ten syllables is manda. A single-syllabled mantra is kūṭa. Another name for the same is niraṁśaka (having no parts).

45-47. The mantra with two syllables is sattvahīna (devoid of essence). Kekara is having four syllables. The mantra with six syllables is called bījahīna. A mantra with seven and half syllables or twelve and a half syllables is dhūmita (smoke-enveloped). It is censured. A mantra with three and half bījas, or twenty syllables, or twentyone syllables or thirty syllables is āliṅgita (embraced). The mantra with as many syllables or with thirtytwo syllables is said to be mohita.

48. A mantra with twentyfour or twentyseven syllables is known to be kṣudhārta (hungry) and is devoid of mantra siddhi.

49. If the mantra is made of eleven or twentyfive or twentythree syllables it is named as dṛpta (arrogant).

50. A mantra of twentysix, twentynine or thirtysix syllables is called aṅgahīna (devoid of limbs).

51. A mantra with twentyeight or thirtyone syllables is atikrūra (very cruel). It is condemned in every rite.

52. The mantra with its number of syllables ranging between forty to sixtythree is known as brīḍita. It is incompetent in any of the holy rites.

53-56. Mantras of sixtyfive syllables are known as śānta-mānasas (of quiescent minds). O leading sage, those mantras with the number of their syllables ranging between sixtyfive and navananda (i.e. $9\times9=81$) should be known as (sthāna-bhraṣṭa) fallen from their places. Mantras with thirteen and fifteen syllables are called vikalas (deficient) by the exponent of tantras. If the number of syllables in the mantras is hundred and hundred and fifty, dvinavatyekahīna (one less than twice ninety $=179$) two hundred or three hundred, those mantras are said to be niḥsneha (lacking in affection).

57. O brahmin, the mantras containing the number ranging from four hundred and thousand śyllables are called atibṛddha (too old). They are said to be śithila (loose) in their application.

58. Mantras with more than a thousand syllables above this are known to be the form of stotras (hymns of prayer).

59-60. Thus the mantras with defects are recounted. If people respect them without knowing these defects, they will not be able to attain siddhis even in hundreds and crores of Kalpas. I shall now mention the procedure how to do practice with the mantras defiled with cchinna and other defects.

61. Sitting in the Yonimudrā posture one who repeats any of the mantras with all concentration, all siddhis will be attained by him.

62. The left heel should be placed beneath the rectum and the right heel over the penis. This is called Yonimudrā-bandha. This is an excellent sitting posture.

63. O Nārada, there is also other method of making the Yonimudrā. I shall give an account of it later with it secrets.

64-67.[1] The qualifications of a good ācārya are as follows : He must be devoted to the performance of nitya rites. He must be obedient to his own preceptor. He must be of pleasing appearance and must have received abhiṣeka. He must be handsome, gentle-faced, quiet, of noble parentage, easily accessible, and one possessing self-control. He must be one conversant with the real meanings of mantras and tantras. He must be capable of showing grace and restraint. He must be a sage of good self-control, not expecting anything. He must speak beneficent words. He must be clever and capable of expounding the real truth. He must be humble and well-dressed. He must be performing the duties of āśramas. He must be engaged in meditation, dispeller of doubts and intelligent. He must regularly perform obligatory rites.

68-70. The disciple should be quiet, humble, of pure soul, endowed with all characteristics. He must be endowed with śama (self-control) and other means, be of good faith possessing stability of heart, partaker of pure food and drink and of pure mind. He must stead-fastly follow sacred rites, be grateful and afraid of sins. His mind must be interested in meditation on the guru and his mind be attached to hear the story and engaged in the service of his guru. Such a person shall be the true disciple, otherwise he accords misery to his preceptor.

CHAPTER SIXTYFIVE

The procedure of repeating the mantras

Sanat Kumāra said :

1-3.[1] The preceptor shall examine the disciple and then go to perform purificatory rites of the mantras. He shall draw five lines east-west and north-south in order to make a square of $4 \times 4 = 16$ squares. Then in the first of the squares he should write the first letter (a) (of the vowel) and (dropping the next) he shall write the second in the first of the second square. The third letter should be placed in the first of the third square and in the fourth the fourth letter should be written. The fifth letter of each should be written in the southeast square of each letter. After writing thus the intelligent man must purify the mantra.

4-6. Beginning with the first letter of the name of the worshipper one should go on writing all the letters of the name and all the syllables of the mantra till both are completed. Then the learned man should purify the mantra. In the square where there is the letter of the name it is called sādhya. The third is called susiddha and the fourth is ari.

7. The mantrika syllable second to it is known as siddha-sādhya. The third is susiddha and the fourth is siddhāri.

8-9. If in this square, which is different from the square where the letter of the name is, the second syllable of the mantra is present, then beginning with that square one should calculate in the way as before : Sādhya-siddha, sādhya-sādhya, sādhya-susiddha and sādhya-ari.

10-12. If in the third group of squares the syllable of the mantra is present, the ācāryas call them in their order (as previously) susiddha-siddha, susiddha-sādhya, susiddha-susiddha, susiddha-ari. In the fourth group of squares they call them

1. The verses give the details of the method how a particular mantra is suitable to the disciple who is desirous of initiation. Some mantra is considered to be Siddha, Sādhya, Susiddha and Ari (inimical) in accordance with the syllables of the mantra and the syllables of the disciples i.e. letters of his personal name.

As the diagram begins with a ka tha ha inside the first square it is known as akathaha cakra. The diagram is given below :

ari-siddha, ari-sādhya, ari-susiddha and ari-ari. In the fourth group of squares, they should be calculated as ari-siddha, ari-sādhya, ari-susiddha, and ari-ari. Among them the siddha-siddha accords desired effect by twice the repetition of the mantra.

13. The siddha-susiddha gives result by half repetition while siddha-ari kills the kinsman. The sādhya-siddha becomes fruitful with double effort and sādhya-sādhya gives result with a delay.

14. Sādhya-susiddha with double effort and sādhya-ari kills friends but susiddha-siddha by means of half repetition and susiddha-sādhya with the repetition doubly.

15-16. But sādhya-susiddha gives the result immediately after one receives it but susiddha-ari is the destroyer of household members. The ari-siddha mantra is the killer of some and ari-sādhya is the destroyer of the daughter. The ari-susiddha is the destroyer of the wife. The ari-ari is the killer of the sādhaka himself. O sage, there are various other forms regarding this.

17-19. This cakra is the most important of all. It is named as akathaha cakra and has been given an account of it to you here. Thus having purified the mantra, the guru shall then initiate the disciple in an auspicious time and place. The procedure is being mentioned. After having obligatory rites and showing reverence (praṇāma) to the guru's pādukā (sandals), he should pray to the sadguru (right kind of guru) for the desired mantra with great respect after propitiating him with clothes, ornaments, cows, gold and plots of land etc.

20. After performing the hailing rites (svasti-vidhānam) and drawing maṇḍalas (sacrificial diagram) the teacher with a satisfied mood and pure of heart should enter the sacrificial chamber accompanied by the disciple.

21-25. Then with the water from the argha for the general purpose and uttering phaṭ, one should cleanse the door-lintel. He should ward off the heavenly obstacles, the obstacles of sky with water. Hitting the ground thrice with his heels he should ward off earthly ones. Then he should proceed with the ritual. In the diagram of sarvatobhadra[1] which has accordingly been drawn with colours, he should offer worship to the disc of the fire and should offer rituals to its Kalā. The jar made according to one's capacity and washed with astramantra = phaṭ should be placed (on the diagram). Then one should offer rituals according to the right procedure to all the Kalās of the sun. He shall fill the jar with pure water uttering all the letters of the alphabets in their ascending order (vilomamātṛka) along with the mūlamantra. Then he should offer rituals to all the Kalās of the moon.

26-27. Dhūmrārci, uṣmā, jvalinī, jvālinī, visfuliṅginī suśrī, surūpā, kapilā, havyavahā, kavyavahā—these are the kalās of the fire just mentioned. Now the names of the sun's kalās are being mentioned. Tapinī, tāpini, dhūmrā, marīcī, jvālini, ruci, suṣumnā, bhogadā, viśvā, bodhinī, dhāriṇī, kṣamā.

1. Sarvatobhadra maṇḍala is a complex diagram which is given in Śāradā Tilaka, pp. 221-225.

28-29. The kalās of the moon are to be known as amṛtā, mānadā, pūṣā, tusṭi. puṣṭi, rati, dhṛti, śaśinī, candrikā, kānti, jyotsnā, śrī, prīti, aṅgadā, pūrṇā, pūrṇāmṛtā. The Kalās of the moon are just mentioned.

30. The jar should be wrapped with a pair of clothes and one should put sarvausadhi (medicinal herbs) inside it and also nine kinds of gems. Then he should place five pallavas (twigs) over it.

31-32. They (the twigs) should be known of jack tree, mango tree, the banyan tree, the holy fig tree and vakula tree. The nine gems are pearls, ruby, lapis lazuli, onyx, diamond, coral, red-stone, sapphire and emerald. After putting these gems into the water he shall invoke the desired deity.

33. Then after worshipping according to the right method the worshipper, adept in mantras makes the disciple properly adorned sit on the altar. He shall sprinkle him with water from the vessel called proksaṇī.

34-35. He should purify bhūtas[1] (elements) with the proper method in his body. He should further be purified by means of nyāsas and twigs should be placed on his head. He shall pour the water which has been consecrated with the mūlamantra one hundred and eight times on the beloved

1. The purification of bhūtas, the elements of the physical body by means of prāṇāyāma. The aspirant takes the soul having the shape of the lamp's flame from its resort of the heart down to Mūlādhāra and after rousing Kulakuṇḍalinī from its place starts for sahasrāra and pierces the six plexuses along its journey. He tries to dissolve all the tattvas to their source. Then he makes a prāṇāyāma (pūraka, recaka and kumbhaka) repeating the syllables yam and while doing this he shall meditate that the body has become purified along with the pāpapuruṣa who has its resort in the left belly. Then he makes another prānāyāma with the syllables ram and thus burns the body along with the pāpapuruṣa. Then he should rebuild the pure body by means of the syllables ṭham and join it with the bindu in the middle of the eye-brow. This is pūraka and Kumbhaka should be done with the syllables vam and with it he rebuilds the pure body as if made with the flow of nectar from the moon. The recaka is done by him with the syllable lam and thus he makes the newly built body strong by this seed.

disciple. while the guru goes on repeating the mūlamantras in his mind.

36. The child (the disciple) shall perform âcamana (sipping of water) with the rest of the water and should put on new clothes. Then bowing to the teacher in the proper way he (the disciple) should take his seat again in front of him.

37. Then placing his hand on the head the guru should repeat the mantra to be given to him one hundred and eight times in accordance with the injunctions.

38-39. 'Let it be equal' saying this he shall impart the mantra. The disciple shall then worship the guru. Placing his hand smeared with sandal paste, on the head of the disciple, he shall with great purity of heart repeat the mantra into his ears eight times. The disciple who has thus learnt the vidyā shall fall at the feet of the guru.

40. O dear one, get up, you are liberated. Be of perfectly disciplined conduct. May you for ever enjoy renown, glory, splendour, progeny, strength, longevity and health.

41. Then the disciple shall get up and worship his guru by means of sweet perfume (gandha, puṣpa, dhūpa, dīpa etc.). Then he should give him fees without being niggard regarding money.

42. After obtaining the mantra thus, from the teacher, the disciple shall be engaged in rendering service to the teacher. through riches, through his sons and wife and his personal self.

43. The desired deity should be worshipped in the middle Offering handful of flowers to it he shall worship the deities : Agni, Nairṛti and Vāgīśa.

44-46.[1] When he worships viṣṇu in the middle, he shall worship Vināyaka, Ravi (sun) Śiva and Śivā outside them. When

1. These verses give direction as to how a person who has received Pañcâyatana dīkṣā should worship his desired deity and other deities who accompany them. At first the main deity should occupy the middle and the other four will be placed in four different corners. If Śakti is considered to be the main deity then its yantra should be drawn in the middle. Viṣṇu will occupy NE, Śiva SE, Gaṇeśa SW, Sūrya NW. Similarly, if Viṣṇu is in the middle Śiva will occupy NE, Gaṇeśa SE. Sūrya SW, Ambikā NW. If he worships Śaṅkara in the middle, he shall worship the Sun, Gaṇeśa, Ambā and Hari outside them. When he worships Śiva in the middle, he shall worship Īśa, Vighneśvara, the Sun and Govinda outside. If he worships Gaṇanāyaka (Gaṇeśa) in the middle he shall worship Śivā, Śiva, the Sun and Viṣṇu outside. When the Sun is worshipped in the middle he shall worship Gaṇeśa, Viṣṇu, Ambā, and Śiva respectively.

47-50. Thus he shall worship respectfully the five deities every dav. The wise man should get up from bed in the brāhmamuhūrta (about an hour before dawn) and perform all necessary duties. Without any doubt while in bed he should meditate on his Guru with hands bestowing boons and fearlessness seated in the akathaha triangle in the disc of the moon placed on the thousand-petalled white lotus of his head. The guru has two eyes and arms. He has white garlands and sandal pastes and unguents. He is associated with Śakti in his left. Thus meditating he should offer services (upacāra) to him mentally and then repeat the padukāmantra ten times.

51-53. Vāk = ai, māyā = Śrī, viyat = ha, sa, kha, pha, agni = ra, ha, sa, kṣa, la, va, ya, marut = ya with Vāmakarṇa = ū and indu = o, then bhṛgu = au, ākāśa = ha, kha, pha, agni = ra adorned with bhaga = e, indu = o, sa, ha, kṣa, ma, la, toya = va, sa, ha, kṣa, ma, la, toya = va, agni = ra, marut = ya joined with śānti = ū. Then uttering the name of a person as Śrī etc. and ending it with Nandanātha, and again the name of the consort as amukī, devyambā, the worshipper would say, 'I am worshipping the śrīpādukā' and end with hṛt = namaḥ.

54. This śripādūkāmantra is the bestower of all attainments of human beings. Then uttering the verse beginning with guhya etc. the learned man should offer it (the deeds) to the guru and should make obeisance to him with the following mantra.

55. Obeisance to that holy preceptor by whom the universe consisting of the mobile and immobile beings and having the shape of a partless sphere has been pervaded and by whom that region has been shown.

Śaṅkara is in the middle, Viṣṇu will occupy NE, Sūrya SE. Gaṇeśa SW, Ambikā NW. If Sūrya is in the middle, Śiva will occupy NE, Gaṇeśa SE, Viṣṇu SW, Ambikā NW. If Gaṇeśa is in the middle Viṣṇu will occuyy NE, Śiva SE, Sūrya SW, Ambikā NW.

56. Obeisance to that holy preceptor by whom my eyes have been opened up by means of the pin (śalākā) for the application of collyrium in the form of knowledge, when I had been blinded by the darkness of ignorance.

57. I bow down to the giver whose nature is non-different from my desired deity and whose words of nectar remove the worldly poison.

58. Thus making an obeisance he should read out the hymnal verses which bestow on the one instantaneous faith.

59. Om, obeisance unto you, O holy lord, Śiva, in the form of the preceptor. You assume diverse forms for the descent of vidyās and their establishment. I bow to you, the abode of fish form, obeisance to the one of only the real form.

60-64. Obeisance to you, the sun, the dispeller of darkness of ignorance of all sorts, obeisance to you as condensed cit (consciousness). Obeisance to the independent one who has assumed the physical form out of grace but who is Śiva by nature. I bow to you who are subservient to his devotees and who assume forms according to the temperament of the tranquil-minded. Obeisance to the quality of the discrimination of those who are discreet. Obeisance to the light of all lights and to the form of the knower. Obeisance to you in front, behind and on either side. Obeisance to you both above and below. Always stand by in the form of sat (being) and cit (consciousness) and maintain your posture. O lord, thanks to your favour, I am contented in every respect. I am liberated from the deadly noose of māyā. I am Śiva.

After worshipping in this way he shall dedicate everything to his preceptor.

65. From the morning to evening and from the evening to the end of the morning thus, whatever I do O lord of the universe, may that be your worship.

66. Thereafter, the wise disciple should conceive that as his own ātman free from impurities. It has been washed with the continuous flow of nectar from the lotus feet of the guru.

67-70. He should meditate that the mūlavidyā is flowing along the path from mūlādhāra to brahmarandhra. In the circular disc of the air, just below the mūlādhāra there lies the vāyubīja. By means of the air born of the seed of the air, one should go to the triangular shaped location of the fire and by means of the fire born of the fire-seed lying there, one should awaken Kulakuṇḍalinī as stationed in the mūlādhāra in the form of a sleeping serpent coiled round the svayambhūliṅga. She should be meditated upon as subtle like the thread of the stalk of the lotus. It has the lustre of ten million lightenings and is very subtle. Thus meditating on her one should awaken her by means of Kūrcabīja = hūm.

71. In accordance with the method as given by his guru, the wise man should take her (kuṇḍalinī) to the brahmarandhra along the path of suṣumnā while piercing the six cakras.

72-73. He should meditate upon the ātman there as has immersed entirely in the nectar and all the universe is pervaded by the pure cinmaya mass of light. Thenceforth, he should bring it back to its own place and meditate the deity (deva) in his heart. Thus seeing him before, he should offer everything mentally. He should pray to him with the following mantra.

74. O Viṣṇu, lord of Śrī, you are the primordial lord of the three worlds, it is due to your command that I get up in the morning. I shall pursue the journey of worldly existence in order to please you.

75. O brahmin, if some other deity is to be worshipped, suitable words must be substituted in place of Viṣṇu. He should perform the offering of ajapā for the attainment of everything.

76. The jiva continuously repeats the Gāyatrī in the form of ajapā twentyone thousand and six hundred times during day and night.

77. The sage is haṁsa and avyaktagāyatrī is said to be its metre, the deity is paramahaṁsa the end of the letter śa and following it = sa and also the end of it is ha as its bīja.

78-79. Then he should perform the rite of ṣaḍaṅga. The leading sādhaka should apply these ṣaḍaṅgas with sūrya, soma, nirañjana, nirābhāsa, dharma and jñāna beginning with haṁsāya and ending with ātmane (as haṁsāya sūryātmane namaḥ).

80. The letter ha having the brilliance of the sun goes out and sakāra of the same nature goes inside. This is said to be the dhyāna (meditation) on them.

81.[1] Thus meditating, the wise person should offer them in the fire and the sun separately in the mūlādhāra having four petals inscribed with seed-letters beginning with va and ending in sa and resembling the vandhūka flower.

82. He shall offer six hundred to Gaṇeśa the lord of words (Vāk) who is possessed of his consort riding on an elephant and whose hands shine with noose, goad, the vessel of nectar and sweets.

83-86. In the svādhiṣṭhāna with the colour resembling coral and inscribed with the letters beginning with ba and ending in la, he should offer six thousand of them to Brahmā riding on a swan associated with his śakti in his left side. He, born of lotus, is the lord of vidyās, has in his hands sruva (sacrificial ladle) and the garland of akṣamālā. In the maṇipūra having latters beginning with da and ending in pha and with the colour of clouds shining with the flashes of lightning, he should offer six thousand to Viṣṇu who holds śaṅkha, cakra, gadā lotus and is accompanied by Śrī.

87-88. In the anāhata with twelve letters beginning with ka and ending in ṭha having white colours, he should offer six thousand to Rudra riding on the bull : The deity is carrying a trident (śūla), abhaya and the vessel of nectar. He is the over-lord of vidyā and is accompanied by his Śakti on his left.

89-92. In the viśuddha with sixteen petals adorned with sixteen vowels (svaras) and of white colour he should offer to Īśvara accompanied with prāṇaśakti. He is the light of all lights

1. The verses 81-91 give the method of Prāṇāgnihotra and show how the breaths are to be offered to different deities located in the plexuses along the path of Suṣumnā. The first 600 are to be offered to Gaṇeśa located in the mūlādhāra. Next comes svādhiṣṭhāna, where Brahmā is located. The six thousand are to be offered to him. In the Maṇipūra region to Viṣṇu another six thousand are to be offered. To Rudra who is in the Anāhata, another six thousand are to be offered. To Sadāśiva in the ājñā region one thousand are offered and lastly in the Sahasrāra where nāda and bindu are in equilibrium the last thousand breaths are to be offered.

and the overlord of all indriyas (sense-organs). In the ājñācakra with the letters ha and kṣa inscribed on two of its petals, he should offer one thousand to Sadāśiva, the guru accompanied by Parāśakti. The great lotus of sahasrāra attached with nāda and bindu is lighted with the letters of mātṛkā and he has in his hands the mudrās called vara and abhaya. He should offer one thousand such to his eternal guru.

93-97. He shall then take water on the hollow palm of his hand and say : This japa of ajapā of the number of twenty-one thousand and six hundred naturally becomes fulfilled when it is done separately. May Viṣṇu, the bestower of release (mokṣa) be pleased with this saṁkalpa (desire). One is liberated from great sins by this mere desire. "I am brahman itself and not one who undergoes worldly sufferings. I am eternally liberated and free from grief. I am of the nature of being consciousness and bliss." Thus he should think about his ātman. Thereafter, he should perform the worship of the deities and the duties regarding his body. I shall mention the method regarding it and of the right conduct.

CHAPTER SIXTYSIX

Daily Prayers and Ritual

Sanat Kumāra said :

1-2. Then according to the breath placing his feet on the ground he should pray : "O consort of Viṣṇu, you are ocean-girdled and mountain-breasted one, I bow to you. Please pardon the fault of the touch of my feet." Thus making a prayer to the earth one should go on wandering about in his own accord.

3-5. Then going to the south-western direction of the village he should repeat this mantra : "May the sages, devas, piśācas, guhyakas, groups of pitṛs and bhūtas leave the ground. I shall now discharge my feces (mala)." Thus after repeating this mantra and clapping his hands thrice and covering his head with a piece of cloth, he should sit facing south during the night and facing north during the day he should discharge the waste matter and then do cleansing business with clay and water.[1]

6. He should apply clay once in the penis, thrice in the rectum, ten times on the left hand, seven times on both the hands and three times on each of the feet.

7. Having done the purification he should gargle twelve times. He shall then make a prayer to the tree with the following mantra.

8. "O king of the forest (tree), grant us longevity, strength, renown, splendour, progeny, animals, riches, glory, intellect and ready wisdom."

9-10. After praying thus, he shall take a tooth brush twig twelve digits in length repeating the mantra of kāma (klīm). He should utter the mantra putting kāmadeva and sarva-janapriya (the lord kāma who is favourite of all) in the dative and end it with hṛt = namaḥ. The brush thus adorned with kāmabīja should be used for cleansing the teeth.

11-16.[1] He should scrape the tongue and wash the face with vāgbhava = aim and with the mūlamantra he should wash his face. Then going to the temple of the deity he should remove the flowers and garlands of the previous day. After putting on a pure cloth he should perform the maṅgala-ārārtrika (the auspicious waving of lamps and incense before the deity). He should sprinkle water with astra = phaṭ on the lampstand and light it with mūlamantra. Then worshipping the vessel and getting up (from his seat) he should ring the bell while going on waving the lamp all round which has been prepared from good cow ghee. The ārārtrika of the deity should be done with the accompaniment of pleasing instrumental and vocal music. Thus performing the nīrājana (the waving of lamps) and offering prayer to his own deity he should proceed towards a river for taking a bath. On the way he should go on uttering the glorious deeds of the deity. Then after reaching the holy water he should bow unto it and then placing the necessary things for bathing (on the bank) he should collect some clay charged with mūlamantra and apply it from his waist to the feet and then wash it with the holy water.

1. See Manu and Yāj ñavalkya (Ācāra section).

17-20. Then with five portions he should wash his feet and entering the water again upto the navel and taking the clay kept in the left hand he should smear the wrist, palm and the tips of the left hand. After taking clay from Gaṅgā with phaṭ mantra he, the knower of the mantras, should whirl it round his head and then cast it over himself. He should smear the six limbs with the clay left in the palm. Then after entering the water he should wash them away properly. This is called malasnāna[1] (bath for the removal of impurities). Then meditating on everything as made of his desired deity, he should perform the internal bathing.

21-22. He should recall the Lord, in the embodied form with the mantra as follows : He is shining like infinite suns and is adorned with his weapons and ornaments. One should meditate that the flow is emerging from the water of his feet and is entering his body through the brahmarandhra. He should wash away the impurities of the internal body with it.

23-30. He will at that very moment become free from impurities and crystal-clear. Then he should take his bath according to the vedic injunctions. After that he should do mantrasnāna[2] the procedure of which is being mentioned. He should mention the time and place (of ablution). He shall then perform prāṇāyāma along with six aṅgas. He shall invoke the holy rivers from the disc of the sun by means of muṣṭimudrā.[3] "O Divākara, all the sacred rivers are touched by the sun's rays. Thanks to that truth, give the holy rivers (tīrthas) unto me. O Gaṅgā, O Yamunā, O Godāvarī, O Sarasvatī, O Narmadā,

1. For further information regarding malasnāna see svachanda tantra. Paṭala 2, pp 2-4.

2. These verses give details of mantrasnāna. For further details see Kulacūḍāmaṇi as quoted by Kṛṣṇānanda in Tantrasāra.

3. Muṣṭimudrā is defined thus : Clench both the fists of the hands and place the fist of the right hand above the left one.

O Sindhu, O Kāverī, be present in this water." After invoking the holy rivers in the water he should unite them with the seed mantra of sudhā = vam, in the water. Then showing the gomudrā[1] he should cause it to become nectar and veil it with Kavaca = hūm. Then he should protect it with astra = phaṭ and show Cakramudrā.[2] The learned worshipper should invoke the disc of the fire, the sun and the moon and charge the water with arkamantra and sudhābīja = vam and then the water should be charged with the worshipper's mūlamantra eleven times and then meditate.

31. He should invoke the pūjāyantra (the yantra on which rituals are made) of his own there. He should invoke the deity there and after bathing it he should offer rituals with upacāras mentally.

32-34. After making obeisance to the deity seated on the throne, the wise worshipper should bow down to the water. The water is born in the form of Viṣṇu of incomparable splendour. They are the support unto all beings. I bow them (waters). After repeating this and bowing down, the aspirant shall close the seven openings of the head and should plunge into the water. He should continue to repeat the mūlamantra and recall in mind the form of his deity. He shall dip into the water thrice and pour water on his head with Kumbhamudrā.

35. One should perform the ablution of one's body three times with the mūlamantra and four times with other mantras. O sage, the four mantras as mentioned in the Tantras are recounted to you.

36. With the desire to create the entire universe the semen comes out again and again. The waters are the goddesses, the mothers of all beings. May they sanctify me.

1. Dhenumudrā or Gomudrā is defined as follows : Clasp both the palms of the hand and put all the fingers inside the joints of them, then touch the tip of the middle fingers of the right hand with the forefingers of the left and vice versa. Similarly, touch the tip of the ring fingers with the little fingers and vice versa.

2. Cakramudrā is defined thus : The little finger of the right hand lies inside the thumb of the right hand and similarly the little finger of the left hand lies inside the left thumb, then the fingers of the both hands remain straight but the position of hands will change, i.e. right comes to the left and vice-versa and then all the stretched fingers will touch one another.

37. Misfortunes are lying in all beings in the form of impurities. The waters, the goddesses wash it off by their touch. May they sanctify me.

38. O apaḥ (waters), Obeisance unto you. May the waters dispel the misfortune that is in my hair, my head, on my forehead, in my ears and in my eyes.

39. May I have longevity, health, riches, the pleasure born of the annihilation of the band of enemies, contentment, forbearance, faith in God (āstikya) and learning. Obeisance unto you all.

40. One should drink water from the śālagrāma stone after drinking water with which the feet of the brahmin have been washed. No one should do anything otherwise. This is the invincible rule.

The śākta form of ācamana is as follows. It begins with vāk=aim, lajjā=hrīṁ and śrī=srīm and ends with svāhā. The ācamana of brahmins is said to be with vāk, lajjā and śrī=aim, hrīm, śrīm and is the bestower of wealth.

54-55. Thereafter, he should make the tilaka (a sectarian mark) on his forehead neatly in the shape of a mace. A mark like the sword of Kṛṣṇa named Nandaka must be made on the chest, and the marks of the śaṅkha (conch) and cakra (wheel) on the two arms. The wise devotee should then make the marks of the (bow) śārṅga and the arrow one after. He shall make similar marks at the roọt of the ears, at the sides, on the back, at the navel and on the head.

56-58. These are to be done by a Vaiṣṇava with the clay taken from the holy rivers etc. (The Śaivas) after taking ashes from the agnihotra fire repeat the mantra beginning with : Tryambakam (yajāmahe etc.) or the mantra beginning with agniriti bhasma, vāyuriti bhasma etc. He shall then make five marks uttering five names of Tatpuruṣa, Aghora, Sadyojāta etc. on the forehead, shoulders, belly and chest. The follower of Śiva does this. The follower of Sakti shall make triangular marks or the mark as does a woman.

59-60. After performing sandhyā rites according to the vedas, he should perform the Tāntrikī Sandhyā. After sipping water according to the method he should invoke the holy water as before. Then with the Kuśa grass he should sprinkle water on the ground three times. He shall sprinkle that water on his head seven times.

61-63. Thereafter he should perform prāṇāyāma and ṣaḍaṅganyāsa (placement of mantras in six limbs). Then he should take water in the palm and cover it with the right hand. When the water has turned black, it should be discharged by means of piṅgalā in front ofhim (on his right palm). He should cast it on the ground by uttering the astra (phaṭ) mantra conceiving the ground to be made of adamantine stone.

66-68. This is called aghamarṣaṇa rite which dispels all sins. Then the knower of mantras should wash his hands and perform the ācamana rite as before. The knower of the mantras shall get up and place flowers in a copper vessel. Repeating the mūlamantra he should offer the arghya to the deity stationed in the disc of the sun. After offering the arghya three times with the mantra he should think of the presence of the deity in the sun.

69. He shall perform the japa of Gāyatrī one hundred and eight times according to his own Kalpa or twentyeight times and then dedicate it by uttering the mantra guhya.[1]

CHAPTER SIXTYSEVEN

Sanat Kumāra Said :

1-3. Henceforth, I shall recount the worship of devas, which bestows desired ends on the aspirant. After drawing a triangle or a square, to his left, one should worship it and then wash it with astra = phaṭ and placing the ādhāra (support of the vessel) with hṛt = namaḥ. Then placing the camasa the vessel on the support, he should fill it with water while meditating there the disc of the sun and repeating the alphabets in their ascending order (vilomamātṛkā).

4. He shall worship the disc of the moon thereafter invoking the holy tīrthas as before. Then he should make it (the water) turn into nectar by means of gomudrā and should cover it with Kavaca = hūm.

5. After washing it with astra = phaṭ, he shall then perform the japa of praṇava = om, eight times over it. This is called sāmānyārgha (an arghya for the general purpose) and the bestower of all attainments.

6. The excellent sādhaka shall take a little water from the prokṣaṇī vessel and sprinkle himself as well as the articles to be used in the ritual separately.

7. He should make a triangle inside two intersecting triangles in front of him and to his left. It should be surrounded by a square and washed by the water from the argha vessel.

8-9. The excellent sādhaka should arrest it by means of śaṁkhamudrā. He should then worship the four limbs (aṅgas) beginning with hṛt = namaḥ in the four corners from south-east to north-east. He shall worship the middle portion with netra = vauṣaṭ and the quarters with astra = phaṭ. He shall then worship the triangle, the ādhāraśakti (the power as support) as present in the middle by means of mūlamantra.

10. Thus worshipping duly as washed by means of astra-phaṭ and established by means of hṛt = namaḥ, he should place the tripādikā (a three-legged stool) and worship it by means of the following mantra.

11. (Namo vahnimaṇḍalāya daśakalātmane amuka arghya pātrāsanāya namaḥ) I bow to the disc of the fire having Kalās and which is the receptacle of the seat for the person referred to here.

12. The mantra for the purpose of worshipping the support (ādhāra) consists of twentyfour letters. He shall then place the conch washed with its own mantra = phaṭ and then worship.

13. (He should utter) tāra = om in the beginning, then mahan, then jalacarāya, then varma = hum phaṭ, hṛdayam (?) (svāhā), pāñcajanyāya, hṛdayam = namaḥ (om mahājalacarāya hum phaṭ svāhā pāñcajanyāyā namaḥ).

14. He should then worship the disc of the sun consisting of twelve kalās and adding the name of the deity referred to with its relation to the verse of the arghya and then add namaḥ in the end. (arkamaṇḍalāya dvādaśakalātmane amuka arghyapātrāya namaḥ). It has three times two syllables (?)

15-17. After worshipping thereby, one shall worship the twelve kalās of the sun in due order. Therefore, he shall fill the conch by means of pure water reciting the mūlamantra (the principal mantra) and the letters of alphabets in the ascending order (i.e. from kṣa to a) and then worship it with the following mantra.

Om obeisance to the disc of the moon consisting of sixteen kalās and which is of the nature of nectar and has taken the form of the arghya of the deity referred to here (Om somamaṇḍalāya ṣoḍaśakālātmane amuka arghyapātrāya namaḥ). The mantra for the purpose of worshipping the arghya is the kalās of the moon.

18. Therefore, the holy rivers are invoked repeating 'O Gaṅgā' etc. as before. He should make it turn into nectar by means of Gomudrā. He shall then cover it with Matsyamudrā.

19. He shall cover it with kavaca = hum and guard it again with astra = phaṭ. Meditating on the desired deity he should show mudrās.

20. (The learned man should show in due order) śaṅkha,[1] musala, paramīkaraṇa and then the mudrās called mahāmudrā, yonimudrā.

1. Śaṅkhamudrā is defined thus: Clench the right fist facing upward and place the thumb of the left hand in place of the tight palm where all the

21. The gāruḍī[1] and gālinī[2] are known to be the chiefest of the mudrās. He should worship the deity there by means of sandal paste and flowers after recalling the deity in his mind.

22. He should repeat the principal mantra eight times and the praṇava also eight times. He shall place the prokṣaṇī vessel to the southern side of the conch.

23-24. He should take a little water from the prokṣaṇī and sprinkle it thrice. He shall sprinkle himself with that water repeating the following three mantras : Om obeisance to ātmatattva, to vidyātattva and to śivatattva adding om and hṛt =namaḥ. The intelligent devotee should worship duly the diagram (maṇḍala) with flowers and akṣatas (raw rice grains).

2. Gālinīmudrā : Place two palms of the hand close to each other and then bring the little finger of the left hand close to the thumb of the right hand and similarly place the little finger of the right hand close to the thumb of the left hand and keep them tightly. Then join all the remaining fingers i.e. the fore with the fore, the middle with the middle and the ring with the ring.

May they be pleased with us and be givers of boons after being worshipped with all ingredients and made fully satisfied. (amukāvaraṇa devatā sālaṅkārās sāṅgāḥ saparicārikāḥ savāhanāḥ sāyudhāḥ sarvopacārakaiḥ sampūjitāḥ tarpitāḥ varadāḥ santu—this is the mantra).

81-82. At the end of the mūlamantra, uttering the mantra (just mentioned) he should offer everything to the deity. He should say : O lord, favourably disposed towards those who seek refuge, grant unto me the object of my desire. I offer this presentation of worshipping such and such āvaraṇa deity to you with devotedness. After saying this, he should cast the handful of flowers on the head of the lord.

83. Then the attending deities as mentioned in the kalpas should be worshipped. He should worship Indra and others equipped with their respective weapons and placed in their respective quarters.

84. They are Indra, Agni, Yama, Rakṣas, Varuṇa, Pavana, the moon, Iśāna, and Brahmā and in the bottom the lord of the serpents.

He shall then get up and pray to his favourite deity.

He shall make an altar on the right hand side of him and perform its consecratory rite.

89. The looking at the altar is to be done with the mūlamantra, the sprinkling of it with astra (phaṭ), the striking to be done by kuśa grass, abhyukṣaṇa (sprinkling over) by varma = hum. Then he should make a nyāsa of vasu.

90-92. He should kindle the fire and after intensifying it he should perform homa after meditating on the desired deity. He shall then perform mahāvyāhṛti homa separately and then collectively with ghee, cooked rice, gingelly seeds or milk pudding. The excellent sādhaka shall perform twentyfive oblations with ghee. After offering homa with mahāvyāhṛti, he shall again offer worship to the deity with sandal pastes etc. Then inviting the deity of the fire to the idol of the pīṭha, he should dismiss it.

93. O vahni of great power, O achiever of holy rites, even when another holy rite befalls me, be gracefully present.

94-97. After the ritualistic dismissal he shall offer ācamanīya to the fire-god. By means of the havis left over, he should offer oblations to the attendants of the deity as mentioned before along with sandal pastes, fragrant flowers and akṣatas "May all Rudras who are the doers of terrific activities, who are the dwellers of dreadful abode, may the Yoginīs of terrible forms, may the overlords of the Gaṇas and others who act as obstacles and who resort to various quarters and their interstices, may all these accept this bali with delightful minds". Thus he shall offer oblations in the eight quarters and perform bhūtabali (oblations to the goblins) again.

98. By means of dhenumudrā he shall make the drinking water change into nectar and offer ācamanīya again into the hand of the deity.

99. After ritualistically dismising the lord stationed in the mūrti, he shall re-unite him there itself. He shall give naivedya (food-offering) to different ucchiṣṭabhojins (those who partake of the leavings of food)

100. The following are the ucchiṣṭabhojins viz. Caṇḍeśa of Maheśvara (Śiva), Vıṣvaksena of Viṣṇu, Caṇḍāṁśu of Taraṇi (sun), Vakratuṇḍa of Gaṇeśa and Caṇḍāli of Śakti.

101. Thereafter, he shall remember the sage etc and perform the mūlaṣaḍaṅga nyāsa. After repeating the japa of the mantra according to his ability he should offer it to the deity.

102. You are protector of the secret of secrets. Accept this japa performed by us. O lord, by your grace, may siddhi (attainment) lying with you be mine.

103-104. Then he should place the arghya turned back and worship it with flowers. Obeisance to you of eight limbs with hands, feet, knees, chest, head, eyes, mind or speech. Obeisance to you having five limbs with the hands, feet, knees, head or speech. In worship both of them are the most distinguished.

105. The knower of mantras should perform obeisance by prostrating like a staff. He should perform circumambulations two for Viṣṇu, one for Soma, seven for the Sun and three for Vighneśvara.

106-109. Then the knower of the mantra should recite hymns etc. with devotion (Then taking water in his palm he should utter beginning with itaḥpūrvam) 'previously' by virtue of my possession of prāṇa (vital energy), buddhi (intellect and the physical body with their attributes, he should state after, during the various conditions of waking, dreaming and deep sleep,whatever has been done by the mind. hands, feet, belly, penis, whatever is remembered, after this he should mention, 'whatever has been uttered, has been done, may that be dedicated entirely to Brahman, then he should say two ṭhas=svāhā. I dedicate myself and whatever is mine to Viṣṇu. The mantra is known to be 'Oṁ tat sat Brahmārpaṇamastu'.

110-117. The mantra beginning with praṇava=om having sixtyfour letters ($8 \times 8 = 64$) should be used for surrendering oneself. It behoves you to forgive everything if it is deficient or superfluous due to ignorance, or due to blunder or due to lack of materials. O Īśa, O storehouse of mercy, kindly forgive if anything is done otherwise, or if it is devoid of articles, deficient in any rite or deficient in mantras. O Lord, whatever has been done by me in the states of waking, dreaming and deep sleep may be conducive to my prosperity. It shall be your worship. Those who stumble on the ground, have the ground itself as their support. O Lord, those who offend you have only you as their refuge. I have no other refuge, hence you alone are my refuge.

O Parameśvara, hence you forgive me. Thanks to your merciful nature. Thousands of crimes are being committed by me day and night. O Lord of the worlds, forgive the same considering that I am but your slave. I do not know āvāhana (invocation) neither do I know visarjana (dismissal). O great lord, I do not know your worship as well, you alone are my goal.

After praying thus the knower of the mantras should utter the verse at the end of the mūlamantra.

118. 'O Lord of the universe, the immanent one, go, O go to your supreme abode of which Brahmā and other gods and even Sadāśiva do not have any knowledge'.

119-120. Repeating the above verse he should offer handful of flowers and then by means of saṁhāramudrā,[1] he should place the deity along with its attending deities in the lotus heart by means of suṣumnāpatha.

The wise worshipper should inhale the fragrance of the flower and thus perform the ritualistic dismissal of it.

One should never worship two śaṅkhas, cakras, śilās (śālagrāma), liṅgas, two idols of Vighneśvaras, two of suns and three Śaktis together. It is conducive to misery.

1. Saṁhāramudrā : Place the left hand down-faced and place the palm of the right hand facing upward. Then attach tightly each finger with the each, i.e. the little with the little, the fore with the fore, the ring with the ring and then transverse the position of the hand i.e. the left comes to the right and vice versa.

121-124. The holy water from the feet of Viṣṇu is auspicious. It wards off premature death and it is the destroyer of all ailments. It reduces all sins. The naivedya (food offering) to the different deities shall be taken by the respective devotees. Śiva's nirmālya (remains of worship), leaves, flowers, fruits or even water should not be partaken of. By the contact of śāla-grāma stone everything is rendered pure.

O Nārada, worshipping is said to be of five kinds.

125. They are āturi (pertaining to the sick) sautikī (that of the polluted), trāsī (that of the frightened), sādhanābhāvinī (the articles for the worship are mentally conceived) and daurbodhī (that which is done by ignorant people). Listen to the characteristics of them in their order.

126-129. One who is sick shall not take bath, or perform japa or pūjā. He shall witness other person's worship. Looking at the idol or the disc of the sun he shall bow down or recollecting the mantra he should offer handful of flowers. When sickness is cured he shall take bath. He shall then bow down to and worship his preceptor. He shall then pray as follows : 'By your grace, O lord of the universe, O storehourse of mercy, worthy of being worshipped by the world, let no defect arise in me on account of the break in the pūjā'. He shall show honour to the Brāhmaṇas and propitiate them according to his capacity. Then on receiving their blessings he should worship the lord as before.

130-132. The pūjā called āturi has been recounted. Now the sautikī form is being explained.

Sūtaka is said to be of two forms : One is named jātaka and the other is mṛtaka i.e. due to the nativity of a child and death. The devotee should take his bath and perform sandhyā mentally with concentration. He should worship the deity mentally and make a japa of the mantra. When the period of pollution is over he shall worship the preceptor and the brahmans as before. After securing their blessings he should resume daily rites. This is called sautiki form of worship. The type called trāsi is being explained now.

133-135. When one is afraid of wicked people one worships the lord with whatever form of service one finds available or mentally. This is called trāsī. If there is deficiency of the means of worship in everything, he should worship the lord with flowers, leaves or fruits or worship mentally. This is called sadbhāvanābhāvinī. O Nārada, now listen to Daurbodhi type of worship.

136. Women, old people, children and ignorant people do this out of ignorance, hence it is called daurbodhī.

137-140. The aspirant should perform pūjā in any of the above ways. One who is devoid of worship of the lord certainly goes to hell. After performing the rites of Vaiśvadeva etc. he should feed the best of brahmins. Afterwards he shall partake of what has been offered unto the lord with his near relatives. He shall rinse his mouth and make his mouth and face pure. Then take a little rest and then listen to the purāṇas, itihāsas etc along with his kinsmen. One who is able to perform the best of alternatives but performs with the substitute he, the wicked-minded person, will get a doubtful result.

CHAPTER SIXTYEIGHT

Gaṇeśa Mantra

Śri Sanatkumāra said :

1. Henceforth, I shall describe the mantras of Gaṇeśa that bestow all desired objects. O leading brāhmaṇa by propitiating Gaṇeśa the aspirant shall attain worldly pleasures and liberation.

2-5.[1] The immutable, the consort of Viṣṇu, the wife of Śambhu, mīnaketana, smṛti, māṁsa adorned with indu and manu and with the moon in the crest, Gaṇapati in the dative, then at the end vara varada be added, then at the end of sarva

---

1. The combination of the mantra is as follows :
Oṁ Śriṁ hrīm klīm glaum
Gaṇapataye Vara Varada sarvajanam me vaśamānaya svāhā.

one should utter janam, then add me vaśam ānaya bring them all to my control. This mantra ends in vahnipriyā 'svāhā' with twentyeight letters.

Its sage is Gaṇaka, the metre nivṛt Gāyatrī etc. the presiding deity is gaṇeśa. The Bīja is six Śaktis beginning with a and the application of it (the mantra) is for the propitiation of Mahāgaṇapati.

6. The excellent sādhaka should place the sage (of the mantra) on the head, the metre on the face, the deity on the heart, the bījas in the private parts and śaktī in the feet.

7. The bīja is possessed of six long vowels which again are to be joined with the bīja, then he the knower of mantras should make the placement of letters in six limbs with the jāti = (namaḥ, svāhā etc.)

8. The mudrās as known to belong to Śiva are to be placed in six of the limbs. He should make the placement (nyāsa) beginning with gām from the feet to the navel and also the region of bhū.

9. From the navel to the throat he should place gīm and others and the bhuva region. The syllable gūm etc and the region of svar are to be placed from the throat to the head.

10-11.[1] The vyāpaka nyāsa (the extended one) is to be done with mūlamantra (the principal mantra). This is called bhuvana nyāsa. After uttering the mūlamantra one should utter the mātṛkā then there should be the mūla and namaḥ in place of mātṛkā. Thus he should proceed upto the letter kṣa, then he should make the extended nyāsa with the principal mantra.

avyaya=om. viṣṇuvanitā=śrīm, śambhustrī=hrīm. mīnaketana=klim, smṛti=ga, māmsa=la. indu=. manu=au, candraśekhara=., Gaṇapati in the dative= gaṇapataye vara, varada, sarvalokam me vaśamānaya, vahnipriyā= svāhā.

1. These verses give indication how Varṇa nyāsa is to be performed. The direction has been given in Prapañcasāra-saṁgraha, pp. 431. First utter Mahāgaṇapati mantra then put the first syllables of the vowels with bindu, then place the mahāgaṇapati mantra ending with namaḥ. This should be continued upto Kṣa. The method of Padanyāsa is as follows. Say Tatpuruṣāya namaḥ. Vidmahe namaḥ, Vakratuṇḍāya namaḥ. dhīmahi namaḥ, tannamaḥ, no namaḥ, dantiḥ namaḥ. praçodayānnamaḥ. These are the eight divisions and the syllebles of the mantra are to be placed in the eight limbs of the body.

12-13. The placement with letters has been mentioned. Now padanyāsa (the placement with pada = words) is being mentioned. The words of the mūlagāyatrī divided into eight portions of syllables containing five, three, five, three, one, one, two and four respectively. (Pañca, tri, vāṇa, vahni, indu, candra, akṣi, nigama) and adding hṛt - namaḥ at the end. They are to be placed on the forehead, in the face, in the neck, in the heart, in the navel, in thighs, on the knees and on the feet. After making the nyāsa he should make the extended one with the mūla.

14-16. He should say—'tatpuruṣāya' and then say at the end of it 'vidmahe'. After the end of the word, 'vakratuṇḍāya' he should say 'dhīmahi'. Then the word tanno dantiḥ, he should utter the word pracodayāt.[1] This is the mūlagāyatrī which bestows all attainments. After performing this, one should meditate thus in his lotus-heart.

17. "I meditate upon the deity who resembles the rising sun, who is the cause of maintenance and dissolution of the world. He is accompanied with Śakti, well-adorned and has lifted up cakra (discus) and tooth (danta)."

18-20. Thus meditating one shall repeat the mantra four hundred and fortyfour thousand times. He should perform the homa rite with eight kinds of articles in the consecrated fire with one tenth of the number repeated. The eight articles are : sugarcane, fried grain, flour, unripe banana flower, the beaten rice, the sesamum seeds, sweetmeats, coconuts and the parched grain. He should worship the Pīṭha beginning with ādhāraśakti and ending with the Paratattva (the supreme truth).

21. He should inscribe a triangle inside two intersecting triangles (ṣaṭkoṇa) and then outside of it he should draw an eight-petalled lotus. Then outside of them he should draw bhūpura and worship Gaṇeśa there.

22-23. Tīvrā, Jvālinī, Nandā, Bhogadā, Kāmarūpiṇī, Ugrā, Tejovatī, Satyā, and the ninth one is Vighnanāśinī. All these are to be worshipped with hṛdaya = namaḥ in the end.

1. The Gaṇeśa Gāyatrī is as follows :
Tatpuruṣāya vidmahe vakratuṇḍāya dhimahi tanno dantiḥ pracodayāt.

This is called Pīṭhamantra and the āsana (seat) should be given.

24-25. Gaṇādhīśa is to be invoked there and be worshipped in the middle carefully. Outside the triangle in the eastern quarters etc, one should worship Śrī and the consort of Śrī, Gaurī and the consort of Gaurī. He shall worship Rati and the consort of Rati, the earth and the boar.

26-28. He should worship them under the bilva, vaṭa, aśvattha and priyaṅgu trees respectively. Ramā has two lotuses in her hands, Hari holds śaṅkha and cakra (conch and discus), Gaurī holds noose and goad, and Hara holds axe and trident. Rati has a lotus in her hand and Kāma holds the flower arrows and the bow. In the tip of her hands the Earth has the awn of barley and grains, the Boar holds the discus and the iron club. In front of the Lord one should worship Vināyaka accompanied by Lakṣmī.

29-31. He should worship Āmoda etc. with their consorts in the six corners. He should worship Āmoda with Siddhi in front. He should worship Pramoda accompanied by Samṛddhi in the south-east corner. In the same way he should worship Sumukha accompanied by Kīrti in the north-east corner. He should worship Durmukha accompanied by Madanāvatī in the West. He should worship vighna accompanied by Madadravā in South-West corner.
